Regardless of whether something was hidden behind her attitude or not, the way he got on with her hadn't changed. Wilhelm didn't reply to her for a little while. Then, he spoke up.

Wilhelm: "Grimm has Conwood with him. They should be able to handle anything that crops up."

Roswaal: "Wouldn't Grimm-kun have more peace of mind if you yourself were to say something to him?"

Wilhelm: “He prioritized Theresia’s safety and that led to Carol becoming like she is now. What on earth can I say to Grimm to settle his nerves?!”

Roswaal: “You sure are tactless, aren’t you? I guess it was far too early for me to have said that you’ve given up being a sword.”

Wilhelm felt a sense of shame similar to how Grimm was feeling reproachful towards himself.

Ultimately, leaving Stride at large had been Wilhelm’s fault. He’d definitely had his chances to lop off his head both at Picoutatte and at the Astrea Residence.

If only he’d seized those opportunities then… He couldn’t help but think that way.

Roswaal: “—I’m sorry, but can we stop for juuuuust a little bit?”

Wilhelm: “—. All troops. Halt. A-ttention.”

Wilhelm swiftly responded to Roswaal’s sudden call to stop their march. Everyone stopped in their tracks as soon as the command had been issued and shifted their attention towards them.

With them as the focus of their attention, Roswaal took something out from between her large breasts. She brought out a thumb-sized crystal which was fastened to a thin chain.

Wilhelm: “He gave you that?”

Roswaal: “I received this from Cragrell-dono of the Alliance. It seems like Libre Fermi got it from Sphinx and used it as proof of passage to the Refuge.”

Wilhelm: “Libre, huh.”

Wilhelm gave a small frown at Roswaal’s explanation, the crystal now in her hand.

Wilhelm was acquainted with Libre Fermi as well, having crossed swords with him personally. He’d been renowned as the strongest swordsman in the Demi-Human Alliance.

In fact, Wilhelm had almost been killed by Libre.

He hadn't ended up dead thanks to luck intervening—No, he hadn't ended up dead thanks to his comrades back then saving him one after the other. Amongst them, Bordeaux's adjutant, Pivot had lost his life to protect Wilhelm.

In the end Libre too had been betrayed by Sphinx and his corpse had ended up being toyed with.

Wilhelm: "You said Libre gave that to Cragrell before he died right?"

Roswaal: "Yeah because he was the most realistic person who was looking for a compromise to end the Civil War. It looked like Cragrell-dono was going to hide it inside his belly until he died though… Hey, what's the matter?"

Wilhelm: "…He was hiding it inside his belly?!"

Part of what she'd said made him double take. Hearing his confusion, Roswaal tilted her head wonderingly, and said,

Roswaal: "I'm not exaggerating, he put it inside of his stomach. It's a greaaaat place to hide things."

Wilhelm: "He was really carrying that around in there like it's the most normal thing in the world…?"

Roswaal: "Strangely enough, the fact that you were raised posh is slowly trickling out from you."

With a wry smile, Roswaal raised the crystal that had been sitting inside of someone else's stomach up for everyone to see. A faint light appeared inside the white crystal when she did, and following that, a beam of light pierced straight into the fog up ahead. The beam continued to stretch out deep into the fog without showing signs of stopping and probably stretched out into the far yonder—

Wilhelm: "It must mean that the Witch's Refuge is around."

Roswaal: “It should be the Testing Grounds which served as Sphinx’s base. However, although we have the proof of passage, its effective range isn’t dependable. We’ll have to take care from here, won’t we.”

Roswaal made a pedantic correction to Wilhelm’s statement. Then she nodded towards the depths of the fog. From here on out, they’d have to be more on their guard just as she’d warned them.

Wilhelm: “Grimm, can you promise me that you won’t run off ahead?”

Grimm: “…”

Wilhelm had named Grimm as he was the person who was most acutely aware of impending danger in the Corps. Having been called out, Grimm stepped forward, his usual happy-go-lucky face tensing up.

Grimm: “…e~~t me oo it eas~~e.”

Grimm raised his Greatshield up, telling him “Let me do it please.” The sigil engraved into his shield was the Remendis one, of Carol’s lineage. Carol had given him the shield during the Civil War so the way he handled it was something which he took utmost care of.

His current determination was just as if he’d sworn on his shield. Thus he could only believe in him.

Roswaal “Here you go.”

Roswaal handed over the crystal to Grimm. He firmly took ahold of the glintstone and turned towards where the beam of light was pointing to. Then he started to walk with the Zergev Corps in his tow.

Wilhelm: “All troops, follow Grimm. Be wary of any traps set by the Witch or attacks from those bastards.”

Urging his Corps members to keep their guard up, Wilhelm too followed in Grimm’s wake with his hand on his sword’s pommel. Roswaal followed behind him, chuffed that their surroundings had been strengthened by the brave men of the Zergev Corps.

Wilhelm: "…"

Is this dampness against my skin due to the fog or from me sweating?

He felt like his senses were getting more and more impaired the further he walked into the fog. It must be the strange powers of the fog which had been left by the Witch that kept people at bay. He couldn't hear the sounds of the wind and his own breathing anymore, and his sight was so covered in white that he was almost blind.

All he could do was follow the guiding light.

Silently, silently following in Grimm's wake (who was following the light's path foremostly) and that guiding light.

How much time had passed since they'd set out?

Wilhelm: "The fog."

Suddenly, Wilhelm became aware that his sight had become clearer and that the world that had been enveloped in thick fog had become brighter. A sense of excitement reflexively stirred up in his voice. He masked it by wiping away at the sweat on his forehead.

Then, he went up to Grimm's side and clapped him on his shoulder.

Wilhelm: "Grimm we've crossed the most difficult part for now, after this we…"

???: "—It seems you've gotten used to captaincy, haven't you? Wilhelm."

Wilhelm: "…"

Wilhelm froze in surprise at that clear-sounding reply which Grimm shouldn't have been able to return. However, his surprise was immediately replaced by a different kind of surprise.

And that was because the voice didn't belong to Grimm, yet he knew who it belonged to.

There's no way he should be hearing this person's voice. That was imp—

???: "It's not just the young lord, but you too that I didn't think would change this much. This is quite the pleasant miscalculation."

The man speaking to him was an elegant looking one with long chestnut coloured hair cascading down his back. Wilhelm was reflected in his eyes, behind the monocle that adorned his left one. The corners of his lips curved up into a smile.

He remembered that expression. That smile was tucked away in memories that seemed a little faraway.

His name was—

Wilhelm: "—Pivot?"

His former camarade de guerre who'd saved his life and died for it was now smiling at him at the end of the fog.

6

???: "…"

Theresia passed the time restlessly sat beside the still sleeping Carol.

It had been four days since Wilhelm had left for Shamrock Valley—The plan had been to make their way there to see if they could find anything at the Witch's Refuge that had been used by the Demi-Human Alliance.

Theresia stretched out her hand to Carol's sleeping face as her own wishful thoughts overlapped with what had been arranged. She gently brushed away the golden fringe that lay against her forehead and then traced her eyebrows with her finger.

Her typical purpose-kept stiff expression became surprisingly gentle when she was asleep. She never really showed it in public but she looked really sweet when she smiled. Theresia felt a small tinge of pride that she was able to keep that knowledge all to herself; though, it was quite a dilemma as well.

Theresia: “It’s really such a waste that only I know what a cute girl Carol truly is.”

So when Carol had told her she was going out with Grimm (whilst stuttering out excuses upon excuses let’s add), Theresia’s had burst into both joy and loneliness. If the guy Carol had been going out with hadn’t been Grimm then Theresia would have most likely felt extremely jealous. Well, actually, she was feeling jealous of Grimm too, but it definitely would have been worse than now.

What am I even going to do with Carol?

Theresia: “I can’t really say that I’m like her Mistress. And if I said Friend Carol would get bashful and show her displeasure. —Sisters is the closest I guess.”

Theresia thought herself more as being the big sister even though Carol was older than her. Carol too thought of herself as something close to that so the “Who’s the Big Sister Dispute” remained unsettled.

Theresia: “…Would it be fine to concede this now to Carol when she wakes up?”

She could say that this would be a pretty big concession from herself. Carol ought to leap up and bask in the honor of her leniency. Theresia’s attitude meant that she’d handed her the victory of their long, long dispute.

Carol: Th-This is too great of an honor, Theresia-sama. But, would, would that really be okay? I’m still not mature enough…

Theresia: “Heheh.”

Theresia giggled out loud, knowing perfectly well what Carol would say. However, the actual Carol wasn’t blushing or awestruck by Theresia’s words since she was still sleeping.

And that was connected to Theresia's sense of dismay. She was fully aware that she was unconsciously acting like a spoiled child.

All she'd ever done was place burdens on Carol ever since the Demi-Human War. In the end, when she looked back on it, she hadn't changed one bit.

Theresia: "…"

Theresia shook her head and took a cup from the tabletop which had been placed nearby in the hospital room. She placed the cup to her mouth and took a sip. The tea really didn't taste good even though she'd brewed it herself.

It was as if her anxiety was increasing so much to the point where she'd forgotten even what she liked. Recently there'd been many of these strange occurrences.

It wasn't just with tea, there'd been many instances where food and spices had felt off to her too. She also felt rather miserable that she was posing the blame for her terrible emotional distress on her surroundings.

Theresia: "I can't keep going on like this though. My mother and father will get worried."

Her parents were coming from the main Astrea residence to the Royal Capital today to check on Carol's condition as had been pre-arranged. They too considered Carol like a daughter.

Theresia wasn't at all sure if she'd have the resolve in herself to leave the hospital room in time despite saying she'd go out and meet them.

—She'd let Carol suffer like this whilst she was away. And neither Grimm or Wilhelm could be at her side, so at a time like this, she couldn't leave her side.

Theresia let out a pensive sigh with that in mind. And, immediately as she did—

???: "—sia… sama?"

Theresia: “Eh?”

Theresia instinctively rushed over to Carol’s bed in response to that faint voice. For a moment, she wondered whether she’d mistaken the voice for the sound of the wind, but there’s no way she would have ever mistaken that particular voice.

Theresia: “Carol?”

She placed her hand onto the bed and gently brought her other one to the supine Carol’s cheek. Carol groggily narrowed her eyes to her palm’s touch,

Carol: “Your hand’s…”

Theresia: “What’s wrong with it? My hand’s…”

Carol: “Cold. Careful not to get too cold…”

She’d woken up and her first words had been those; Theresia blinked her eyes in astonishment at that. Her words had been rather typical for her so Theresia quickly understood that this wasn’t a dream.

Theresia: “Oh my gosh Carol, thank goodness! I was really, really worried…”

Carol: “Ah, I’m… Where’s Grimm?”

Theresia: “Already the Grimm-kuns are starting right after you wake up? No, it’s okay. Today I’ll let you off. I’ll let you off, so… ah no, wait up. I have to get the master of healing!”

Theresia flusteredly replied to Carol whose voice was barely a scrap of whisper. She then wiped away the tears that had welled up in her eyes with her sleeve and rushed out of the hospital room. The knights who were guarding Theresia got pretty agitated seeing the state she was in. But they too erupted into joy when they looked into the hospital room and noticed that Carol had woken up.

Theresia: “Wilhelm… Grimm-kun…! Carol woke up, she woke up…!”

Theresia reported the news to her husband and friend (who of course weren’t there) as she sprinted down the corridor. It’s not like they could do anything about it. But she hoped they’d both come back safely after.

With that hope in mind, Theresia rushed past the mage, Garritch, without even looking at him.

It ended up with Garritch giving both the Knights and Theresia a good scolding for kicking up such a racket in the hospital with spittle flying from his mouth, along with Theresia’s parents, who had been worried sick when their daughter hadn’t come to meet them. That was after she’d given them the news.

—Still no one could notice the footsteps of the Destruction Wish steadily creeping forward.

Act Three

1

—The scenery around the valley now that the fog had cleared up was far more peaceful than he'd imagined.

With Shamrock Valley situated near the marshlands there was always an unpleasant wind blowing about. The rocky crags here were covered in moss and bogs littered the area; needless to say this made traversing the area a chore.

Thus the vibrant greenery that had painted the landscape and the chilly, serene breeze blowing by felt really weird to him.

Wilhelm: "That, and it makes no sense as well that you, being dead and all, are walking alongside me."

Pivot: "So why are you telling that to the dead man himself? I just said that you've gotten used to captaincy and that I'm pleased with your growth… Though it seems like your impudent streak is alive and kicking."

Wilhelm: "As for you, you ought to look more dead. Your face looks full of life."

Wilhelm let out a snort and then scowled at the long-haired man walking beside him—at Pivot.

The dead should look like the dead: these words were neither a metaphor or a joke, they were just plain fact. This man, Pivot Arnancy, had lost his life in the Civil War several years ago and had long departed from this world.

So their reunion right now was an impossible one.

In the first place, the figures of Roswaal and the members of the Zergev Corps who'd accompanied them were nowhere to be seen. So there was only one possibility he could think of in this situation, unless he'd been instantly hurled off to a faraway land or he'd been dropped into the lands of the dead when he'd gotten lost in the fog.

—And that possibility was that this wasn't really happening.

Pivot: "You're being overly hasty. During the Civil War there were those secret arts of the Witch that raised the dead, right? What if me being here is related to that?"

Wilhelm: "That Witch didn't make people come back to life, she just made their corpses into her puppets. The you here doesn't look like her puppet… That's why you're…"

Pivot: "…"

Pivot almost looked like he was enjoying himself and that made Wilhelm cut himself off mid-sentence. Pivot narrowed his eyes behind his monocle as a silence grew between them.

Pivot: "That's why I'm?"

Wilhelm: "—. That's why you're definitely dead and haven't come back to life. You're just a phony."

Pivot: "What cruel remarks. Were my heart weak, you might have been able to kill me just with the sharpness of those words, like that of a blade."

Pivot brought one of his hands to his chest and muttered those words out following Wilhelm's declaration. Then he, having been treated as a phony, continued to speak and said "But in fact,."

Pivot: "Words didn't kill me, but a blade most assuredly did."

Wilhelm: "…"

Pivot: "The look on your face didn't change, not one bit. Now that's Wilhelm Trias for you."

Wilhelm: "So did you come here now to voice your grudges against me?"

Wilhelm didn't understand what sort of intentions he had in mind speaking like he was making fun of his own death. However, Pivot voiced his denial to his blunt question with a “Not at all.”

Pivot: “What you just said about grudges, it’s too late for those sorts of things. I’ve got limits in regards to starting off on the wrong foot even if I’ve become like a hollow and appeared before you.”

Wilhelm: “Then why is it that you showed your face.”

Pivot: “Well, let’s see. Wilhelm, why have I?”

Wilhelm: “How am I supposed to know?”

Pivot replied like he was teasing him and then chuckled at him as he grew more irritated.

Wilhelm: “…Were you always like this?”

Wilhelm was wary about Pivot with his behavior seeming quite frivolous.

The Pivot that Wilhelm had known had been a calm, cool and collected man. He’d supported Bordeaux in both public and private as master and vassal; on top of that he’d also been the kind of person who always tried to keep what he said relevant to the topic at hand.

Having been the deputy commander of Bordeaux’s Zergev Corps, he’d often commanded them on behalf of Bordeaux as he’d had a penchant for getting into the thick of things in the frontlines. His composed decisions and precise instructions were like the picture of what a commander ought to be, to the point that right now, even Wilhelm was learning a lot from him back then.

However, when you took away that impression of his position and his talents—

Pivot: “Are you and I so close that we can talk about our impressions of each other?”

Wilhelm: “…”

Pivot: “We did spend 2 years together in the same squad… But our relationship was always one of just associates. We shouldn’t have been so close as to be able to call it one of friendship.”

Wilhelm: “…Yeah. That’s why it’s weird that you’re here.”

Wilhelm agreed with what Pivot had said and then turned his gaze not to him, but to the scenery around him.

Beneath the clear skies lay an unearthly garden of fantasy, a utopia —At least now he was sure that this place wasn’t Shamrock Valley. His real self was still wandering through the fog.

Wilhelm and the dead mingled together in this impossible land of fantasy—

Wilhelm: “So it’s neither out of a grudge or us having been close. Then I’ve no clue why I’ve come face to face with you here.”

More specifically, what was it that Pivot wanted to make Wilhelm do?

Pivot: “Well, let’s not get so flustered. How about we sit down and try and talk about it?”

Wilhelm: “Sorry, but I prioritize the living. I have no time to care about you… about the dead. If you understand that then hurry up and put me back where I came from.”

Pivot: “Words that lacked any consideration towards the dead, that too is like the old Wilhelm Trias. Though for me it’d be more accurate if I’d said the Wilhelm I know rather than the old Wilhelm.”

Wilhelm: “PIVOT—tch.”

A fierce sword aura emanated from Wilhelm directed towards Pivot who’d tried to continue their leisurely talk.

Having no intention of drawing out the conversation, Wilhelm reached for his Beloved Sword on his waist. He would not stay for any longer. He sharpened his eyes, conveying that intention.

Wilhelm: “If you’re going to stop me, I’ll…”

Pivot: “You’ll cut me down and move on forward. That too is like Wilhelm Trias. If you can, though.”

Wilhelm: “You think I can’t?”

Pivot: “Yeah, I do. That’s why I am here.”

He’d had his threat brushed aside very easily and for a moment he was taken by surprise. However, he readily gritted his teeth and tried to draw out his sword.

He’d hold the steel out towards him and give him one last chance. And if that didn’t work out—

Pivot: “—You didn’t pull it out, Wilhelm?”

Wilhelm: “…It should have.”

Wilhelm put some muscle into his arm in response to Pivot’s question. But his right arm, which he’d touched to his Beloved Sword, was trembling slightly and wouldn’t move. His will to fight wasn’t being conveyed to the palm of his hand.

He still couldn’t even draw out his sword before he could decide whether to kill Pivot or not.

Wilhelm: “Wha…”

Pivot: “If you wanted to say “What did you do to me”, then that’s a pointless suspicion. I’m doing nothing to you. I can even swear on the Young Lord, on Grimm, on each of the dead of our squad.”

Wilhelm: “—Hic.”

Pivot’s mannerism was awfully respectful and that enraged Wilhelm, making him draw out his sword.

However, his familiar Beloved Sword gripped within his palm felt incredibly heavy and his arm felt useless as if he’d forgotten how to swing his sword. He realized that his tongue was drenched in awful, bitter saliva.

Pivot: “You managed to draw it out, how splendid. And now what will you do?”

Wilhelm: “Now… I’ll…”

Pivot: “My oh my, your attitude doesn’t seem like that of that Sword Demon. Then I’ll give it to you in the form you best understand.”

Wilhelm had lost his bearings on how to swing his sword down, having been unable to raise his fist up. With Wilhelm embroiled in this turmoil, Pivot threw him a helping hand as if he was saying there’s no helping this. Pivot closed the distance between him and Wilhelm with a single step.

And then—

Pivot: “—Well done.”

Pivot’s words of admiration juxtaposed against a shrill ringing noise. His admiration was because Wilhelm had reflexively swung his sword and parried away his own.

Wilhelm had immediately protected himself from Pivot’s sword after he’d closed the gap to him. The sword had been aiming straight for his neck and if he hadn’t protected himself it would’ve surely been fatal.

Wilhelm: “The hell were you trying to do just now!”

Pivot: “I just thought I’d try and reduce your guilt. If you’re hesitant about killing a defenseless dead acquaintance, then what difference does it make if it’s a hostile dead turncoat?”

Pivot replied indifferently to the enraged Wilhelm, without any shade of malice. Then he muttered “What an awkward position this is, that I’m in right now” as if he was talking about it being someone else’s problem.

Pivot: “Anyways, you needn’t dwell on this, you should be able to achieve your purpose.”

Wilhelm: “My purpose? And what may that be! All I care about is getting back to where I came from! I don’t have any time to fight you here. There’s no point in this!”

Pivot: “It’s rather cruel of you to say there’s no point. Certainly my skills with the sword may appear like mere child’s play compared to yours, but I am still a Knight regardless, and I haven’t thrown that much away.”

Wilhelm: “—tch! Quit talking like that!”

Wilhelm flew into a fit of rage at them communicating like they were on different wavelengths. But Pivot’s expression lit up as if he were enjoying his anger and he swung his sword again as he stepped forward.

Of course, Wilhelm parried that one as well. As sharp as his blow had been, it was far off the Sword Demon’s level. His neck, his side, his belly, below his lower back, he could see countless openings. If he swung his sword at any of those places he’d be able to put him out of action.

He should do that. That’d let him quickly put an end to this phony —

Pivot: “—Look out, the next one’s coming.”

Wilhelm: “—Hic.”

He was forced to take defensive action against Pivot’s next blow before he could start his counterattack.

Pivot’s blows were elegant ones that were fired off with no openings in between them. The battle had turned to one of sheer defense for Wilhelm, as if Pivot’s prowess had vastly improved from the time he knew him.

Pivot: “That can’t be right. You should know that too.”

Wilhelm: “Gh…”

Pivot: “It’s not down to my skill that you’re stuck on the defense, it’s down to your heart. The reason all you’re doing is defending is simply because that’s all you’re doing. You aren’t even mounting one counterattack.”

Wilhelm: “GHAAAA…!”

Wilhelm locked swords with Pivot after he told him the reality of the situation and pushed him back by force. Pivot’s posture crumbled a bit at that impact and Wilhelm tried to slip his sword into the gap that emerged,

???:—Don’t let Wilhelm die!

Wilhelm: “…”

The moment he stepped forward he heard a scream resounding against his eardrums—No, in his mind, and it sounded like it was coughing up blood, a scream that he’d heard once before.

For a split second, that hallucination robbed away his attention. Pivot’s figure was there in front of him. The Knight Sword held in Pivot’s hand sprung into motion, arcing towards Wilhelm who’d stopped in his tracks,

Wilhelm: “GRAAAAAAA—!”

Feeling the signs of cold death nearing him, Wilhelm’s fighting instincts slowly stirred.

He swung his arm as he roared out a battle cry and his sword cut through Pivot’s Knight Sword halfway up the blade. The momentum that his attack had didn’t stop there, instead his flash of silver carried on and cut into Pivot’s lean figure in one fell swoop.

His blade went through from his left shoulder all the way down to his right hand side; he’d cut across his body with a single stroke—Funnily enough, it was the same wound that Pivot had suffered in real life.

Wilhelm: “—Ah.”

Pivot: “Very good, Wilhelm.”

Wilhelm widened his eyes at how savage the wound he’d given him was. Pivot nodded at him as he did so. No blood was coming out from his wound. However, he traced the scar that Wilhelm’s attack had carved into his body with his finger, and said,

Pivot: “Congratulations. —Once again, you survived.”

Wilhelm: “…”

Pivot: “That’s twice you’ve killed a comrade in arms and ended up surviving, Sword Demon.”

His rosy smile and praise morphed into cold words designed to push him away. As Pivot had stated, Wilhelm had for a second time caused his comrade in arms’ death and that made him stiffen. Pivot’s eyes narrowed in delight from behind his monocle at his reaction and then he let out a short sigh.

Pivot: “—Wilhelm Trias. It’ll be your turn next.”

2

Wilhelm: “—Gh.”

The pain coming from Wilhelm’s temple made him grimace for a moment. He firmly gritted his teeth, immediately pushed back the sudden pain and opened his eyes.

A pair of heterochromic eyes were looking at him from in front.

???: “Wilhelm-kun?”

Wilhelm: “…Your face is too close.”

???: “I get that that’s rude for someone who is married, but I’d be grateful if you didn’t blame me for it. At any rate, I’m here because you didn’t reply back to my call.”

The one who’d pulled away from Wilhelm’s somewhat menacing cry had been Roswaal. Wilhelm raised his eyebrows at her words and said “Huh?”

Wilhelm: “You said you called out to me?”

Roswaal: “Hey, hey, what’s up with that. The one who was saying that we needed to keep our wits about us should’ve been you, but isn’t it troooubling that you didn’t manage to do that properly?”

Wilhelm: “…I’m sorry.”

Wilhelm gave her a meek apology as she shrugged her shoulders in an exaggerated manner.

He’d committed an unimaginable blunder and let his guard down even though it shouldn’t have happened. Following what she’d said, whatever happened in this wicked lay of land was of no surprise. Under these circumstances, just the thought of him Losing Himself, even if only for a short while, made him shiver—

Wilhelm: “—?”

Wilhelm noticed something not quite right about that and held his breath. Damp, horrible sweat had been clinging to his brow which he’d wiped with his sleeve, yet a closer look revealed that his entire body was drenched in it, including his back and legs.

He knew straight away when he felt it that it wasn’t due to the lingering fog or the long march.

Wilhelm: “What the?”

This null of several seconds, or perhaps several moments was really starting to worry him.

—It was like he was overlooking something critical.

Wilhelm: “Roswaal, I think something strange is…”

???: “—Wilhelm! Miss Mathers!”

A loud voice called out to him from up ahead as soon as he tried to tell Roswaal about the strange stuff he was experiencing. He saw Conwood running over to them, brushing away at the fog with his arm.

He fixed his eyes on both Wilhelm and Roswaal, and said,

Conwood: “Come to the front! Grimm found something.”

Roswaal: “—! Is that something that thing’s refuge?”

Conwood: “Most likely.”

Roswaal sank her teeth into Conwood’s news with a slight feeling of impatience about her. Conwood confirmed her suspicions and scratched his short hair,

Conwood: “There’s a strange building. Though having said that, Grimm says that it’s not as dangerous as it first appears.”

Roswaal: “If Grimm-kun says that then I definitely believe him at the moment. For now, let’s make our way there. That’s okay with you… Right Wilhelm-kun?”

Wilhelm: “Ah, yeah… It’s okay with me. Let’s go.”

Though he’d been interrupted by their conversation, he gave priority to the things that needed it. After all, the topic he was going to bring up about “His sweat making him feel uneasy” wasn’t something worth mentioning.

So like that, Wilhelm took Roswaal and Conwood with him and headed to the front rank. He ordered his troops to remain on standby and joined up with the guy at the very front. Grimm, who’d volunteered to lead them in the fog, was awaiting them there.

He lifted up the crystal he had in his hand and gave a significant look over at where the light was shining up ahead.

Wilhelm: “—I see, so that’s the one?”

Wilhelm looked over to where the light was shining, and there he saw a white stone building standing leisurely in the world draped by fog—It was the refuge that he’d been told about.

It was likely the dwelling of the Witch who was said to have hidden in Shamrock Valley.

The building was quite large and in area it was almost as large as the Bar in the Royal Capital's Main Street. The bewitching atmosphere it gave off was pretty fitting for this valley of fog, and it looked strange, as Conwood had said.

Nevertheless, he did have some niggling doubts in that it'd never been found despite how much its presence stood out, even when taking into consideration that the land around here was covered in thick fog and home to Witchbeast colonies. This feeling that something wasn't quite right there went beyond being as a result of lackluster surveying or oversights.

Roswaal: "The answer to your question lies in our proof of passage, in this glintstone. Grimm-kun, may I?"

Roswaal, who was standing beside Wilhelm, answered his questions. She covered Grimm's palm, which had the crystal within it, with her own and then she quietly nodded at the refuge. As soon as she'd done that—

Wilhelm: "What kind of crazy trick is this…"

Wilhelm muttered that in a hushed tone when he saw what had happened. The Witch's Refuge, which should have been directly in front of him, had vanished from sight. And when Roswaal moved her hand away and let the light shine again the refuge rose back amidst the fog.

Wilhelm: "So, this means that the Refuge can't be found without this stone's light?"

Roswaal: "This glintstone serves as a proof of passage in the valley, but also as a map for the Refuge and a keeeey. That must be why Cragrell-dono kept it concealed with utmost zeal."

Roswaal too surmised the same thing as Wilhelm. She then took the glintstone from Grimm and handed it over to Conwood.

Roswaal: "Me, Wilhelm-kun and Grimm-kun will go in first. I think we'll probably be okay, but I'd like you to keep shining the light on the building from outside."

Conwood: "Very well, understood… But, won't it be dangerous inside?"

Roswaal: "You shouldn't need to worry about traps. There's no need for them to set any in the first place since you wouldn't be able to see the Refuge without this stone. I'm pretty sure that you shouldn't be able to feel the building even if you touched it when invisible."

Conwood: "That sounds really spooky…"

Conwood shuddered a bit as he listened to Roswaal's explanation.

Roswaal left him to hold the glintstone, and in line with her plan of action, she, Grimm and Wilhelm moved forward towards the Refuge.

Wilhelm: "There's no lock. I guess because it's not necessary?"

The door at the front was made of iron and opened easily on account of it not being locked. Whilst keeping their guard up, Wilhelm and Grimm nodded at each other and went inside. The inside of the building wasn't partitioned into rooms, instead the spacious interior was used as a single room. The floor was covered in dust and a great number of mysterious objects were scattered about on it. There were signs as well that rats, insects and those kinds of creatures were scurrying away from human presence.

Though that was to be expected since the room looked like it hadn't been inhabited by anyone in a while. Reason being that years had passed since the owner's death. He'd imagined that it'd look dilapidated

However, there were also clear unusual signs left behind in this abandoned building.

Wilhelm: "There's quite a ruckus left behind… and some people's footsteps."

Roswaal: "It's pretty likely that they're from Stride's followers. That doesn’t really surprise me.”

Wilhelm stared at the floor and found traces that the house had been searched along with some footprints that had been left in the dust. Roswaal nodded at his information and then continued to speak, saying “Even so,”

Roswaal: “The fact that our enemy’s been here merits a bit of consideration. This place is one you shouldn’t be able to enter without having the proof of passage of the glintstone. If they could break that…”

Wilhelm: “Then?”

Roswaal: “It shows that they either have a very powerful mage on their side or they too own one of these glintstones.”

Wilhelm: “…Setting aside the former of those options, would the latter even be possible?”

Wilhelm racked his brain in thought at Roswaal’s conjecture.

A really skilled mage—When he considered Stride’s aberrancy having someone around like that wasn’t out of the question. But, if it was the latter, then where had he gotten the same glintstone from?

Roswaal: “I dooooon’t know how many of these glintstones Sphinx prepared. We could be holding one that’s mass produced, or maybe…”

Roswaal cut off her words there for a moment, licked her lips and then continued.

Roswaal: “—The glintstone’s owner is cooperating in those guys’ undertaking.”

Wilhelm: “You’re saying… someone who survived the Demi-Human War?”

Roswaal: “There were only three names that stood out, Sphinx, Libre and Valga, though there were also hidden individuals of note like Cragrell-dono. It's something really worth considering."

Wilhelm: "…"

Wilhelm silently gulped at the persuasiveness of her conjecture.

The ravages of that Civil War, The Demi-Human War, never let those roped up in it escape from its clutches. That had been an undeniable fact from the moment they'd made their way to the Witch's Refuge like this.

Wilhelm: "But, they really fucking turned everything upside down… they didn't leave anything good behind."

Despite their conversation, the three of them continued to search the refuge. However, as if exemplifying Wilhelm's grievances, they couldn't find anything that looked like a clue in the upturned interior.

Grimm in particular continued his search in silence, desperate to find something for Carol, whose wellbeing was on the line. Wilhelm could see how agitated he was from looking at his back and that made him firmly grit his teeth together. For both Grimm and Carol's sakes he wouldn't let himself leave here without any results.

???:—Wilhelm, this way

Wilhelm: "…"

Wilhelm, who was feeling that pressure, slowly turned around to the sound of the voice calling him. The voice was coming from near a dirty wall in the corner of the room.

???: That's right the wall is dirty. But, why is it dirty? It's not the floor. Even if someone did a botched job of cleaning up, the wall would never get so unevenly dirty

Wilhelm: "That's a good point."

Wilhelm agreed with the voice that had told him about the weirdness of the wall's dirtiness. The filth that had accumulated on this wall was unnatural. This technique where they hid traps behind where you least expected them, like an unnaturally filthy wall—They'd been subjected to many hardships during the Civil War of that ilk from none other than the Witch's own handiwork.

Wilhelm: "Grimm, Roswaal."

Wilhelm called out their names and then walked over to that odd wall.

He slowly drew out his sword as the two of them looked on at what he was doing behind him.

—Considering how the building had been hidden in the fog, and more importantly, the malevolence of its owner, the Witch.

Wilhelm: "HYYYAAAAAAAA!"

His decision was one that had half relied on speculation.

It wouldn't be surprising if he'd looked like he'd lost his marbles to them when he started to slash the wall with such a shaky foundation for his reasoning. However, neither Grimm or Roswaal had stopped him.

They trusted that the Sword Demon wouldn't do anything for no reason when he'd made his way here.

And lo', that trust was—

Wilhelm: "—So there was something. A clue from the Witch or from that cunt."

He'd shredded at the thin wall with his sword and uncovered a hidden area—A foreboding, large Magic Circle was painted on the white wall within.

3

—The results which the Zergev Corps had brought back from Shamrock Valley ended up only being the Magic Circle they'd found in the Refuge.

In all honesty, he couldn't deny that this was a pretty unsatisfying result. Nevertheless, the Kingdom of Lugunica had been heavily affected by these Magic Circles in the Civil War, so in that sense having been able to confirm the presence of a Magic Circle early was a great achievement in itself.

Roswaal: "The Magic Circle itself was undoubtedly an algorithm left behind by Sphinx. The question is, what sort of effect will this Magic Circle bring… We'll need to investigate into this."

That had been Roswaal's judgement after she'd made a copy of it and brought it back. It was her role as the Court Mage to analyze the Magic Circle they'd discovered. As frustrating as it was, there was no one better at it than her. All they could do was idly wait for her to finish her analysis.

However, an unexpected result had come from the Royal Capital in stark contrast to the Zergev Corps who'd barely managed to find anything—The results came from Theresia's group who'd stayed behind at the Astrea Estate.

???: "Welcome back Wilhelm. Look, it's Carol!"

Wilhelm: "…"

Wilhelm had returned back to the Royal Capital and finished giving his report at the Royal Castle. He and Grimm had left the castle and tried to make their way over to where Theresia and the comatose Carol were.

But awaiting them at the castle's main gates was an adorable woman with dazzling red hair who'd been talking with the gatekeeper—It was Theresia. And beside her, she was accompanied by a woman with golden hair.

He knew immediately that it was Carol, just as Theresia had proudly stated.

Wilhelm: "Hey… Carol, you woke up?"

Carol: "What the hell's with that remark… Ah, no, I'm sorry. It was wrong of me to say that. I also made you worry. I'm fine now."

Carol instinctively snapped at Wilhelm who'd blurted that out without bothering to conceal his surprise.

However, she quickly switched over to apologizing and reassuring him that she was fine. At a glimpse, she didn't look pale, nor did she look ill. Why she was holding hands with Theresia was on his mind, but setting that aside he was delighted that she'd woken up from her coma.

Wilhelm: “What's up with your hand? Is Theresia spoiling you?”

Theresia: “No, it's not like that. It's the other way around actually, I'm the one being spoiled by Carol. I just kept feeling dreadful whilst Carol wouldn't wake up… And you weren't with me either Wilhelm, that's why me and her have stayed like this ever since she woke up.”

After she answered his question, Theresia pulled Carol in closer to her and said “Isn't that right?”

Carol became flustered at her mistress' clingy behavior,

Carol: “Th-Theresia-sama… I get it, but acting like that here where there's so many people about.”

Theresia: “I understand. Then let's flirt later back at the mansion.”

Wilhelm: “Theresia.”

Wilhelm curtly called out Theresia's name as she kept on teasing the abashed Carol. Theresia reluctantly let go of Carol in response and said “Okaaay.”

Theresia: “Okay, my turn's over. I'll let go of her properly now.”

Carol: “Ah…”

Theresia let go of Carol's hand and grasped her by the shoulder; as soon as she did, she gently turned her around. Naturally she came face to face with her lover, Grimm.

Grimm had just been as shocked as Wilhelm—No, he should have been more shocked. He'd been silent up until now, and not because of his ruined voice. His eyes and Carol's met each other.

Carol: "I…"

They exchanged looks with each other and Carol blushed slightly, casting her eyes down. Not from repugnance, but from shyness. On one hand Wilhelm held quite a stubborn impression of her, but on the other hand she was quite resolute. For that, Wilhelm was slightly surprised at such a typical feminine reaction coming from her.

Wilhelm: "Gnh…"

Theresia walked over to Wilhelm and grabbed him by his side as if she'd read what was on his mind. Wilhelm became subject to her judgement whenever his impolite thoughts hung over her favored attendant.

Looking away from the married couple's exchange, Grimm took a step forward towards the bashful Carol—

Carol: "—eh."

Carol let out a small squeak and then opened her eyes wide.

Facing her, Grimm firmly embraced her slender body. His crumpled face was etched with immense anguish, but also relief.

Wilhelm had witnessed Grimm's anguish firsthand over the past two weeks every time he thought about the comatose Carol. They hadn't managed to get any significant results from their mission and Grimm's haggardness had been so bad that he could barely bear to see it; however…

Wilhelm: "What on earth caused her to wake up?"

Theresia: "Erm, let me see, my love I guess… Oww."

Wilhelm scolded his wife, who'd joked around and said that with a straight face, by pinching her cheek. He continued to pull at her cheek and scold her whilst relishing the sensation of how smooth and soft it was.

Wilhelm: “Answer me properly. Even the Healing Arts User said that he couldn’t do anything when he saw her.”

Theresia: “But I really don’t know the reason why. I was constantly taking care of her… And yet, as soon as she woke up, she looked for Grimm-kun…”

Wilhelm: “You’ll be putting up with me.”

Wilhelm finished speaking with the greedy Theresia and shifted his attention back to Carol and Grimm embracing. He’d let them enjoy their reunion for a while and afterwards he’d—

Wilhelm: “—Grimm?”

Just as he thought about that, Wilhelm noticed that something strange was going on and called out to Grimm.

Grimm and Carol, who should have been embracing each other in delight at their reunion were kneeling down—No, the strength from Carol’s legs had abandoned her and Grimm was crouched down, propping her up.

Grimm: “ARROR?-ARRRRROOR!”

Theresia: “CAROL?! What’s wrong, hang in there!”

Both Grimm and Theresia cried out at the same time, Grimm with his broken voice and Theresia with a wail.

However, held between Grimm’s arms, Carol didn’t reply to either of them. There was no time for her to do that because she had her eyes wide open and she was clawing at her own throat.

Carol: “A… Ah, Ukh!”

Wilhelm: “What the… her throat…”

???:—No, you’re not quite correct. This isn’t about her throat.

Wilhelm: "—Her breathing?!"

After he'd had that pointed to him, Wilhelm realized that Carol's suffering came from the fact that she wasn't able to breathe.

However, he didn't know why. It was like her mouth was being gagged and her neck being strangled—

Theresia: "Wilhelm! On Carol's neck!"

Theresia cried out as soon as she'd grabbed her arm and tried to stop her from clawing at her throat. Wilhelm was drawn in by her voice and looked at Carol's throat; when he saw what was there he let out a groan.

A dark red mark had swelled up on her pale throat which she'd been desperately clawing at and was now oozing with blood—And the mark was completely different from her fingernail gouges. It had suddenly appeared and it looked like a bruise which took the shape of a palm.

Of course, there wasn't a real arm there. Yet despite that, she was still being strangled by this palm-shaped bruise from an invisible arm, and it was trying to suffocate her.

Wilhelm: "We need to take her to the healing ward…"

???: I can't say that's a wise choice. Does this look to you like a wound or disease?

Wilhelm: "—No, Roswaal should still be in the castle!"

Wilhelm's thoughts went into overdrive at the predicament they were in; after he received that advice he elected to get Roswaal's help.

What was causing this bruise was unknown, but it must have something to do with Carol's coma. In these sorts of matters, the situation didn't call for the medical ward, but rather for a certain specialist in magic, curses and the like.

The question wasn't whether Roswaal could handle it, more that he had no choice but to bet on her here.

Wilhelm: “Theresia! Find Roswaal! I’ll take Carol…”

Wilhelm hurriedly blurted that out and then pried Carol away from Grimm’s arms. This was an emergency. He was going to be much faster than Grimm at running whilst carrying her. He’d made Theresia go on ahead, and he’d take Carol to wherever Roswaal was.

—At least, that’s what he’d intended to do.

Carol: “Khaa… Cough cough.”

Wilhelm: “Huh?”

However, the state of emergency that would have required him to do that had vanished.

Carol’s breathing had come back to her the moment that Wilhelm had picked her up and started running with her.

Carol: “Haaa… haaaa! Cough cough.”

Wilhelm: “Hey, can you breathe again?”

Carol: “Y-Yeah… I can somehow… breathe again… R-Right now…”

Carol rubbed her throat as she replied gasping for breath. Though she was panting heavily, she was able to breathe without any issues. The reasons why she’d recovered from her inexplicable coma and now her choking were complete mysteries.

But right now she’d been freed from this life-threatening predicament.

Theresia: “C-Carol, are you really alright?”

Carol: “I am, Theresia-sama, I’m sorry for worrying you… And you as well, Grimm.”

Grimm: “…”

Carol extracted herself from Wilhelm’s arms, now standing unaided, and apologized to Theresia and Grimm. The two of them shook their heads at her apology, relieved that she was okay.

Then, Grimm once again tried to stretch out his arms and embrace Carol,

???:—Wilhelm

Wilhelm: “—Wait, Grimm, don’t touch her.”

Wilhelm had noticed what was wrong and had grabbed Grimm’s wrist and stopped him.

Theresia: “Wilhelm? What are you…”

Wilhelm: “Her neck.”

Wilhelm replied curtly to Theresia, who’d raised her eyebrows at his sudden motion. Theresia looked over at Carol with her blue eyes in response and then she let out a small squeak.

—The dark red palm-shaped bruise had appeared on Carol’s neck once again.

The bruise went away again the moment he’d pulled Grimm’s arm away. On the flip side, it came back clearer when Grimm took a step forward—

Wilhelm: “—We’re going to Roswaal.”

Wilhelm said that as he understood what was happening.

Still sharing in their anxieties and distress, the four of them headed towards the castle as if they were clinging to their last hope.

—It was only moments later that they realized that their hopes had been in vain.

4

Roswaal: “She becomes unable to breathe whenever she’s touched by a loved one. —I have no doubt that's the shackle which Stride's Curse Rings put on Carol-kun."

Roswaal had examined her from top to bottom and her diagnosis had confirmed their worst fears.

She'd had her breath choked out of her as soon as she and Grimm had embraced at their reunion. Then, whenever Grimm approached her, the curse's mark would threateningly loom up onto Carol's neck.

Even now, they'd been made to keep their distance as if he was tearing the two lovers apart.

Theresia: "Can't… Can't you do anything at all?"

Theresia said in a trembling voice in reply to Roswaal's provisional diagnosis; she was sitting next to Carol on the bed and had her arms around her. Her round eyes were full of tears as she bit her lip in frustration.

Her slender arms which were wrapped over Carol's shoulders were faintly, weakly trembling.

Theresia: "This is just… so horrible. The absolute worst. I will never, never be able to forgive him for this…"

Roswaal: "…I understand how you feel. I apologize for my lack of ability."

Roswaal felt ashamed at her own lack of skill when Theresia stammered that out. However, everyone here except for Roswaal herself sympathized that it wasn't her fault.

They were at the Royal Castle, in a private quarter set aside for Roswaal, the Court Mage. The quarters contained a guest room, a bedroom and another room for her to put her books and instruments in. She's carried out her examination of Carol primarily in that room.

The five of them had gone back to the bedroom now where they could talk to each other face-to-face.

Wilhelm: “So, you’re saying that he first put her to sleep and now he’s even stopping her from being held by her beloved… You’re making me really regret not having killed that bastard.”

Grimm: “…”

Wilhelm gritted his teeth in frustration and folded his arms. Then he looked over to Grimm who was right beside him. His usual jovial expression had darkened, and he’d cast his gaze down without a word.

He caused his beloved to choke every time he touched her. Fearful of that, they’d placed him further away from Carol (who was sitting on the bed) than was really needed; that had contributed in adding to his misery.

He regretted the fact that he’d blown his chances to kill Stride many times till now, however, now that the situation had gotten this bad, his tendrils of wickedness had grown more malevolent—Especially with Carol’s curse right now, it couldn’t be anything but sheer evil.

She’d woken up and found out she couldn’t be held by the person she wanted to hold the most. What else could this be but sheer evil.

Carol: “…Please lift your head up, Theresia-sama, and you too Mathers-sama.”

Theresia: “Carol-kun…”

Carol spoke up to try and liven the mood up in the room. Hearing the firmness and resolution in her, Roswaal and Theresia shifted their attention to her.

With their attention set on her Carol slowly shook her head, and said,

Carol: “Things are better now than when I was stuck in my long sleep. I can still serve my main role as your escort, Theresia-sama, and so long as I’m careful I won’t be subjected to being suffocated either.”

Theresia: “When you say so long as you’re careful… You can’t mean that…”

Carol: “If we set aside our feelings, then this issue should become much easier to deal with.”

Theresia was left speechless by what Carol had said. However, Carol would not budge.

Of course everyone knew that she was putting on a show of courage. But even so, Carol was probably going to remain stubborn and continue to vehemently urge that no one here was at fault.

And that was correct. The only evil true evil was Stride, and only him.

—This wasn’t the time for all of them to set their wicked enemy aside and wallow in self-reproach.

Carol: “The unscrupulousness of this idea is unpardonable, but that guy must have released me so that he’d relish my feelings for his own amusement. Sooner or later I’ll make sure he’ll reap what he’s sown.”

Theresia was clinging onto Carol’s left arm, but with her free right hand, Carol determinedly clenched her fist. The shade of anger lodged in her eyes, merely that was no mere show of courage, rather it was her true feelings.

???: She’s a strong woman. More so than before I feel. Grimm chose a good match for himself.

Wilhelm: “Yeah, you’re right.”

Wilhelm agreed with what had been pointed out to him as well, although he had absolutely no intention of telling her that directly. Though they clashed with each other in personality, he wouldn’t be exaggerating if he said that the way Carol was at heart was a virtue. She seemed like a perfect match for Grimm, who was a good man through and through, though soft in some respects.

And as Carol had mentioned, Stride had made a big mistake in what he’d chosen as his entertainment.

Wilhelm: “Whatever shape it may be in, he messed up by making more people into his enemies. You’d better make him realize that firsthand.”

Carol: “You don’t have to tell me. I won’t be able to let even you have that guy’s head.”

Theresia: “…You guys are always at each other’s throats.”

Carol had kept in sync with Wilhelm’s tone, before then shrugging her shoulders. Theresia sighed at them and for the most part overlooked what they’d said,

Theresia: “It’ll be fine Carol, because my Wilhelm will definitely see to it.”

Carol: “—Right, Theresia-sama. Thank you very much.”

Being stared at by Theresia’s round blue eyes, Carol meekly accepted her expectation in her stride. Then, she slowly looked over to where Grimm was.

Grimm: “…~~Arror~~.”

The gazes of the two lovers who weren’t able to touch each other met, and of them, it was Grimm who’d opened his mouth first. Since Grimm had lost his voice, his words were rasped and ill-shaped,

Grimm: “~~I’m sorr~~…”

Carol: “If you were apologizing, saying stuff like sorry, then I won’t forgive you darling.”

Grimm: “…”

Carol had anticipated his apology and stopped him from finishing it, making Grimm look at her in astonishment. She looked at him sharper than she’d ever done before and then continued her words all the while giving off a sword-like aura.

Carol: “What happened to me was down to my own lack of skill.

You and I carried out our duties though. What I wouldn't be able to stand at all would be if this had happened to Theresia-sama and Wilhelm."

Grimm: "…"

Carol: "So, what I'll be doing will be exactly as I said before. I'll give our enemy, who not only carried out these cruel machinations but also slighted me, his just reward. If possible, let's do it together."

Carol firmly declared that and gently held out her right arm in front of her. Her left was still being held by Theresia, yet the person she'd held her right one out to was none other than Grimm.

The curse would activate if he touched her and she'd get strangled by that bruise. Yet despite that—

Grimm: "…"

Grimm understood what she wanted to do and took her hand after a few moments of hesitation.

Naturally that activated the curse and the dark red bruise reared its ugly shape onto Carol's pale neck.

Nevertheless, the two of them established their shared determination with Carol doing all she could to not show even a tiny bit of discomfort on her face until he moved his hand away.

Carol: "…hk, haa."

Roswaal: "You really didn't neeeeed to choke yourself. Jeez, you and Grimm-kun are so reckless. Even though I don't think I may be able to overlook this one, wouldn't you agreeee?"

Roswaal brought her hand over to Carol's neck as she gasped for breath. She flashed a wry smile at them for their conduct—ritual.

Roswaal would have described it as "You're making yourself suffer without any need for it" and left it at that; however, doing that had been an indispensable ritual for the two of them to share their resolve. That’s why Roswaal wasn’t really blaming them.

And it wasn’t only her who’d been impressed by their ritual. Emotions were welling up in Wilhelm’s heart as well, and above all…

Theresia: “—Um, Wilhelm…”

Theresia turned towards Wilhelm with a serious look in her eyes. She trailed off her words for a moment, and only for a split second did she hesitate. However, she looked straight into Wilhelm’s eyes and spoke immediately after.

Theresia: “If I were to… If I were to break that important promise I made you my dear, would you hate me?”

Wilhelm: “…You’re not the Sword Saint anymore.”

Wilhelm instantly knew what she was referring to without having to ask her what “promise” she was talking about.

Her reaction had been natural. Theresia wasn’t ladylike enough to behave herself in this situation. She had a strong sense of responsibility and care, but above all else, she loved Carol.

As a result, Wilhelm was half-convinced that his words wouldn’t be able to stop his wife.

Even so, he’d told her what her standpoint was because he didn’t want her to break the vow she’d made and he didn’t want to see her using the ability she’d never desired for ever again.

Theresia: “I knew you’d say that. But my Divine Protection isn’t going to disappear even if I’ve abandoned that… That’s why even now I…”

Carol: “No… Theresia-sama, you mustn’t. I can’t let you do something like that…”

Carol had realized what Theresia had meant in her talk with Wilhelm and that had caused her voice to quiver. She, who had been the picture of fortitude a dozen seconds ago, feared that more than putting her own life at stake.

Both Carol and Theresia were far more willing to get hurt for the other than themselves.

Grimm: “~~H̀h̸e͜l̃m̆.͜~~”

Wilhelm: “Don’t say it. —I know, I’m completely contemptible.”

Grimm had similarly guessed what they’d been talking about. He shifted his gaze over to Wilhelm, who dodged it and tched.

—The Sword Saint Theresia van Astrea.

She, the strongest swordsman, had had her sword taken away from her by the Sword Demon Wilhelm Trias and her position revoked by the King’s favor. Now, she was determined to take up her sword again for her dearest friend,

Roswaal: “—Whoa there, I apologize for butting in when you’re all about to get heated up, buuuuut…”

Theresia: “Roswaal-san?”

Roswaal suddenly clapped her hands so that she could cut into the conversation. Though Theresia had been shot down and widened her eyes as if she’d wanted to say something, everyone in the room had the same question on their mind.

With all four of their gazes now on her, Roswaal continued her words and said “I’m sorry, but…”

Roswaal: “I have to say that it’s hard for me to welcome that sort of disposition, even though I’d really like to. Theresia-kun… No, I guess I should say Theresia Van Astrea-dono.”

Theresia: “I get really worried whenever you honor me like that…”

Roswaal: “Worried…? It’s difficult in some respects to deem how suitable putting it like that is regarding this news I have. Nevertheless, I can’t let your current self, a masquerade of a swordsman, behave as the Sword Saint.”

Wilhelm: "…Stop beating around the bush. What are you trying to say."

Wilhelm snapped at Roswaal, who'd continued to speak in her roundabout manner. Irritation was etched all over his face, but it was directed more so towards a different target than Roswaal. And he knew in himself what target that was.

???: "You don't want Theresia-dono to take up the sword, but, you can't stop her by yourself. You're irritated that she's about to grant your wish. Something like that, right?"

Wilhelm: "So damn annoying."

Wilhelm replied to that voice that sounded like it was chuckling, then he silently urged Roswaal to continue.

Faced with his somewhat insolent manner, Roswaal closed one of her eyes. Of her differently colored eyes, only her blue one was returning Wilhelm's gaze…

Roswaal: "—In order to dig into the connection between the bruise from the curse and when Carol-kun woke up from her coma, I was also allowed to briefly examine Theresia-dono's body who'd nursed her."

Carol: "Wh-What on earth's going on… Mathers-sama, what's happened to Theresia-sama."

Carol's expression tensed up as soon as she heard what Roswaal had said, which had instilled uneasiness.

Carol: "There's no way she's gotten sick, right?!"

Roswaal: "I'm quite sure that there's been a big change in her body. Theresia-dono, have you felt anything weird in your everyday life recently?"

Theresia: "Weird?"

Roswaal: "Yeah, weird. For example… weird things like your head feeling a little heavier or differences in the taste and smell of food."

Theresia made a strangled “Eh” sound when she heard those specific examples. They could see from the way her eyes had widened that she wasn’t bewildered, but rather surprised that she’d hit the nail on the head.

Meaning that what Roswaal had pointed out had happened to her. But what did that mean?

Theresia: “My fondness for black tea has definitely changed, and my head has been feeling heavier, but…”

Wilhelm: “Hey, stop beating about the bush! If something’s happened to Theresia then hurry up and tell us…”

Roswaal: “—She’s expecting.”

Her voice was gentle and really tender, quite unlike her usual self.

Wilhelm: “—Huh?”

Wilhelm froze in surprise at Roswaal’s words.

This had come at him after she’d implied that there was a chance something was wrong with Theresia and he’d raised his voice at her. The urge he’d had which had almost looked like he was going to lay his hands on Roswaal was knocked out of him. Understanding gradually came to him.

—Understanding about what the hell she’d said. About what she meant by “She’s expecting”.

Theresia: “U-Um… Roswaal-san… When you say that…”

Roswaal: “Pleeeease don’t mistake it for the name of some strange disease. To put it in different words, you’re pregnant. You were a woman and a wife, but now, you’re also a mother.”

Though Roswaal had explained it in a very matter of fact manner, Wilhelm was unable to process what she’d said.

And that wasn’t the case only for him, Theresia was the same as him too. Wilhelm, frozen in his tracks, and Theresia, who’d been taken aback, slowly looked at each other with bated breath.

In other words, being pregnant meant that they were going to have a child. Who. Theresia?

Roswaal: “I can’t let a woman who’s going to become a mother go out to the battlefield. Sooooo, though her determination is noble, I’ll have to ask her to refrain from it.”

Theresia: “Th…That’s, I, yeah. I guess so. But um… is it really this?”

Wilhelm: “Don’t ask me. It’s in your belly…Whoa?!”

In her confusion Theresia looked towards Wilhelm for a confirmation even if it made no sense. Wilhelm replied back to her, embroiled in his own confusion. Then suddenly he was pulled back by the scruff of his neck and he almost fell over.

The one who’d pulled him by it had been Grimm. But he didn’t even have the time to complain at him for that. Because he’d had to jerk his head back so that the pair of long legs aiming for his nose would end up whistling by.

Wilhelm: “What… What was that for…”

Carol: “Trias, you bastard…”

Wilhelm felt a fierce anger piercing into him as he peeled his eyes wide open at the kick which had just grazed past his nose. He realized that it had been Carol who’d gotten up and launched that kick at him, and now her muffled voice was filled with anger.

Her shoulder length blonde hair was swaying and her eyes were set ablaze with rage. —That rage was perhaps comparable to the levels which she showed for Stride.

Carol: “So you actually got Theresia-sama pregnant, what the hell did you do to her, you bastard, TRIAS!”

Wilhelm: “Stop calling me by my old surname! Can you even listen and look at stuff seriously!”

Carol: “I can! Are you really insinuating that I’m not serious around Theresia-sama!”

Wilhelm: “Is there even any point in me talking to someone I can’t get through to…”

Wilhelm shrunk back before Carol’s fierce attack, who’d lost herself in her anger. This sort of ferocity and vigor was definitely the mark of Carol Remendis.

Theresia: “Wilhelm…”

Wilhelm: “—Theresia.”

Wilhelm’s name was called out after he’d reacted to Carol’s kick. He turned around to look at Theresia.

She was still sat on the bed with the palm of her pale hand resting on her belly, a new life was sprouting behind it. —Suddenly, his entire body shook.

He and Theresia had fallen in love with each other and became a married couple, family. Of course, he’d been thinking about someday adding to their family too. However, he’d willfully imagined that that day was going to be a long way off.

Wilhelm: “…”

Theresia gently brushed her hand against the taciturn Wilhelm’s cheek. The feel of his wife’s pale fingers brought him back to reality and he noticed that her fingers were trembling.

It hadn’t just been him who’d been surprised, confused and bewildered by the news. She too was facing the same issue and worrying about what she should do.

And in this world, only the two of them, and no one else, could tackle this problem together and share it as one.

Wilhelm: “Roswaal’s right. I won’t let you take up your sword, Theresia. Swear to me once more.”

Theresia: “But at a time like this…”

Wilhelm: “There’s no need for you to do so, so long as I become your strength… No, so long as I be your strength.”

Regardless of whether it was Stride, his followers, or Kurgan the Eight Arms, he would not lose.

Wilhelm right now should have the strength and companions he needed to ensure that.

Carol: “Theresia-sama.”

Theresia: “Carol… I’m… I’m sorry that this happened, despite all you’re going through.”

Theresia cast her gaze down and tried to apologize after Carol called out to her. However, Carol gently shook her head at her apology and said “No,”

Carol: “I’m the one who’s really sorry for getting upset. In truth, I had to tell this to you, Theresia-sama, before anyone else.”

Theresia: “…”

Carol: “Congratulations on your pregnancy, I’m really happy for you.”

Carol put on a brave smile; her words of congratulations took away Theresia’s breath from her. Her guilt was still there, and times where she’d worry herself sick would undoubtedly still come. But, that time was not now.

Now, she only had time for the words which her attendant, who she’d been close to for a very long time and was like a sister to her, had said to her.

Theresia: “—Truly, thank you so much Carol.”Maybe she’d let her reply back to her with a smile.

Wilhelm and Grimm had left the room for the time being while only the girls remained behind.

Theresia's pregnancy had come to light, and now it looked like Roswaal, having been pregnant herself, was going to give her a few words of precaution about it. Men weren't welcome there when they lacked the common sense.

Wilhelm: "…It was kinda bad timing, I'm sorry."

Not liking the constant silence that had floated over the corridor, Wilhelm decided to break the ice with Grimm. His eyes widened in response and he cocked his head as if he was saying "What's the matter?"

Wilhelm: "It's as I said. Not allowing Theresia to take up her sword was appalling for me to do… But these are difficult times for you and Carol. By raising your arms up and welcoming that you… Ghhkgh."

Grimm: "—tch."

Wilhelm had looked down and continued to speak. However, Grimm had seized him by the scruff of his neck. He pushed him against the wall like that causing Wilhelm to let out a pained cry.

Grimm's eyes in front of him were streaked with anger. He hadn't reacted like this so that he'd evoke sympathy for his and Carol's circumstances, it had been because he'd took offense to Wilhelm's fatherly attitude.

Even now Grimm still put others before himself. That's why being good-natured only made him lose out.

Grimm: "Ilhelm… you're a."

Wilhelm: "It doesn't feel real. I'm not prepared yet. Even so…"

He murmured a response back to Grimm, cutting his words off halfway through. Grimm let go of the scruff of his neck with a look of sorrow adorning his face. Even he couldn't explain the reason why he'd done that.

Nevertheless, the world around them kept on steadily and significantly plodding along without pause regardless of the good and bad.

???: You are weak in matters which you can’t solve with your sword. That is your weak point. Right, Wilhelm?

Wilhelm: “…”

Resting against the wall, Pivot grumbled as if he were sneering at Wilhelm’s troubles.

Act Four

1

???: “Theresia, Theresia! Are you alright? You’re not cold right? Or too warm? Don’t hesitate to tell your dad whatever you want if anything is bothering you. Are you thirsty? Are you getting hungry? That’s right! I think you had a stuffed animal that you cherished ages ago. You’d stop crying immediately whenever we gave it to you to hold… I’ll go fetch it for you right away!”

Theresia: “F A—T HER!”

Theresia cried out to the man pacing restlessly around the room, stressing each syllable she said—The man had blue eyes, red hair and a respectable beard and moustache. Though her cry had obviously been an angry one the man turned around rapidly as if he’d pounced on it,

???: “Mh, what’s the matter Theresia! Is there anything urgent you want to tell dad? Oh, I get it, I love you too.”

Theresia: “Father, just sit yourself down.”

???: “Just sit myself down… Even dad finds that just a little hurtful…”

Theresia: “SIT DOWN PLEASE!”

???: “Right away!”

Theresia pointed to the chair at her bedside and once again forcibly ordered him to sit. He finally got the point and sat himself down. Theresia placed her hand against her forehead at that and flumped down against the pillow on the bed she was lying on.

They were in Theresia’s bedroom at the Astrea Mansion in the Royal Capital. Theresia herself was in her sleepwear and her hair was untied; with her in the bedroom was just this man. Absurd as it was in a situation like this, this man wasn’t her husband, though luckily he wasn't a paramour either—he was merely her father.

Bertol Astrea—Theresia's father, a man who was both delicate and a little petty in stark contrast to his composed, intrepid appearance.

There'd been many, many times where he'd let his pettiness show. Everyone who'd become a witness to those acts especially would testify that they couldn't support what he was doing. So much did he dote on his beloved daughter Theresia that he'd probably planned to hinder her and Wilhelm's wedding. Even after they'd married, he would still act hostile to his son-in-law from time to time.

Even so, he was ultimately a good person. Since his bouts of hostility weren't anything more serious than mild annoyances they could be chalked off as a kind of familial love for the most part.

Though Bertol was the type you could give all sorts of these scathing evaluations, right now he was acting more restless than usual; putting it more plainly, he was acting pretty weirdly.

However in this instance the onus behind Bertol's behavior didn't come from himself. Rather it came from what was in Theresia's belly.

Theresia: "I'm… I'm glad that you're worried about me father, but there's no point in you pacing around the bedroom. I'm getting sick and tired of looking at it so please, give me some space to breathe."

Bertol: "I… I see… Now that you've put it like that, I guess yeah I don't blame you. I don't. I understand Theresia, you can leave this to me. I'll make sure to give you some breathing space. After all, I've been doing that quite a lot for everyone at the mansion as well."

Bertol nodded a few times at Theresia's reasonable, albeit surprisingly stern request. Though Theresia felt a tinge of sadness in his reply she didn't make any mention of it.

Theresia would get some peace and quiet for now by saying that. Though it wasn't as easy as she thought.

Theresia: “…Father, the look in your eyes and your presence is annoying me.”

Bertol: “Huh? The look in my eyes and my presence, isn’t that a bit harsh?”

Theresia had tried to close her eyes and rest a bit in her bed. However, it had proved impossible since Bertol didn’t know what to do with himself and his presence at her bedside betrayed that he hadn’t really calmed down.

Theresia: “I’m sorry for the way I’m speaking, but I’m being serious… What are you doing?”

Theresia sighed. Then she noticed Bertol drawing her a strange circular shape in mid-air with his left hand, a serious look plastered on his face.

Bertol: “Look here Theresia, this is your dad’s love who’s worried about you from the bottom of his heart.”

Theresia: “Please, give me some space to breathe, seriously…”

Bertol: “Huuh? I can’t even do this?”

She forbade Bertol not only from speaking, but also from moving about. Now his protests had grown ever more pitiful. Theresia contemplated whether she’d gone too far in what she’d said but her head hurt and she couldn’t find the proper words to express herself.

Theresia: “Father, shut up.”

Bertol: “Gnnnh!”

Her words were sharp and blunt because of that and tears welled up in Bertol’s eyes at his beloved daughter’s rejections. Then coming down towards the two of them trapped in this vicious circle was—

???: “—Theresia’s pregnant my dear. You have to treat her properly with sympathy.”

Theresia: “Mother…”

A flaxen haired woman opened the bedroom door and interjected into their conversation. The woman was Tishua Astrea, Theresia's mother.

Theresia breathed a sigh of relief at her mother's appearance. Bertol stood up at the same time as if he wasn't going to let that go unchallenged.

Bertol: "What's with that remark Tishua? Do you really think that there's anyone out there right now who shows their sympathies to Theresia as much as I do? No, you probably won't find anyone like that anywhere."

Tishua: "It seems like you took care to keep your voice down, but you move around noisily and I have no clue what you're saying so you're being counterproductive."

Bertol: "Huuuuh? So I can't be like this too?"

Though he'd replied to her with a whisper, his movements had still been noisy.

Either way, Tishua coming here had been a stroke of good luck for Theresia. She pointed outside the window with one of her supple fingers to live up to the faith that her daughter had in her.

Tishua: "Look, it seems like Theresia can't stop worrying about the flowerbeds in our garden. A father should have the consideration to quickly take note of that and water them. You really aren't that thoughtful."

Bertol: "Argh! Of course I noticed! I just wondered if something else was bothering her as well… Ah well, I'll hop to it! Feast your eyes upon dad's consideration!"

The irritated Bertol quickly hurried out of the bedroom without wasting any time. Theresia stared at his retreating figure in bewilderment, and Tishua gave her a small smile.

Tishua: "Great, the flowerbeds aren't going to wilt now that he's pumped up. All thanks to him being so easy to handle, though I find that pretty cute."

Theresia: “Mum, you’re crazy good at handling dad…”

Tishua sat down on the chair Bertol had vacated and smiled broadly at her beloved daughter’s words. She then turned her gaze towards Theresia’s belly, and said,

Tishua: “How are you doing? Have you gotten used yet to your stomach feeling so heavy?”

Theresia: “Yeah, it feels weird, but I think I’ve gotten used to it… Though I’d really like you to calm dad down some more, rather than me, maybe.”

Tishua: “You know that’s going to be tough, the world for him is always fresh and exciting.”

According to Tishua, Bertol’s “He never learns” disposition was wonderful too because it was often heard. Thanks to that, Bertol and Tishua’s marriage had always remained smooth—Theresia’s parents for her were the epitome of a perfect married couple.

Theresia: “…”

Theresia stroked her swollen belly as she felt Tishua’s warm gaze on her. Her child was growing day by day there, impatiently awaiting the day of its birth.

—Three months had passed already since she’d found out she was pregnant.

In all honesty, she’d found it difficult to get excited at her pregnancy having come to light back then with everything that had been going on, but, as time passed by, her feelings gradually grew.

Theresia’s unborn child was growing quickly without waiting for her to gear herself up mentally. Her body was changing faster than she could prepare her mind, but with that, her mind would have no choice but to catch up to that naturally.

As a result, Theresia was stuck handling the various problems associated with pregnancy and preparing to have a child. Luckily the people around her were sympathetic and her parents (who always worried about their precious daughter) frequently visited the Royal Capital and were happily willing to do everything they could for their first grandchild.

She was truly blessed by her family, her husband and her neighbours. That’s precisely why she—

Tishua: “—Please don’t blame yourself too much about what happened to Carol, Theresia.”

Theresia: “…Mother.”

Tishua: “I am your Mother after all. I can tell what you’re thinking as well as how guilty you’re feeling. I’m betting your father can too.”

Theresia: “…”

Theresia glanced down wordlessly at her mother’s earnest words.

She was right. Though Bertol showed plenty of times that he was pretty slow at grasping various things, he never missed the important ones. Much less when the matter concerned his beloved daughter, beloved exactly the same also by Tishua.

Tishua: “What happened to Carol’s body, that dreadful event, is neither your or Wilhelm-san’s fault. Doesn’t everyone who knows you both tell you that?”

Theresia: “…Yes Mother, but, like.”

No matter how many people had told her that. No matter that even Carol had told her “You aren’t responsible “the words of blame and rebuke never dimmed.

Because, the one speaking them was none other than herself.

Tishua: “…You sure are someone who makes life tough for yourself, aren’t ya? I wish you wouldn’t brood over things so much, like my husband.”

Theresia: “Do you really think so Mother?”

Tishua: "I'm joking. I love my husband but if you too became like him I wouldn't be able to show my face around Wilhelm-san."

A faint smile slipped onto Theresia's face after hearing her mother's jape. However, she didn't have the capacity to give her a proper smile. Tishua saw that and let out a sigh,

Tishua: "Carol should be at the Castle now, right?"

Theresia: "She has to go to the Castle a lot because of her curse… Roswaal-san said that she's been giving her a ton of different examinations to determine the source of the curse."

Carol often visited Roswaal J Mathers at the Royal Castle to get the curse which was eating into her body examined. Despite that, her situation hadn't changed even though 3 months had passed. She got the feeling that they couldn't expect her circumstances to improve with these examinations.

It's not that she couldn't believe in hope, it was just her intuition.

But it was also her intuition as a Sword Saint that had led to the end of the Demi-Human War—

Tishua: "…You sure do make life tough for yourself."

Tishua murmured merely those words as she gazed at her beloved daughter's delicate face in profile.

2

She put her undergarments back on, pulled on a loose-fit shirt and started to button it up.

She let out an unconscious sigh as she reached the buttons above her chest. It was probably one of resignation because she could imagine the results of the examination without needing to hear them.

A voice called out to her saying "Wait, wait" when she heard her self-diagnosary sigh.

???: “You’re gonna make me feel terrible as weeeell, what with you so straightforwardly showing that you’re not expecting anything.”

???: “…I’m sorry. For acting like that despite always counting on your kindness, Mathers-sama.”

Roswaal: “It’s when you take it so ceremoniously that it makes me feel terrible thoooough.”

A woman with long hair said that to her with a shrug of her shoulders. It was the Court Mage, Roswaal J Mathers. Sitting opposite to her was a pure-looking woman who gave off a clean impression that starkly contrasted Roswaal’s bewitching beauty—Carol Remendis.

They were in a room in a stone tower built on the Royal Castle’s Grounds.

A stone tower called the Prison Tower had been built on the Royal Castle’s Grounds to house criminals. The stone tower they were in right now had been built as a counterpart of the Prison Tower but had been shut down over a decade ago. It had been opened up now to Roswaal as a research facility for magic now that magic itself had had its importance re-evaluated in the wake of the Demi-Human War.

Thus many users of magic studied here around the clock, starting with Roswaal.

—Roswaal and Carol frequently met on the down-low here, keeping their meetings a secret.

Roswaal: “We can’t tell anyone, becauuuse we’re in a seeeecret relationship, isn’t that right?”

Carol: “Why do you have to put it so unseemingly? It’s like we’re keeping this a secret… But, I don’t understand why it’s so risky, just that we’re keeping everything in private.”

Roswaal: “You’re reserved as ever, eh, Carol-kun. You never crack, even with how long we’ve known each other.”

Carol: “Please don’t embarrass me, it’s just that I’m always respecting your position.”

Carol sat herself down on the bed and drew her eyebrows down with a troubled look on her face, causing Roswaal to pout at her. Their conversation in the treatment room was full of familiarity for each other, a contrast to the way they behaved.

In fact, Carol and Roswaal had known each other for over 5 years having been comrade in arms from the Demi-Human War. But just adding to that, Carol kept a clear distinction between her position and the one Roswaal had as the Court Mage.

—Actually, as an aside, Theresia too felt the same sense of dissatisfaction at this attitude of Carol’s.

Roswaal: “In any case. Thoooough it took a while, here are your results.”

Carol: “Did you find anything?”

Roswaal: “There’s some good news, and some bad news. Which would you like to hear first?”

Carol reacted in surprise at Roswaal presenting her those options since she’d resigned herself to Roswaal saying she’d found nothing. After a bit of thought, Carol made her decision.

Carol: “Well, the good news first please.”

Roswaal: “Alright, the good news it is, which is that your curse isn’t getting worse.”

Carol: “…And the bad news?”

Roswaal: “The bad news is that we have no choice left other than to ask the one who put the curse on you himself on how to remove it. Meaning that making any progress will be difficult now, until your sweetheart catches Stride.”

Carol’s expression grew sullen as she heard those words, keeping her silence.

Nothing had changed. Roswaal's news had only re-expressed what they already knew so far using different words. Roswaal noticed Carol's disgruntlement and closed one of her eyes, and said "I'm sorry."

Roswaal: "All I ever end up doing is making you feel just like we've wasted our time, so I wanted to give you hope even if it was only for a short while…"

Carol: "I'm grateful for your consideration, but didn't only a really really short while pass…?"

Even if that was what Roswaal had intended, Carol had only been thrown off by it for a few seconds. Although, it was quite like her to tell pointless lies for a time like that,

Roswaal: "—You didn't get angry Carol-kun."

Carol: "Huh?"

Roswaal: "The former you would have blushed and gotten mad when teased like this. Though of course with consideration for our pooositions."

Carol: "Eh… Wasn't I only like that back when we'd only just met?"

Carol didn't understand what Roswaal was getting at and replied in confusion.

The feeling she'd gotten from being told that she hadn't gotten angry was one of bewilderment mixed with a teensy bit of bashfulness.

She knew that she was naturally hot tempered and struggled to keep her cool. There'd been many instances where she'd get into arguments with others due to being so prone to paroxysms of anger. She even still did with Wilhelm.

Even so, didn't it mean she'd matured if she didn't get angry so easily anymore?

In her defence she'd been young and immature when she'd met

Roswaal 5 years ago. She wanted to act more like an adult as the years passed by, and she must have learnt that from her friendship with Roswaal.

Above all else, Carol had Grimm with her now.

—That in itself should be her greatest change for the better.

Carol: “I can’t just keep on losing my temper like I used to. Like even under normal circumstances I keep causing Theresia-sama trouble. I can’t keep doing that…”

Roswaal: “So what you’re saying is that you’re going through all of this because of Theresia-sama?”

Carol: “…”

Roswaal’s tone of voice was hushed and cold making Carol gulp.

For a moment she gazed at her in astonishment as if she’d misheard her. Despite her reaction, Roswaal gave her a profound nod and said,

Roswaal: “Let me repeat myself. The curse that was put on you was down to Theresia-sama. Naturally Stride’s the one we should truly call evil, but she and her husband helped sow the seeds that made it so that you were targeted by that dangerous individual and ultimately dragged you into this mess. You really shouldn’t overlook their sins.”

Carol: “What… What are you…”

Roswaal: “It’s foolish of you to think like that, or are you just intentionally averting your eyes from it? Are you trying to set things right by being complicit with her? You always have your back turned pretending not to be aware of it, never pressing her adequately enough about it. This isn’t kindness, this is simply just indulging her. You’re the one who’s having a tough time, not Theresia-”sama.”“

Carol: “—Stop it please!”

Carol jumped up from the bed and glared at Roswaal as she spoke one cruel word after the other.

The glint in her eyes grew sharper, honed by the fury that had surged up in her. Faced with that, a dark, dangerous look began to creep in around Roswaal too. Carol clenched her teeth at the unfathomable pressure.

Carol: “Why… Why are you talking like this! What has Theresia-sama done wrong… She’s always, always been suffering! That’s why she should continue to be happy, and only happy after this! Despite everything that’s happened!”

Roswaal: “She’s not like you. Everyone should desire to be the happiest they can be. I find it virtuous to desire happiness for the people around you after you’ve prioritized your own. The way you do it is wrong.”

Carol: “I… Hic.”

Carol’s parched voice was draped in sorrow, and this time she was almost on the verge of tears. She resisted the urge to cry and moved over towards Roswaal. Then, as she tried to get her to take back her words, Carol realized something.

She realized that something felt odd. Gazing at Roswaal’s heterochromic eyes, a notion swiftly came to her.

Sure, Roswaal was sometimes cruel and ruthlessly dug into other’s hearts, but…

Carol: “…Are you perhaps testing me, Mathers-sama?”

Roswaal: “Oh, have I been found out?”

The pressure that had been mounting inside the room vanished and Carol was left dumbfounded. Roswaal’s expression loosened, and she laughed out a “I’m sorry, I’m sorry.”

Carol: “—. —. ——. Why… why do such a thing.”

Roswaal: “I’m getting the feeling that you want to say a bunch of stuff to me, but you forced yourself to swallow them all down, right?”

Carol took several deep breaths and then asked her that with an air of semi-composure. Surmising the effort she’d made, Roswaal (who was still sitting comfortably on her chair) urged Carol to sit down as well.

Roswaal: “Now then, you asked me why… Plainly speaking, I tested you. I tested you to see if you’d get properly mad or raise your voice at me for my slander.”

Carol: “…Why?”

Roswaal: “You mentioned, so to speak, that you not getting angry was because you’ve grown up. I’m pleased that you’ve matured as well. Though I was pretty fond of the reactions the former you would make from being teased as well… That’s why I would’ve been able to welcome it too if this was from growing up. But, it’s not down to that.”

Carol: “…”

Though she was speaking in what seemed to be a roundabout way, Carol patiently waited for her conclusion. Her hands were clenched on top of her knees and she gulped in front of Roswaal’s narrowed eyes.

Roswaal: “The price you paid to wake up from your coma was that you couldn’t be touched by your sweetheart, Grimm-kun. Though the curse changed its course and burrowed into you, I’m thinking that you’re not in the clear from the dangers of coma.”

Carol: “So are you saying that it wouldn’t be strange if I were to lose my consciousness again soon?”

Roswaal: “It’s not down to your self-restraint that you’re unable to get angry, but rather you being unable to is proof that your emotions are fading away. I know that you’re a strong woman emotionally, of course… And yet, you didn’t grieve about this situation, nor did you wantonly show your impulsive anger. It’s unnatural.”

Carol: “Mathers-sama, you’re thinking this too is an effect of the curse, right?”

Roswaal: “…”

Roswaal glanced down silently. That alone was enough to tell Carol what her thoughts were. And that silence brought even more news to Carol.

Roswaal had said that she had good and bad news at the start, and had indicated that there’d been no developments to her condition. But, in actual fact, this wasn’t all there was to it…

Carol: “Is there more bad news Mathers-sama?”

Roswaal: “…The only way to get rid of the curse is to capture Stride. You can’t be touched by your loved one in your current condition, and now it’s likely that you’ll even be unable to feel sad about it.”

Carol: “…”

Roswaal: “You’ll become like a puppet if your emotions fade completely. There’s nothing better at destroying a person’s dignity than this.”

Roswaal revealed to Carol the bad news without hiding any of it. A mark of the unfathomable sincerity that this woman called Roswaal J Mathers possessed.

For the first time in their long fellowship Carol could see the affection that lurked behind her blithe demeanor.

—And at the same time she also realized that her emotional response to her bad news had been surprisingly stunted.

Right now she could still feel angry if people insulted Theresia, Grimm and her loved ones. But, if her condition continued to worsen—

Carol: "—Am I going to even be unable to celebrate Theresia-sama's child being born…?"

Carol said that in a terrible murmur.

If she slowly lost her heart and her feelings for her loved ones, then she'd stoop down to the level of a cold-blooded sword. Wilhelm had frequently hoped to become like that.

In the end though, he too had sought the bonds of warmth and made his way towards the sun.

Carol: "Mathers-sama, please keep this a secret from Theresia-sama and her family. From Grimm too if you can… It has to be from my own mouth when he's told."

Roswaal: "…I wish you wouldn't be so pessimistic. Even now, Grimm-kun is doing everything he can for you. Wilhelm-kun too is a little useful so long as it involves swinging his sword. There's still hope."

Carol: "I feel like this is the first time in these 5 years that I've heard you consoling me, Mathers-sama."

Carol had never heard Roswaal speak anything that looked like consolation, what with her being a woman of many jests and japes albeit pragmatic. The fact that Roswaal had consoled her like that meant only that her situation was at an impasse.

Roswaal: "…"

The taciturn Roswaal probably wasn't going to deny Carol's request. To Carol it seemed like their fellowship was one close to friendship to the point that she could believe that she'd be the type who'd do as she asked.

Thus, what she should be worried about now was—

Carol: "—Grimm, please stay safe."

She hoped he was safe, even if he hadn't found anything. Carol couldn't remember the last time she'd seen his smiling face, and that wasn’t because of her shrivelling emotions.

3

“—Thud!.”

A steel shield thudded, and the man who’d opened the door ate a punch to his face and was sent flying. His flailing legs knocked bottles of sake and drinking glasses off the counter they were standing on; the sounds of broken glass gaudily echoed around the tavern.

For a split second or two, there was only silence, and then the men inside the tavern realized what was happening.

—This uninvited guest had come here to attack them.

???: “The fuck, who the hell are you…”

Intruder: “Ȓ̳R̶̪R̴̹̓͐R̭̒H̸̳̉AÄ̸̳̋ÀA̸̡̹Aͯ̽A̶̓!!”

The intruder leapt towards a man who’d drawn out a dagger from his pocket and tried to rush over to the entrance. He swiveled his shield around, which was about the size of a full-grown adult’s body, letting out a battle cry as he did. The shield smashed into the man’s arm, dagger and all, flipping the man (who had tried to let out a shriek of pain) up from under his shoulder and making him clatter into the ceiling.

Before the man even fell back down, the intruder had already moved onto his next targets.

???: “What the…GYAAAA!”??? “W-Wait up, wait up I said—!”???: “AIIIIEEEE?!”

The men were all defeated in tandem by a blow that packed tremendous speed and nary a hint of hesitation. It had taken less than a minute for the roughnecks of the store to be overrun by the intruder.

Tavern Roughneck: “Kh, Hha… The fuck are you… Ghhhhhhh!”

Intruder: “…”

The man who’d been thrown up to the ceiling and then clattered back down to the floor was grabbed by the scruff of his neck and forced to his feet by the intruder. Glaring at the man, who was now on his tip-toes and desperately gasping for breath, was a man with simple, gentle features. He didn’t really seem like the kind who could beat up nearly 10 roughnecks by himself.

—Though you’d only be saying that if you didn’t see the eyes of that gentle-featured man himself.

Tavern Roughneck: “Hh.”

The intruder’s eyes were bloodshot and the glint coming from them was one of absolute fury. They were clearly different to that of a typical gentle featured man. He was lifting the roughneck up with one arm and holding his incredibly heavy shield with his other as if it weighed nothing. He was far from the norm.

Things would get far more violent if he made one false move. He could feel that in his bones.

Tavern Roughneck: “The hell does this fucker wan- No, what do you want…”

The Intruder of Gentle Features: “‘ĕrz ~~Śride~~?̈~.”

Tavern Roughneck: “Huh, you what now?”

The man contorted his face in confusion at what the unintelligible, broken voice had said. The gentle-featured man lifted his head up in response and pointed to the base of his throat. —To the white scar that stretched across it.

In other words, it looked like he was saying that he couldn’t speak due to that battle scar.

Tavern Roughneck: “What the… Then how are we going to talk!”

The Intruder of Gentle Features: “Bỷ~…”

???: “—It’s simple. I do the talking.”

Yet another unfamiliar voice replied to the question the man had croaked out. However, when he looked from the entrance of the tavern to the man with gentle features after replying to him his expression grew sour.

Second Intruder: “If you’re saying it makes you feel awkward, then don’t run off ahead.”

He said that to the man of gentle features and slowly made his way towards him. He was a young man with brown hair which he had tied at his back. You could tell at a mere glance that the aura this man was enveloped in was terrible, vivid and showcasing that he possessed more skill than the gentle-featured man.

The man, who’d had his friends beaten up by those two monsters, kept his eyes on them. Finally, he looked up at the ceiling and despaired.

Tavern Roughneck: “Give me a break… What did we do…”

Brown Haired Intruder: “This guy should save us some time. —That’s what we also wanted to ask.”

The young man looked at the lamenting man’s face, still being hoisted up. He could see a fierce anger lodged deep in his blue eyes that felt like it would shake everything they saw to the core—

Brown Haired Intruder: “If you cooperate with me and speak I won’t do anything to you that would otherwise be beyond your imagination.”

Those words he’d spoken were as plain as a threat could be. The man could feel his heart freeze in fear.

4

???: “He’s still doing whatever the hell he likes, the guys we found this time were just small fry, but still…”

???: “…”

???: “I know that you went in because it wasn’t dangerous, that you were sure because of your intuition… But god damn it, I don’t even have anything I can say against it when you have that as your basis.”

Wilhelm briskly scratched his head and tched at Grimm’s protests, who was walking beside him. They were in Abiate, a town in Southern Lugunica—They were here in this town because there’d been reports that Stride had been sighted in its vicinity.

Stride’s covert movements around the Kingdom of Lugunica had increased tenfold ever since they’d found Sphinx’s Refuge in Shamrock Valley. Even though he was a wanted person, he strutted around under the light of the sun as if he didn’t give a toss. There’d been many eyewitness accounts, but even so, he wasn’t letting them lay their hands on the important stuff. They were being completely outplayed by him.

—After everything they went through, they hadn’t been able to get their hands on Stride’s trail in Abiate either.

They’d no choice but to chase up the eyewitness accounts to follow him. Though they knew that full well, all they were able to do was force the information out of the people who’d cooperated with him.

They’d once again beaten up some thugs who’d helped with his ins and outs into the city and provided him a hideout. They’d gotten some information out of them about what was happening.

Even so, it was hard to say if what they’d gathered was anything good.

Wilhelm: “This town too was the same as all the other places after all. All we were able to hear was about those Magic Circles of the Witch and that he’d hired those guys with gold to help him escape… It’s another dud.”

Wilhelm gritted his teeth feeling like they’d wasted their time and recounted the information they’d gotten out of the thugs.

Though Stride had been sighted in a lot of places around Lugunica, what they always found in the places he'd been spotted were the mysterious Magic Circles that they'd discovered in Sphinx's Refuge.

Though they'd collected the Magic Circle from the Hideout, they still didn't know what it did. Roswaal was still studying it back at the Royal Capital, but she hadn't made any progress yet.

As for how they were dealing with them in the current situation, they were destroying them as soon as any were found.

???: Though, I find going around and extinguishing Magic Circles indiscreetly a bit risky, when considering the measures Valga Cromwell put on them. Do you remember? How they were structured so that their Mana streams out when you destroy them, activating a bigger Magic Circle

Wilhelm: "…Forget? You died because of that."???: Indeed I did. That question right now was a bit unkind of me.

The long-haired man brushed Wilhelm's worries about the Magic Circles aside with a chuckle.

That man—Pivot's departed spirit was another one of the problems that plagued Wilhelm.

Wilhelm had come across the departed spirit of Pivot, who'd perished in the Demi-Human War, when they'd investigated the Shamrock Valley. Ever since he'd encountered him in that illusory world amidst the fog, Pivot had always been following him around and talking to him like this.

Wilhelm knew that this wasn't normal.

You can't talk to the dead, and Wilhelm didn't believe in Hollows. When people die, if they're not resurrected, they just return back to the earth. That's the solid truth.

Thus this Pivot was only a figment of Wilhelm's imagination. Even so, Wilhelm was finding this phony to be incredibly useful as an advisor who gave him objective opinions.

Having someone at his side giving him a composed opinion was priceless for Wilhelm, as by nature he tended towards impulsiveness. Usually Grimm was the one taking on that role, but right now he couldn’t manage it.

—He was especially invaluable now that he had far more problems than usual, meaning he needed advice more than ever.

Wilhelm: “…”

Wilhelm sneaked a glance towards Grimm’s face as he walked beside him.

His cheeks looked a bit sallow, but his eyes were set ablaze, and lacked collectedness. Naturally he hadn’t been getting enough sleep, his nerves were frayed, and he’d been constantly jumping into danger as if he craved retribution.

It was clear that he was doing this to gain atonement for what had happened to Carol. However, things would get really dangerous for him if he kept doing what he’d just done today.

There were limits to this, even if Grimm had been munitioned with a blessing that allowed him to sense danger.

Wilhelm: “How did I get stuck with telling others to stay calm…”

Pivot: Yeah, jeez, it’s no laughing matter, but it almost makes you want to laugh, right?

Irritating as Pivot’s cynicism laced words were, he couldn’t deny them.

Wilhelm was seeing ghosts, Grimm couldn’t keep his cool, Carol was still under the influence of her curse and Theresia was pregnant. —His troubles were never-ending even when excluding Stride from them.

It was difficult to deal with all these problems at once. Though getting rid of them one at a time, starting from the most dangerous one, Stride, if he could, would be ideal.

Wilhelm: “It almost looks like he’s fucking enjoying pushing and toying us about.”

Pivot: Practically speaking, we can’t completely discard that possibility. My worst guess is that he’s the sort of scum who just likes to commit crimes to see his victim’s reactions. An even worse guess is that… Is that he’s moving forward with some sort of plan that we aren’t aware of whilst all this is going on

Wilhelm: “…”

It meant that things were going to get even worse, regardless of which one it was. That, and the experience Wilhem had actually had when confronting Stride wouldn’t let him deny it.

That reject definitely wanted more chaos and for the situation to get worse, make no mistake on that.

Wilhelm: “…In any case, Abiate was a dud. Let’s go back to the Royal Capital. Maybe Roswaal’s managed to find some sort of result.”

Grimm: “…’a̸yb̄̒e̸.”

His opinion wasn’t an optimistic one, and Grimm’s reply was heavy too. Wilhelm hesitated in mentioning that to him, and since he couldn’t think of any words to console him he abandoned the idea.

No matter what he said now, it’d just end up a burden. With that on his mind, he started to make his way back to his squad—

???: “Wilhelm! Grimm!”

Wilhelm: “…Conwood?”

Wilhelm and Grimm stopped in their tracks and turned around. Conwood, a Deputy Commander of the Zergev Corps, was running over to them. He’d ordered them to destroy the Magic Circle which the thugs had informed him about, but it was evident from his complexion that he wasn’t here to report the task’s completion.

With a tense look on his face, Conwood spoke out to Wilhelm, who’d braced himself for “something”.

Conwood: “We have a problem. —Lord Miklotov McMahon has been attacked at his mansion.”

5

Miklotov McMahon was one of the Ministers of Internal Affairs that held an important post in the Royal Castle.

Though he was still young, he’d made a name for himself with his incredible talent and powers of judgement. After the end of the Demi-Human War, he’d been integral to the politics of the Kingdom of Lugunica, engaging in them with his shrewdness.

Wilhelm too had been one of the people he’d helped out with his reinstatement to the Royal Forces, and some other matters. It was dead clear that if anything happened to Miklotov it’d be grave enough to shake the Kingdom to its core.

Thus, Wilhelm had immediately made his way to Miklotov as soon as he’d heard the news about the attack on him.

Miklotov’s main residence, the McMahon mansion, was located dozens of kilometers south from the Royal Capital. Luckily, he could reach it from Abiate in about half a day.

Wilhelm: “Grimm, you go back to the Royal Capital ahead of me. I’ll entrust Theresia… Theresia and the others to you.”

They split up along the way, Grimm leading the Zergev Corps back to the Royal capital on ahead, and Wilhelm visiting the McMahon estate. There’d been a large number of Miklotov’s private guards on patrol at the mansion, and it’d taken Wilhelm a fair amount of time to prove his identity and get inside.

And when Wilhelm was able to finally enter into the mansion—

???: “—It sure seems like we’ve left some holes in our defenses with me being attacked several days after leaving the Royal Capital.”

Wilhelm placed his hand on his chest in relief as he came face to face with the master of the mansion—Miklotov, who’d ushered him into his parlor.

Miklotov didn’t seem to have any visible injuries at a glance. The attack hadn’t been a major one, and it looked like the forces he kept in his mansion had managed to turn them away.

Even so, the fact still remained that a key person from the Kingdom had been attacked. Even in regards to their enemy’s guile in setting his aims on Miklotov from the numerous important people who worked at the Royal Castle.

Wilhelm: “Honestly, this has made my blood run cold. The future of the Kingdom would be at stake were something to happen to you.”

Miklotov: “Hmm, as expected, aren’t you making far too much of me? Others can take my position you know. The ones who are truly irreplaceable are the Royal Family and ladies like your esteemed wife.”

Miklotov kept up a humble attitude in response to Wilhelm’s candid relief. He then raised his eyebrows as if he’d recalled something and said, “Come to mention it…”

Miklotov: “I’ve heard that your esteemed wife is pregnant, so congratulations are in order. I haven’t had the chance at all to tell her my congratulations firsthand, but I’m delighted for the both of you.”

Wilhelm: “…Celebrating that now is kinda tough. Especially when you said that you’ve just been attacked.”

Miklotov: “Huh, well that doesn’t mean that no one’s going to be saved by just looking at the bad stuff happening around us. Besides, we’re talking about the child of the Sword Saint and the Sword Demon here, the prides of our country. Wouldn’t the kind of lionheart that’s born from such be an irreplaceable asset for the Kingdom as well?”

Miklotov had quite the silver tongue, as could be expected from his line of work.

Naturally, Wilhelm was incredibly interested too in what kind of child his and Theresia’s would grow up to be. He was a man who was only talented with the sword. He didn't want his child to be just like that as much as he could.

A time would come to them sooner or later where mere skills with the sword wouldn't keep them standing strong. When that time came, they'd need the right skills to find happiness.

Wilhelm: "Even so, the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint is in the Astrea Family. If that gets passed down to the next generation, it should definitely go down to a child who's inherited mine and Theresia's knack with the sword."

Miklotov: "If that happens, then they could become the strongest Sword Saint ever… They might even become a hero as great as the exalted Reid Astrea, the first ever Sword Saint. I'm looking forward to this now."

Wilhelm: "You're getting way too ahead of yourself. You're overly neglecting today when looking forward to the morrow like that."

Wilhelm's anxiety hadn't been cleared away despite all of his flattery. When Wilhelm spoke those words that indicated he wanted to get down to business, Miklotov's mild-mannered expression changed.

It changed from one of a pleasant man to one of a man who flourished his shrewdness on a stage of government embroiled in Machiavellianism.

Miklotov: "Based on what's been happening, the individual who turned up at my mansion seems to be connected to Stride. I think based on the reports it was probably the Shinobi that accompanies him."

Wilhelm: "Him… That thing that I nearly killed was skulking about too?"

Wilhelm recalled the Shinobi whom he'd clashed with at his home in the Royal Capital a while ago and clenched his teeth.

That Shinobi had been quite skilled too, though not as skilled as Kurgan. Wilhelm had let him slip from under his fingers just as he was about to kill him; if that had led to this happening then this too was another error he'd made.

Wilhelm: "Even so, Stride kept himself truly safe and sound with that Shinobi. To put it clearly, for him to end up being thrown back by your private guard is like…"

Miklotov: "I did gather my guard for their skill, but they pale in comparison to you. Besides, I can't deny what you're saying. If he'd wanted to kill me, I imagine he would have done so."

Wilhelm: "Then you're saying that his aim wasn't your life?"

Miklotov: "First things first, I wouldn't call what happened now an attack on the mansion, it's more like a break in. The Shinobi just fled when my men realized that he'd broken in. There wasn't any pointless fighting… Well, actually, no, a few of my men who chased him too far ended up dead."

Miklotov cast his eyes down, mourning the men he'd lost. Even so, Wilhelm pondered for a second about what he'd mentioned, and then said,

Wilhelm: "…Why are you here at a time like this?"

Miklotov: "Hmmm."

Miklotov didn't reply to his question straight away. Wilhelm sensed that something was up with how he'd reacted and spoke up again, starting his words off with a "No,"Wilhelm: "I hate to say this, but you don't seem to be the kind of person who'd be so careless. The Royal Family and VIPs are being guarded in the Royal Capital. You shouldn't have behaved like this, leaving the Royal Capital and carelessly exposing a breach to our enemies. It's not like you."

Miklotov: "…You seem to be looking around at things, unlike what I'm used to about you. Also, I'm genuinely glad that you're evaluating me like that. Hmmm, you've sure grown up fast."

Wilhelm: "Quit fooling about. Though if you're saying that you can't answer me, then you don't have to…"

Wilhelm could more or less infer that he couldn't talk about it. Red flags were flashing all around him considering that Miklotov had gone back to his main home, and as a result, been taken advantage of by Stride due to reasons he couldn't divulge.

—Miklotov spent an unusually long time contemplating Wilhelm's consideration. Then, a voice called out towards them,

???: "—You needn't fret, Miklotov. What happened now was due to my venerable self's carelessness."

Wilhelm "—?!"

Wilhelm suddenly jumped up in fright at the sound of the voice that wedged itself into the parlor.

Not because he'd been surprised by this man's appearance, after all, he'd recognized his presence. He was majestically walking down the mansion's corridor as if he owned the place.

And that was natural of course. This person had nary a reason to shirk away from the gaze of the public.

He held a position in the Kingdom of Lugunica that boasted stately authority wherever he went—And that was because he was His Majesty the King, Gionis Lugunica.

Gionis: "It's been a while, hasn't it, Trias… No, not Trias! You're an Astrea now aren't you. But I'll get you mixed up with your wife if I call you that. I think it's a good idea if I call you Wilhelm!"

Wilhelm "Your Majesty…"

Gionis had red eyes and sparkling golden hair and he declared that with a cheerful, friendly expression on his smiling face. Wilhelm turned stiff faced at his overly-relaxed demeanor and Miklotov covered his head with his hands.

Gionis: "Hm, what's the matter Wilhelm? Is your stomach or something aching? You are indispensable for the kingdom right now, so I think it's a good idea if you're seen by a good Healing Arts User… like Garritch!"

Miklotov: “Your Majesty Gionis, please sit down for now. Wilhelm-dono isn’t sick. He’s just surprised by Your Majesty’s sudden radiance.”

Gionis: “Ohh, so that was it! My apologies for that. Even my venerable self cannot hide the majesty a king lets off.”

Gionis gave him an absentminded apology and then sat himself down on the chair that Miklotov had pointed out. The sense of stiffness Wilhelm had been feeling up until now finally cleared away and he immediately knelt down beneath Gionis and gave him a reverential bow.

Wilhelm: “Your Majesty Gionis, it’s an honor to see you.”

Gionis: “You can dispense with the ceremonies. After all, weren’t you once so bold as to hide yourself in my venerable self’s bedroom and talk to me directly? That… Erm, that truly freaked me out!”

Wilhelm: “That was truly inexcusable of me. But, Your Majesty, why are you at Lord Miklotov’s Mansion…?”

Wilhelm felt ashamed when he touched on the subject where back then he’d committed one the biggest acts of human impoliteness. Now even he knew that under no circumstance should that discourtesy have been allowed.

Gionis let out a somewhat regretful sigh at Wilhelm’s humbled attitude and then said, “What of it?”

Gionis: “It’s because Miklotov is a friend. He’s always been giving me advice whenever I need it. Oftentimes, when business takes me away from the Royal Capital, I visit the Mansion like this.”

Wilhelm: “…No way, then what happened now is…”

…Why Stride’s underling had set his sights on the Miklotov Mansion—They couldn’t overlook what had happened one bit if Stride had known that Gionis was going to visit the Mansion.

Not only was that a leak of information, but there were also some fingers to be pointed with exposing the King to danger so carelessly.

This matter could likely endanger Miklotov's position and even end up with the McMahon family being pegged responsible for it.

With that in mind, Wilhelm looked over at Miklotov with a stern look in his eyes. Miklotov received his gaze as if he'd expected it and looked down in resignation.

Gionis: "Wait, wait up, don't jump to conclusions. It's a good idea here to listen to what my venerable self has to say to the end."

However, Gionis himself told him to hold up.

Gionis: "I told you at the start that what happened now was due to my venerable self's carelessness. Miklotov has no blame in this. First things first, Miklotov has often stopped me from visiting during these times. My venerable self insisted despite that. Because of what I did, I put Miklotov and his guests in danger, I've reflected about that many many times."

Wilhelm: "You did so, Your Majesty… No, even if that's the case, Lord McMahon's duty's to…"

Gionis: "Didn't my venerable tell you that it's a good idea to listen to the end!"

Wilhelm: "…"

Gionis defended Miklotov and once again repeated that to Wilhelm when he cut in. Wilhelm instinctively shut his mouth due to the force of his words.

—A puppet king who's just popular with the masses, a king who's unfit for rule, a king with an overly benevolent temperament and optimistic ideas.

There were many instances where gossipmongers would say stuff like that about the Lugunican Royal Family. In all honesty, Wilhelm too had once thought that being a man of upright character and a ruler went as well as Vinegee on Lemoms.

But in this very moment, Wilhelm was undoubtedly kneeling before a king.

Gionis: “My venerable brushed aside all of his protests and made my way here so to talk to a certain “gentleman”. Due to certain reasons, I shall not divulge the identity of said “gentleman”, but my venerable self can guarantee the veracity of what he told me.”

Wilhelm: “…What did he tell you?”

Gionis: “—He told me about the aims of this evildoer who’s causing chaos around the Kingdom right now, he told me about what this man called Stride plans to do.”

Wilhelm was taken aback by what Gionis had said in a low but firm tone of voice. He saw Miklotov across from Gionis also give him a curt nod, with a serious look on his face.

They’d given him the news that the Kingdom faced danger, news which even the brains of the Kingdom placed his faith in. And moreover—

Wilhelm: “Was Stride’s Shinobi trying to break in proof backing that as well?”

Miklotov: “I even reckon it was worth letting him break into the mansion.”

Miklotov jokingly replied like that to Wilhelm’s understanding. He then exchanged looks with Gionis and the latter nodded his head and continued his words with a “Mhm.”

Gionis: “To start with, that “gentleman” was able to suspect that Stride’s aims involved those things in the report… those Magic Circles was it? And that’s because the “gentleman” is quite familiar with them. I imagine he would have likely used them next time.”

Wilhelm: “Used them… next time…?”

Miklotov: “Your Majesty.”

Miklotov called out to Gionis at the same time that Wilhelm had experienced a weird sense of unease concerning his explanation. Hearing his name called out, Gionis faked a coughing fit, “Hem ahem hem.”

Gionis: “It’s nothing, ignore me. Anyways, what’s important is the effect these Magic Circles or whatever they’re called have.”

Wilhelm: “…Which is?”

Gionis: “—The complete destruction of the covenant.”

Wilhelm’s breath stopped in its tracks at the heavy echo of those words.

The meaning of those words took some time to sink in. Then, almost as if he’d been waiting for that, Mikotov took over his explanation so to make things clearer.

And this is what he said—

Miklotov: “The complete destruction of the covenant that the Kingdom and the Divine Dragon are bound by. In short, our enemy’s planning the downfall of the Kingdom of Lugunica.”

6

—Would anyone have been able to immediately comprehend what had happened?

Sound disappeared from the world, time crawled to a standstill, and a scene of splattering blood was projected vividly.

There were no cries of agony. Both because sound had vanished and because the individual who’d been on the receiving end of the attack had once sustained a wound to his throat and couldn’t speak. However, there was a far more obvious reason why.

—And that was because he was in sheer disbelief at the very fact that he’d been cut down.

???: “…”

He’d heard a heavy Swoosh, and then his body had been slashed across diagonally. Grimm Fauzen collapsed to the floor.

A dull thunk accompanied Grimm’s fall due to him still donning his armor—He hadn’t had the time to change into lighter garb since he’d been eager to get back to his sweetheart.

He should have been looking after her, exchanging sweet nothings with her. But now all of those feelings he held for his sweetheart tantamounted to no more than sheer irony.

—Because the one holding the sword that had cut Grimm down had been his own sweetheart, Carol.

Carol: “Gr…imm?”

Carol gazed down at her sweetheart who’d collapsed at her feet and spluttered those words out in shock. She held her Knight’s Sword in her hands with perfect poise, exemplary of a swordsman.

Her Knight’s Sword had a long, thin blade, that was now covered in the blood of her sweetheart, glittering with the cruel color of steel.

???: “—Hah! There’s a certain lack of flashiness to its production for a comedy, isn’t there? What we also needed here to make things more sublime was some music that accentuates the folly rather than silence. How surprising, the observers in the heavens above lack a sense of aesthetic.”

A man stood in front of that spectacle, his whole body was drenched in malice, and when he declared that, he did so with a bored look on his face—He was currently the worst criminal in the Kingdom of Lugunica, a sworn enemy that the Sword Demon kept pursuing, Stride.

Stride calmly walked up to the people who were frozen in their places because of what they’d witnessed, without sparing a single glance at Grimm collapsed in a pool of his own blood. When he arrived in front of them, he gave each of them a deep bow in turn, and only that.

It was as if he’d turned to his audience atop a theatre stage and promised them an act tonight that would move them.

Stride: “Splendid, the preparations worked properly, even though the start was a little bit dull. Lo’ and behold, ‘tis my venerable self, the playwright, I shall permit you to pay your tributes to his magnanimity. You may applaud me to your heart's content, no matter how much of a let down the overture was."

Stride said that with a wicked smile. Theresia still kept her silence, an acrid taste cloying her mouth at the unspeakable malice exuding from him.

…

—Everything had happened so suddenly.

It had happened during the time when Theresia, her parents and Carol were all sitting together having a good time in one of the rooms of the mansion.

It was a few days after Wilhelm and his squadron had left the Royal Capital; they hadn't received any good news yet, nor had they been able to make any progress on Carol's curse. In the meantime, Carol had spent her days devoting herself as much as possible for Theresia.

Theresia had continued to depend on Carol's favor even after she'd talked to her parents, who'd suggested she should let her do what she wants even if she felt terrible about it. "Carrying on like normal will be for the best", was what they'd said.

So even at a time like this, the harmony inside the Astrea Mansion was as it always had been.

Bertol said stupid stuff without thinking that got misjudged by the women of the mansion; Tishua found it amusing to keep her husband in check when he was like that; And everyone talked about the future of the child that would soon be born into the world.

It was during times like these that Grimm had returned after he'd left the Royal Capital to accompany Wilhelm.

He'd reported that the Zergev Corps had made it back safely and that Wilhelm would be late coming back due to something cropping up. Then he'd bore the news of his return to Carol and made their feelings of affection known to each other even though they still couldn’t touch each other.

Seeing the tryst of the two lovers who were unable to touch each other, Theresia gently stroked her tummy.

—There’d been many a time recently where Theresia and Wilhelm had missed each other.

Naturally with the Stride matter at hand, Wilhelm couldn’t take the time to settle down. Theresia also felt frustrated whenever she thought about Carol and Grimm, having herself been strictly ordered to take things easy.

Nevertheless, she felt anxious about herself, even whilst her thoughts were directed to the utmost on Grimm and Carol’s troubles.

—Reason being that she couldn’t find the time to talk with Wilhelm about their child.

Theresia’s belly had already gotten pretty swollen and she could feel the baby shifting about inside her womb. The actual feelings of the fruits of their bond growing to life grew ever stronger day by day inside of Theresia.

She wanted to share her feelings, her joy, and her anxieties with Wilhelm.

If she could get Wilhelm to take in the feelings she was experiencing, as a father, then she too felt like she could take in the Things which he harbored.

That’s why as soon as Wilhelm got back she’d decided that she’d take the time to properly talk together with him as husband and wife.

—That was when it happened, immediately after she’d decided that.

Stride: “It’s been a long time, Sword Saint. —Have you been keeping well?”

That man had shown up unreservedly, without a shred of hesitation, ruining the family's happy moment.

He cared not a lick that he was about as welcome here as a Giant in a Gustekan milkbar, he had the audacity to waltz in as if he owned the place no matter where he went in this world. Numerous thoughts whizzed through Theresia's mind the instant she caught a glimpse of him.

And the thought that worried her the most was—

Theresia: "—What happened to the bodyguards outside?"

Stride: "Hmph. The first thing you worry about are those peasants outside instead of my own venerable countenance? Such disrespect…, normally I'd make you pay for it with your life… But my venerable self is in a fine mood right now. Thus, I shall generously overlook it."

Theresia firmly squeezed her eyes shut to his manner of speaking, which was laced with cruelty and arrogance. Although he hadn't answered her question, his apathetic attitude spoke volumes about what end her honorable guards had met.

Why this, in this Kingdom that had just recovered from that senseless Civil War and was slowly building towards peace—

Theresia: "How can you be so cruel to others like that?"

Stride: "How unthinkable, to be told that by the Sword Saint who slayed not thousands of lives, but tens of thousands. Were I to compare my venerable self's deeds and such to the amount of lives you took, mine would seem like mere child's play. If inquity is determined by the number of lives you take, then I doubt there is anyone in this world who gets the edge on you."

Theresia: "—Hic."

Though his reply strayed from the topic at hand, Theresia felt a sharp pain from the sting of his words.

He was referencing the anguish that had kept tormenting her mind ever since that Civil War, ever since she'd been allowed to cast down her sword, and ever since she'd had a child with Wilhelm.

However, someone did erupt in a raged frenzy at those words in place of the speechless Theresia.

???: "YOU BASTARD! YOUR INSULTS AGAINST THERESIA-SAMA STOP RIGHT HERE!"

Carol drew out her Knight's Sword from her side and bellowed those words at Stride. Grimm stood next to her, raising the colossal shield he'd had strapped to his back in front of him.

When the two of them turned towards Stride, readying themself up for a fierce battle, Bertol pulled Tishua back by the arm and placed himself in front of where Theresia was sitting, so to protect her.

Stride: "Hmph."

Stride snorted with an air of languor as he gazed at what was happening. Only here, he shouldn't be acting so composed. Because he stood here all alone.

Theresia had already found out that Stride didn't have the power to be able to fight by himself. That still hadn't changed; the only strength of body he had was something akin to the kind a semi-invalid would have.

Carol: "I don't know what you're hiding, but I will capture you right here."

Stride: "You know, the only splendid thing about you is your vigor. Have you forgotten how uncouth you looked the other day?"

Carol: "Even if you try and make me faint with the power of your rings bastard, I'll kill you before I lose my consciousness!"

Stride: "Hah."

Stride scoffed, and in his scoff he placed great scorn and disdain for Carol, who'd readied herself to fight.

The moment she saw that, Carol's sword spirit exploded and she jumped towards the immobile Stride. She swung her Knight's Sword in a beguiling semi-circular pattern, and——When she came to, Grimm had collapsed onto the floor, struck by her attack.

…

Stride: "—Making you faint, causing your breath to stop when you're touched by your loved one, all of these are overtures. The ring's curses aren't limited to such infantile restrictions. I've made you into a puppet."

Stride raised his right hand and showed it to her. The jewel on his index finger was shining with a bewitching radiance to it. Carol gasped out an "Ah"and looked behind her, at Theresia and the others.

Carol shook her head in refusal. However, the tip of her Knight's Sword was pointed towards Theresia and the others—No, towards Bertol and Tishua.

Stride: "The time is ripe now. Long have I awaited this moment, Sword Saint. Are you going to be able to stop me?"

Theresia: "What are you…"

Theresia had placed her hand on her swollen belly, stood up, and asked Stride what he was intending to do. Stride laughed at her words, then his lips split into a cruel sneer,

Stride: "—Do it."

He shook his raised finger and issued a short command without deigning to answer Theresia's question. Carol keenly understood the meaning of that command more than anyone else, thus making her scream.

Carol: "NO…NO, NO, NONONONONOOOOOOOOO!"

Tears streamed from her wide open eyes, nevertheless, her flesh and bones went against her feelings as it tried to exhibit the skills she had honed up until now as a swordsman, without holding anything back.

For the first time ever since she’d taken up the sword, she was pointing it at the family she’d sworn to protect.

Carol: “RUN AWAAAAAAY!”

Carol screamed, and immediately after, she sharply stepped towards them.

Theresia had tried to jump away when she saw that. However her baby had moved in her womb, and that had caused her to stop in her tracks. She hesitated. Then, Tishua pushed her down.

Tishua pushed her down to the floor and shielded her. She could see Bertol standing up with both of his arms spread out before him in front of Tishua.

A flash of silver filled the room.

—And fresh blood splattered around the Astrea mansion.

Act Five

1

—Something strange happened in the Commercial City of Picoutatte that day.

Picoutatte was one of the Six Great Cities in the Kingdom of Lugunica and was located in the south, alongside the border with the Vollachian Empire. The city itself was considered a vital one in the country as it acted as a trading hub with the Empire.

As usual, Picoutatte was lively with a flow of merchants crossing between the border, with people and merchandise moving in and out of the city. Naturally though, the more people there were, the greater the chance of fights breaking out became.

To fight against that, Picoutatte had posted soldiers around the city who kept a watchful eye for that, so that they could immediately intervene if any did break out. Especially because several months ago, a duel had taken place on the stone bridge in the middle of the city; that, and the whole city was going through a time where it was becoming susceptible to disputes.

A situation like that was about to be repeated. The first one who took notice of the anomaly was one of the soldiers who'd been trying to intervene in an argument between a merchant and his customer, and was trying to put an end to their quarrel.

Soldier: "Huh?"

The soldier had grabbed one of the arms of the merchant, and one of the customer, and then widened his eyes in surprise at the strange sensation he'd felt.

All he needed to do was touch the two quarreling individuals and stand between them. If things had proceeded like they always did, then the power of his Divine Protection of Empathy would have kicked in and conveyed their feelings to each other so that they'd be able to reach a compromise.

—The soldier's Divine Protection of Empathy was a gift he'd received from the heavens when he'd been born.

The soldier could read other's emotions simply by touching them, and if he stood between two people, he could even go as far as making them understand each other.

Thanks to this power, the soldier had long been hailed as an expert mediator, and naturally he'd chosen a future for himself that made use of his Divine Protection, allowing him to take a dream job in the current system of soldiers.

All the soldier knew was that when he touched people, he understood their emotions, and that when he made them touch like this he made them come to an understanding. Other than that, the soldier didn't know anything about how it worked, its quintessence, or why he even needed to touch them. That's why the soldier was extremely confused by what had just happened.

The technique he'd been using ever since he'd been born had suddenly stopped working. Then, what ought he do now—

???: "—You're twisted. Yes, well and truly twisted. The epitome of a twisted lump of flesh."

Soldier: "Huh?"

The soldier, who'd blanked out due to what had happened, gathered his wits back when he heard an abrupt voice coming from his side. He turned to face the direction the voice had come from, and standing there right beside him was a tall, thin man.

The man had dark purple hair and gave off an awfully cold, handsome impression. For a second, the soldier was completely spellbound by him, then he briskly shook his head and said, "No."

Soldier: "What did you just say? Excuse me, but after I settle things here, I'll…"

Purple Haired Man: "Stop their quarrel? Don't be so foolish. You're not too unlike a newborn baby right now. How do you intend to stop a fight between adult men in your state? Don't be so conceited."

Soldier: "…"

The man's voice was even more cruel than the look to his face and in his eyes. The three of them reacted in surprise to his words. Not just the soldier, but also the two men who'd started the incident.

The merchant, the customer and the soldier all had no clue what to think about this sudden intruder.

Was he a weirdo or maybe a drunk? It wasn't that late yet, but when you got so many people moving about, you'd occasionally get someone who'd let loose even in the earlier hours of the day. Dealing with people like these was one of his duties as a soldier.

Soldier: "Let's stop right here. If you have something to say, then you can say as much as you want back at the station…"

Purple Haired Man: "You can tell certain things with touch. That's the root of your twistedness, isn't it?"

Soldier: "…"

The soldier had let go of the quarreling mens' arms and tried to grab the drunk instead. However, he'd been stopped in his tracks again by what the drunk had said. Just this time, it wasn't out of surprise, but more so because chills had run up his spine.

The man's words had hit the nail precisely on the head about what the soldier's Divine Protection was. What's more, the soldier had never told anyone other than his family about his Divine Protection of Empathy.

Divine Protections easily tended to create strife between people who were and weren't privy to one. That was common sense in the world, and the soldier too had sworn by that and never opened his mouth about it.

Then how did this man in front of him, whom he'd never met before, know about it?

Purple Haired Man: “Look, If you want to know… then try getting the information out of me, twisted spawn of the heavens.”

Soldier: “Ukh…”

The man offered his arm to the soldier, who was staring at him rooted to the spot. The man had goaded him to try.

There was no doubt, the man knew about his Divine Protection. The soldier noticed from the look in the man’s eyes that this was a challenge, and that from the fierce, strange aura that was coming from him, he wouldn’t let him escape. As a result, he took the man’s arm and prayed that his Divine Protection would work.

What he could read with his Divine Protection of Empathy wasn’t a person’s thoughts, but rather the emotions they harbored at the time. Even so, if he could see a part of his true, unadulterated emotions, then smoothing things over would instantly become a lot easier.

Even the strange fear he had of this man should be eased with his Divine Protection—

Purple Haired Man: “So, did you find out anything?”

Soldier: “N-Nothing…”

Purple Haired Man: “I see. —You’ve been a great help.”

The soldier had grabbed the man’s surprisingly thin wrist and once again felt nothing. He shook his head at his question. The man pondered the soldier’s answer for a moment with his eyes closed and then gave him a short, solemn nod, thanking him for his efforts.

The soldier didn’t even know if his thanks had come from what he truly felt, though.

Soldier: “—Urk.”

The next moment, a flurry of scythe-like slashes reaped the soldier’s life. The flurry kicked up a gale of wind and the two men who were looking at the spectacle from the sidelines were showered in fresh blood.

Those two men who'd started this whole mess looked at the spectacle happening in front of their eyes, unable to move a single muscle or utter a single peep.

The soldier's arm had been cut off at the elbow and was still clinging to the man's—Stride's wrist. Stride shook it off and then let out a brief sigh.

At Stride's side stood a colossal figure with eight arms, as well as a figure that was clad in a darkness blacker than the night. That figure of darkness brought along a short woman with them, who serenely walked over to Stride's side and snuggled up to him.

Stride paid no attention to them though, he merely continued to look up at the sky and spoke to it as if he were in song.

Stride: "Now then, the test has succeeded, Sword Demon Wilhelm van Astrea. All that's left now is to await the results. You'd better watch, o' audience who decides fate. —You'd better watch which choices the world shalt make."

That was Stride Vollachia's proclamation of war, the overture of one the worst days with Picoutatte as its stage—that would become the grand stage of the Sword Demon Battle Ballad.

2

Everything was already over by the time Wilhelm got back to the Astrea Mansion.

Wilhelm "—!"

Wilhelm, by nature, didn't care much for things being busy and noisy. And he wasn't the only one like that, Theresia was also like that, so typically they didn't have that many people coming in and out of the mansion.

The only exceptions to this had probably been just after their marriage ceremony and the time when Theresia’s pregnancy had come to light.

Many had turned up at the mansion to bear their congratulations on both of these occasions. It hadn’t just been people from the Royal Castle, Knights who knew them and family members who’d come bearing their good wishes for their marriage and pregnancy. People who only had that they lived in the Royal Capital in common had also turned up.

The wedding ceremony had been about a year ago, and the baby shower a tad under a half year ago. Yet now, the Astrea Mansion was once again in an uproar.

—A stream of soldiers was bustling in and out of the mansion in an attempt to get ahold of the situation.

???: “Wilhelm! Over here!”

A deep voice called out to him soon after he’d forced himself into the mansion through a gap in the stream of soldiers. He turned to look towards where he’d indicated, and there waving his arm at him was a giant of a man with short blue hair, Bordeaux Zergev.

He should have hung up his boots when it came to actual combat. Nevertheless, he was still here because there was no one who was more talented than him with the experience of the commander that he was when it came to dealing with emergencies.

It made complete sense why—The Astrea Mansion in the Royal Capital should never have been attacked.

Wilhelm: “Bordeaux, what happened.”

Wilhelm rushed over to the stiff-faced Bordeaux and demanded an explanation from him.

Wilhelm had left the Royal Capital and visited Lord Miklotov’s estate. When he’d received the news there from an Earth Dragon that had come galloping to him at full speed, he’d rode back to the mansion without wasting a single moment.

All he’d heard then was that their mansion in the Royal Capital had been attacked. He’d rushed back with his mind clear save only for that.

He knew that the more he thought about it, the more negative his thoughts would become, considering that it looked like Theresia and her baby had gotten roped up in this nightmare.

Bordeaux: “There was a bloodshed in your mansion. The 8 soldiers we’d placed here as bodyguards were all put to the sword, and at the end of all this, Theresia-dono was kidnapped… I’m sorry. For all of this, even while I was in the Royal Capital.”

Wilhelm: “Kidnapped? Theresia was kidnapped? What the hell, by who!”

???: “—S͝t̶r̶i̶d̸e̊.”

Wilhelm grabbed the apologetic Bordeaux by the scruff of his neck and raised his voice at him. The one who’d answered the Sword Demon’s wrath hadn’t been the groaning Bordeaux, no, it had been someone behind him.

Wilhelm: “…Grimm.”

Grimm: “…”

He looked back and saw Grimm, his head hung low and a melancholic look on his face.

Unlike Wilhelm, he should have gotten back to the Royal Capital ahead of him and been there during the time of the attack. Though even Wilhelm wasn’t going to be so cruel as to ask him why things had gotten this bad with him here.

Namely because he was sitting sunk into a chair, with his whole body covered in painful, bloodied bandages.

Bordeaux: “Grimm was the first person he took out of action when things started to kick off. Makes sense that he’d remove his most troublesome enemy before anything else… But, what happened here is far more worse.”

Wilhelm's grip on the scruff of Bordeaux's neck loosened, allowing Bordeaux to free himself and then whisper those words into his ear. Why did he even need to take the consideration to not let Grimm hear what he was saying?

Bordeaux looked meekly at the baffled Wilhelm and continued.

Bordeaux: "The one who put those soldiers and Grimm to the sword and afterwards kidnapped Theresia-dono was Carol Remendis."

Wilhelm: "—What the hell?"

Bordeaux: "To be precise, a Carol-dono who was being made to do Stride's exact bidding. The soldiers who managed to escape this ordeal with their lives are testifying that she was shouting "Run away" whilst crying her eyes out."

Bordeaux sheepishly explained to him everything that had happened.

Stride had attacked the Astrea Mansion half a day ago; Grimm and Carol had met his attack but Carol had turned her blade against Grimm rather than Stride. The reason why she'd done that had been down to one of Stride's rings—The curse-casting ring had been behind everything that was going on in Carol's body, like her coma and her asphyxiation.

And now it had turned Carol into a puppet, forcing her to put their bodyguards and Grimm to the sword one after the other. With Carol taken as a hostage, there was no way Theresia could have resisted.

That's why she had been taken away too—

Wilhelm: "—Wait up. I get that Theresia's been kidnapped, and that Carol's been dragged into this by that bastard Stride… But her parents should have been in the mansion as well."

Bordeaux: "…"

Bertol and Tishua both doted on their daughter and were using her pregnancy as an opportunity to make frequent trips to the mansion, making themselves available for helping out with their first grandchild.

Most likely, they secretly considered Carol like their own daughter. So they should have been in the mansion when it happened.

Wilhelm: “I told them I was going to be leaving for a while, that I would count on them to be at Theresia’s side. So the two of them must have been in the mansion…”

Knowing them, they would have kept their promise no matter what.

Wilhelm’s face stiffened in fright. Bordeaux looked away from him for a moment, then he let out a short sigh and looked straight into his eyes and said,

Bordeaux: “Wilhelm, listen carefully. Lord Bertol Astrea is…”

Wilhelm: “…”

Bordeaux: “He was the pride of the Kingdom, one of its most esteemed Knights, and an exemplary father.”

3

The woman sitting on the bed gave off an impression that was remarkably different from her usual self.

She had cascading long flaxen hair and wore a grass-green dress over her curvaceous body. Her youthful looks made her look a lot younger than she actually was, and since she usually wore a smile that never seemed to dim, she’d always kept up an impression of gentleness.

Right now her lips were pursed shut, the look on her face was stiff, and her dress, hair and pale cheeks were caked in dried blood. It almost felt like she was presenting herself as a surrealist’s painting.

The woman was Tishua Astrea—Theresia’s mother, Bertol’s wife and Wilhelm’s mother in law whom he’d entrusted Theresia to during his absence from the mansion.

Tishua: “…”

Tishua was sitting on a large bed in her matrimonial bedroom gazing vacantly into space, the light gone from her eyes. Her demeanor indicated that she was there in body but not in mind. In fact—

Bordeaux: “She doesn’t reply to anything we say. But she’ll struggle for dear life if you try to take her out of her bed. That’s why we’ve still left her in her bedroom like this.”

Wilhelm: “…Is my honored mother hurt?”

Bordeaux: “Nope. The Healer already made sure of that. The blood on her is all…”

Bordeaux trailed his words off there. But Wilhelm knew what he was going to say, even if he hadn’t finished them. It was pretty clear who the blood belonged to when he considered that Tishua was refusing to wash it off.

Bordeaux: “We could get her off by force, but I don’t want to do that. Can you try speak to her somehow?”

Wilhelm: “Do you think I’ll get through to her?”

Bordeaux: “If you can’t manage it, then no one can. That’s the rub of it.”

Bordeaux’s words were full of supplication and concern, imploring Wilhelm to not leave her like she was. Taking his words on board, he approached Tishua. Even if all she did was curse at him, he determined that it was his duty to accept that.

Wilhelm: “Honored mother, it’s me, Wilhelm. I’ve just gotten back. I’m really sorry for being so late.”

Tishua: “…”

Wilhelm: “I’ve heard about what happened whilst I was away. My honored father… Erm, our head of the Astrea household, how should I put it…It was unfortunate, what happened to him.”

He felt distaste at himself for voicing out those hollow words.

Even so, Wilhelm became properly cognizant of the feelings storming around his heart by the mere power of kotodama those words had carried as they left his tongue. Anger and impatience were the most prominent, however, a feeling he'd been shirking away from had naturally taken form inside of him.

It's not something related to my lacking words where I'd tried to express my regret, penitence and such. Aah, now I realize what it is.

—I never hated Bertol Astrea.

Wilhelm: "—Hic."

Before Wilhelm even noticed, he was kneeling at Tishua's feet with his head held out to her. A gesture that though seemed like he was saying "You can go ahead and remove my head from my body" hadn't been done to mean that.

As much as he craved that, he still needed his head. He had something which needed to be done.

He needed to tell Bertol's wife the feelings he felt for his father-in-law.

Wilhelm: "—? Honored mother?"

Wilhelm suddenly felt something odd brushing against his head, making him lift his head up. Someone had feebly stuck their fingers through his brown hair and was stroking his head as if they were soothing a child.

Wilhelm was stunned; the hand brushing through his hair belonged to none other than Tishua, who should have been in an incognizant state. Slowly, the light came back to her eyes.

Tishua: "Wilhelm…san…"

Wilhelm: "My Honored mother…! Tishua-sama, do you know who I am?"

Tishua: "…Mhm, of course. I've… Right. I've shown a rather shameful side to myself."

Tishua came back to her senses as Wilhelm called her name. She quickly got a grasp on the situation and cast her eyes down in shame. Wilhelm shook his head in reply and exchanged looks with Bordeaux who was hanging by the entrance. Bordeaux gave him a nod and gave out instructions to his soldiers to go and call a healer.

Wilhelm: "A healer will be here very soon Honored mother. You've no physical injuries, but…"

Tishua: "Nope. I don't Wilhelm-san, you needn't take the trouble to do that, I'm alright. More importantly, I have something I need to tell you."

Wilhelm: "To tell me?"

Tishua: "Well, a message from this insurgent who forced his way into the mansion. A message from the man called Stride."

Wilhelm: "—Hic."

Wilhelm unconsciously gawked at her when he heard that name come out of her mouth.

Tishua drew her chin in at his reaction, and her face grew even more pale,

Tishua: "I don't imagine I need to tell you what I feel about that man. He's a monster. Nothing good will ever come of leaving him out loose in the world of men."

Wilhelm: "…"

Tishua: "That man forced Carol to murder her own liege against her will, kidnapped Theresia and then turned towards my helpless self and put a curse on me. Wilhelm… He did it to make me deliver to you his words."

Wilhelm: "Then he must've stripped you of your will as well, Honored mother…"

Tishua nodded, confirming Wilhelm's doubts. Stride had them completely in the palm of his hand. Tishua continued her words with a “Listen well” in response to his frustration,

Tishua: “Hold your anger in for now. That’ll become the best way to return the favor.”

Wilhelm: “—I understand.”

Tishua: “Let me tell you what that man said. —”I await the close with the Sword Demon in the land of the Silver Flower Dance.”“

Wilhelm: “…”

The way Tishua’s words had rung so theatrically most likely reflected Stride’s intent rather than her own.

Silver Flower Dance, it felt like a stanza from a poem, one which he knew about.

In the first act that he’d come across Stride, he’d ended up clashing swords with his escort, the Eight Arms. He vaguely remembered hearing him calling the duel The Silver Flower Dance. He couldn’t help but feel like it was coming from Stride himself when she said it in that tone—

Wilhelm: “—That bastard’s in Picoutatte.”

Both Theresia and Carol should have been taken there.

Of course that wicked man would have designated a location. It was hard to even imagine what sort of ugly tricks he had lying in wait for them.

Wilhelm: “Even so, we don’t have the choice to shy away. —Bordeaux!”

Wilhelm raised his voice and put the question to Bordeaux, who’d been listening in, about whether he would muster his forces. Even if he rejected the notion, there was no way that was going to be able to stop him. However—

Bordeaux: “—I’ll muster together a subjugation force at once. You gather the Zergev Corps and get yourselves in gear.”

Bordeaux's decisiveness at taking swift action was his greatest weapon; he'd shown that here as well to the fullest. He was the kind of man who when he said he'd do something, he'd do it. For that, Wilhelm placed absolute faith in him.

Wilhelm knew that he wouldn't betray this faith.

Wilhelm: "Tishua-sama… My Honored mother, please leave the rest to me. I will definitely get Theresia, Carol and her unborn child back."

Wilhelm looked back around, took Tishua's hand, and swore to her that he would do so.

Since Wilhelm had pegged Bordeaux as the sort who did the things he said, it meant that he too had to follow in his example. That was the duty the commander of the Mark II Zergev Corps had to hold, the duty of the man who'd married the Sword Saint, of the Sword Demon Wilhelm van Astrea.

Tishua: "—May good fortune smile on you."

Tishua returned Wilhelm's grip and left him the best words she could, making them no longer than they needed to be, words fit for a woman who'd married into this family of warriors.

Wilhelm took her words in and tried to give her a firm nod. —But as he tried to, he felt her nails digging into the back of his hand.

Tishua mustn't have been aware that she'd done that. Her hand was shaking and she'd tightened her grip on his hand without even realizing. Large teardrops were welling up in the corner of her eyes despite her having put on a brave look up until now.

Tishua: "Wilhelm, you are…"

Wilhelm: "…"

Tishua: "You are an Astrea. Never forget that, not even for a moment."

Her voice was quivering, tears were streaming down her face and her hand was blisteringly cold.

Even so, the feelings she'd expressed were incredibly precious to Wilhelm, and so he bowed his head.

Wilhelm: "—I never will."Wilhelm replied with these words and then took his leave from the Astrea Mansion.

—Vowing that he would make the Destruction Wish awaiting him in Picoutatte get his just reward.

4

A subjugation force had been assembled at unprecedented speeds under Bordeaux Zergev's command.

Though a part of that came from Bordeaux's competency as a commander, it was mostly due to the morale of the knights and soldiers who'd joined the subjugation force being so high.

All of them already knew about what had happened with the attack on the Astrea Mansion and the Sword Saint Theresia's abduction. They all knew she'd been the hero who'd brought an end to the Civil War.

They all knew that she was the benefactor who'd saved their friends and families, their mothers, their fathers, their brothers and sisters, and their children and grandchildren. They all knew that the man known as The Destruction Wish had utterly crossed the line.

Thus they'd all hearkened to her banner right now, faster than anyone else, vowing in their hearts that they would carry out justice and achieve victory for the prestige of the Kingdom of Lugunica.

???: "Your plan's practically cleared out most of the Royal Capital. I really dooooon't see how you got the permission to go ahead with this."

Her voice was quite clear despite them being inside a Dragon Carriage that was under the effect of the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion.

Wilhelm was sat sunk into his seat with his arms folded, deep in meditation, though her voice had made him open his eyelids up just a tad. When he looked to his side, he saw there the figure whom the voice belonged to, her long legs crossed together and a smile on her face. It was Roswaal J Mathers, the mage whom he'd ended up being as thick as thieves with, no matter how unfortunate that was.

—Right now, she, Wilhelm and everyone else with them inside the Dragon Carriage were heading towards the Commercial City of Picoutatte.

The soldiers from the Zergev Corps were all split up between the vast cavalcade of Dragon Carriages. Wilhelm was riding on board one of them, waiting impatiently for the moment they arrived at the city.

He'd ended up riding on the same carriage as her before he could even take notice. She'd been staying at the Royal Capital when she'd heard about what had happened at the Astrea Mansion. She'd then added herself to the Subjugation Force as if it were the most natural thing to do.

As a result, right now she was sitting next to Wilhelm, gazing out of the window and telling him her impressions about the force heading out to Picoutatte and stuff like that.

She stroked her chin with her supple fingers and said “Hmmm” when Wilhelm didn't break his silence.

Roswaal: “I'm just trying to make small talk before we get down to business. Aren't you going to help me out and ease my nerves?”

Wilhelm: “Nerves? Don't make me laugh. Don't you rarely ever show things like that? I'm sorry, but I don't have the time to chit-chat with you right now. I'm busy waiting for our arrival in peace and quiet.”

Roswaal: “You actually doing that sounds liiiiiike a bad joke. Besides, no matter how much you've blamed yourself, nothing's going to change. Wouldn't you agree?”

Wilhelm: "…"

Wilhelm tch'd at Roswaal who'd closed one of her eyes and looked over at him with her blue one.

She was the same woman as ever, always talking like she understood him. To make matters worse, those kinds of remarks always felt like she was hitting bulls-eye, her nature was the worst.

In actual fact, Wilhelm's meditation didn't help him keep his zen up at all. Whenever he closed his eyes a voice would speak to him, tormenting him with blame. And now—

???: Just as I thought, Miss Mathers has got quite the keen eye. Don't you think so too, Wilhelm?

His feelings of guilt were always at his side in the shape of his former comrade, who was now shrugging his shoulders at him.

His guilty conscience, which took the form of Pivot, had always been dogging him around without letting up. Though, he hadn't showed his face at the Astrea Mansion, almost as if even this specter had been able to read the mood there,

Pivot: I don't talk to you when you don't need me. So, this must be why you've never been distracted in the middle of a fight, right?

Pivot read what he'd left unsaid in his heart and answered his doubt as if he were a teacher teaching his student. In the end, this was all an illusion that came from Wilhelm's mind. That's why he perfectly understood Wilhelm's distress and appeared before him as if to say "Don't avert your eyes".

Roswaal: "Even if you're thinking about blaming yourself for everything that's happened today, I reckon you'd be making a big mistake… Though, what do you think?"

Wilhelm: "…So tell me."

Roswaal had peered over at him looking like she'd taken his silence as him anguishing. Wilhelm moistened his tongue, and said, Wilhelm: “Tell me, what big mistake am I making?”

Roswaal: “It’s like I said, it’s conceited to think that all the blame lies in yourself for what happened today. If we are going to speak about guilty consciences, I definitely know someone who’s suffering way more than you.”

Wilhelm: “More than me? Just who would that be…”

Roswaal: “—Carol-kun of course.”

Wilhelm had started to seethe in indignation, but as soon as she mentioned Carol’s name, he did a double take. Roswaal kept an eye on his reaction and then once again said “Carol-kun.”

Roswaal: “Her sense of responsibility is strong, and she loves Theresia-sama… the members of the Astrea Family more than anything else. Don’t you think that she’s been constantly blaming herself for having been made into a puppet and having been made to swing her sword against her will?”

Wilhelm: “—. Even still, that doesn’t mean I’m blameless.”

Roswaal was right.

There definitely wasn’t anyone in the world right now who was tormenting themself in blame and wishing that someone would judge them more than Carol. There was no way that a woman as sincere as her could turn her eyes away from the fact that she’d sullied her hands.

He could easily imagine what she was feeling right now. Still, that didn’t mean it’d alleviate his suffering.

Wilhelm: “It was me who left Theresia behind with her parents to hold the fort whilst I was away from the mansion, I let Stride spring into action. Even Carol’s suffering is my fault.”

Pivot: If you’d been able to stay at the Mansion, if her parents had been able to enjoy some quiet time at their home, if you’d managed not to leave Theresia by herself, and if you’d been able to stop Carol-dono, then…

Pivot's objective hypothesis overlapped with Wilhelm's introspection, laying bare the cold reality of the situation at hand.

That's why—

Wilhelm: "I'm to blame because…"

Roswaal: "Look, that's where your mistake is. Men really need to stop always trying to take the blame for everything."

Wilhelm: "…"

Roswaal placed her finger on Wilhelm's lips and shushed him in exasperation. Wilhelm became lost for words at being shushed up like that, giving Roswaal the opportunity to continue her words with a "Mind you…"

Roswaal: "Sometimes I too feel like blaming myself. Like I'd been examining Carol-kun on a regular basis, so I should have figured out the effects of the curse. Or like, I wished that I'd gotten to the bottom of those Magic Circles that Stride left behind before Miklotov-dono told me the news."

Wilhelm: "…"

Roswaal: "Everyone else feels such blame. That includes Bordeaux-dono, Conwood-dono, and the other soldiers. No, all the people who've gathered here as part of the Subjugation force feel these things."

Roswaal told Wilhelm about how everyone else was carrying regrets.

She told him how they all thought that what had happened now was primarily due to some dearth of their own. But as far as Wilhelm was concerned that was…

Pivot: Merely conceit

Roswaal: "Are you going to say they're conceited? And that you're the only exception?"

Pivot and Roswaal mentioned that he was conceited, almost in tandem, though in the opposite sense of its meaning. Taking in the force she'd delivered those words with, Wilhelm felt ashamed of himself and Roswaal flashed him a smile.

Roswaal: "You're always getting the wrong sort of ideas, Wilhelm-kun. If you're pinning the blame on yourself… As in, you're saying that you think of yourself as the only villain here, then that's the obvious mistake you're making."

Roswaal cut her words off there again with a "Because",

Roswaal: "—Because right here, right now, the only one at fault here is Stride himself, make no mistake about that."

Wilhelm: "…"

Roswaal: "Of course, there's his companions too who've helped him, but he's the only villain here if we look at the big picture. And while this may not be necessary for me to say and only add one thing to another… Please stop wallowing in self-reproach. You weren't like that before, it's not you."

Roswaal snapped her fingers after she said this. Wilhelm's eyes widened in surprise as the snap rang out through the carriage, as he was saying "what was up with that?". The soldiers who were riding with them also turned around in surprise.

Roswaal: "It seeeeeemed like you'd finally gotten to the point where you could see what was going on around you."

Wilhelm: "Wha…"

Roswaal: "You seeing these things as your own responsibility definitely means you've grown. But, forgive me for saying it, but what I want to get back here isn't this you, but the Sword Demon you once were."

Roswaal continued her words, earnestly reflecting Wilhelm in her heterochromic eyes.

Roswaal: "Not self-reproach, but anger. An anger so pure where your thoughts are consumed by the enemies you need to kill; doing that will make you reach the heights you once reached with your sword once more. Right now, you need to forget about your own humanity, other than for that. The Sword Demon Wilhelm Trias. — This is your name, right?”

Roswaal called him by his old family name so to give him a nudge in the right direction, hoping it would awaken the demon of the sword who’d fought like a maniac in the Demi-Human War and in the end, even defeated the Sword Saint.

Though, that didn’t mean he had to think “Oh let’s get on board with her exaggerated, nigh ritualistic behavior”—

Wilhelm: “…You sure like to go full circle before getting to the point, don’t you? I’d like it if you put all this drawn out stuff into a few idiot-proof words that I don’t even need to think about.”

Roswaal: “It’s just my womanly instincts showing through in wanting to talk with you as much as possible.”

Roswaal gave him a wink and then calmly shrugged her shoulders at his reply. Wilhelm snorted at her reply and let out a heavy sigh.

Although she got on his nerves, he’d been able to look at things less narrowly now thanks to her. Her saying that he’d finally gotten to the point where he could see what was going around him were words which he understood plainly enough.

He had no intention of breaking the oath he’d sworn to Tishua back at the Astrea Mansion. But at this rate, he looked like he was going to fall to pieces before he could fulfill it.

Pivot: You feel like thanking Miss Mathers, don’t you?

He felt like saying some snarky remark back to him, but that would be pointless. He’d long acknowledged that this Pivot was just a manifestation of what he truly felt at heart.

Wilhelm: “…”

Wilhelm didn’t think that steeping himself in anger and swinging his sword was the right solution, but he knew what she was getting at. What they wanted from Wilhelm right now was the strength of the Sword Demon who'd defeated the Sword Saint.

There was no doubt that he needed that strength to bring down his enemy, the Eight Arms, who would be standing in his way and stopping him from killing Stride. The Eight Arms was the sort of enemy who could only be killed by him.

Roswaal: "Anyways, I don't think Stride has the strength to match our 1000 strong Subjugation Force, no matter how far he's tried to spread his influence. Now then, let's move onto talking about what he has lying in wait for us…"

Wilhelm: "…Ah on that topic, did you manage to find out what those Magic Circles which he's been leaving behind in various places did?"

Wilhelm had talked with Gionis in person back at Miklotov's Mansion; there he'd heard that the purpose of those Magic Circles was to orchestrate the "complete destruction of the covenant." However, Wilhelm still had no idea what that truly meant or what they were capable of doing.

That's why he'd checked with Roswaal, who should have obtained that same information.

Wilhelm: "Miklotov mentioned that his aim was the downfall of the Kingdom, but…"

Roswaal: "That's not a bad guess, I suppoooooose. Putting it simply, we can consider the effect of those Magic Circles to be one which disrupts the barrier that the Divine Dragon wound all around the Kingdom from working."

Wilhelm: "The Divine Dragon's… Barrier…?"

Wilhelm furrowed his brows, he'd never heard this piece of information before.

The Divine Dragon Volcanica—was the name of the ancient dragon who'd entered in a covenant with the Kingdom of Lugunica, promising it peace and prosperity. They said “Peace and prosperity”, but to him it felt like nothing more than a lark.

Long ago, a terrible calamity known as the Witch of Envy had dropped the entire world into a maelstrom of terror. It’s said that the Dragon helped seal the Witch, and from then on continued to watch over the Kingdom.

Wilhelm: “What’s this about a barrier of the Divine Dragon? I’ve never heard of anything like that being in the Kingdom.”

Roswaal: “I’m just calling it a barrier for the sake of conveeeenience. In actual fact, it’s there to let the Divine Dragon know if the Kingdom is in danger. It’s kind of like some sort of naruko. In situations where the Kingdom needs the Divine Dragon’s help… like when the Kingdom is under attack from foreign invasions, the Dragon gets alerted and lends us its helping hand.”

(TL Note: 鳴子 (Naruko), a device which was used to scare away (or otherwise get the attention) of birds that would damage crops in Japan, now more modernly refers to the clapper (a musical instrument). The way it’s being used here feels close to the way the word “clapper of a bell” is used in English. Essentially it’s a magical warning system to get the Dragon’s attention.)

The legend to him felt like a sham. If the Dragon harkened to them in times of life-threatening danger, then where had they been during the Demi-Human War?

At the very least, most of the people in the Kingdom of Lugunica believed that the Dragon wouldn’t save them.

Roswaal: “So, these Magic Circles prevent the Dragon’s naruko from being rung. In other words, they’re a way to buy time to wreak havoc without the Dragon finding out about the perilous crisis that the Kingdom is in.”

Wilhelm: “…Are you saying that he’s been playing out his flashy escape acts just for that?”

Roswaal: “I imagine the Dragon would have shown up for Stride.

So, he wouldn't have been able to take action without ruling out that possibility. Eventually, the time became ripe for him."

Wilhelm frowned at Roswaal's explanation, and kept silent with a glum look on his face.

He was stunned that she'd said that the Magic Circles that Stride had been brandishing about pretty much everywhere (and in turn them desperately destroying them) "meant absolutely nothing."

The sense that they'd wasted their time grew stronger in him as he thought about how the Circles had been brandished about by the work of a man who believed in superstitions.

Roswaal: "Has the anger you put into your sword boiled up in you yet?"

Wilhelm: "I am starting to feel more and more like there's not a devil around who doesn't deserve to be killed."

—Wilhelm responded to Roswaal and then brought his hand over the pommel of his beloved sword, checking its feel.

Come to think about it, this treasured sword had been given to him by Bertol, and its name was Astrea—He would make sure that he'd settle matters with it. That was the kind of distinction he would teach Stride.

Roswaal: "So now your only remaining worries are about him, I guess…"

Roswaal leaned back on her chair and looked up at the roof of the Dragon Carriage. Wilhelm instantly knew who she was referring to.

Despite having been stabbed by the puppeteered Carol and having sustained heavy injuries, Grimm had joined the Subjugation Force. Right now he was on board a separate Dragon Carriage, heading towards the same place as them whilst getting medical treatment from a healing arts user.

Everyone knew that he was pushing himself past his limits, but no one was going to stop him considering that Carol had been snatched away from him. He probably wouldn't stop even if it meant that Picoutatte was going to be the place he died in.

Grimm though was worth as much as ten ordinary soldiers, even when wounded.

So all that remained was—

Pivot: What they have waiting in store for you in Picoutatte, right?

Wilhelm: "Yeah, that's right."

Wilhelm voiced his agreement to what Pivot had said, words which only he had been able to hear. He wondered, what sort of scheme was the Destruction Wish cooking up for them at the place of their long-awaited deciding battle.

He was going to tear apart Stride's plot, get Theresia back and lop off his head.

???: "We're nearly there. We need to go through the plans again before we arrive at Picouttate…"

Wilhelm focused himself up and established what he needed to do. Straight after, he heard the voice of one of the soldiers inside his Dragon Carriage calling out to him. Wilhelm looked up and tried to reply with an "Okay"—

Wilhelm: "…"

—The very next instant, a shockwave came careening down on the Dragon Carriage convoy, swallowing Wilhelm and the people around him whole.

5

???: "You're quite the tough woman, aren't you, not shedding even a single tear at a time like this."

Saying this, Stride jabbed one of his thin fingers under her chin and forced her head up. She could see through her barely opened eyes the scornful smile of the most despicable man in this world.

Needless to say, the woman—Theresia's sky-blue eyes were ones which were full of fury as she firmly clenched her teeth.

Stride: "Hah, what a lovely face. Maybe I was wrong to use tough, though. Valiant is far more suiting."

Theresia: "…I have a husband. Get your hands off me you wretch."

Stride: "You think that there are people who would lust for a woman with a stomach as bloated as that…? No, I bet it excites your husband in your case. Before you became a mother, I would be too repulsed and would hesitate to even touch you."

Theresia: "—hgh."

Hurt welled up in Theresia's eyes after being hit hard by the full extent of his malice.

Actually, if Theresia wanted to, she could easily kill this man considering how close he was standing next to her. She could immediately stamp out the root of all of their problems were she to not think about the consequences.

Yet, she couldn't do that. She'd vowed to Wilhelm that she wouldn't take up her sword again of course, but other than that, there was a far more pressing reason why she couldn't.

And that was—

Stride: "Any resistance from you, and my venerable self's curse shall snuff the breath out of your unborn child. Make sure you do not forget that."

Stride flashed Theresia his ring. The same ominous light that was reflected in the ring's crimson jewel faintly shone up from her swollen belly. It was this light that was the shackle that was keeping her in check.

She'd seen the horrible, evil effects which Stride's curse rings had over and over again. They'd eaten into Bertol, turned Carol into a puppet, made Tishua into a mouthpiece and now were holding the life of her and Wilhelm's child hostage.

That's why Theresia couldn't lay a single finger on this root of all evil that stood in front of her.

Theresia: "—You wretch."

Theresia denounced Stride again and looked away from him. Though by doing that, it didn't mean she'd be averting her eyes from the wrongdoings this man was committing. At the edge of her averted gaze, she could see a bunch of people shaking in fear who'd become prisoners just like her.

Right now, Theresia was being held captive in the spire located in the central district of the Commercial City of Picoutatte.

Picoutatte was split into five large districts, with the main facilities of the city gathered in the central one. The spire she was in was popularly known as the symbol of the city.

Choosing a place like this to orchestrate his evildoing was a scheme very befitting of Stride, considering how much he trampled over people's wishes. The scene perfectly illustrated his theatrical tendencies and his craving for the limelight.

Theresia: "…"

Theresia wondered in silence about the reasons why specifically these prisoners had been selected. They were all of different ages and genders, and they seemed to have nothing in common with each other than the fact they were taken from this city. Of course, Stride taking hostages at random wouldn't be anything strange or such when you considered what sort of individual he was, but…

???: "—Stride, Shasuke and Raizo have returned."

Whilst sunk in her thoughts, Theresia heard the sound of a door swinging open and then a low, deep voice. A blue-skinned, grotesque eight armed figure with an expression that looked like it was chiseled out of stone peered into the room that they were being kept captive in. It was the Eight Arms Kurgan, hero of the Multi-Armed Tribe, a warrior hailed far and wide as the strongest man in the Vollachian Empire. This dignitary, who'd sided with Stride for goodness knows what reason, was still here doing his bidding.

Maybe it was because he too had metaphorical shackles fitted around his burly neck thanks to those rings' curses, Theresia thought.

Stride: "It's about time you both got back. How are things proceeding?"

???: "We brought two more… Though, I humbly think that piling her with any more burdens will become really taxing for her. I'd say there are limits, even to your esteemed wife's eyes."

It hadn't been Kurgan who'd responded to Stride's arrogant voice, but rather the shadow at his feet. His (rather appropriately) huge shadow began to squirm. It slowly began to rise up from the floor as if it had come to life before finally morphing into a Shinobi clad in jet-black clothes.

The Shinobi was holding two bound men under his arms, whom he promptly threw into the room without much concern. The two of them bundled down onto the floor, letting out shrieks of pain, before then looking around their surroundings in fear.

Once again, they had no idea why they'd been brought here. All they knew was that putting up a fight against Stride and his men would be a very unwise choice.

Stride: "Limits? Do you think that tools can determine their own limits as they please? Quit messing around. You'd better go bring me Melinda."

Shinobi: "But…"

Stride: "I am not going to say this twice."

Stride paid no heed to the captives' feelings and instead ordered his Shinobi around, cutting out his protests.

The Shinobi shook his head and gently tapped the floor underneath him with the tip of his toes. This time it was the shadow of the Shinobi that started to squirm and rise up in a similar manner as before. Then, a second Shinobi who looked identical to the first one emerged in its place. However this second Shinobi was carrying a young-looking girl in his arms.

She had long, wavy grey hair and was rather short of stature.

She was looking down at the floor and both of her eyes were squeezed tightly shut. She was dressed in a long grey robe that covered her entire body, and was dragging its hem (which was long enough to cover past her feet) along the floor.

Stride: “Melinda.”

The girl’s shoulders violently shook in response to Stride calling her name. She didn’t open her eyes or lift her face, but her attention shifted to him before she frightenedly clutched her head.

This wasn’t the first time Theresia had seen this girl called Melinda. She’d been with Stride at the start just like with Kurgan and the Shinobis. In other words, she was one of Stride’s allies—No, from what she’d hazarded from their talk, she was far more than that.

She was Stride’s—

Stride: “—Answer me carefully, Melinda. Has your evil eye reached its limits? Have you gotten so exhausted that you can’t live up to my venerable self’s desires, your husband’s desires?”

Melinda: “Ah…N-No…”

Stride: “Answer me straight.”

Melinda: “N-No. No. No. No. NO. NO!”

Melinda chanted back her denial at Stride’s question, first in a small, quiet voice before then gradually increasing the zeal she was chanting her no’s back at him. Finally, she vigorously shook her head.

Melinda: “I c-c-can keep doing it. I’m alright. Thank you for worrying about me.”

Stride: “My venerable self. Worried about you? He was right, it seems like your evil eye has already lost its strength. Would you prefer to keep them closed forever or gouged out by my venerable self? Which one will it be?”

Melinda: “Ah, you can s-still, still-still m-m-make-make use of them…”

Stride: “Then stop hanging your head down, ash cast, if you’re to stand at my venerable self’s side as my wife.”

Melinda nodded eagerly with her eyes still squeezed shut in response to Stride’s menacing words. Her cheeks were slightly flushed, and it seemed like she was in ecstasy at having been ordered about.

Incredibly enough, Stride and Melinda were married.

The marriage was one between a young girl in her teens and a man in his thirties; Theresia didn’t have any objections in regards to their age difference, however she couldn’t help but feel that their relationship was an awfully distorted one.

Nevertheless, both of them saw their marriage, which was more like the sort of relationship a lord and their serf would have, as one that they were content with.

Stride: “Anyways, so you’ve gathered 20 of them as sacrifices? That ought to suffice for now.”

Shinobi: “Though I humbly think that it would have been better if we hadn’t killed one of them on a whim at the start.”

Stride: “Fool. No matter what, you have to put in the work when it comes to the overture. It’s like skipping out on the introductory remarks in a play, you can’t make any omissions, or anything like that, a grand stage like this only comes around once in a lifetime. I don’t think your head will remain attached to you for very long, Shasuke, if things flop due to an oversight of yours.”

“Shasuke”: “My humble self is Raizo, the other one is Shasuke.”

One of the Shinobis voiced his protests at what Stride had said.

Raizo raised his right arm, whilst the other one called Shasuke raised his left. They sometimes kept their faces concealed, meaning that they couldn't be distinguished by their outward appearance. Stride snorted his nose, indicating that he'd decided to ignore his complaint and instead gazed out at the sky outside the spire's window.

He brought his hand up to his chin in thought and narrowed his eyes as he looked at the scene outside. Theresia could tell that it was a sign that things were moving into action, and thus she spurred herself into motion so to try and forestall them. She'd talk to him and ask him questions to stall

Theresia: "I have no idea what you're all planning… But, do you really think that you can manage to do something as large-scale as this with only five people?"

Stride: "Hoh? How amusing. Let's hear what you have to say."

Stride turned around and sneered at Theresia. She would make use of this whim to voice out the question that had been gnawing at her mind.

Theresia: "I don't understand what you're trying to achieve. You're doing all these things… you went and called Wilhelm to Picoutatte by making my mother give him that message, what are you trying to get out of all this?"

It would have made far more sense if he'd set up his base somewhere other than the location he'd made Tishua tell him, thus creating a diversion for himself. Stride however had actually gone to Picoutatte to begin his preparations for his evildoings.

Naturally Wilhelm was going to come to the city. Not just by himself, but likely with his Zergev Corps at the very minimum. Then, in that case—

Theresia: "It's not like any of you can escape from here. You also can't defeat Wilhelm, even if you have Kurgan with you. This is really strange, your defeat's been guaranteed from the very beginning."

Stride: "Well then, have you considered though that this forecast of yours where the Sword Demon defeats the Eight Arms is just a fruit of blind devotion?"

Theresia: "—Wilhelm will not lose. That's why you're all going to be defeated."

With an air of grandeur as she spoke, Theresia wouldn't back down only on that.

Wilhelm was going to win. He was definitely going to be victorious. In her eyes, Theresia saw the Eight Arms as an enemy that was far, far stronger than the usual crop with swordsmanship that rivalled Wilhelm's. —Even so, he was going to win, he was going to win for sure.

Theresia held no doubts about this, because he was the demon of the sword whom she loved.

???: "Ha…"

Someone let out a wheezed laugh at her declaration. When she looked to see who it was, she realized that it had been Kurgan. He had four of his arms crossed against his chest and was caressing his cleavers with them.

The very lips of the Eight Arms Kurgan himself had split into a smile in response to her proclamation of victory.

Stride: "What's so amusing, Eight Arms."

Kurgan: "Don't blame me Stride. Her words really tickle my fancy. That Sword Demon's swordsmanship is truly magnificent. I know only too well why she believes in him."

Kurgan replied to him with a solemn look on his face and the voice to go with it. Still, he was the only one from their group that got special treatment. Stride didn't blame him for talking back to him as an equal and merely contented himself with giving Kurgan a small snort in response.

Stride: “Let’s assume that it is like that.”

Theresia: “Huh?”

Stride: “Let’s assume what you’re saying is correct and the Eight Arms doesn’t manage to defeat the Sword Demon..”

Stride narrowed his sharp eyes and began to lay out this assumption to her. That surprised Theresia a fair bit because she’d been prepared to not get an answer to her question when she’d posed it.

Stride: “If the Eight Arms is defeated, then garbage like these stray Shinobi twins will meet the same fate too. Melinda, being too slow to get away, would end up getting raped out of anger; and as for my venerable self, he’d probably take my head for the sake of the Kingdom’s prestige. Even if the Sword Demon doesn’t do any of this, the rabble that follows him most certainly will.”

Theresia: “—. Then why…?”

Naturally Stride was imagining the same things as Theresia was about how things would turn out for them. She wondered why, if they lacked the combat prowess and numbers, why he’d still challenged him to this showdown.

Stride: “Avoiding waging a battle in the face of inevitable defeat is the normal thing to do. —So you must have figured it out now, right?”

Theresia: “…What do you mean?”

Stride: “Heyhey, you can’t be serious? What an imbecile of a woman you are. It’s as if the child in your womb is sucking everything out of you, even a fool would be able to understand what’s going on when I’ve already said this much.”

Stride injected a heartfelt scorn into his voice, mocking Theresia who’d shown her lack of understanding to him. She frowned in response and then tried to reason out what he’d meant by these cruel words.

There’d be no sense in him waging a battle that would just end in his defeat. Even so, considering he’d moved to wage this battle… That meant that—

Theresia: “—You have a.”

Stride: “A chance at seizing victory.”

Stride powerfully declared this at the same time that understanding finally dawned on Theresia.

And as he declared this—before anyone could even blink, he’d produced a crooked dagger in his hand which he promptly used to stab one of the prisoners in their chest.

Theresia: “Wha.”

Theresia’s reactions were delayed for a moment, having witnessed that terrible act.

Had it been an attack, there wouldn’t have been any reason why Theresia couldn’t have stopped it. However, Theresia hadn’t been able to read his behavior. And that was because his current act now hadn’t been an “Attack”.

—As far as Stride was concerned, the act of stabbing others wasn’t something he considered as launching an attack.

Thus even through the eyes of the Sword Saint his blade hadn’t been seen as an attack.

Prisoner: “—ARRRRRRGH.”

The prisoner who’d been stabbed in his chest cried out in agony, his loud shrieks echoed around the spire. The rest of the huddling prisoners stiffened in fear, having looked on at what had happened with looks of mute astonishment.

Meanwhile Stride was still working his dagger into the prisoner’s chest, digging it into his wound and making it worse. Now covered in blood, Stride languidly continued with his work until eventually the man fell to the floor and went limp.

They'd been in agony, suffered from heavy bleeding and damage to their vitals, but more crucially than that, his heart had been gouged out. Death was a certainty.

Stride: "Hmph, what a terrible racket. So this must be what it means to tarnish your twilight years with blood."

He wiped the blood away from his dagger and carelessly muttered this over his shoulder. His words weren't full of any particularly strong emotion at having taken a human life, rather they were so casually intoned that it felt like all he'd done was brush aside a fly.

The captives drew back as his scream still echoed, trying to get as far away from the man's corpse as possible. Stride looked at them and then at the blood still soaking the floor out of the corner of his eye before turning his scornful smile over to Theresia.

Stride: "You know, you're awfully frigid for a Royal Citizen who shed the very same blood for such a long time. Aren't you going to try and help this man who's fell down?"

Theresia: "…"

Theresia glared at Stride, who'd shamelessly pointed at the dead man.

As the Sword Saint, Theresia had taken away the lives of many people with her sword. She had no intention at all of turning away her back and eyes to that fact. This was the karma she'd decided to bear until the day she died.

However, Theresia had never swung her sword because she'd actually wanted to kill someone.

Therefore, this was the first time that she had glared at a man with murderous rage rather than righteous indignation, a man who she couldn't allow to live any longer.

Stride: "Only after doing this, do your eyes look human."

Stride wearily dismissed the dangerous look that had appeared in her eyes and then gazed down at his blood-soaked dagger. It was twisted in appearance, and the blade was too roundish to be called a sword. The conical shaped twisted dagger had drunk in the man's blood and was now so unctuously, bewitchingly wet with it that drops of it were dripping down.

Stride: "Nineteen more to go… There's really no end in sight to all of this pointless hard work when you go at it alone."

Theresia: "…Wait, Nineteen more to go, No, you can't!"

Theresia caught the sound of a whisper that made her shudder. She gazed at Stride in astoundment, but he didn't reply back to her.

He'd stabbed one of the men to death. There were nineteen more prisoners held captive in the spire here excluding herself. —Even with herself included, that made twenty.

Stride: "Well, the amateurishness of these actors shows a tad too much, indeed this is one act that isn't worth my venerable self's efforts… In that case, I'll just get my replacement to hold the blade in my stead."

Saying this, Stride tossed his dagger from one hand to the other and then turned to look behind him. Standing before him were his four allies: Kurgan, Melinda and the two Shinobis. However, none of them fit the bill in his eyes. Instead he lifted his free hand up and gleefully waggled his finger, causing an ominous blue light to flicker into existence in the room.

Then came the sound of footsteps slowly creeping up; a new actor was being introduced onto the stage.

Stride: "I shall bestow the honor of getting this play underway to my venerable self's new puppet."

He held out his blood-soaked twisted dagger, and with a gesture that was nothing but reverential, the newcomer knelt down with a motion that was far more polished than anyone else could have managed and accepted it, all the while shedding tears.

The newcomer shook their head in refusal, weeping at their own helplessness, unable to offer any resistance. She was a woman whose typically firm attitude had been broken, and her heart smashed to pieces—Carol Remendis.

???: "…Stop."

A voice croaked out, pleading for an end to this.

And it hadn't been Carol's. Ironically enough, she'd cried herself so hoarse that, right now, she could only speak in a bare rasp of a voice that sounded exactly like her sweetheart's.

Theresia: "Please, stop…"

This was why Theresia had sorrowfully gasped these words out on Carol's behalf.

Theresia knew better than anyone else in this world that Carol Remendis always put in her all to try and remain earnest and upstanding so that she didn't bring any shame to her family name or her beliefs.

Her sword was as straight, graceful and pure as the look in her eyes and the way she decided to live her life.

This was why Theresia was pleading with Stride, with large teardrops welling up in her eyes.

Theresia: "Please, I beg of you, don't make Carol sully her sword —."

Her pleading, entreating, supplicating voice echoed throughout the spire,

Stride: "Do it."

His curt, cruel command forced the unwilling swordswoman to reap the lives of nineteen.

6

The sounds of sobbing had filled the top floor of the spire along with the thick smell of choking blood.

The lives of twenty people had been snatched away in such a short period of time. None of them had anything to do with the fight at hand or had posed any danger; they'd just been people who would have been perfectly content with living out their lives in peace.

They were people who should have walked the ever-advancing future together with their beloved friends and family now that the hellish Civil War had ended and with it the threat to their lives.

Theresia would never forget how he'd made Carol kill them despite her sobbing and refusal.

Theresia: "Sob, Sniff, Ghuu…"

Stride: "How can you have the gall to shed so many tears over a matter that doesn't even regard you. It's far too a deficient way of being, to mar the balance of your soul by being overly concerned about others."

Theresia: "—. You are absolutely."

Stride: "Unforgivable? Hah, now that's a word that I've gotten used to hearing for it to even tarry in my mind. Besides, the sacrifices have been offered. I don't have the time to listen to your scoffing."

Stride flung those words behind him and then grabbed his dagger from the immobile Carol's hands. Her expression was blank, and she was covered in blood; a puppet in the true sense of its meaning.

Faced with the terribly pitiful state she was in, Theresia wanted with all her fiber to hold her in her arms right now, to get close to her broken heart and ease the burden of all her anguish together.

However, with having had her child taken hostage and shackled by it, Theresia didn't possess that liberty.

Stride: "—Let's go."

Stride began to walk out with his dagger in hand, his footsteps squelching against the pools of blood, his gait grandiose as ever. Melinda followed beside him with Kurgan in their wake. The Shinobis meanwhile had skulked into god knows who's shadow in the blink of an eye. Finally, the puppet Carol had grabbed Theresia by the arm and forced her to stand up.

Theresia: “Carol…”

Carol: “…”

No reply. Her mind had rejected the reality at hand and her purity had been stained with blood she’d never wanted to spill.

Theresia, being a prisoner, was being ushered out by Carol—Right now she was taking her out of the room where they’d housed the captives (now her being the only one left), and leading her up a set of stairs. There weren’t any rooms above, all there was up there was the spire’s rooftop that overlooked the city.

A strong gust of wind buffeted them as soon as they opened the door and stepped out onto the rooftop. Faced with the strong high-altitude winds and the view that overlooked the city, Theresia was struck by a strange feeling of unease.

—There wasn’t a single sign of anyone about in the Commercial City of Picoutatte.

Stride: “The play would come to naught were people cast with minor roles to interfere. We’ve taken care of these factors in advance.”

Stride stood at the edge of the rooftop, and revealed to her the reason why the streets below them were eerily quiet. As he did so, he held up his dagger which had drawn in the blood of the twenty captives and pointed it at the sky.

He’d said that twenty people were going to be sacrifices, and he’d carried that out by giving his dagger blood—

Stride: “That’s right, I didn’t deign to answer your foolish question earlier.”

Theresia: “…”

Stride: “You alluded to whether we had any chances of victory. And if we did have one, where it would come from. Well then, feast your eyes—.”

Stride’s cold smile was brimming with confidence. His words were interrupted, and suddenly a shadow loomed over the rooftop. A strong gale of wind accompanied it, causing Theresia’s long red hair to blow about everywhere. She closed her eyes for a moment due to the wind, and slowly opened them back up again. Then, she saw what was there in front of her.

Spreading out its vast wings to the sky was a colossal creature with pitch black steel-like scales running across its body. It had a body with three heads attached to it; the heads themselves looked like a cross between a lizard and a snake’s, and they were all lined with sharp fangs.

A dreadful aura was coming from it and its appearance was imposing; indeed it was one of the mightiest of creatures that lived beyond what humans could fathom—A dragon.

The three-headed black dragon unfurled its wings and glared down at the people on the rooftop.

Theresia: “—Ah.”

Those living in the Kingdom of Lugunica all grew up hearing about how everyone in the country was under the protection of the Divine Dragon. Even if they’d never actually seen its venerable figure, they still revered it.

The same was true for Theresia, who’d always felt these feelings of reverence towards the Dragon somewhere deep inside her. However, this was the first time she’d gotten the chance to meet one in person, in the true sense of its meaning.

Faced with its formidable presence, Theresia became so overwhelmed that she couldn’t even find any words to say.

Stride: “This dagger is the dragon’s fang—when you let it drink the blood of the spawn of the heavens, a blood-crazed dragon appears.”

(TL Note: Spawn of the heavens, or literally “heaven-sent children” is a concept that's seemingly common in Japanese tradition. It refers to a child that was given as a result of a prayer to a deity. Many such exist in legend, folklore and I believe religion too, in Japan. The interesting thing is that Stride referred to the soldier at the beginning as one because he had a Divine Protection, and it's confirmed in the next act that the sacrifices were indeed individuals who had Divine Protections)

Theresia: "Those sacrifices were to summon a dragon…? No, even if it's like that!"

Dragons were very proud creatures, and they weren't the sort who'd willingly bend to a person's will. And most of all, there was hardly any human or dragon in existence who'd approve of what Stride was doing.

They were going to be burnt to cinders by the breath of the dragon he'd summoned. In fact, the black dragon had now lifted all three of its heads up and was glaring down at the rooftop with clear hostility in its eyes. It would only be a matter of time before it released its scorching fiery breath.

Faced with such a critical situation, Stride was—

Stride: "Three heads, three souls. You're quite greedy aren't you, baying for three of mine rings!"

An eerie light shot out from three of the rings on Stride's raised left hand.

They shot out a red, black and green radiance similar to the ones that had been put on Carol and Tishua, then linked themselves to the enraged black dragon and began the process of binding its souls.

Naturally, the black dragon tried to stop itself from being restrained. It swung its long tail and tried to sweep them all off of the rooftop as its souls began to be shackled by that invisible power.

Kurgan caught its blow with his cleavers and then parried the follow up it had delivered from his blindside with the claws on its black wings. Little by little, the fight from the black dragon started to dwindle—

Stride: "—Sword Saint Theresia van Astrea."

Stride called out Theresia's name almost abruptly as the rooftop filled with the black dragon's roars.

He turned his darkly glinting eyes over to her, still in mute shock at the spectacle that was unfolding in front of her eyes, and gave her a gloating smile.

Stride: "You did tell my venerable self, right? That you'd vowed you'd never take up your sword again. Even so, my venerable self doesn't believe your promise. If your own body, or that of your husband's were to be in peril, my venerable self reckons you'd break that promise and take up your sword. As the transcendental being you are, you would rely on your Divine Protection."

He said this, as dark blood trickled down from the corner of his lips.

This was why Stride had kept a close eye on Theresia, having considered that option a possibility.

Stride: "Thus, I was waiting. —Waiting for the moment you'd become pregnant, the moment you'd become a mother, the moment you'd become weak."

He'd meticulously arranged the pieces on his board so that they wouldn't be destroyed by transcendental beings like the Sword Saint.

Theresia was completely lost for words at how purposeful Stride's considerations had been.

Then, standing in front of the astonished Theresia, Stride pointed his left hand, along with the shimmering rings on it, to the horizon.

Towards the main road that stretched out from Picoutatte and continued past the horizon.

—The crazed black dragon, Valgren the Three-Headed, released a breath of ruin and destruction towards the horizon.

The curtains that marked The Subjugation of the Evil Dragon rose, unfurling one of the worst days in the history of Lugunica.

Act Six

1

—The Sword Demon had immediately sprung into action the instant that the Dragon Carriage had been engulfed by the impact.

He grabbed the beautiful woman sitting next to him by her waist with one of his arms, drew out his sword with his other, and cut open the bodywork of the keeling Dragon Carriage, whose wheels were now lurching off the ground. He jumped out without delay, using the floor and seats to propel himself.

The very next moment, the actual crimson shockwave reared its head and swept away the Dragon Carriage as if it had been caught by a billowing wave.

Wilhelm: "…"

Beneath his eyes, Wilhelm could see the row of carriages being swept away by the impact. Only a handful of the very best were taking swift action like he had to escape the danger, the majority of them were just being engulfed by the violent blast. The number of Dragon Carriages they had on the main road had totaled to around 50.

Wilhelm: "The Subjugation force's been… From head to tail…hk."

Wilhelm now found himself on terra-firma and firmly clenched his teeth as he looked on at the catastrophe unfolding in front of him, blanketed by the smoke.

They'd been gathered together to subjugate the Destruction Wish Stride and they'd made their way towards the City of Picoutatte. Stride had preempted this and struck first without warning, destroying their ranks through and through.

Bellows of anger and cries of grief flew about, and just like that, the Subjugation Force quickly became a mass of casualties. Some of its members pulled themselves out of the toppled Dragon Carriages, and started pulling out the heavily injured who'd shed blood and weren't able to move, thus beginning the rescue efforts. The situation was starting to look like that of a field hospital.

???: “No way…”

A dazed voice escaped from the lips of the woman standing beside him, as if she couldn't believe what she was seeing. That woman he'd grabbed her by the waist and immediately taken out of the Dragon Carriage had of course been Roswaal.

It was rare to see her actually showing her distress on the surface when considering she was typically the sort who never broke from her usual composed, collected and easy-going demeanor. So much so, that this was quite alien to him—

Roswaal “…”

Wilhelm: “Roswaal? What are you looking at…”

Wilhelm looked over to his side, puzzled at the state Roswaal was in.

Her heterochromic eyes were wide open and frozen in fear; they were looking far off at the sky in the distance rather than the row of carriages that had been mowed down by the impact.

Wilhelm followed her gaze and narrowed his blue eyes.

—And then he saw it.

Wilhelm: “Wha.”

Far off in the distance, past the main road, he could see the silhouette of the commercial city's streets. —A strange black cloud with an unbroken view of the entire city was drifting over the sky bang in the middle of those streets.

The black cloud flapped its black wings and glared down at the ground with its three long, mighty heads.

The black cloud—No, not a black cloud, but a being that everyone in the world knew about, yet, one that lived beyond what mankind could fathom. Moreover, a being that should have been impossible to lay eyes on the real thing.

Wilhelm: “A dragon.”

Not a lesser dragon—But an actual dragon with multiple heads was spreading its black wings, hovering over the Picoutattian sky.

Everyone remaining from the Subjugation Force was drawn in one after the other by its grandeur. Looking up at the sky, surprise began to ripple through them. The number of people rooted to the spot out of shock skyrocketed.

This lasted for a while until Bordeaux’s angry bellows brought the Subjugation Force back to its senses.

2

???: “The assumptions we came with have been completely shredded. What the hell even is that thing. Is it really going to give us the time to continue our discussion?”

The Subjugation Force had taken their wounded and fled off the main road for the time being. Their commander Bordeaux was the one who’d spoken up.

Luckily the wounds Bordeaux had sustained were shallow and didn’t interfere with his ability to fight or command. Blood was streaming out from a cut on his forehead, but it wasn’t anything that a bit of spit wouldn’t fix. He had a far more serious problem at hand.

—Namely, what sort of connection the Black Dragon who’d suddenly appeared over the city’s sky had with Stride.

Things like Dragons showing up were rarities regardless of whether or not they happened once every hundred years. It was hard to think of it as a coincidence when it had attacked their forces which were going to subjugate the scum threatening the Kingdom.

It really wasn’t that surprising that the Black Dragon had attacked them, considering they'd been about to launch their assault. In other words, it meant that the Dragon was either Stride's ally or its subordinate.

Subjugation Force Member: "Could that Black Dragon be the Divine Dragon Volcanica of legends…"

Subjugation Force Member: "It looks completely different to how it appears in the murals! Besides, we're in the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica here! Why would the Dragon have bared its fangs at us?!"

Subjugation Force Member: "Give priority to the injured now! Ah, shit! We're short on healers!"

Turmoil in the Subjugation Force had reached an all-time high, having been hit full force by their surprise attack. Their initial blow, which had served the purpose to crush their morale, had definitely been the perfect tactic, things had truly turned into a nightmare for the side receiving it.

In fact, their Subjugation Force which should have been made up from the cream of the crop had been halved by the Dragon's breath.

Staying on the battlefield with so many casualties would be suicidal. Hence the Subjugation Force had started to consider the prospect of withdrawing before launching their attack. However—

Wilhelm: "—Bordeaux, I'm still going in, even if you're going to tell us to retreat"Bordeaux: "…I thought you'd say that."

Bordeaux sighed at the Sword Demon standing next to him, clad in a fierce sword aura.

He alone—No, he and another had been the only ones who'd escaped unscathed from the dragonbreath in his group. Wilhelm, who'd been driven by beast-like intuition, had a reason why he needed to go to the city.

—He needed to rescue his pregnant wife. That was something he would not budge on.

Bordeaux: "I get what you're feeling, but the situation has changed.

Our enemy’s no longer just Stride and his small band of lackeys. We need to review our plans.”

Wilhelm: “—tch, BUT!”

Bordeaux: “I can’t just stand here and watch you go to your death. We already knew that the Eight Arms was siding with that bastard… But now that he’s gotten this Black Dragon into the mix, would even someone like you be able to win against that?”

Letting the demon in him grow even more enraged, Wilhelm laid bare his anger. The glint that had appeared in his eyes had made every single muscle on Bordeaux’s body tense up. There was no way that words were going to stop him. He knew that much from the long time he’d known him. Even so, he hadn’t lied by what he’d said to him.

Theresia, the Sword Saint was a treasure of the Kingdom. Their most precious treasure, even. Regardless of that though, Bordeaux couldn’t lose his friends and allies by letting them go into battle without a plan.

In the worst case scenario, he’d sound the retreat, even if it meant taking Wilhelm by surprise and restraining him—

???: “—I̸’́m̕ n̶õt lȇ̶a̸̍v̸in̍g̸̤.”

Bordeaux: “…Ah that’s right. You’re the same as him in having a reason why you can’t pull back from here.”

Hearing his ruined voice and sensing his piercing fighting spirit coming from behind him, Bordeaux rued his own blindness.

Grimm had been one of the people engulfed by the dragon’s breath as well.

And yet, he was in surprisingly good shape. It was as if his morale had increased with his injuries.

And it wasn’t just him who was like that, but also half of the Subjugation Force—The half that had survived the attack.

Despite being bathed in dragonbreath, half of their forces still possessed the strength to be able to fight. It was astounding. Though naturally their fighting strength had been cut in two, whilst their enemy's had increased by a lot compared to what they'd had at the start.

It would be inconceivable for Bordeaux to think that going into battle like this would be a wise choice.

???: “It's not necessarily like that, Bordeaux-dono.”

Bordeaux: “You can't be planning on being reckless as well and lending them a hand, Miss Mathers.”

Guessing correctly at the intentions she'd voiced ever so silkily, Bordeaux turned around to face the beautiful woman, Roswaal, with a sour look on his face. Her usual outfit was covered in dust, having been saved from their predicament by the Sword Demon. She tilted her head with a smile.

And like that, she moved her gaze yonder, over to the patch of sky where the Dragon was.

Roswaal: “Even I wouldn't go as far as lending them a hand if I was planning on just jumping in recklessly without a plan. I'm nooooot saying that I share in their suicidal tendencies, after all, I cannot afford to die in a situation like this.”

Wilhelm: “Everyone's thinking the exact same as you about not wanting to die. Quit beating around the bush and get to the damn point. It's not like we know when this Black Dragon is going to spring back into action.”

Roswaal: “That's the point right there.”

Roswaal pointed at Wilhelm, who'd butted in, and closed one of her eyes. Now being gazed at by her blue eye, Wilhelm grumpily groaned out a “Eh?”

Wilhelm: “What do you mean?”

Roswaal: “I have a proposal for you, Lord Commander Bordeaux

Zergev. I’m 100% sure that the Dragon’s a trump card prepared by that renegade Stride… But, he doesn’t have full control of it yet.”

Bordeaux: “You think that it not chasing after us is proof of that?”

Bordeaux crossed his muscular arms and replied to Roswaal’s report. She nodded at his answer.

She’d pointed out that there was a chance that the Black Dragon wasn’t completely under Stride’s control; that was something Bordeaux could nod his head at. Namely because he too had thought it a possibility.

After all, it’s common sense to give chase and rout out an enemy when you’ve just destroyed their vanguard with the first blow, but their Dragon hadn’t come to do that.

Weirdly enough, the Black Dragon was still hovering over the city right now. But that’s all they had going for them. Their Subjugation Force had half fallen into ruin, and he’d been giving them time to try and re-muster themselves up again.

Bordeaux: “But we can’t really completely rule out it being a trap.”

Roswaal: “What would be the point in that? If he has the Dragon under his control, all he needs to do is make it breathe in our direction a couple more times. No matter how stubborn Wilhelm-kun is, even he’ll eventually get incinerated if the Black Dragon keeps aiming for him. There’s no reason for him to take the risk and let us come near him.”

Bordeaux: “…I suppose so.”

Roswaal: “That’s the biggest reason why I’m proposing that we shouldn’t retreat from here. The Dragon still isn’t under his control now. And even if it is, we won’t know if we waste time.”

Bordeaux’s core shook as he heard Roswaal’s conjecture.

The Black Dragon wasn’t under Stride’s reins yet. But what would become of them if the Dragon’s psyche was broken and it ended up bending to Stride?

He had no room left to doubt it, Stride, with his despicable ideologies, was definitely an enemy of their Kingdom. Just how many tragedies was he going to bring to them with that Dragon in tow? They would probably bring Lugunica to ruin, which had been finally heading towards stability with the Demi-Human War ending.

He was going to bring the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica to ruin with a Dragon. It didn't get more ironic than that.

???: "Lord Commander Bordeaux…!"

Someone called out to Bordeaux, their voice had quivered with anger and resolve. It hadn't been Roswaal, and naturally it hadn't been Wilhelm or Grimm either.

It had been one of the Knights who'd been keeping their attention on their meeting. And it hadn't just been him who'd turned their determined looks over to Bordeaux.

All the Knights who'd gathered here and still had the strength left to fight shared one resolve—No, even those who'd been injured and couldn't possibly fight shared the same resolve.

Knight: "Let us fight. To protect our Kingdom, our Sword Saint … our swords and our pride."

Bordeaux: "…"

Everyone raised their swords up in unison when he said that, so as to show everyone what it meant to be a Royal Knight.

Seeing them like that, Bordeaux closed his eyes. In his heart, he weighed his sense of duty against his willingness to fight, and so did the scales tip.

Bordeaux: "These dumbasses…"

Only after spitting out these crude words he would have once formerly used, did Bordeaux shoulder his ax. Then, he slowly looked up at the sky where the Black Dragon was flapping its wings.

It still hadn't moved from where it was. That was the only scrap of evidence that supported Roswaal’s conjecture. But if her worst guess was right, then now was their only chance to save the Kingdom.

They had to settle things here before the Black Dragon succumbed to his evil.

Bordeaux: “…”

Am I going to go down in history as a foolish and reckless commander or as the one who brought even the Kingdom to ruin?

—It didn’t take long for Bordeaux to come to his conclusion.

3

They placed the heavily wounded on some of the Dragon Carriages they’d mended and sent them off to the nearest town. They’d sent them there to spread the news as well, but it was likely that the Black Dragon had already been spotted in the towns near Picoutatte.

It wouldn’t be too long before they’d send in troops from each city to try and get control on the situation. However, they wouldn’t get here in time. Right now, the only ones who had a chance at saving the Kingdom were their forces entering the city.

Wilhelm: “Looks like your gamble paid off.”

Wilhelm muttered this as they continued down the main road, having just reached the outskirts of the city.

No one had gotten in their way as they’d expected on the road down. Their forces had managed to make it past through where they’d initially been attacked and were about to enter into the city. Meanwhile, the Black Dragon had stayed in mid-air, keeping a watchful eye on them.

—No, it wasn’t keeping a watchful eye on them. As they drew closer to the city, they could see the state the Black Dragon was in far more clearly.

Its body was tens of meters long, its scales shone like black steel, and its three heads each had powerful-looking jaws giving it an altogether imposing appearance. It was without a doubt one of the Dragons of yore.

However, the Black Dragon right now was writhing about in the sky, shaking its heads in agony, and roaring without stop. It was pretty obvious that the Dragon was resisting orders that went against its will. That was proof that Roswaal's conjecture had been correct and more importantly, that Stride wasn't in full control of it.

Roswaal: "From the look of things, the Dragon should be set free if we defeat the mastermind who got it in this current state. Though, even so, we aren't guaranteed that the Dragon is going to be friendly to us once set free…"

Wilhelm: "Still far better than having to fight all of them at once. After we wipe out Stride and his minions, I'll tag along for our likely-to-be dragon slaying."

Roswaal: "You're just so full of energy. I'm reaaaally finding it hard to stop myself from laughing and saying "That's so you."“

Roswaal shrugged her shoulders at Wilhelm's words, who'd indicated that he didn't even fear dragons, before then giving him a wry smile. As he looked at that smile from the corner of his eyes, the Dragon Carriage that was carrying them finally arrived at the city, and they passed through its wide-open gates.

The moment they passed through the main gates, they readied themselves for any attacks, but none came. The Dragon Carriage made its way inside the city uneventfully, meaning that the Subjugation Force had reached their intended destination. However —

Wilhelm: "—gh! What the hell?"

Wilhelm frowned at the sudden sensation of noise thrumming against his skin. Then, immediately afterwards, the body of the Dragon Carriage started to shake and jolt, making him choke up in surprise.

That hadn't just happened in Wilhelm's Dragon Carriage, but also in all of the other ones.

???: The Earth Dragon's Divine Protection…it's come undone?

Pivot's ghostly illusion put the sensation Wilhelm had felt into plain, easy to understand words for him.

His illusion had accompanied him all the way through thick and thin, so right now, he accepted him. His presence was priceless to Wilhelm, for he was a pair of eyes who would take a composed approach when assessing things. After all, there'd be no exaggeration in saying that what lay in his heart right now was the polar opposite of composure.

Bordeaux: "Everyone, HALT! Our Dragon Carriage's Divine Protection of Wind Evasion has come undone. It's not just us, right?!"

A murmur of assent spread out from all the other Dragon Carriages after Bordeaux stopped his just inside of the city.

The Divine Protection of Wind Evasion was one that was unique to the Earth Dragons species. It allowed them to disregard anything that would be a nuisance to them while running and drawing their carriages. The only time that the Divine Protection broke off was in cases where you didn't wait out its cool-down period after stopping. However, that hadn't been the case right now, considering that all of their Dragon Carriages had experienced this at once.

???: "Hold on a second. Was it actually just the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion that came undone?"

The one who'd butted in with that doubt whilst raising her hand had been Roswaal. She looked all around them and then furrowed her shapely eyebrows,

Roswaal: "If any of you here have a Divine Protection, I'd like you to speak up. No need to tell me what it does, since I know that's an awful thing to ask about. I would just like to hear if your Divine Protection is still working now."

The Knights looked at each other in confusion after they heard Roswaal's question.

The Divine Protections that individuals received at birth were blessings given from the world. However, being born with powers that differed from person to person also meant said people cultivated different values from each other. Thus it was typical for people who had Divine Protections to keep what they did a secret so to not cause any unnecessary problems.

Roswaal had taken that into consideration with her question. And to that, a single Knight timidly raised his hand up.

Knight: "—. No, I'm not getting any kind of response from my Divine Protection. It felt like it got removed as soon as we entered the street."

Roswaal: "So it's as I thought. Is there anyone else who felt this other than him?"

Once one hand went up, others did as well in their twos and threes. However, they still totaled to less than ten. It was unlikely that others were hiding it, after all, Divine Protections were rare gifts, so even getting a number like this was no short of a miracle.

Roswaal: "—So this is what the complete destruction of the covenant means."

Seeing this result, Roswaal's face tensed up as if she'd realized something, and then muttered these words. That made Wilhelm raise his brow.

The complete destruction of the covenant, he'd heard those words directly from His Majesty Gionis back at Miklotov's Mansion. Though in all honesty, Wilhelm hadn't been able to properly understand what that meant.

Roswaal: "Stride is invalidating the Divine Dragon's covenant… No, he's invalidating the constraints of the world."

Wilhelm: "The constraints of the world? What do you mean?"

Roswaal: “The Divine Protections disappearing are good evidence for it. I think it’s likely just limited to this city, but Stride is cutting the link between mankind and the world with his Magic Circles. Meaning that in this city, both Divine Protections and the Dragon’s Covenant will not work. —We won’t be receiving the Divine Dragon’s salvation.”

Wilhelm: “…Is it really that big of a deal not having Divine Protections?”

Though Roswaal’s explanation had been tinged with unease, Wilhelm didn’t really get what all the fuss was about.

Originally, Wilhelm had been a rookie who’d been blessed neither by a Divine Protection or talent with the sword. He wasn’t affected by any disadvantage that this loss of Divine Protections would bring about. That, and he’d made up his mind long ago that he wasn’t going to believe in the Divine Dragon’s Covenant.

Everyone other than the most pious who believed in the Divine Dragon probably shared this sentiment. No one really believed in the Covenant, or otherwise, being handed down to the Dragon Kingdom.

However, Roswaal shook her head at Wilhelm’s understanding.

Roswaal: “It is a big deal. There’d be no point in us arguing about the Dragon’s Covenant here, but the disappearance of everyone’s Divine Protections is a disaster. For those who are privy to one, it’s like losing a third leg you were born with. The more useful it was to them in everyday life, the greater the impact. Also what’ll happen next is that…”

Pivot:—Stride is going to spread this around the Kingdom. If he manages that, the amount of damage he’ll cause will skyrocket. Though, the Black Dragon might burn the Kingdom down to ashes far quicker before that comes to pass

Pivot finished the rest of Roswaal’s words as if he were trying to put on her voice. She’d said the same things as well, but the words of this specter had had more of an impact on him.

In the end it was like this,

Wilhelm: “So this bastard’s plan isn’t just to try and snatch away people’s wives and their country, but also their Divine Protections?”

Roswaal: “…His actual intentions aside, he’s definitely setting his sights on that sort of thing as an end result. In any case, that’s given us another reason apart from his Black Dragon why we can’t leave this guy at large.”

Wilhelm: “There’s been no reason from the start why we should even leave this bastard’s head still connected to his body!”

The number of reasons why they couldn’t let this man live any longer had gone up from ten to eleven. Tch’ing at that feeling, Wilhelm turned to look over at the streets with his hand over the pommel of his Knight Sword.

Wilhelm: “Anyways, it feels way too quiet.”

Silence had fallen on the city that had the Destruction Wish in its heart and the Black Dragon in its skies. That in itself was far too weird in a situation like this.

Cities and streets had ended up becoming battlefields many times during that murky Civil War. Based on his experience back then, places that would end up becoming battlefields would have a peculiar kind of atmosphere to them, and tension would hang all over them.

But he couldn’t feel that in this city. On the contrary, this should have been one of the most populated cities in the Kingdom of Lugunica and yet there wasn’t a single soul in sight despite it being daytime; it went beyond being eerie.

There’s no way they could have killed all the people in the city in just half a day after they’d been delayed by Stride, right? Or maybe, if it’s Kurgan we’re talking about, I guess that wouldn’t be impossible, though—.

Knight: “Hey, look over there!”

Wilhelm’s thoughts were interrupted by one of the Knight’s calling out. The Knight was pointing at the main street that led to the city center—Someone’s figure had come into view there.

Tension spread around the Subjugation Force for a moment, but they immediately relaxed. Reason being that the person who’d showed up definitely wasn’t one of Stride’s men, instead he was someone who was actually from the city.

He staggered over to the Subjugation Force, holding nothing in his hands. The Subjugation Force breathed out a sigh of relief seeing that figure, but then immediately noticed something that wasn’t quite right.

Knight: “Hey, there’s no way…”

They could hear a sound of footsteps coming from the main street in droves, that felt nigh about countless. And they weren’t only coming from the main street, but also from the streets to their left and right—No, they were coming from the entire city, and all of them were heading towards them.

They gradually became a sea of black, and their pace quickened. They began to push and shove each other, stampeding towards them as if they were racing each other. Without speaking a single word, with crazed eyes, all at once.

Their escape route had been immediately cut off by the time they’d had a chance to think “This is looking bad.” The Subjugation Force became surrounded by the swarm of people rushing towards them and were forced to stop them from punching into them.

Bordeaux: “EVERYONE, HOLD UP YOUR SHIELDS AND REINFORCE THE PERIMETER! THEY’RE GOING TO FLATTEN US!”

Receiving Bordeaux’s bellowed instructions, the Knights instantly raised their shields up and reinforced their perimeter. They tensed every single muscle in their body and met the swarm’s blow head on.

“—crash bang crunch squelch.”

The sounds of fierce crashing was overlapped by anguished screams; the crunches of flesh mashing and bones breaking squelchily resounded. It didn't stop with just one round, wave after wave of them kept bearing down on them. The swarm kept on throwing themselves against the Knights' shields without cease, even when the momentum of their assault began to ebb away.

Bordeaux: "FORCE THEM BACK—!!"

The Subjugation Force responded to his bellow and launched their counterattack before they had a chance at getting crushed. They pushed people back with their shields and forcibly opened up a sortie by knocking their bodies away.

They didn't have the time to think about what had happened. All they could do was keep staving off the rush of bodies that ceaselessly descended down on them.

Wilhelm: "If we cut down just…"

Roswaal: "That's exactly what our enemy wants us to do! They're just being controlled. We'd be playing straight into Stride's hands if we kill them!"

Wilhelm had tried to say in his impatience that things would get easier if they just killed two or three of them. However, Roswaal had stopped him. She was standing right beside him, using her fists to punch people in their vitals one after the other, stopping them from swarming her by knocking the lights out of them.

Though it was a daunting and grueling task, they didn't have much other choice in regards to dealing with them.

Roswaal: "They're in some sort of frenzied state right now. They've completely lost control of themselves and are being guided to attack us."

Wilhelm: "So we just knock 'em unconscious. Should have told me this more clearly."

Wilhelm unleashed a flurry of attacks with his sword (though still in its sheath), threading them through the swarm of people. Close to ten of them collapsed in the blink of an eye, but still there was no end to them.

Near him, Bordeaux, Grimm and the others had likewise switched from defending themselves to clobbering them. All of them were giving it their all to try and gain the upper hand. However, some of their Knights had succumbed to the swarm's momentum and had ended up being pushed down and trampled over, putting them out of action. And once one of them fell over, so did many others. To the point where it looked like they couldn't stop them—

Wilhelm: "—No, it's not just that!"

Wilhelm noticed out of the corner of his eyes that one of the Knights who'd been stopped in his tracks had been pushed down in a really unnatural way. He unsheathed his sword and swung it out towards the source of that strange sensation. The silver blur of his sword pierced towards completely empty space. —Then in a flash, the ring of steel against steel echoed, and someone took a great leap back.

That someone was a short figure that was clad in black garb. Its familiar sight caused Wilhelm to clench his teeth, having seen them once before. It was one of the enemies he'd failed to kill—the Shinobi that he'd come across at the Astrea Mansion a while back.

He'd been skulking in the shadows of the swarm and killing the Knights one by one as their backs were turned; a cowardly maneuver that was—

Wilhelm: "Truly the mark of a filthy professional who lacks the balls to face people head on."

Shinobi: "Humbly speaking, I've grown used to being told things like that, being a Shinobi and all. Anyhow…"

The Shinobi stooped down to the ground and held a Kunai Knife in each of his hands in a backhand grip. Those weapons allowed him to either slice with them or throw them.

Shinobi: "I'm sure we both hold regrets at not being able to take the other's head last time we met. It shalt not end like so this time."

Wilhelm: "The hell is up with you speaking like you're from the middle ages. Are you fucking screwing around with me? Just die already."

(TL Note: Don't interpret Wilhelm saying "Middle-ages" as an Earth reference. The Japanese is literally Wilhelm commenting on what the hell he's doing using ござる which is an archaic polite form of the verb ある, a form that is not used outside of certain set phrases in modern Japanese. Though my writing of old-fashioned English kinda sucks so it might not be evident, pretty much all the Stride camp except for Melinda speaks using old-fashioned Japanese.)

Wilhelm closed the distance between them in an instant, bearing his attack down on the Shinobi at lightning speeds. The Shinobi caught his sword with one of his Kunai and struck back with his other one. Wilhelm avoided it by ducking his head, but a split second later, the Shinobi tried to knee him in the face, only barely missing and making Wilhelm tch.

The Shinobi's body had been trained rigorously and was tempered like steel. He was short, but his whole body was just a clump of muscle, so he came close to Wilhelm's sword strength with strength of his own that was greater than appeared.

And worst of all was that the swarm of people that had been turned into this mob was still attacking them, meaning that Grimm and the others were stuck dealing with them without his help. If he didn't finish things quickly here, it'd be impossible even for him to get rid of the swarm whilst taking on the Shinobi.

Wilhelm: "That's why you need to hurry up and fucking die, you damn rat—!"

Wilhelm fired off a piercing stab at the Shinobi, which whistled through the air like rain. The Shinobi dodged it using only the minimal movement required to do so, and then threw one of his Kunais behind him. The Kunai didn't pierce into Wilhelm, but rather into one of the legs of a Knight who'd been keeping the mob at bay. The Knight lost consciousness and was trampled over.

Wilhelm: “Shit…”

Shinobi: “It’s not just My Lord who knoweth where your weak points are. If conditions were ideal for you, then there would be no way my humble self could prevail… However, these narrow spaces suit me better.”

Wilhelm: “…”

There was a reason why the Shinobi’s words had sounded so composed, and that was because of how narrow the area they were fighting in was. Surrounded by the swarm, the Subjugation Force were just about managing to push them back with their backs pressed against each other’s. But each time one of their men fell, so did the space they had available to them. Naturally that meant that Wilhelm had very little room to operate in—He couldn’t swing his sword, so all he could do was stab with it.

Shinobi: “So, all I have to do is dodge as long as things carry on like this. I need not keep myself on high alert if all you can do is attack in a straight line.”

Wilhelm: “So you say…”

Wilhelm was in fact struggling with the Shinob who’d been able to easily avoid his stabs. Things were going to get worse for him if they kept up like this, he’d end up getting out-pushed over time. Then—

???: “Well then, shall we swap players?”

Shinobi: “—gh.”

The Shinobi was hit by a roaring punch that came whistling through the wind, blowing him backwards. The one who’d cut their way in, adding themselves to this brawl by means of some nimble footwork, was Roswaal, now donning black gloves. She flashed the stunned Wilhelm a smile.

Roswaal: “If the scene here’s shifted to one where it’s all about fighting in close quarters, then there’s no technique that works better here than martial arts. Will you let me handle this?”

Wilhelm: “…With your bare hands? He’s going to end up chopping them to pieces with his Kunai.”

Roswaal: “Thank you for your concern, but these gloves are of a special make. —They’re a kind of weapon that one of my ancestors left behind. They can even stop the blades of holy swords, would you believe.”

Roswaal spread out both of her hands to him and said this as if she were joking. However, it didn’t feel like a bluff to him since he could sense a strange, overwhelming aura coming from her black gloves.

In actual fact, Roswaal’s martial arts were far more suited to the Shinobi’s taijutsu. Normally he wouldn’t entrust this to anyone whose skills were only half-baked, but Roswaal’s fighting strength passed with flying colors. The problem with him was that he really wasn’t the type to leave things to others, no matter how defiant they were—

Wilhelm: “I should put up that sort of front up only with Theresia.”

Roswaal: “I doooon’t know why you suddenly played up your spouse and hurt my maiden heart, though, if you say so, I will try and accept it.”

The Shinobi, who’d been pointed at and forced to switch enemies, gave off an impression of dissatisfaction, seemingly narrowing his eyes beneath his black hood. Wilhelm took a step backwards and handed the reins of battle over to Roswaal.

He’d cover her back instead and try break the deadlock they were in—

???: “—iłħe̸lḿ̮͓!”

The very next instant, someone knocked into him from the side and sent him stumbling. When he looked to see who it was, he realized that it had been Grimm, now sporting an alarmed look on his face. Wilhelm began to ask him if he’d meant anything by doing that, but he immediately realized that he didn’t have the time for that.

Grimm had pushed Wilhelm away and found himself where he'd been standing—His ankle had been grabbed by one of the pair of hands that had come up from the shadows. Also, their other hand had a hold of Roswaal by her slender ankle.

Roswaal: "Damn th—."

They didn't even have the time to react; the two of them were dragged into the shadows in the blink of an eye, leaving behind ripples like the sort you'd see in a pond. Then their figures literally vanished from sight.

Witnessing that with his own eyes, Wilhelm's breath caught, uttering not a single word.

Shinobi: "What an awfully good sense of perception… We've invited the wrong guest thanks to that."

Wilhelm: "…What?"

Shinobi: "Though Our Lord had instructed us to… Oh well. Either way, the shackles of the curse shalt fall apart in this city. Now is the hour, for all my service up until now—."

Wilhelm: "You bastards, always saying whatever you like… THE HELL ARE YOU ALL THINKING!"

Wilhelm bellowed that out at the Shinobi, finding himself once again face to face with him after he'd been denied their challenger-exchange. Though worried about the safety of the two who'd been snatched away, his fury had reached murderous levels, and it now lay in his sword.

Pivot: WILHELM!

Wilhelm: "WHAT?"

Shinobi: "—?"

The spectral Pivot, however, had called out his name right next to his ear before he could swing his sword, causing him to shout back at him. That puzzled the Shinobi, but he didn't have the time to care about that. Instead, he turned around.

There he understood why Pivot's voice had been so frantic, and he tightened his grip on his sword.

"…"

Members of the mob were being ruthlessly swept away by a scything blow. Namely, the people who were at the outer edge of the perimeter, the last rank of them who'd been trying to swarm the Subjugation Force. Their blood splattered everywhere and their limbs went flying off due to the sheer strength of the blow. The perpetrator took no notice of that and swung again, and again, spreading death amongst them.

Then his imposing, grotesque appearance came into view, as he brushed aside their lives as if they were annoying little pebbles in his way—He was a blue skinned, eight-armed first-rate warrior.

Wilhelm: "The Eight Arms, Kurgan…ghk!"

Kurgan: "It has been a while hasn't it, Sword Demon. Have you been keeping well?"

His low, imposing voice came back in response to Wilhelm's strangled one. As soon as he stopped, he looked over to the Shinobi who was standing behind Wilhelm, and said,

Kurgan: "Did you mess up? I've been saying from the very beginning that you wouldn't meet his expectations. I can just picture Stride's disappointment… Nevertheless, this is a golden opportunity for me."

Shinobi: "Humbly speaking, even if I'm to die, that's part of my work as a Shinobi. Even if I weren't shackled at the neck, I would follow my Lord until I died, though I'm still yet to earn his belief."

Kurgan: "No one is going to believe that. Hence the reason for his curse rings, hence the reason for his plan, thus his hatred, and…"

The words they exchanged couldn't be understood by anyone but them. Kurgan then turned his gaze over to Wilhelm. He was holding four cleavers in his burly arms, and a strong fighting spirit was emanating from his entire body.

The lesser Knights feet froze in response to that strong sense of pressure which they'd mistaken as a storm brewing up.

Wilhelm: "Looks like I've got no choice but to deal with this guy…"

???: "Then I've got no choice but to take over with the Shinobi, right?"

Bordeaux, who'd been keeping the swarm at bay with his ax, segued into what Wilhelm had said. Wilhelm gave a glance to his words and then thought for a moment.

He only had Bordeaux left here from the remaining knights whom he could trust in their strength now that they'd lost Roswaal and Grimm. Bordeaux's combat style however was a very poor match for the Shinobi's.

Just how much would Bordeaux's clunky fighting style work against an opponent like the Shinobi who operated best in narrow spaces?

Wilhelm: "I'll…"

Pivot: Are you saying that you're reluctant to leave this to the Young Lord? Is that something to do with his ability? Or could it be…

Wilhelm: "…"

Wilhelm was stopped in his tracks by Pivot, before he could blurt out his instinctive answer. Pivot, who should have been an illusion that reflected Wilhelm's innermost thoughts, shrugged his shoulders in response.

Truthfully speaking, it was as if he was making fun of how conflicted he was, as if he were punishing him.

Bordeaux: "I'm counting on you Wilhelm. I ain't gonna take long with this guy though."

Bordeaux clapped him on his shoulder as he hesitated, and then crashed into the Shinobi. Once he started, he couldn't be stopped.

Likewise, Wilhelm couldn't afford to worry about him now that he was face to face with a formidable enemy that had to be dealt with.

Kurgan: "My gratitude for this worthy foe. —For this duel fit for the last moments of the Kingdom."

Wilhelm: "You're still the same asshole as ever, always spouting out whatever you like. I'm not going to be taking long with you."

Kurgan: "Then let us make it the best moment of our lives."

With these words, the Sword Demon and the Eight Arms clashed with each other.

—The petals of the second battle of the Silver Flower Dance bloomed amongst the tumult in Picoutatte.

4

Grimm's senses of what was up or down were completely out of sync, so he lost his balance the moment he was let go.

Grimm: "—gh."

Letting out this choked sound, he somehow managed to stop himself from falling by planting one of his knees on the ground. Immediately after he caught himself, he jumped back and raised his greatshield that was emblazoned with the Remendis Family Crest, expecting an attack.

However no attack came. —No of course not, after all, the place he was in was different.

???: "It looks like even my venerable self is not blessed with his subordinates, what with them not being able to handle even one little thing properly. Setting the woman aside, does the other one even have any worth?"

???: "—Dear me, what a surprise. Could it beeeee that I've been invited straight down to the root of all this evil.”

The beautiful woman standing next to Grimm replied. Having been dragged along with him into the shadows, Roswaal glared at their enemy with a look of wariness in her heterochromic eyes. Grimm likewise wasn’t able to completely hide his shock and surprise.

Before their very eyes, standing completely defenseless, was the sharp-eyed man who had become the Kingdom’s long-pursued arch nemesis—The mastermind of all these atrocities, none other than Stride himself.

The two of them had been thrown out from the shadows onto a stone floor that was being buffeted by a fierce wind. Taking a closer look around, Grimm realized that there wasn’t any cover around them and that they were on the rooftop of a tall building. They were in the heart of the city—Or so he thought, as he lifted his surprised face up.

If they were in the heart of the city, on a building that almost reached the sky, then that meant—

Grimm: “—A̵͚̋́h̛̕͝.”

His field of view opened up, and he saw in front of him that imposing being, with its wings spread out, hovering in mid-air. The three-headed Dragon continued to roar in agony as its eyes flickered about with bewitching shades of color.

Stride: “It’s a sight to behold, isn’t it? A Dragon from the legends of yore, sung about in folklore, groaning so uncouthly like this. Even so, I’m using three of my curse rings, the pride and glory of Vollachia, and still it manages to resist. Maybe I ought to praise it though and say ‘I expected no less from a Dragon’.”

Roswaal: “The pride and glory of Vollachia… Where on earth did you get those from?”

Stride: “What? You people still haven’t figured it out? Did my venerable self overestimate you all a bit too much?”

Stride showed them the ten rings he wore on his fingers and then sighed in disappointment. He shook his head as if he were saying "Good Grief",

Stride: "It should have been obvious, but my venerable self is Stride Vollachia… A relative by blood to the Vollachian Emperor. That's why even the pride and glory of the Empire was easily within mine reach."

Grimm & Roswaal: "…"

Stride: "But then again, it does seem like you've all been fooled by the old foxes of the Empire from day one."

Stride casually revealed his lineage which had never really been made clear before. Grimm gazed at him in astonishment due to the obliqueness of his response, however, Roswaal only let out a short gasp.

She looked down in thought for a few seconds, and then said,

Roswaal: "We more or less hazarded at that guess at our upper council meeting. The general consensus was that if anyone had gotten involved from the Holy Kingdom, the City States and the Empire… It would have no doubt been the Empire. Even so, I neeeever thought you'd tell us this so easily."

Stride: "I need not keep it a secret. So what if you know? Are you going to seek reparations from the Empire after things settle down? On the ruins of a Kingdom that burnt to ashes."

Roswaal: "Or we crush all of your schemes and then find out how much responsibility the Empire holds for this, and such. Once that happens, your home country's going to end up being greatly damaged…"

Stride: "Hmph, is that so?—I care not one bit."

Stride readily sneered at the notion of having any love for his country. Naturally Roswaal likely wouldn't have expected it to work, nevertheless she frowned, he'd sidestepped her question more than she'd expected.

If he was truly a member of the Vollachian Imperial Family, then that meant that the Empire's ulterior motives had—

Roswaal: "Then that means they have nothing to do with you. If you don't care about them… Then what the hell are you trying to achieve? Why did you kidnap the Sword Saint, summon a Dragon, turn off our Divine Protections and tear down the Covenant."

Stride: "Whilst we're on this subject, why not add why I summoned you here? All of these things, save for this last one, served only to satisfy the indispensable requirements to tear down the Covenant. Yet the answer to the last one is pretty straightforward. —I needed to show you this, sorceress of the Kingdom."

Roswaal: "Show this to me…? No, show this to the sorceress of the Kingdom?"

Stride: "No, to you. The Mathers woman. I needed to show you this."

Roswaal was completely bewildered, as if she had no clue what Stride was saying. Stride on the other hand gave her a curt nod and closed one of his eyes in satisfaction.

Then he obscenely caressed the rings that he wore on his right hand with his left, and said,

Stride: "With this, my oath with that deranged criminal has been fulfilled. Now, I'll be allowed to do as I please."

Roswaal: "Wait. What are you…"

Stride: "My venerable self shalt not wait. Long have I been waiting. I shalt not wait any further. What is there to wait for? SHASUKE!"

Shasuke: "At your command."

A Shinobi rose up from Stride's shadow at his command. The figure was clad in black garb and perfectly resembled the Shinobi who'd slipped into the middle of their brawl earlier. He looked over at Stride from his side.

Shasuke: “All of them?”

Stride: “Only if you hadn’t invited the wrong guest. Get rid of them. The one that’s… Oh, that’s right.”

Stride looked over at Grimm and his lips contorted into a grimace halfway through his command. It took some time for Grimm to realize that his grimace was actually a scornful smile, so different had it been to the kinds of smiles he’d seen.

Leaving aside what Grimm was thinking, Stride continued to smile his crooked smile.

Stride: “Now that I think about it, your face looks familiar; weren’t you one of the small fry who was at the Sword Saint’s abode? I could have sworn you were… Oh, that’s right, how amusing. How very amusing. This shalt be amusing.”

Grimm: “W̸̭ha̍͜ are̋̀͠ ̰y̸̆o͍u̇̄…”

Stride: “What, you say? My venerable self is cooking up a masterpiece. One that shalt be to my liking.”

Stride lifted his left hand up after he said this. The blue gemstone that was inlaid on his middle finger ring shone with a bewitching radiance. Then—A woman slowly walked up onto the rooftop.

Roswaal: “Carol.”

Grimm: “I̸ts̶̓ me̸͛, ̷Gri̭͠m̦̓m͜…”

The one who’d opened the door to the rooftop and made their appearance was none other than Carol Remendis. She was a beautiful, blonde-haired woman with clear green eyes—And as far as Grimm was concerned, the women he loved who he treasured beyond all else.

Her entire body was caked in blood, and her Knight Sword, which for her was her very pride and joy, was covered in fresh blood. Her eyes had no will to them, and along her cheeks ran the traces of the innumerable tears she’d shed. Tears which even now resumed to stream down her face the moment she laid her eyes on Grimm and Roswaal on the rooftop.

Carol shook her head in refusal as she wept, having poised her Knight Sword up with a fluid motion.

Stride: “You’re the one who’s in love with my venerable self’s loyal wooden puppet, right? Why not try and make her tell you from her very own lips just how much innocent blood she’s steeped her sword in?”

Carol: “No, No… NOOO…”

Stride: “That look of refusal on her face sure is an arousing one as well. It’s rare to find a woman who suits having a tear-stained face as well as she does. Surely that must get you all bothered too as a man? If it doesn’t, then…”

Stride’s vulgar words were interrupted by a shrill clang.

That was because the Shinobi garbed in black called Shasuke had glided over to Stride, stood in front of him and turned aside a chunk of stone, that had been aimed at Stride, with his Kunai.

The chunk of stone had been broken off from part of the floor and kicked at him by Roswaal. She was now glaring at him with clear, cold hostility on her otherwise handsome features.

Roswaal: “Shut your mouth, scum. I can’t stand to hear your voice any longer.”

Stride: “What an odd coincidence! For some reason, my venerable self can’t stand the sight of your eyes either. That blue one especially really gets on my nerves. Do you really think you’ve protected something by drawing this line? Don’t get carried away, woman.”

Roswaal: “…”

Stride: “—You and I are one and the same. Though I suppose there’s a difference of up and down.”

Stride and Roswaal confronted each other, both of them turning their emotions which were mutually blighted by hatred and repugnance towards the other. Looking at them from the corner of his eye, Grimm raised his Greatshield and turned to face Carol.

Even now, her posture was captivatingly beautiful. Even if she'd become stained in blood, all the days that she'd spent earnestly dedicating herself to her sword made her poise untrembling.

Carol: "Grimm… I'm sorry, I'm so sorry… Please, I want you to…"

Grimm: "C̰̃ä̠r̩̍o̵l̳̓, I̵…"

She was sobbing, her voice shaking with grief. Grimm immediately understood what she was trying to say, and for that reason he had interrupted her. He resolutely stiffened the look on his face.

And then, as the woman he loved wept, he spoke the words he needed to tell her.

Grimm: "—I̵ l̏ő̉v̂e̵ y̸ó̸u̸̇."

She arced her sword towards him ever so beautifully, and then unleashed her blow. He caught it with his Greatshield, and thus did sparks blossom.

And so began here the fierce battle between the two lovers.

5

Theresia felt a rush of air streaming into the room which reeked of blood, and lifted her head up.

Theresia: "…Something must be going on upstairs."

The Black Dragon remained over the sky above the rooftop of the spire, and along with it was Stride who was trying to get it under his control.

Stride had returned Theresia back to her confinement after he'd cast his curse on the Black Dragon. The nineteen corpses which had been sacrificed to summon the Dragon still lay clumped on top of each other in a corner of the room, tormenting Theresia, as if they were cursing the horrible destiny that had befallen them.

However, it was definitely Carol's heart that was being gnawed at the most by guilt for these victims as she'd been the one to swing her sword at them against her will. Theresia really wanted to be next to her as she cried. She really wanted to hold her and hug her until her tears stopped, until her sobs couldn't be heard anymore.

But Carol had been made to stand guard over the room somewhere where Theresia couldn't see her. And that wasn't her only issue, something strange had happened to her body as well.

—She couldn't feel the presence of her two Divine Protections, the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint and the Divine Protection of the Death God, inside of her right now.

Theresia: "I know that my Divine Protection hasn't moved onto the next generation though…"

The Divine Protection of the Sword Saint was a special kind of Divine Protection that passed between the people in the Astrea Family generation after generation. Theresia had inherited the Divine Protection from her now-deceased uncle, who'd been the previous Sword Saint. Thus, she was prepared that someday, a time would come where this Divine Protection of her's would leave her. But that wasn't what had happened right now.

Her Divine Protection hadn't left her, it had fallen asleep instead. She'd realized that from her Divine Protection of the Death God vanishing, a protection she held that was different to her Sword Saint one. Yet, she wasn't hopeful enough to think that them vanishing was unrelated to whatever Stride was planning.

Theresia: "What on earth is that man… What on earth is Stride thinking?"

Theresia, who was trying her best to understand what was going on, wasn't speaking these words to herself. She'd posed them as a question to someone. A someone that was sitting in front of her, with her back turned to her.

She was a young girl with wavy ashen-colored hair, who wore an ashen-colored robe that covered her entire body—It looked like she was called Melinda and was actually Stride's wife. She was one of the people helping Stride out with his schemes, and it seemed like she was the one who'd chosen the nineteen sacrifices. She'd been able to somehow perceive that they'd had Divine Protections, with that.

Theresia: "He mentioned the word "Evil Eye", does that mean you're from the Evil Eye Tribe? But I thought the Evil Eye Tribe was…"

Melinda: "W-We were w…wiped out because we were a risk. I survived. If I hadn't been picked up by my lord husband, I would have died."

Melinda turned her head to look back at Theresia and unexpectedly answered her words honestly.

The Evil Eye Tribe, that she'd confirmed she was from, was a variety of Demi-Human Tribe that possessed a very rare kind of blood, and were said to be very few in number. They were said to be a tribe with eyes that possessed unnatural abilities which were different from the likes of magic and cursecraft. Theresia had heard that they'd all been wiped out by the Empire because of how dangerous their powers were in being able to see the unseen, interfere with other's minds and the like.

In some respects, their treatment there was close to how Half-Elves were treated in the Kingdom of Lugunica. The locations of their tribes must have been identified since they'd been all wiped out or maybe worse.

Then the fact that one of its survivors was helping Stride of all people meant that…

Theresia: "Aren't you being used by Stride? Like, he's got his eye on your power by taking advantage of your persecuted position."

Melinda: "…You're right, but what on earth's the problem with that?"

Theresia: “Huh…”

This time Melinda turned her whole body around instead of just her head, before then sharply tilting it at Theresia. Her eyes were still squeezed tightly shut, however she was looking at Theresia from behind her eyelids. She could feel such a strong sense of pressure, so much so that it convinced her of that.

Melinda: “The only thing my lord husband wants from me is the power of my abominable blood. B-But, I don’t mind that. I’m fine with being wanted by my lord husband just for that.”

Theresia: “You’re actually satisfied with being wanted just for your power?”

Melinda: “There are countless more unhappy marriages. Looks, age, pedigree, lineage; all I have to offer amongst these things is a power like mine… Stride-sama wanting me for who I am is my ideal, compared to a marriage where I’m not wanted for who I am.”

She’d given a response that had differed from intoxication or adoration that had made Theresia ashamed of herself despite the scene.

She could hardly imagine that Stride felt any love for Melinda as a wife, but Melinda understood that and so loved Stride in her own way.

Although the nature of her love was vastly different, it wasn’t a one-sided relationship.

Melinda: “My lord husband is the pariah who was abandoned by his homeland. My lord husband is the fang of the criminal who curses destiny. My lord husband is the savior of us outcasts who were rejected by history. My lord husband is the absolute blow to the Observers who sit in the heavens above.”

Theresia: “…”

Melinda: “I am the foundation for that. I shall use my cursed blood for that. —My Evil Eye is key to our defenses. It’s my most cherished desire as a wife, something that even the Eight Arms wouldn’t be able to carry out.”

Theresia: “The key… to your defenses.”

Theresia swilled those words around her mouth and then closed her eyes in thought.

Over half a day had gone by already since she’d been brought to this city. Though people would probably get captivated by the Black Dragon’s appearance, what was far more strange was that she hadn’t heard any sort of commotion coming from the streets nearby so far.

It had been strange in the first place that no one had made any kind of noise when they’d prepared the nineteen sacrifices. Something was up there with their sense of perception, it probably had something to do with Melinda’s Evil Eye.

And Melinda had boasted about herself being the key to their defenses; she had a role to carry out in this city. Something that would almost certainly slow Wilhelm down as he hastened to her.

Melinda: “—tch, please don’t try anything funny”

Melinda was keenly aware of Theresia’s movements, even with her eyes shut. Her body had gone rigid as soon as Theresia had stirred, and she’d sternly raised her voice at her.

Theresia hadn’t been restrained here. Even if her Divine Protections had been taken away, she could still move freely. Naturally, she couldn’t do anything that required too much exertion, being pregnant and all. Still, she could probably move faster than Melinda. The problem however was that—

Melinda: “Remember, your unborn child is still cursed. Try anything funny and the curse will take the life of your unborn child in… exchange.”

Theresia: “I know, that terrifies me. It truly does. But, that man… Stride isn’t here right now. I can’t imagine something would happen straight away.”

Melinda: “A-A-Are you putting the life of your child at stake over such a tenuous bet?”

Theresia: “Suffering will come to mine and Wilhelm’s child regardless of whether I want it or not. That’s because they’re an Astrea… They won’t be able to run away from their destiny either. Though I’d really like it they could find happiness by living out an uneventful life in peace, just as an ordinary person, that would be my preference.”

Theresia cast her eyes down and silently thought about the future of her child that was growing in her swollen womb.

A life without troubles was something which wouldn’t come to her child. She wanted to shelter them from the many problems that they’d find along their way, but that was practically impossible.

That’s why—

Theresia: “They’re an Astrea, so they too shall fight, for me, for my darling, and for our country. One day, if it’s to be so, they will succeed me as the Sword Saint.”

Melinda: “—What… arrogance. T-To not protect them as a child, and instead let them fight. Y-Y-You disgust me. I. Cannot. Forgive. You.”

Melinda couldn’t hide the shock that had crept into her voice when she’d heard what Theresia had said. She brought her hand to her face and then slowly opened one of her eyelids, reflecting Theresia in her pitch black eyes.

There was no white to her Evil Eye, it was completely dyed in black. It locked onto Theresia and in an instant she was seized by a horrible feeling, like her soul was being swallowed by her eye, and then, a feeling like she was falling down.

Melinda: “—Please now, sink into the dark, dark depths of your sinfulness. Your unborn child may bear no sin, but within you, the mother, there are sins which cannot be washed away so easily. Please, awaken to them.”

Melinda’s voice, which should have been coming from in front of her, including her disgust, were fading far away.

Theresia registered that at the back of her mind as her consciousness slowly plunged towards the abyss—

Theresia: “—Wilhelm.”

Before she fell, she spoke only that one word, calling the name of her beloved husband out. —Then her lights went out.

6

Fierce battles had broken out everywhere on his stage, the Commercial City of Picoutatte.

Betwixt the Black Dragon in the heavens above, the people on the earth below, and the world with its blessings deprived, only did that one insurgent smile.

Standing at the edge of the Spire’s rooftop that overlooked the entire city, Stride Vollachia spread out his arms. As he listened in satisfaction to the Dragon’s roars, which could be heard all around the city, he opened his mouth.

Stride: “Lo’ and behold, with this all of the actors have gathered upon the stage. Kingdom! Empire! How does it feel having your imperturbable faces dragged through the mud? The hour of the end is near. Shalt you accept this ruin along with mine venerable self…, or shan’t you?”

Stride hadn’t raised that question to anyone in particular, it had been closer to a monologue.

He wasn’t seeking an answer. Only his eyes shone brightly from his pale face.

Stride: “The testament of the realm fades away, and so the Dragon’s salvation shan’t come. The light coming from your Divine Protections seeps not through, and so heroes become ordinary men. Witness, cruel Observers who look down at us from the heavens above, feast your eyes to your hearts’ content. —Witness the choices the world shalt make.”

Stride turned around and looked behind him, with his black cloak fluttering in the gale that was being produced by the wings of the Black Dragon. The fierce clashes of steel against steel were unfolding right here as well.

“—Clang.”

Two battles were taking place here, on the Spire’s narrow rooftop—

One of those battles was pitting the skills of the Shinobi, who’d reached the limits of what was humanly possible via rigorous training, against that of the formidable talent for martial arts that the woman, who should have been fighting back as a mage, possessed. The woman was catching Shasuke’s attacks that were coming from his two Kunai with her strange black gloves, trading sharp blows back at him.

Both of them had honed their skills to perfection and were holding their own. From a purely battle-orientated perspective, there were many noteworthy things you could enjoy from their fight.

However, it was the other confrontation that had captured the spectating Stride’s interest far more.

???: “RRRAAAAAAA!”

A graceful sword blow came from the hand of the woman, whose eyes were now puffy from crying herself dry,

She’d poured the results of all her years of training into her sword and swung it without any reserve. A Greatshield caught her blow, first came a shrill clang, and then sparks flew around the rooftop.

There was no hatred or animosity in either of their blades, instead there was but grief and love unquenching. —The sight of the two lovers crossing swords with each other against their will gave rise to a sweet numbness in Stride’s heart.

Though maybe, to be more accurate, he couldn’t exactly call this clash between sword and shield with stuff like crossing swords or blades.

Stride: “But there’s no way that her skills were so middling originally. Could she be fighting against the curse with her emotions? What an absurd puppet.”

Stride shrugged his shoulders in disappointment and then let out a sigh at the battle that was unfolding in front of him between the swordswoman and the shieldsman.

The swordswoman was bound by his curse, yet she wasn’t showing the true extent of her ability. From her neck down, the curse still compelled her to do as he willed, but the fact that he hadn’t shackled her mind for his own amusement had backfired.

Of course, the shieldsman’s ability to defend himself against her blows was outstanding as well, but—

Stride: “He’s someone who I hadn’t anticipated for. When you look at him, he should be no more than just some small fry, but he’s gone well above and beyond my expectations. In that case, that leaves me no choice, I’ll have to come up with something.”

Saying this, Stride brought his finger to the gemstone encrusted on one of his rings, the one that corresponded to the swordswoman. The ring’s blue glow grew stronger the moment he touched it, and the woman’s groans grew louder.

Swordswoman: “Ghh…ahhhh…! N-No NO! GRIMM! RUN AWAAAAAY!”

A pattern of blue swept up across the wailing swordswoman’s entire body. Its glow could be seen over her clothes and light armour, causing the shieldsman to react in astonishment. However, the speed at which her sword blows were being delivered grew more intense the very next moment.

The man caught her heavy blow that had come slicing horizontally through the wind towards him and was flung backwards by the sheer force of it.

Stride was using his last resort technique that caused the curse to manipulate the body of its target so to draw out the very limits of their potential. Naturally the burden that it placed on their body was inordinate, making it a technique that would likely destroy the puppet he used it on.

But he didn't care. As far as he was concerned, the only thing he had on his mind right now was enjoying himself. His work had been done already. What mattered now was—

Stride: "—Just this thriller of a show to see which one of you shalt triumph over to mine venerable self."

Swordswoman: "HYAAAAAAAA—!"

The swordswoman burst into a frenzy of attacks, letting out a scream as if she were blotting out what he'd muttered. Her longsword was greater in length than a typical Knight Sword, and she moved it splendidly like it were one of her own limbs, all the while driving her lover back.

The man shrunk back and desperately defended himself against her blows. However, he would likely reach his limits and sink under a pool of his own blood soon enough. It was likely that the wound that the woman had given him back at the mansion hadn't completely healed. The woman was going to cut him down a second time.

—Except this time she was going to reap his life and sink to the depths of despair.

Swordswoman: "Grimm… Please… I want you to…"

The woman held her sword up and once again said these words just before she swung it back down at him.

—I want you to kill me. She was probably trying to say something like that.

Stride gazed at them indifferently, feeling rather bored. However his boredom swiftly vanished due to how the man had reacted.

The man had let go of his Greatshield the moment the woman's blow had come bearing down on him, rendering himself completely defenceless to her.

Swordswoman: “Wha.”

Shieldsman: “Carol.”

The man’s face softened into an awfully gentle expression as he called out the woman’s name.

It all happened in a flash. The woman had a look of desperation on her face, yet her arm still yielded and thus the blow from her longsword crashed down upon him.

—It went straight down the man’s whole body, cutting him in half from head to inseam.

Swordswoman: “…”

The sword had torn the man’s flesh asunder, yet not a single sound matching the intensity of that deed could be heard. Namely because the sword had actually stopped an inch away from the man’s face. Their wholehearted love producing a miracle… was not the reason why this had happened.

The man had caught the blade between his bare hands and protected himself that way.

It was as if he’d been able to perfectly judge the sword’s speed and trajectory.

Shieldsman: “~~Just… how much must I have picked up from watching Carol and the 『Sword Demon』.~~”

With the sword still caught between the palm of his hands, the man somersaulted over the woman’s—Carol’s head. The glint in his eyes focused itself on Stride, fury raging within them. Stride looked at the man properly for the first time.

Grimm, that was what the man was called. Having witnessed how inconceivably hard he’d fought, Stride’s face contorted, not in anger, but in delight. A smile appeared on his face due to this unexpected find.

Stride: “Surely.”

Grimm: “—?”

Stride: “Surely you must be the one? You must be the ordinary man my venerable self sought for? Rather than the Sword Demon?”

Grimm frowned in confusion, not understanding the questions Stride had thrown at him. However, Stride didn’t care about how he’d reacted. He’d already made his conclusion.

My venerable self should test this. —To see whether this’ll make my lifelong goal come true.

Stride: “…”

Meanwhile, Carol and Grimm’s duel was continuing. But no matter how hard Carol pulled, her sword didn’t yield an inch from in between Grimm’s hands.

Ordinary run of the mill swordsmen were probably nowhere near Carol’s level. So Grimm too should have been below her in terms of pure fighting strength. However, the opponent that the shield of this ordinary Grimm had gotten through to was Carol, someone he’d spent a long time gazing at her sword technique by her side. In other words, that man had overcome his destiny.

In that case—

Stride: “Shasuke.”

He curtly called out the Shinobi’s name. The black hand of woe immediately understood what he’d meant by that, and moved into action.

The Shinobi dove into his shadow, leaving its fight behind. A moment later, he emerged from Carol’s shadow, who’d stopped in her tracks. The Shinobi no longer had a Kunai in his hand, instead he was holding a short sword.

He was going to skewer it through Carol’s back along with Grimm who was standing in front of her. Grimm, having dropped his shield, had no way to defend against it, and he couldn’t even see Shasuke’s figure.

The Shinobi’s merciless blow pierced towards Carol’s back, and a split second later—

???: “—I can’t let you do that.”

A tall figure closed the distance between them and Carol in one leap, forcing themselves between Carol and the blade. The short sword pierced through their abdomen and fresh blood spurted out onto the rooftop.

Carol’s breath was knocked out of her by the blow that had knocked their back against hers. She moved her head (which had become free) and saw what had happened behind her.

A woman had thrown her body in front of the Shinobi’s blade—Roswaal J Mathers had been stabbed in her belly.

She opened her green eyes wide in shock at the spectacle in front of her and screamed.

Carol: “—JULIA!!”

Her anguished scream echoed through the sky. Echoed forevermore.

In the sky, the Black Dragon continued to roar—Already the light had vanished from two of its heads; likewise the resistance its final head was putting up was only a short matter of time.

Act Seven

1

Theresia swayed in the darkness, enveloped by a feeling that she was sinking down to the dark, dark depths of the ocean.

Perhaps using the word “darkness” was sort of a mistake here.

Because according to the enchantress who’d sent her here, the place where she was sinking to was the dark depths of her sinfulness—A cold place that was darker than darkness itself, where no one could save her.

Theresia: “I’m sorry for being a Mother like this.”

The feeling from her arms and legs were indistinct in this place, even so, Theresia touched her belly and apologized. There, in her swollen womb, her baby was awaiting the day of its birth.

Theresia, the Sword Saint and Wilhelm, the Sword Demon’s fruit of love had already fallen into mortal danger before even being born into the world.

Her baby wouldn’t even get to be born if she didn’t manage to make it back—

Theresia: “—I absolutely won’t let that happen.”

Theresia quietly said this with a strong sense of determination hidden in her voice.

She’d been the one who’d gotten her unborn child dragged into these depths, there was no argument to that. But there was no way she’d let that eat up her baby’s fate before they were even born.

“I want my child to be a member of the Astrea Family”, Theresia desired.

There was a duty which the Astrea Family, lineage of the Sword

Saint had to carry out. That was the same for both herself and her unborn baby. Her child would likewise be born as an Astrea, so they would also bear the same things regardless of whether they wanted to or not.

Therefore, though ashamed of her own immaturity, Theresia implored that she'd be there with her child through the same sufferings.

—No matter what lay ahead for her baby, she would be sure to be with them and do all it took to protect them.

Theresia: "…"

The abyss floor finally greeted Theresia as she set that determination in mind.

She felt like she was stepping on mud, she knelt on the soft ground. She curled her body up so to protect her belly and then strained her eyes in the impenetrable darkness.

Her round blue eyes slowly started to adjust to the pitch black, and gradually the world around her became clear. And what Theresia saw spread out before her was—

Theresia: "…That's right. If this place is going to show me my sin, then I already know what I'm going to see."

Theresia let out a sigh and squeezed her eyes shut for just a second.

And then, when she reopened them, she saw head-on the situation she'd been placed in, in the area which had now come clear from the darkness.

—Theresia was alone, standing on top of a tower that had been built on a rocky crag.

A barren wind was blowing by, and the sky was far, far away, as if it had forsaken the ground. The stone tower looked like it had been made from a child's building blocks, with treacherous stairs piled high going up the crag.

Standing at its summit, Theresia saw beneath her eyes a swarm of the dead—filling her view from every corner.

She could hear their gravelly, resentful voices that sounded like the rumbles of the earth.

The army of the dead stretched out their blood-stained fingers and pointed towards Theresia above them, staring at her with their vacant eyes. She remembered each and every single one of their faces. That was only natural.

Every single one of these dead were people which she had killed by her own hand.

Theresia: “These… are my…”

Theresia had taken up her sword as the Sword Saint in the Demi-Human War and reaped countless lives. Hadn’t the number of people she’d killed neared ten thousand?

If all life had an equal weight to it, regardless of whether born low or high, then she’d tipped the scales far, far too much.

Thus, if the groans of the dead were their cries of condemnation, then she had no right to deny them.

Theresia: “This place is…”

The end of the line for sinners.

The peak of condemnation where happiness and tranquility are not permitted.

—These were the depths of sin which Theresia van Astrea had sunk to.

Theresia: “This place is my…”

Theresia once again let slip a whisper of self-awareness, faced with her own wrong.

She unconsciously brought her hand to her belly, and in her mind, thought only about her husband, her beloved demon of the sword.

The tower on the crag shook.

The dead below her were clawing their way up the tower, clambering over each other as they screamed out their inhuman cries.

—With the awareness of her sin being laid bare by the Evil Eye, the condemnation of the Sword Saint was about to begin.

2

—It had been a while since Wilhelm came to see Pivot's ghostly illusion.

Pivot: I'm the very guilt that still dwells in your heart after all

Pivot said this with a cool smile on his face. Wilhelm grimaced and let out a tch.

Pivot's illusion had started a conversation with Wilhelm as he'd been cleaning his sword, taking advantage of the fact that there was nobody there with them. Wilhelm let out a short sigh, still refusing to look at him,

Wilhelm: "…I'm listening."

Pivot: You have my thanks. Then, shall we continue? Though, it's safe to say that what I'm going to talk to you about now are nearly all your own thoughts

Still keeping his smile on his face, Pivot shrugged his shoulders, looking quite human for the specter he was. It was these types of behaviors that were the reason behind why Wilhelm didn't think he was just your ordinary run of the mill illusion.

Wilhelm didn't feel like his existence was affecting him negatively. In fact, it was the opposite for him, considering how easily he got emotional, he found him at the very least to be someone useful in providing him objective advice.

However, it was Pivot himself who'd spoken against Wilhelm's perception of him.

Pivot: Wilhelm, I don't recommend that you keep taking this situation for granted

Wilhelm: "For granted? Me?"

Pivot: Yeah, that's right. Even you should be convinced of this already. That the me that's with you here is not the same Pivot Arnancy who served as the Deputy of the Zergev Corps. In the end I am a silhouette that was created from the likeness of the Pivot you know, I'm no more than a fake.

Wilhelm: "It's not li…"

Pivot: It's not like that? Then try and ask something really personal please. Like about Pivot's childhood memories or his family. I wouldn't be able to tell you the first thing about them.

Wilhelm trailed off his words and Pivot continued his,

Pivot: Because you don't know anything about Pivot's past, or his family. In the end I'm the dredges of your sin that cling to the back of your heart, I can't tell you anything that you don't know

Wilhelm: "…"

Pivot: You need to get a grip of yourself and recognize this. I'm the recognition of your sins that was born when you awoke to a part of it, thus becoming more human. Simply put, I'm saying that you've regretted my death from the very beginning

Wilhelm couldn't deny Pivot's words as the latter pressed him.

Because none other than he himself had been about to admit that he was right.

Pivot: My existence is like a shimmer of hot air that eventually disappears. Your old war buddy whom you hold regrets about, Pivot, has already passed away. You won't have the opportunity to speak to him ever again.

Wilhelm: “…”

Pivot: That’s why Wilhelm, you have to become aware of this

Pivot cut his words off there and looked directly at Wilhelm. A faint trace of emotion was lodged in his creased expression as he told him,

Pivot:—It’ll be your turn next

…

???: “Your mind isn’t quite here right now?”

Wilhelm: “—tch!”

An overpowering blow came bearing down on him as payback for his momentary lapse.

His opponent’s blow brought forth a fierce gale, a deadly tempest that raged at tremendous speeds. Step back or jump to the side, making a snap decision, Wilhelm plunged forward using his Holy Sword to shield himself.

The blade of his Holy Sword, which bore the name Astrea, caught the impact of his opponent’s cleaver, which was more than twice as wide as his own blade. His chosen steel took the blow right at its core, but it protected its owner without breaking.

???: “Just barely, though.”

His opponent’s thunderous voice struck his eardrums just as the shockwave that followed his blow razed the stone street.

He’d just barely defended himself against the storm his opponent had unleashed. However, that sense of relief didn’t apply to his surroundings. The aftermath of his blow spread around them without relent, blowing away many of the townspeople who’d been making up the encirclement.

Wilhelm clenched his teeth hard seeing their figures come apart scattering blood everywhere.

Wilhelm: “Gh…!”

???: “You cannot afford to be distracted. Turn thy sword to me, and I shalt turn mine to thee. —This is the greatest performance in life itself, so don’t ruin it.”

Wilhelm: “Your theatrics are like a fucking spitting image of your nonsensical owner, don’t you think?!”

Wilhelm cursed and spat blood out of his mouth.

The attack hadn’t hit him directly. However, his opponent was the Eight Arms Kurgan—The War God who’d assumed the name of Strongest in the Vollachian Empire. Merely the wakes of his attacks were enough to be a threat to the lives of the people around them. Even Wilhelm couldn’t avoid pain and fatigue as he continued to parry his blows, searching for an opportunity to attack.

Even if not for that, the situation was looking really bad for Wilhelm—No, for the Kingdom’s Subjugation Force.

The city of Picoutatte had fallen into the clutches of the Destruction Wish Stride, and its people had god knows how become his puppets. They were advancing on them with eyes that possessed no will of their own, having been made into a mob. The Subjugation Force was being swarmed by their sheer number, and were at a huge numerical disadvantage. Finally, there were Shinobis lurking in the shadows, and Kurgan himself who didn’t care about the damage he inflicted on his surroundings.

—Being driven into a corner described it perfectly.

Pivot: Things are really getting more and more perilous now. Wouldn’t this be a good time to recall what I said?

Wilhelm: “…Shut up.”

Pivot, who was at Wilhelm’s side, called out to him as he checked the grip of his sword. After he responded so abrasively to him, Pivot narrowed his eye from behind his monocle,

Pivot: “Driven into a corner”, it’s rare to see a scene that symbolizes these words so well.

Wilhelm: "…"

Pivot: Theresia-dono's been captured, Carol-dono's been made into a puppet, Miss Mathers and Grimm were swallowed by a shadow, and no one has any idea where they are. The young lord is at a disadvantage against the Shinobi he's fighting, and everyone from the Subjugation Force, including the Zergev Corps, are going to eventually be overwhelmed by the swarm of people. And as for you…

Kurgan: "…You seem to be entranced by the Evil Eye."

Wilhelm: "What?"

Pivot stated everything that was wrong about the situation they were in, and then came Kurgan's low voice, as if he were finishing off the last bit. Wilhelm raised his eyebrow up.

Of course, he hadn't actually been able to hear the spectral Pivot's words, and it was mere coincidence that it had seemed like their words had been interlinked. However, Kurgan had shouldered the four cleavers he carried in his eight arms and still had a disappointed look to him on his otherwise solemn features that seemed like they were chiseled from rock.

Kurgan: "It's that devilish light which the girl from the Evil Eye Tribe, Stride's wife, possesses. I know not whence the chance came for you to be reflected in that girl's eyes… But, it disappoints me that you've been caught in her snare."

Wilhelm: "Did you say Evil Eye…?"

Wilhelm couldn't believe his ears at what he'd just heard.

The Evil Eye was a unique ability that only members of the endangered tribe called the Evil Eye Tribe possessed. Their ability was considered to be different to stuff like Magic or Divine Protections, nevertheless, they were in a time where the members of the tribe itself were said to be on the brink of extinction. There hadn't been any opportunities, or such, for Wilhelm to fall under its spell.

Wilhelm: “…Was it at the Witch’s lair?”

Pivot: The Evil Eye snare was left behind in that valley of fog by Stride’s crew when they retrieved Sphinx’s legacies… If as a result you were entranced by that, then we have an answer to my existence as well.

Wilhelm: “But it wasn’t just me who went there. Grimm and the others should have been there too!”

Kurgan: “That’s why I am disappointed, Sword Demon. They say that those who become captives to the Evil Eye are only those who are weak of mind. —That’s to say, if nothing strange happened to the rabble who visited that place, then…”

He was just saying that only one who’d been experiencing a weakness of mind was Wilhelm, in being the only one captivated by the Evil Eye back at that place.

Wilhelm: “…”

Wilhelm was lost for words due to the sheer weight of what Kurgan had informed him.

He had never thought of himself as being weak, or anything like that. He could say that about both his state of mind and the way he lived his life, not just his swordsmanship.

Weakness should be despicable, so the word itself should have been the last thing used to describe him.

Why had it befell his current self? That was—

Kurgan: “—Devote everything to your own ability to fight, and only that, Sword Demon. It will hone you in steel. That is what I seek from a worthy foe, a conclusion with someone whose honed both their mind and body in steel, and merely that.”

Wilhelm: “Their mind and body, in steel…”

The War God lifted his four cleavers up, a blood-stirring sword aura emanated from him. Wilhelm looked down and then brought his hand to his chest, the one that wasn't holding his sword, and clenched it into a fist.

He was going to devote everything to his own ability to fight, a.k.a. his sword, and only that.

It should have been like that. Wilhelm should have done as he always did.

He'd just wanted to become strong, give up every inch of himself to his sword and thoroughly master it to its peak.

He'd ended up marching onwards, weighed down by many burdens that he'd not even been aware of, making it so his desire was no longer pure. He'd become weak as a result.

If he'd devoted himself wholly to the sword then he would have been in the perfect position right now to be called the Sword Demon. Thus, if the case was that he wouldn't reach the heights of the Eight Arms unless he was in that position right now, then—

Kurgan: "—Indeed. That is what is required. That is what I expect of you."

Wilhelm: "I—."

Letting his strength flow to his sword hand, Wilhelm tried to get rid of the heavy burdens that were weighing him down. Kurgan's eyes lit up in anticipation seeing that sign, and the hair-raising sword aura that was coming off from him intensified.

—Right here, right now, it's about whether I can kill him, and nothing else.

???: "Don't you dare look down on our commander of the vanguard, damned Eight Arms!"

Wilhelm gawked in astonishment as suddenly a roaring voice cut through the strained atmosphere. The one who'd been behind this shout was the giant of a man on the other side of the battlefield, holding his ax at the ready—Bordeaux.

He'd been peppered with cuts all across his muscular body and he was covered in blood. From the remaining members of the Subjugation Force here, Bordeaux was second only to Wilhelm in terms of ability and he'd been the one taking on the Shinobi.

Bordeaux had nigh the worst fighting affinity with the Shinobi, who was chaining multiple attacks together, paired with his agility, as his weapon. In fact, Bordeaux looked like he was losing a lot of blood, being unable to withstand the Shinobi's relentless attacks.

Nevertheless, Bordeaux laughed fearlessly, displaying an attitude that didn't betray one shred of such weakness,

Bordeaux: “It took me ages to barely bring him back from the path of a beast to that of a human. I am not gonna stand for him being turned back into a beast with your selfish logic.”

Kurgan: “A giant of a man carrying an ax, could it be that you're the Mad Dog of the Kingdom?”

Bordeaux: “What, you know of me as well? It really doesn't sit well with me that that nickname is still knocking about, but well, whatever.”

A frown appeared on Bordeaux's face for a second, before then immediately vanishing. He looked over at Wilhelm, and said,

Bordeaux: “Don't hold back, Wilhelm. Hold your chest out proudly without any scruples. You are the Strongest in the Kingdom no matter what is weighing you down.”

Wilhelm: “Bordeaux…”

Bordeaux: “You are the Sword of our Kingdom. Our sharpest, most precious steel that can fight against this unprecedented danger.”

Bordeaux had firmly stated “No matter what is weighing you down” to Wilhelm.

Bordeaux twisted his bloodstained features into a smile, and the Knights around them nodded in approval at his words.

With their weapons in hand, they were doing everything they could to keep the mob that was bearing down on them at bay without hurting them. All of them were entrusting in Wilhelm's sword to find a way to get them through this situation.

They were proving that they were staking their very lives on their absolute faith in leaving this to the Sword Demon.

Pivot: Is being the Sword Demon who threw everything away a testament of your strength?

Pivot had been keeping his silence for a while, but now he posed him this question. Wilhelm turned to look at him, and his lips broke into a faint smile as he looked down at him.

Wilhelm: "…Why change your attitude after cornering me this much?"

Pivot: You're misinterpreting that I've cornered you. I've never held the least bit of interest in wanting to drive you into a corner. You still never listen to all of what people have to say, both now and back then

Pivot shrugged his shoulders and let out a sigh of exasperation, looking rather like he had done whilst he was alive.

Pivot: You remember how I lost my life in front of you, right?

Wilhelm: "—. Of course I do."

Pivot: I guess for you it must have been like a bolt out of the blue. Because, back then, I guess you'd have never even imagined that someone would have been killed in your place on the battlefield.

The man gave him a small smile as he said so. He'd stood in front of the Demi-Human Tribes' strongest warrior and protected Wilhelm, taking their deadly blow. —Wilhelm still relived that moment in his dreams.

That's why even he couldn't deny things when Pivot's illusion told him It’ll be your turn next—.

Pivot:—Wilhelm, it’ll be your turn next.

Pivot once again spoke these words to Wilhelm.

A curse that said that Wilhelm was going to lose his life next, just as Pivot had done.

Those words should have been the curse, but they had a continuation to them.

Pivot: Next shall be when you put your life on the line for someone important.

“—THUNK!!.”

Wilhelm smacked his forehead with the handle of his sword all of a sudden.

A dull thunk resounded and blood streamed out from his split forehead.

Pivot: Wilhelm van Astrea, the demon of the sword who desired to live life as steel. —Up until now, and from now onwards, I imagine that many deaths will shadow you to the end of the path you walk. Even so, you must never stop walking it.

Wilhelm wiped away the blood that was streaming down his forehead with his sleeve, gritted his teeth and looked forward.

Pivot: These are the only words I, as the deputy of the former Zergev Corps, am conveying to the current commander of the Zergev Corps

Wilhelm: “—That’s enough.”

He took a step forward. Pivot, standing nearby, didn’t follow him. Of course he didn’t. He wasn’t here anymore. The dead cannot catch up to the steps of those who are still alive.

Like once before, he watched the Sword Demon drive into the frontline, and—

Pivot: Wilhelm, cooperate!

Wilhelm: "—BORDEAUX!!"

Wilhelm heard Pivot's voice and then shouted this out. Hearing his name, Bordeaux readied his ax and nodded.

Wilhelm kicked off from the ground in an instant, as if he were a cork whizzing out from a bottle, and rushed down towards Kurgan.

Kurgan swung one of his Demon Cleavers down in response, aiming for Wilhelm who'd gone in low—However, Bordeaux brought his ax in its path and caught the blow mid-swing, using all of his strength to stop it.

Kurgan: "Ngh?!"

Bordeaux: "Ghaa… Man is a blow from the Empire's Strongest something heavy!"

An involuntary groan escaped from Kurgan's lips due to his unexpected interruption; at the same time, Bordeaux's wounds gushed out blood because of how jarring the blow had been. However, his pride and spirit had made him completely catch the blow in its tracks, leaving an opening behind.

But that didn't apply just for Kurgan, but for Bordeaux as well.

Shinobi: "Showing your back to me was foolish!"

Bordeaux had abandoned his own fight and left his back exposed. The Shinobi had crossed the shadows over to Bordeaux and pointed his short sword at him, right towards his heart. If the Shinobi's blow went into him like that—

Wilhelm: "—Ah, you dumbass. You put your life on the line just to say that!"

Shinobi: "—gh?!"

The Shinobi reacted in surprise to his voice, then a flash of silver was let loose that arced across his sightlines. He immediately tried to defend himself against the blow with his short sword, but the sharpness of the blow shattered it, and continued onwards, severing his right arm at his elbow. The arm spun away spurting blood out all across the street.

And it didn't stop at that, the flash of silver came at him from every angle. The now one-armed Shinobi jumped backwards and tried to dodge the attack using his taijutsu and remaining left arm. But—

Wilhelm: "RRHHAAAAAAAAAAAA—!!"

Shinobi: "…Oh crap."

The Shinobi's left arm was eventually deflected by the sheer power of his sword, and his body was cut across diagonally. His wounds were deep and would sure enough bring him a death inescapable. He coughed up blood, well aware of that.

But the Shinobi clung on despite his useless body and took out the last trick up his sleeve.

Shinobi: "Even… in death… this body is not that of a human, but that of a Shinobi! It has one last duty!"

The Shinobi cried this out and then plunged his hand into his own belly. He instantly triggered the explosion hex that had been placed in his body, and his small figure began to swell up, producing a terrific amount of heat that caused the air around him to shimmer.

A suicide attack, Wilhelm readied his sword noticing the signs. Maybe I can minimize the damage if I chop his body to pieces in the short time I have left before he explodes, or…

Bordeaux: "There's no way you can do that! Move aside!"

Bordeaux told Wilhelm off for his recklessness and let go of his ax. He kicked the Shinobi down and pushed Wilhelm back, covering the enemy's body with his own. The diminutive Shinobi ended up pinned down under Bordeaux's giant body, and straight after—

“—BANG!.”

A tremendous bang led to a shockwave that surged through the streets, giving Wilhelm the illusion that the entire city had shook for a moment. But in fact the explosion had had practically no effect on the city as a whole.

Cobblestones had been torn up, the Shinobi’s corpse had flown up from the upended street, and finally—

Wilhelm: “BORDEAUX!”

Bordeaux: “…hh.”

Bordeaux had taken the brunt of the explosion with his body and had as a result lost consciousness due to its tremendous force. He was still breathing however when Wilhelm shook him. He was still alive despite the force of the blow.

Wilhelm: “What a tough bastard. Don’t you go dying on me.”

Breathing out a faint sigh of relief, Wilhelm instructed the Subjugation Force to form around Bordeaux and the injured. Now that the Shinobi was out of the equation, their enemies remained the mob and—

Wilhelm: “Now we can settle this without any distractions getting in our way.”

Kurgan: “…”

Wilhelm turned this tip of his sword around and pointed it at Kurgan. However Kurgan had closed one of his eyes and was looking at the ground zero of the explosion, instead of at Wilhelm.

He gave a curt nod, not to Bordeaux, but to the Shinobi that was scattered there, as if to mark his end. Then—

Kurgan: “Nevertheless, you’re in a slightly different state than I’d hoped for.”

Wilhelm: “Indeed. It seems like I’ve picked up too many “distractions” to throw them away.”

Kurgan: “…”

Wilhelm: “That’s why I can’t imagine myself losing anymore.”

He was hesitant to say that the situation had improved.

Theresia was in the enemy’s clutches, Carol was a puppet, he had no idea if Roswaal and Grimm were safe or not, Bordeaux wasn’t stirring and the Subjugation Force was close to collapse.

Yet, despite all of that—

Wilhelm: “—DEFEND THE KINGDOM!”

Subjugation Force: “ROGER—!”

Wilhelm bellowed that order out, imitating the man who’d once shouted like he was spitting out blood. The brave men of the Subjugation Force responded vigorously to the Sword Demon’s rousing shout.

Wilhelm bore down on Kurgan once again, as swift as an arrow that had been let loose.

The holy sword Astrea and the Demon Cleavers clashed together, causing sparks to fiercely blossom.

3

It plunged through her torso; a scorching hot sensation welled through her body, and her knees gave way.

Her body had moved on her own. What blunder, what error had she made?

She couldn’t very well die. It was her own unmistakable standpoint, it should have been an unwritten law.

Nevertheless, she’d let her feelings take over and threw herself over like this.

—Aah, but even so. Aah, but then. Aah, but still.

???: “—JULIA!!”

An anguished voice called out her old name, drawing a smile out from her.

Something started to fill the empty parts in the depths of her heart, making her, unexpectedly, feel relief.

“I’m glad that I could protect you”, she thought.

That’s why, by that alone, Roswaal J. Mathers was—

.

Grimm: “…”

Seeing Roswaal’s face split into a smile and Carol’s tear stained face letting out that sorrowful cry, Grimm Fauzen’s heart flared violently.

He’d taken care of the possessed Carol’s weapon, and the Shinobi who operated from the shadows was being held in place by Roswaal. —There was no way to stop Grimm from attacking the culprit behind everything now.

Grimm: “A̸h̰.”

Grimm breathed out and forcefully brought his foot down. Leaping up from where he’d stamped his heel, was the greatshield he had dropped so to catch Carol’s sword.

Grimm: “Ŕ̷R̬̭̕R̃H̩̍H̸ȞH̶̨Ã̬̭Ā̸̜!!”

Grimm kicked the greatshield with all of his might, hurtling it straight towards—straight towards Stride, who stood by the rooftop’s edge.

The spinning silver disc was a steel greatshield that was as large as a human body. Its momentum and force were akin to a weapon that could easily break a human body were it to score a direct hit. It was hurtling towards the defenseless Stride.

Shasuke: “My Lord—.”

???: “Whoops.”

The Shinobi—Shasuke had attempted to stop that blow of silver, but had been stopped in his tracks by Roswaal, despite her having been stabbed in her belly. She had grabbed Shasuke’s arm with her heavily injured body, so as to not let the assassin escape, and smiled sweetly with blood trickling from the corner of her lips.

Julia: “You can’t just be so cold to disturb a woman’s stomach and then tryyyyyyyy and scurry away.”

Shasuke: “Gh…”

Shasuke shuddered at her pale smile. And, that delay proved to be fatal.

The greatshield was still hurtling towards Stride without any signs of stopping. He was a man that had declared himself as unable to fight. Naturally, that meant he had no way to stop that blow—

Stride: “Tch!”

The sound of steel against steel clashing against each other overlapped with his tch.

Giving off a dull thunk, Grimm’s greatshield struck the rooftop’s floor and rolled away. But the figure of the man collapsing from being hit by the greatshield was nowhere to be seen.

And that was because Stride had brushed the greatshield away with a crimson sword he had drawn from the sky.

Grimm: “Is~tha̵t t̵he̸…”

Julia: “Is that the Yang Sword Vollachia that’s handed down in the Vollachian Empire…?”

As she coughed up blood, Roswaal’s words swept away Grimm’s doubts.

—It was a beautiful treasured sword that looked as if it could burn the hearts of anyone who lay their eyes on it to cinders.

The crimson blade gave off the appearance that locked within its steel were undulating flames. The jewels encrusted on the sword shone with nothing but the brightest radiance. Were you to pin a treasured sword that carried the supremest value, it would be no doubt that sword itself.

However, their surprise at the Yang Sword didn't stop just at its beauty.

Stride: "Nngh…! Damned thing…"

Immediately afterwards, Stride gave a howl of what seemed like annoyance and his face contorted in pain. His left hand—his thin arm that was holding the Yang Sword suddenly burst into bright red flames.

Feeling the heat and pain, Stride reflexively let go of his Yang Sword. And just like that, the treasured sword was sucked back up into the sky, before it even dropped onto the rooftop's floor, and then vanished from sight.

It had disappeared just as quickly as it had appeared, however, the flames on Stride hadn't.

Shasuke: "My Lord, your arm!"

Stride: "I know!"

Shasuke moved his hand to his waist and threw a Kunai down at Stride's feet. Stride picked it up, and without any trace of hesitation severed his own burning arm at the elbow.

The arm fell down onto the rooftop, still continuing to burn, until finally charring and completely turning into ashes. Even so, Stride had managed to prevent the flames from consuming him further. He let out a long sigh.

Stride: “Never would my venerable self have dreamed that I would have lost an arm. And on top of that…”

While letting his smoldered left sleeve flutter in the wind, Stride stepped down on the remains of his own charred left arm. He picked up his curse-rings that had been engulfed by the flames with his arm from among the remains.

The gemstones on those curse-rings that he’d worn on his five fingers were beginning to fall apart.

Meaning that—

???: “—You won’t be doing as you please anymore, you bastard.”

A sharp, cold, dignified voice resounded from the rooftop. The one who had shouted that was the female knight—Carol. She was kneeling down on one knee, holding the fallen Roswaal in her arms.

She turned her crystal-clear sword aura towards Stride as she called out to Roswaal in her arms.

Carol: “Mathers-sama, Mathers-sama! Please, please hang on.”

During this moment of offense and defense, Shasuke had extracted his arm from Roswaal’s belly and returned back to Stride’s side. There was a river of blood which Roswaal had shed around where she’d collapsed.

Carol unfastened her cloak, and wrapped it tightly around her wound as a makeshift tourniquet. However, the cloak absorbed far too much of her blood and became incredibly heavy. Her blood wouldn’t let up. —Roswaal’s life wouldn’t stop flowing out from her.

Carol: “Mathers-sama, pleaseplease open your eyes…!”

Julia: “…You called me… Julia… I didn’t mishear you, right?”

Roswaal suddenly opened her eyelids fraily, and her lips stirred, her tone of voice felt just like she was teasing. Hearing those words, Carol gave a small gulp. Then she shook her head whilst holding back tears.

Carol: “If I call you that… please, would you tease me, like you always used to?”

Julia: “Ah, that would be nice, indeed. Yes, that would be nice.”

With a smile on her deathly pale face, Roswaal nodded several times. And then, with a trace of awfully faint emotion lodged in her heterochromatic eyes that were reflecting Carol in them, she said,

Julia: “At my home, there is a butler called Clind. Tell them that I’m entrusting Karl to him.”

Carol: “N, No! No, you can’t. Please, Mathers…”

Julia: “—Julia.”

Roswaal placed her finger on Carol’s lips as if shushing her tearful voice. Carol gazed in surprise at her touch, and then, hoping against hope to cling onto her,

Carol: “Julia, please…”

A single tear trickled down her cheek. Seeing that, Roswaal—No, Julia let out a long sigh as she looked on at her with affection.

Julia: “…Find happiness with Grimm-kun.”

Carol: “Julia?”

At the very end, her final words were that of a prayer. Her weight inside from between her arms grew heavier. However, something had left her instead.

Carol: “Julia, Julia… Julia, JULIA, JULIA!”

Julia’s head tilted forward, and the strength from her body left her. And her strength wasn’t the only thing that had left her. A far more important, the most important thing had left her. That was that she’d never again,

Carol: “Juli…”

Stride: “She died?—Halfway through.”

He said that in an awfully parched voice. It was, however, a voice that was devoid of both scorn and sarcasm.

Stride, who had lost his left arm, was gazing at Julia dead in Carol’s arms. His expression was cold, the feelings dwelling within his eyes were unfathomable, not a single soul would have been able to guess what was going on in his mind.

But, in a part of those complicated emotions, surely it felt like he was glimpsing at her with envy.

Carol: “—Don’t you fuck about.”

In the face of that envy, Carol’s anger had reached its limits.

It was natural. Of course it was natural.

She’d just lost someone here right now. He’d snatched away someone who was most dear to her. And for that.

Carol: “Even death would be a mercy for you, Stride Vollachia.”

Stride: “Forsooth. Even my venerable self cannot bear to think that the end awaiting me is in a place like any other.”

Carol had no intention of listening to his bullshit. She gritted her teeth, strongly.

She laid down Roswaal’s limp body, and crossed her arms on top of her chest. She then wiped away the blood that had trickled down the crook of her lips, and straightened her fringe up. After she finished doing this, Carol slowly stood up.

She stood next to her sweetheart who had picked his greatshield back up, with her Knight Sword in hand. Leaving her friend behind, she looked ahead at the enemy.

Shasuke: “My Lord, please forgive me for removing my bonds.”

Stride: “The curse ring which binds you has burnt to cinders. Why are you still here? Seeing the chance, shouldn’t it have been you and your unworthy younger brother’s dearest wish to lop off my venerable head off?”

Shasuke: “Raizo is my older brother. We always intended to follow you My Lord, even without the curse rings.”

Stride: “Hmph.”

Snorting as if he were making light of it, Stride raised his right hand. The five gems of his remaining curse rings glittered bewitchingly there, and both Carol and Grimm remained vigilant for his next move.

Stride: “Hah, don’t be frightened, scared little mice. Even the curse rings are not omnipotent. At this moment in time here, they cannot bind your minds and bodies. My venerable self does not have enough entrails remaining to pay their price.”

Carol: “Entrails, to pay their price…?”

Stride: “Each ring causes everlasting damage to a part of your body. That’s how they work. Even without them, I’m forcing myself to keep moving this corpse-like body. I have nothing left to offer.”

Receiving those words along with the radiance of those gems, Carol intuitively understood what he meant. And it horrified her.

Stride had worn ten rings on both of his hands. If he had to pay a price for each one of them, then the one standing in front of her was in their truest meaning a being whose body was like that of a corpse.

He’d kept up a ritual that brought him closer to his own death; this man had made it here as he unscrupulously kept piling up his villainy.

Where on earth had his tenacity and source of insatiable malice come from?

Carol: “I’ve heard that the Empire’s Imperial Family can be quite…

ruthless. Does you becoming like this have something to do with the issue of succession?”

Stride: “You mean from when I was served poison by my father, the emperor? I suppose that was the start of me becoming like a corpse.”

Carol: “—tch.”

Stride: “Hah. Don’t go thinking that such a trifling thing was the origin of who I am. What my venerable self detests is not my father, the emperor. And of course, it’s not my half-siblings who battled for the line of succession either. What my venerable self detests is… the construction.”

Clenching his right hand where the gems were, Stride continued, a fervor filling his voice. The man had brought down scorn for everything about the world, always with cold indifference, yet now he continued to speak with a fervor filling his voice.

Stride: “This world is the cruel Observers’ miniature garden. Fixed events, fate that has already been decided, where tragedy and comedy are a matter of course. It’s no more than a puppet show that’s merely been produced and garnished to make it look as if it were real.”

Carol: “Such wild delusions… they’re nonsense! What meaning is there to this situation when you say that?!”

Stride: “It’s quite simple, man and woman of minor roles. The Observers hath cast their roles in their miniature garden… Namely, the Divine Protections. And you small fry differ from their pawns. My venerable self as well. And my venerable self’s foolish wife, the Shinobi twins, and even the Eight Arms. What the Observers expect of us is tantamount to nothing more than us playing these nameless minor roles, which we do so like bumbling idiots, in an environment where everything is already decided.”

And then with a lurid smile, Stride put his right arm into the depths of his bosom pocket.

And slowly, he took something out from it.

Carol: “That’s a”

Seeing what it was, Carol gazed in astonishment, and Grimm too was lost for words.

A black spine, along with a cover that bore no title. There were hardly any opportunities to see the real thing, but just its existence was something that was well known by many people living in this world. It was a symbol of absolute evil.

It was a book that was owned by just those who were chosen. Or perhaps, those selected ought not to be referred to as chosen but rather as cursed—

Stride: “My venerable self is not going to finish with a minor role. No, actually, on the contrary. I don’t mind even a minor role. Scratches can be made upon the surface of the board regardless of whether a minor role is curtailed by the script. The stage can be broken. I shalt teach them that.”

Carol: “Stride Vollachia, YOU BASTARD!”

Stride: “It’s not like I believe in that foolish Witch or anything, but emulating that psychotic criminal who handed this over to me, I shalt say this.”

Held against his chest, was that evil book—The Gospel. Stride continued to give a wicked smile, and said.

Stride: “Witch Cult Sin Archbishop, representing Pride, Stride Vollachia.”

Carol: “The Witch Cult…?!”

Stride: “Unfortunately though they’re just a sham that came by Authority and influence. There’s no way I’m going to revere the tyrant of the world, The Witch of Envy like that lunatic does. Though perhaps, if you were to look at that too from the perspective of that which acted as the destroyer of the world, then I guess they’re on the same side as my venerable self.”

Confusion swept over Carol’s chest as she received Stride’s cynical words. The entity he had referred to was the name of the most abhorrent group in this word.

Knowing now that Stride was associated with that group of utmost evil was—

???: “Carol.”

Carol: “…ghk, Grimm, I’m so sorry. I’ve made you suffer so much.”

Grimm: “~~I’s fine. Besides,~~ you ~~shouldn’t dwell~~ on it ~~too~~ much.”

Carol: “Huh?”

Shaking his head, Grimm solemnly stiffened his gentle features. And then, he jerked his chin towards their friend who had collapsed right behind them,

Grimm: “~~We gotta wipe the~~ floor ~~with~~ this ~~guy.~~ We have ~~another reason~~ why.”

Carol: “…”

Receiving Grimm’s candid encouragement, Carol widened her eyes. Then she looked behind at the collapsed Julia, setting her eyes on her pale face.

A heat started to fill her body. She kept those emotions in check by gritting her teeth together; and then nodded.

Carol: “Yeah, you’re right. I am Carol Remendis. I am a daughter of the Remendis family, which has for generations served as the sheaths of the Astrea family. But now, just this one time.”

Holding out her Knight Sword in front of her, Carol firmly squeezed her eyes shut. Every single day flashed by behind her eyes, from the time they’d met until the end. Time and time again she’d annoyed her. Time and time again she had angered her. Time and time again they’d smiled and laughed together. Time and time again, she had thought of her with fondness.

That’s why, just this one time, in just this moment, she wasn’t a daughter of the Remendis Family, but rather—

Carol: “…As Carol, as Julia’s friend, I will cut you down, bastard. Repent for everything you did to Theresia-sama and Julia, the most important people in my life, and DIE.”

Saying those words as a vow, Carol pointed her sword at Stride. Seeing that, Stride’s smile deepened. His look couldn’t help but betray delight.

Stride: “Excellent, commoner, well said. And, what about you, her partner with a minor role, have you nothing to say?”

Grimm: “No.”

Stride: “Oh?”

A short, immediate answer. To Stride, who had raised his eyebrow at that reply, Grimm said.

Grimm: “You’re… jus’ some madman passing by.”

Stride: “—That’s the best solution.”

One could never hope to understand Stride who had smiled at those words.

That is what Carol and Grimm concluded. Their sword and shield sprung into action simultaneously.

But, just before the battle commenced, something stirred.

???: “—ROOOOOOOOOOAR!!”

The breath of the black dragon that had been freed from the shackles of the curse-rings raced down towards the four people standing on the rooftop in one fell swoop.

4

???: “Puff…Pant…”

She continued to run for dear life despite being out of breath, as fast as she could so that they wouldn't catch up with her and grab her.

The ground beneath her was muddy, so there was a good chance that she'd stumble and fall if she didn't take care. Yet if she paid too much attention to that, then there'd be no avoiding the clutches of the dead who were chasing her right now. She was up the creek without a paddle.

She'd never thought her stamina would fail her this much. Though it was natural when she calmed down and thought about it. What had she ever done to improve her own fitness?

She'd been living happily, feeling at peace, ever since she'd cast her sword aside; never had she seriously devoted herself to the sword. And with her having to hold her swollen womb on top of that, why on earth had she thought she could run away?

Regardless of that, she had to run away. She couldn't let herself be caught.

In her head she knew that this wasn't real, but at the same time her soul understood that there was no way that what happened here wouldn't not have some kind of effect on reality.

Theresia: "I've got to escape… No."

Theresia shook her head and tried to shake off all the complaints that were crowding her mind.

What would running away do? What would keeping on running away do? It mustn't be like that. Theresia, having been roped up here in the depths of her sin along with her unborn child, had a purpose.

That purpose was for her to defeat Melinda's Evil Eye, the Evil Eye Tribe girl who'd brought forth this darkness—

Theresia: "She told me… that she was the key for protecting the city. If that's the case then surely it'll help Wilhelm if I can get rid of her Evil Eye…"

If Melinda was their key, then it certainly had something to do with her Evil Eye. Thus now that she'd dropped under the influence of the Evil Eye herself, it was a matter of whether she could interfere with it somehow.

Even the least bit of change could possibly help Wilhelm. That was Theresia's battle.

Theresia: "…I'm really such a weak woman without my sword."

She gazed down at her hands and felt discouraged when she couldn't feel her Divine Protection of the Sword Saint. At the same time, she was disappointed in her own arrogance at trying to rely on the power she'd shunned so much.

Theresia: "…"

Taking a ragged gasp of air, Theresia looked back behind her at where she'd ran away from. The swarm of the dead were reflected in her blue eyes. They were still chasing her after having just missed out on grabbing her at the Stone Tower.

—The many individuals she'd killed in the Demi-Human War were drawing near to her, wanting to make Theresia one of their own.

Theresia looked at the faces of the dead, their faces were streaked with bloody tears; she listened to their cries and then closed her eyes. It made her aware that her earlier discouragement was more cruel than arrogant.

If I still had my Divine Protection of the Sword Saint, would I have killed them again? Would I have killed them all over again and procured their lives?

Could this be the sin that this place was trying to teach her?

Theresia: "—Ah!"

Theresia's feet faltered in her escape from the dead as she remained engrossed in her own thoughts. The dead stretched out their arms towards her. She couldn't dodge them and one of them managed to grab her arm.

Theresia's bones instantly started to creak, caught in his vice-like grip, making her shriek.

Theresia: "AGHHHHHH! WHAAAAA!"

Theresia swung her arm around with all her might, biting down her pain. However, the strength of the deadman was strong enough that she couldn't shake him off. And more of them arrived, grabbing her arms, legs, shoulders, trying to pull her down. She couldn't fight against such strength.

The moment she thought she was about to fall, she felt her baby stirring in her womb.

Even if I'm pulled down and torn to pieces, please let my child, just my child be safe.

Theresia: "Wilhelm…"

Wasn't here.

Theresia: "Carol…"

Wasn't here.

Theresia: "Someone, anyone…"

No one was here. —Theresia was all alone.

All alone in this place.

Theresia: "—Help me father."

???: "Why yes, of course."

A hug that was so gentle as to want to make her cry came in response to her weak cry for help.

Immediately after Theresia spluttered out a faint "Huh" a foray of silver blurs came racing forth, cutting down the dead who'd taken hold of her by her limbs.

Those behind that were all men, each with a Knight Sword in hand.

They held their beloved swords steady in their hands and positioned themselves in front of Theresia,

???: “No matter where we are, dad always has to show off.”

???: “You know, we were worried about Theresia too.”

???: “Huh?! Are y’all going to be knocking me down here as well?!”

The man who’d hugged Theresia reacted in indignation to what the men had grumbled at him. Theresia shook her head in refusal both at his response, and at the touch of him on her arms.

Because there’s no way. There’s no way this can be happening.

???: “Our lil’ sis took on too many burdens. Well, that’s probably ‘cause she regrets having had to kill so many people as the Sword Saint. But, you needn’t think of us as your sins too.”

???: “Either way, it’s thanks to her personality being like this that we can be here as well.”

She knew who those two who were talking were.

Their smiling faces were gentle-looking, and they were lazily holding their swords over their shoulder—

Theresia: “Big brother Casilles and Carlan…”

???: “I’m here too of course Theresia.”

Theresia: “You’re here as well, big brother Thames…”

Her youngest brother Casilles and her second eldest brother Carlan. And finally, her eldest brother Thames, whose unassuming looks took after their father, was there flexing his muscles.

Theresia’s breath caught in its tracks due to the appearance of her three brothers considering that she’d never expected to see them again.

Long ago, in the midst of the Demi-Human War, the three of them had taken Theresia's place when she had refused to fight—

???: "This is a miracle of love. Don't you think so, Theresia?"

Theresia: "What are you saying Father?"

???: "Eeh? What's up with that reaction? I thought you'd be glad?!"

He said this, looking taken aback. He was sporting aristocratic-looking facial hair that didn't quite match his faint-hearted personality—But that about him was charming too, being her beloved father, Bertol Astrea.

Bertol had rushed to Theresia's side along with her supposedly dead brothers. Along with her awfully out of place relief, that meant one other thing.

When Stride had attacked the mansion, Bertol had stood in front of Theresia to protect her from the possessed Carol's blade. Her father was still—

Theresia: "Father, I…"

Bertol: "You mustn't blame yourself, Theresia. Carol too. There's no reason why either of you are to be blamed."

Theresia: "But, but, there's so so much I wanted to talk to you about Father… hgu."

Bertol: "I also have tons of stuff I regret I won't be able to do of course. I won't be able to hold my first grandchild, and I'd wanted to be there for Carol's wedding. I was planning on making this year's wedding anniversary with Tishua something spectacular, and I even wanted to slowly get to the point where I'd have tried drinking with Wilhelm-kun, but…"

Theresia couldn't hold back her tears as she listened to all of Bertol's main regrets.

I really wanted that. I really wanted to give him that.

Yet, he'd never get that chance. He would forever "live" with those regrets—

Bertol: “But, you know Theresia, I’m okay with that.”

Theresia: “Huh?”

Bertol: “You can’t live without having some regrets. You can’t achieve everything you want. I lived happily, and so I died happily. The wants of a happy man know no bounds. I would have other desires if I’d fulfilled my current regrets. They’d keep coming and coming with no end.”

Bertol proudly puffed out his chest and continued his words,

Bertol: “That’s why Theresia, I… We love you. That’s why you, and your child, and their child will take over what we couldn’t do. We’re okay with that.”

Theresia: “Father…”

Bertol: “So, let us dig deep to give you that. Hey, you guys.”

Bertol lifted his head up and said that while keeping a certain air of gallantry about him. His three sons heard him, and looked back at him,

Casilles: “I mean, we’ve already started while you were talking.”

Carlan: “It’s not like the dead are gonna wait quietly for y’all to finish speaking!”

Thames: “You really suck with the sword dad, so even when you’re saying to “dig deep” it’s just us who will be.”

Bertol: “Eeeeh?! You’re really saying that?! You know, if you guys are gonna be like that, I’m not gonna bring in our reinforcement!”

He received a scathing judgement from his sons, even as they were busy cutting down the advancing dead whilst they talked. Theresia however, who was still being embraced by Bertol, cocked her head in confusion and said “A reinforcement?”

What kind of reinforcement could he be thinking about that'd save her more than she'd already been in a situation like this?

???: "—That would be me, Theresia. Though you may not be very happy about it."

Theresia: "Oh."

Someone who'd newly arrived there answered her question. He was a tall man with long hair, with a somewhat pleasant face to him. He'd rushed in and cut down a clump of the dead in one fell swoop.

She knew how sharp that sword was, and how strong he was with the sword. Because, the man was—

Theresia: "Uncle Fribal!"

Fribal: "The previous Sword Saint, hastened here after biting down his shame."

The man, Fribal van Astrea, gave her a wry smile—He was Bertol's younger brother and he'd been the Sword Saint before Theresia. She'd gotten the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint from him. That's why she'd often resented him for having burdened her with that horrible fate.

Fribal: "I didn't come to atone for that though. You've always, from the very beginning, bore a duty that couldn't be avoided as a member of the Astrea Family."

Theresia: "…Yes Uncle, I know. Back then, I wasn't able to fulfill my responsibilities."

Fribal: "Indeed so. You may have avoided your responsibilities, but lives were lost as a result of that. Maybe you could call that as being your sin. Nevertheless…"

More of the dead drew nearer behind him, even as they talked, but Fribal took care of them with a sharp blow from his sword, not even bothering to look back at them.

Pain surged through Theresia's heart, even as she thought "But I just couldn't help it." She was in pain because all of the dead here had materialized due to her sins.

Fribal: "Nevertheless, you needn't agonize over it. Theresia, even if this was the world that your guilty conscience produced, they aren't the actual people you killed. They're no more than an extension of the puppet show."

Theresia: "But Uncle."

Fribal: "Let me finish what I have to say, Theresia. I get that you want to believe this as being your sin, I get that feeling. But, if it's like this, then what does that make me, Thames and the others, and even my big bro' who came here?"

Theresia: "…"

Theresia kept her silence when she heard Fribal's question and plunged into thought. Bertol's face had turned sour right next to her, but he didn't notice it.

What was it that her uncle wanted to tell her? She thought hard about it. After all, she'd never properly talked to her uncle like this when he was alive.

Fribal: "You see, this place isn't the depths of your sinfulness. This place takes the form of the things that the people who are entranced want to believe. —It must have surely been made by a kind person."

Theresia: "A kind…person…"

Fribal: "You mustn't drown in your sin here, Theresia. I'm not going to let you die in a place like this. There's not a single thing you can make up for with death, so, you must live."

Fribal said this, then stepped forward and swung his sword to protect Theresia and Bertol. Thames and the other brothers stood by his side, once again forming a defensive line.

Bertol: "There's so much I want to say, but…"

Bertol trailed his words off there and looked at the Astrea men as if he were looking at something dazzling. Envy was in his gaze, for not having been blessed in any talent for the sword.

However, that envy quickly passed and he looked back towards Theresia with only affection in his blue eyes.

Bertol: “What Fribal said is correct. You must live, Theresia. You needn’t burden yourself with such sin. Like, how should I say it, daddy was really surprised to see that you’d been driving yourself into such a corner.”Theresia: “I never meant for it to get as bad as this though…”

Her recognizing it too was probably something sweet, now that he’d spelled it out to her.

Bertol: “I’m not saying to forget your sins, but stop living for them. You don’t have to live in order to atone for them. Even if your heart still aches… you must return the favor.”

Theresia: “The favor…?”

Bertol: “Don’t live in order to atone for your sins, but rather to return the favor. Then you can live happily, and die happily. I’m positive that’s precisely like the ideals of my daughter.”

Theresia’s eyes swung wide open as Bertol beamed at her.

Could she be allowed such a way of living being from the lineage of the Sword Saint? Could she be allowed to live such a gentle life being someone from the Astrea Family, a family who’d been compelled to live out their lives as the swords of the Kingdom?

But Bertol Astrea was laughing, him having managed precisely that.

Theresia: “Father.”

Bertol: “What’s up?”

Theresia: “Just like, I wanted you to name my child.”

Bertol: “…Is that so. Right, right.”

Bertol's expression grew more relaxed at Theresia's coaxing. Then he scratched his hair, which was the same shade of red as Theresia's, and said,

Bertol: "Then I'm gonna go and try rack my brains for one."

Theresia: "…Mhm. That's a promise, father."

Theresia made this promise with him, knowing full well that there'd be no chance he could keep it. Then, still holding her father's arm, Theresia looked up towards the Astrea men.

Theresia: "Big brother Thames, big brother Carlan, Casilles, uncle Fribal."

The men turned to look at her when she called their names out. All of them were in a state where they couldn't really afford to do that, but they put on a show of courage, so as to not look weak in front of her.

When she paused to think about it, she finally realized that she'd been protected all this time.

Theresia: "I love all of you."

Thames, Carlan, Casilles, Fribal: "…"

Did I manage to give them a proper smile?

Did I manage to be the Theresia Astrea they knew before I had the "Van" added to my name?

—Can I think of the smiles that everyone showed me at the end as the answer?

5

—A sound like cracking glass signaled its collapse.

Theresia: "—Hh, ah."

Theresia crouched down and clutched her chest in agony, unable to breathe for a moment. She raggedly gasped for air over and over again. The air was full of dust, and the room stunk of blood—She'd made it back.

???: "—GHAAAAAA?! My Evil Eye has been defeated?!"

Someone let out a piercing yell as soon as Theresia's senses returned to her, that person being the user of the Evil Eye, Melinda.

She dragged her long robe (which was long enough to brush against the floor) along to the window of the Spire. She looked out of the window in complete panic. Then she screamed, tearing at her ashen-colored hair.

Melinda: "A-A-AGHHHH, IT WAS BROKEN, IT'S BEEN… BROOOOOOOKEN?!"

Theresia: "Melinda…?"

Melinda: "MY SPELL WAS BROKEN… THE TOWNSPEOPLE ARE BACK TO NORMAL… MY LORD HUSBAND'S DESIRES, HIS WISHES!"

Melinda yelled her head off in a complete frenzy. Then she looked back at the crouching Theresia, and with her eyes that she'd been squeezing tightly shut now wide open, she ran over to her with hatred in her Evil Eyes.

She grabbed Theresia by the hair and forced her up.

Theresia: "OW!"

Melinda: "HOW DARE YOU DO THIS. MY LORD HUSBAND LEFT THIS TO ME, HE ENTRUSTED IT TO ME. I WAS FINALLY APPRECIATED. M-M-M-My IDEAL DREAM… HOW!"

Theresia: "—. My family ended up sending me back because I'm not really bearing anything like sin."

Melinda: "—TCH! ALWAYS SO ARROGANT! Y-Y-Y-Y-YOU…"

Biting her lips in anger, Melinda tried to push Theresia down.

However, just before she did, she caught sight of Theresia's swollen womb and that made her suddenly stop.

She'd been saying this even before she'd tried to use her Evil Eye power. Then, her uncle was right.

Theresia: "You care about my baby. —Let's stop this here."

Melinda: "I c…"

Theresia: "You can't do that? Well, you shouldn't be. I don't have my sword or my Divine Protections right now. I'm just a woman, a mother… If you have someone you love as well."

She could neither understand nor pardon the sort of nature Stride, Melinda's loved one, had.

Even so, that wasn't why she'd denied Melinda who loved that evil man.

Melinda: "I ca…"

Melinda closed her eyes again and turned her face away from Theresia's gaze, as if she were avoiding it on purpose. Theresia didn't look away despite that and kept urging her.

Melinda's hands were trembling all over, as if she were struggling to bear her gaze. A few brief moments passed with her in that state before she continued speaking,

Melinda: "I…"

Melinda tried to blurt something out, as if she'd made up her mind. Seeing a glimmer of hope there, Theresia nodded her head with a "Yeah." However—

Theresia: "Oh."

Melinda's face tensed up and she pushed Theresia away by force.

Theresia fell backwards, offering no resistance to her unexpected push. But she didn't have the time to check why she'd actually done that.

—The red hot fiery breath of the Black Dragon billowed towards the spire’s rooftop, towards the room Theresia and Melinda were in.

Act Eight

1

—The Shinobi were Shura that were birthed as a result of Modifications akin to the tortures of hell.

In the beginning, their names were taken away. Then their family, their possessions, their past, their future, and everything they had before becoming a Shinobi was taken away. Only after being bleached like this, were they readied as a Shinobi prototype.

Only after that, was the true essence of the atrocities that took the name Body Modification were carved into their mind and body.

They were trained, drugged, magicked and subject to all kinds of heresy from everywhere and every time—One in a hundred of them would manage to escape suicide, one in a hundred from those would manage to keep their human form, and from those, one in a hundred would manage to not die from insanity. Finally, one from those hundred would be completed as a Shinobi.

After mastering the arts of taijutsu as well as the Shinobi techniques, these inhuman Shura called Shinobi were born.

Thus it was nothing short of a miracle that both brothers, Raizo and Shasuke, the Shura Brothers, were completed successfully—It had been the first time since the village had been founded that a set of twins had been completed as Shinobi.

The Twin Shura, who were one in body and soul, were venerated as the pride of the Shinobi Village.

—I guess that must be why.

A Shinobi only becomes a fully-fledged one when it loses its self. The Twin Shura, who had been hailed as the greatest masterpiece of the village, swore a vow of retribution for their fellow villagers after their village had been burnt to the ground. And thus they ended up siding with the Destruction Wish.

The Shinobi Village had grown too powerful. Its burning had been an instigation from some of the Empire's Nobility who feared that they would mount an insurrection. They struck when the Twin Shura were absent and engulfed the village in flames, reducing their fellow villagers to ashes.

The pale faced, half-dead looking man spoke to the Shura Brothers, standing on their pile of ashes.

—We shalt tarnish the script of this cruel world and trample down its fine stage.

They still had no idea why they'd followed those words. But, they had no regrets.

They exacted their revenge for their fellow villagers and burnt down the mansions of the Nobles. The Twin Shura had bowed their heads at the man's ambition.

That's why, even now, they were—.

???: "My Lord!"

The Shinobi yelled out, then tore open the black costume he was wearing, exposing his shiny pale skin. A phosphorescent light brimmed out from the mottled pattern that rose up across his entire body, and he began to run faster.

In an instant, the Shinobi—Shasuke's body fiercely leapt up to the sky, having grabbed the man next to him.

"…"

A moment later, a wave of heat billowed through the Spire rooftop behind them, that they'd previously been standing on. It was the red-hot fiery breath the Black Dragon had unleashed. A being that went beyond what humans could fathom, now spreading its black wings up over the city.

Its fiery breath glowed a pale green, and as it melted the stones of the Spire as it spread out, contrary to its beauty.

It would easily burn you to cinders if it scored a direct hit; merely the hot air that came from its wake was plenty enough to burn one's internal organs to cinders just by breathing it in. Naturally that meant the other people on the rooftop had no way to survive its onslaught—

???: "—Hey, dumbass, where do you think you're running off to!"

A split second later, Shasuke heard a quiet voice that was full of anger coming towards him. He twisted himself around in midair. He couldn't manage to dodge and was hit full force by a sword slash. His left shoulder burst open, making him peel his eyes wide open.

The golden haired Swordswoman—Carol, had jumped up after Shasuke and caught up with him. She was someone who was pretty clean with the sword, but he'd never thought she'd amount to more than that. And yet, she'd kicked her way up over to him, as if she were using the very sky as her footholds, and had slashed at him whilst he'd been unable to move.

Carol: "Kicking up in mid-air is my domain, it looks like you've made a misjudgment."

Shasuke: "—tch, But what happened to your beloved if you're here?"

Very few people would have been able to escape from the rooftop that had been scorched by the dragon's fiery breath. Shasuke and Carol, who had abilities that let them run up the sky, had been exceptions. But there'd been one more man.

An ordinary man who just had a greatshield with him, there was no way that he would have survived—

???: "—That's what it's all about, an ordinary man."

Within his arms, Stride wasn't paying any heed to the blade bearing down on them, and was instead looking in the complete opposite direction as he spoke with a fervor in his voice. Shasuke followed his Master's gaze to see what had caught his attention. It looked to be the rooftop that was smothered in the lingering heat.

He could see a glistening greatshield there. —As well as the ordinary man who'd tided through the flames, protecting the body of the dead woman.

Carol: "I am the Sheath, Grimm is the Shield—And we shall remain companions next to our Sword."

Shasuke: "Gh."

Shasuke caught her flashing blow with his Kunai and jolted back, managing to gain a foothold on something. That something was the Black Dragon's back.

The Black Dragon: "GRAAAAAAAUGH."

Considering that the Dragon was way over ten meters tall, the weight of such puny humans was nothing to it. Its roars resounded, now having gained its freedom from the rings' curses. And as they resounded, a fantastical swords dance began to unfold between the Shinobi and the Swordswoman, making use of the transcendental creature's back, wings and arms to conduct it.

The Black Dragon twisted its body around in mid-air; its claws and tail lashed out relentlessly all around them. A gale blew up that would mark certain death were it to sweep over them. Shasuke gritted his teeth, faced with this moment of battle.

He was holding his Master with his injured left arm, and crossing blades with the first-rate Swordswoman using only his right arm. He was wielding the power he'd honed as a Shura of the extremes on the back of a Dragon, a being of legend, as if this were some kind of jape.

I can't believe this. Is this really happening?

It should have been his destiny to rot in the darkness, to be shunted away and lurk in the underside of legend, in the shadows of the world and history. Yet such a grand stage had come to the Shinobi.

Shasuke: “Khaa!”

The Shinobi bared his teeth and let out a gasp of air—No, he’d laughed.

It had been a very long time since Shasuke, who should have lost his self and thrown away his emotions, had laughed. The last time had been when he’d been a child, before he’d become Shasuke.

He gave a full-toothed grin and finally he realized why he’d sided with Stride. —It was just because it felt fantastic.

He found everything delightful about the man who cursed destiny and was trying to upend the world, from the gratification he got from him, to the way he sneered at them being constrained by their limited way of life as that of a Shinobi.

That’s why—

Shasuke: “—Yes, indeed, it has been truly delighting!”

He thrust his Kunai forward at god-like speeds, trying to stab it through the Swordswoman’s pale throat. However, the Shinobi’s godspeed skill didn’t come close to the likes of a blow from the Sword Demon

Therefore it was swept aside by the skill of the Shieldsman who’d been keeping an eye on them from nearby.

Grimm: “C̚A̸̩R̒O̶L̃!”

The man had jumped onto the Black Dragon’s back and risked his life just for that one blow. He shouted her name out, and in response, the woman rushed forwards without a shred of hesitation and swung her longsword up.

Looking at that from the corner of his eyes, Shasuke released the clasp on the magic sigil that adorned his entire body and burned through his Od to turn his body into steel. There’d be no reason why the blade couldn’t bounce back off him had it been a half-baked one.

However, the Shinobi knew that he was as good as a piece of paper in front of that blade of crystalline purity.

Shinobi: “Big brother, I hope you managed to fulfill your part.”

Her sword slash came at him diagonally and cut into him from his right shoulder all the way down to his left hip, severing his body in two with a single stroke. Having received such a fatal blow, Shasuke spat out blood and smiled the best smile of his life.

—Though, I hope you too big bro were able to smile in your last moments.

Shasuke: “Pardon me for leaving, My Lord.”

The Shinobi fell from the Dragon’s back, covered in blood.

—Likely they were going to be the only Shinobi, or such, who’d died in a place as spectacular as this one.

The Twin Shura fulfilled their Destruction Wish, accompanied by such a sense of satisfaction, and thus perished in Picoutatte.

2

Shasuke: “Pardon me for leaving, My Lord.”

Saying this, the Shinobi collapsed with his blood and viscera splurging out. The pale blue shiny pattern on his body had lost its light, and he was definitely dead.

The Shinobi’s remains slid down the Black Dragon’s scales and fell to the ground below. Barely paying any attention to that, Carol wiped her bloodstained Knight Sword clean and once again readied herself for combat.

In front of her, that evil man in black was clinging to the Dragon’s back as it stormed about like the wind; the man had now lost the Shinobi that had served as his faithful guard—It was Stride Vollachia, the man who’d named himself as a Sin Archbishop.

Carol: “You’re all out of options, you demon. Your Black Dragon’s escaped from your clutches, and your plot has all come to nothing.”

Stride: “So you’re the sort who runs her mouth silly as soon as she sees that the tide has turned. But I shalt forgive you. Changing your ways to the vibrato of the accompaniment is likewise the karma of a minor role like yourself.”

Carol: “…”

Stride’s left arm had been reduced to ashes, he’d offered his entrails as payment for his curse-rings, and now he was on the verge of death, having just lost his last ally. Despite all of this, his attitude hadn’t changed.

Carol realized that within herself, she was gazing at him awfully calmly.

The man’s words should have really gotten to her; they should have tormented her as if she’d just been given all of the world’s anguish, anger and sorrow. But all that Stride was right now was pitiful.

Carol: “Did you resort to this kind of violence as revenge for being unable to attain ordinary happiness?”

Stride: “—Eh.”

Stride looked like he’d been taken by surprise for a moment, having heard Carol’s composed voice. He then turned his face down, still staring at the serious-looking Carol.

His shoulders shook and a gurgling sound came from within his throat. He was laughing.

Stride: “Ghghahahahaha! Are you for serious, hahaha! What clownish words… Could it be that you’re pitying my venerable self? How foolish can you get, to find yourself in my venerable presence, me, the guy who’s at the core of all that which has happened, and only be able to understand it like that?”

Carol: “That’s right, I’m a fool. It’s because I’m a fool that I was tricked by scum like you, lost the one I was meant to protect and let my friend die. I hate myself for being made an idiot of all this time.”

Carol looked down at her bloodstained hands in response to Stride’s words that were marked with a sneer.

Carol had let her precious friend die and laid these hands on her benefactor that she was meant to protect. She’d made countless mistakes. Come to think of it, hadn’t she always been making mistakes ever since she’d met Theresia for the first time?

Despite that, such a Carol, such a foolish Carol was—

Grimm: “~~I love you.~~”

Carol: “Mhm, I love you too. Julia loved me too. Bertol also cared a great deal about me. —And Theresia-sama loves me as well.”

Carol gave a nod at Grimm’s affirmation, who now stood right next to her, and then a gentle grin appeared on her face.

Stride’s expression stiffened when he heard those words, and the scornful glint vanished from his eyes. A heated fury akin to that of the Black Dragon’s fiery breath replaced it.

But that tempestuous emotion vanished from him in the blink of an eye. He slowly stood up.

Gale-like winds were still blowing past the Black Dragon’s back. He sucked at fighting, and it was unlikely that he was going to last more than a few seconds without his left arm. As if to prove that point, Stride immediately lost his footing and slowly started to topple over. —He was thrown off from the Dragon’s back, into mid-air.

Carol: “Not after coming this far—hgh!”

Carol brought her longsword down and flew towards him with a single jump, as if she were saying she wasn’t going to let him suicide. She would catch up to Stride’s falling body and cut him down with a single blow.

At least, she believed that that would be a good way to mourn for Julia—However, her sword didn’t reach him.

Grimm: “N̦̍Ö̸!”

She’d been held back from behind the moment she’d jumped, making it so she’d stayed fixed in place. The one who’d held her back by her slender waist had been Grimm, having flung himself at her with a look of alarm on his face. His normally gentle look had been replaced with one of urgency, similar to that of a drawn blade; he jumped backwards with all his might still holding onto Carol.

A split second later, the Black Dragon’s enormous tail crashed down where they’d just been standing a moment ago. Its tail was covered in rocky scales; had it scored a direct hit, it would have easily ground them down into chunks of flesh.

They’d managed to escape their demise, however, it had come at the cost of that scumbag Stride dropping down right beneath her eyes—

The Black Dragon: “KRAAAAAAUGH.”

—The Black Dragon, with its three heads still scrapping amongst each other, followed Stride down, setting their sights on him.

Stride: “…Come.”

Carol could see Stride in the distance facing the looming Dragon, moving his lips to say that.

In his final moments, that man had escaped from Carol’s blade and surrendered his life to the fangs of the Black Dragon that he’d summoned—Yet, just before that came to pass.

???: “STRIDE-SAMA!”

A woman jumped out of the ruined, burnt Spire window.

The woman was completely burnt all over, to the point that it was a miracle that she was still alive. The woman—Melinda clung to her husband’s body in mid-air as he moved to meet the Dragon.

The Dragon’s maws did not hesitate and swallowed up the embracing married couple.

3

The Dragon’s fiery breath engulfed the Spire rooftop, and a part of its intensity reached the inside of the Spire as well.

Theresia: “…”

The green flames billowed in from the open window and burned through the remains of the wretched sacrifices that had been piled up in a corner of the room. Then with no signs of stopping, the flames surged towards the two women as well—Theresia and Melinda.

—No, that wasn’t quite right. The green flames were crashing down on only one of them.

Melinda had pushed Theresia away and shut the iron door that led to the staircase with her body. Melinda was left alone inside of the flame-stricken room with the scorching heat mercilessly burning her back.

Melinda: “GHAAAAAAAAAAAAA—!”

Her screams of agony echoed through from behind the iron door. Theresia, protecting her womb, rushed over to the door and tried to open it. However, the iron door had partially lost its shape from being melted and didn’t budge an inch under Theresia’s slender arms.

Theresia: “Damn this… MELINDA! MELINDA! OPEN THE DOOR!”

Theresia banged on the scorching iron door and called out to her inside. Even from where she was, a tremendous amount of heat was coming through it. There was no way that anyone could survive being subject to this without some way to protect against it.

Theresia: “WHY, Why did you…”

Melinda: “—The… child. In your womb… No… sin.”

Theresia: “—Hic, MELINDA!”

Melinda’s struggling voice coming from beyond the iron door made Theresia’s head jerk up. The deformed iron door still remained tightly shut, keeping the two women separated from each other.

Theresia: “Melinda, listen to me! I’m sure… I’m sure that we’ll get you treated right away, so I just need to find somewhere I can get through to you.”

Melinda: “I… my Evil Eye for my Lord Husband… I’m… my Lord Husband’s… unworthy wife… my Lord Husband’s…”

Theresia: “…Melinda?”

Melinda’s voice was delirious. Theresia instantly knew what that meant. She had been in many battlefields during the heights of the Civil War in her role as the Sword Saint. She’d heard that kind of voice many times in the fronts of battle where life and death were intertwined.

—This was the voice of a human being who’d been gripped by death and was about to lose their life.

The flames that had surged into the room had burnt Melinda’s body so badly that death was an inevitability for her. What’s more was that she’d protected Theresia from meeting that end.

She’d done it instinctively, most probably unconsciously, just as an act from her own conscience, to protect Theresia and her unborn child.

Theresia: “…”

Theresia gritted her teeth and then clenched her fist. She needed to get back into this room by any means possible. Even if she couldn’t save Melinda, she couldn’t let her die alone.

No one should ever die alone.

Theresia: “…”

Theresia climbed up the staircase whilst holding the weight of her swollen belly.

Considering that the Black Dragon had unleashed its fiery breath at the Spire, what had happened above had also been gnawing at her mind. She was worried about whether Carol was alright, since she would have been on the rooftop. With those thoughts likewise plaguing her mind, Theresia rushed over to the door that led to the rooftop. The iron door had been warped out of shape as she'd expected, but she just managed to squeeze her body through since the door had been left ajar.

—Then, on the smoldering rooftop, she lay her eyes on the corpse of a beautiful woman who'd been laid to rest with her eyes closed.

Theresia: "Roswaal-san…"

She instantly knew that the beautiful woman was Roswaal, being that they'd interacted with each other quite a few times. She also immediately understood that her pale sleeping face was one that would never wake up again.

A painful pang went through her heart. Both Wilhelm and Carol would mourn her death since she'd been an irreplaceable friend for them.

Theresia: "—tch, the Black Dragon!"

However, she couldn't run over to her corpse and lose herself in grief. As soon as she focused her attention, she could see the figure of the Black Dragon flapping its wings around the sky near the rooftop.

Seen at a distance, the Dragon had several figures on its back. And soon enough, one of those figures (the one wearing black clothes) slipped off of the Dragon's back and fell down, down, down—

???: "STRIDE-SAMA!"

A shrill voice echoed through the sky a moment later, and an ashen haired woman jumped out from the tower window. A gentle woman who'd been brutally burnt by the flames, with her whole body covered in burns wherever she looked—Melinda.

She jumped down to Stride, who was falling from the sky, and wrapped her arms around his slender body into a tight embrace. Theresia could see that her eyes, the eyes she'd long shunned as Evil Eyes, were full of happiness.

As they fell, Stride's right hand and Melinda's left clasped each other from the front. The two of them, just in that moment, were nestled up close to each other, truly like a married couple who loved each other—

Theresia: "…"

—Their two bodies were swallowed up by the maws of the swooping Black Dragon. Their three heads sunk their fangs into the two bodies, as if scrapping for them, and mercilessly began to tear them apart. Even though all of the Black Dragon's scrapping heads shared the same stomach, its vicious hunting still turned the married couple into chunks of flesh as if they had some meaning to rending their fangs amongst their flesh and blood.

Theresia: "Ah…"

Theresia thumped down to her knees where she'd been standing. The strength had gone out from her, and her feet were refusing to move. Had she sunk to her knees out of discouragement or relief? Her heart hadn't been able to really take in Melinda's final moments.

I wanted to speak some more with her.

Would that have let me understand, even if but a fragment, the happiness her Evil Eyes had filled with in her final moments?

???: "Theresia-sama…"

Someone suddenly called her name out, making her lift her head up. There she saw Carol's figure.

She'd knelt down and gently placed her hand against Theresia's cheek. Theresia placed her own hand on top of her's; "It's definitely warm”, she thought, that meant that she was herself again. She started to shed tears.

Theresia: “Carol… Are you okay?”

Carol: “I am, all thanks to Grimm… and Julia.”

Theresia: “Julia…”

The name was unfamiliar to her, but the look in Carol’s eyes told her all she needed to know. There’d been a profound sadness, and affection, in her eyes when she’d spoken out the name Julia. Roswaal J Mathers—The woman Carol had called Julia was probably to thank for bringing her and Carol back together again like this.

???: “The~~resia-sama~~…”

Theresia: “I’m sorry for everything I’ve put you through as well Grimm-kun… Where’s Wilhelm?”

Grimm: “~~—Still fighting~~ in th~~e city~~.”

Theresia closed her eyes after she heard Grimm’s response, who’d moved over to be beside Carol.

Wilhelm’s fighting. Of course he would be. Wilhelm’s always fighting. He’s always swinging his sword about, fighting to protect something.

—That’s why my dear is still fighting even now.

Theresia: “The head honcho of the Stride faction’s dead, but, as for his Black Dragon…”

Carol: “I hope the Dragon he summoned is going to go back to where it came without a hitch…”

Legend has it that the Divine Dragon Volcanica was a deeply benevolent being as well as a rational entity of sagacity. However, even though the Kingdom of Lugunica took the name of the Dragon Kingdom, no one had ever recorded anything about encountering a Dragon other than Volcanica. —The Black Dragon could be a history re-defining being.

Earth Dragons acted friendly around people, Water Dragons acted gruff around people, whilst Winged Dragons were hardly ever fond of people.

Then, how was this Dragon, which you could call their progenitor, going to act in this situation…?

Carol: “—tch! THE DRAGON!”

Carol yelled and then pointed up at the sky.

The Black Dragon had finished chewing up the body of that evil man and his wife, and had now unfurled its wings and soared up high above the city sky. They hoped it’d continue to flap its wings like this and head over yonder to the Great Waterfall. But, such a fleeting hope it was—

The Black Dragon: “KRAAAAAAUUUUGH!!”

Its three heads all turned in different directions, and they quickly vanished from sight due to the fiery breath they had unleashed as they bickered amongst themselves.

Their fiery breaths of destruction bore down on the city and surged through the streets, lighting them up in flames. Deserted buildings burst up in flames, spreading the flames about even more. Anguished shrieks started to echo throughout the city.

Carol: “THE CITY…! Gh, the Dragon’s still enraged?!”

Grimm: “~~Their voices~~…~~They’ve all gotten their senses back~~…?”

Carol and Grimm each gave their reactions to the damage the three heads of the Black Dragon had brought about.

Carol to the Dragon’s wrath, Grimm to the anguished shrieks that came from the city, and Theresia, who’d reacted to neither of those things, had swung her eyes wide open.

Theresia: "—Wilhelm."

High up in the sky, a silver gleam swooped up to the Three-Headed Dragon that had perched itself in the skies with its wings unfurled.

???: "HYYAAAAAAAAAAAAAA—!"

—The Sword Demon, Wilhelm van Astrea's sword pierced into its black wings.

The Black Dragon: "KRAAAAAAAAAAAAAGH."

The Black Dragon let out a roar of pain at that unexpected blow which had come from this diminutive being who shouldn't even have been able to reach it up in the sky. Wilhelm's sword shallowly tore through the Dragon's wing, yet definitely inducing damage to it.

Carol: "That man is so…"

Carol muttered that with disbelief in her eyes, having just witnessed Wilhelm leap up to where the Black Dragon was. Next to her, Grimm's eyes crinkled up—A trace of vexation flitted through them before he then turned to look at Theresia.

Grimm: "~~Please escape with Carol~~, ~~Theresia-sama.~~"

Theresia: "Grimm-kun?"

Grimm: "It's ~~our duty to protect the city~~. ~~Carol's duty is to protect you~~, ~~Theresia-sama~~. ~~And your duty Theresia-sama is~~…"

Grimm's gaze shifted to Theresia's belly. Theresia realized that she'd been unconsciously keeping her hands over her belly ever since she'd looked over at the Black Dragon.

She'd been gently stroking her belly in instinct, so as to reassure her unborn child.

Carol: "Grimm, I…"

Grimm: "~~Go with Theresia-sama and Mathers-sama~~."

Carol: “But I…ah.”

Carol’s eyes had swayed with hesitation after she’d received Grimm’s instructions. Shouldn’t she, who had the strength left to fight, stay here and help out; it was that kind of hesitation.

—Grimm pulled Carol close to him and silenced that with a kiss.

Carol: “…”

Grimm’s lips overlapped with Carol’s sweet, soft ones, her body stiffened in surprise. Then, once Grimm slowly pulled away from the kiss, Carol’s face grew bright red as she stammered out a “Wh-Wha-Wha…”

Grimm: “I’m ~~leaving the~~ life ~~of~~ t~~he person I love to you~~”Carol: “—All… Alright. Grimm, you too, please…”

Carol placed her hand on Grimm’s chest, her hesitation melted away by his lips, and placed within these words of supplication. Grimm gave her a resolute nod and then turned his attention to Theresia.

His look was one of resolve and determination; Theresia had no intention of stopping him.

Grimm: “~~I can’t let him fight alone~~.”

Theresia: “—You may go, Grimm Fauzen. Knight of the Shield. The Sword Saint Theresia van Astrea sees your resolve.”

Grimm: “Th~~ank you~~.”

Grimm received Theresia’s blessing and gave her a firm nod with an imposing look now adorning his face. Then he turned his back to Theresia and Carol and looked up at the evening sky where the Sword Demon and Black Dragon were fighting.

Grimm: “—H~~YAAAAAAAAAA~~!!”

He shouldered his greatshield and let out a heroic shout. Then he jumped from the Spire rooftop to the building next to it. He jumped again, making his way down to the ground in a single bound. When he touched earth, he kicked off from the ground so to make his way down below where his camarade de guerre was.

Carol saw Grimm off and then gently picked Roswaal's corpse up. She turned her head around and looked at Theresia with an expression that she'd cleared of sorrow and unease.

Theresia likewise gave her a resolute nod in return seeing that look.

Carol: "Theresia-sama, we too need to…"

Theresia: "Yeah. —Let us do what needs to be done. So that we do not bring shame to the people we love."

4

—Rewinding back a bit from when the Sword Demon commenced his attack on the Black Dragon in the sky.

.

???: "—Her Evil Eye… has come undone?"

Wilhelm parried the deadly blows that came from his cleavers, and with his own blow of silver, nicked a scratch across his opponent's massive body. The blue-skinned, bare-chested Eight Arms took half a step backwards before Wilhelm heard him mutter that in his solemn tone.

Wilhelm grasped what he'd meant by that from the corner of his eyes, causing him to powerfully gnash his teeth together.

Wilhelm: "…"

He could see the citizens of Picoutatte from the edge of his sight, confused by what they'd just been doing, utterly bewildered. They'd been made into a mob thanks to the power of the Evil Eye and had been bearing down on the Zergev Corps. They'd been freed from their spell now and gotten their senses back.

???: "Commander! Everyone's come back to their senses!"

As soon as his deputy commander, Conwood, shouted that, all the other group members also raised their swords and cried out cheers of joy. They then called out to the confused citizens and hurriedly started to take the necessary steps to usher them away from the battlefield.

Conwood: “Have at it, Wilhelm! Leave the surroundings to me!”

An imposing smile appeared across the Eight Arms Kurgan’s face as soon as he heard what Conwood had said.

Kurgan: “Bravo, what a fine soldier. Your soldier is really well trained.”

Wilhelm: “Actually my Deputy Commander’s the most unreliable of the bunch. He really needs to get his act together.”

Kurgan: “A fine jape. Even so, if the Evil Eye girl’s control of them has come undone with this, then that means…”

The Dragon’s roars poured down from the sky midway through Kurgan’s words. The three-headed Black Dragon that had settled in the heavens above had started to writhe and buck, as if something was clinging to its body.

There’s a few people on its back, fighting on top of a place like that. They’ve gotta be real idiots.

Wilhelm: “Guess I’ve got no choice but to help out those idiots, so you’d better just give up and die.”

Kurgan: “My apologies, but I must do the same thing as well. It’s not just your strong suit.”

Kurgan swung his drawn blades after they exchanged these rebuttals, thus recommencing their sword fight with a flick of his cleavers. Wilhelm kicked off from the ground, from the walls, and used the city in any way he could to lay down his attack. Kurgan countered that by swinging the four cleavers in his eight arms in a similar fashion that a storm would rage.

Wilhelm’s actions were like an adventurer who’d daringly challenged a tornado of death. He'd end up snatched away if the swirling torrents of wind snagged even a shred of his clothing, and duly turned into mincemeat.

On other hand, the ability the Eight Arms possessed in continuously dodging through his sword slashes without getting any serious wounds on his huge body was likewise of a supreme quality.

That's why he didn't get it, no matter how many times he thought about it. Why, why was this man siding with Stride?

Could it be because of the fighting spirit that blazes through his body in battle with the strong? That's too shallow, if that's the reason why. I'm not going to say that I understand his personality just from locking swords with him, but there's definitely something it's telling me.

The way the Eight Arms treats his sword isn't like some kind of half-assed swordsman.

Wilhelm: "Having said that, it doesn't seem likely that he's being manipulated by those rings either."

There was no hesitation or indecision in Kurgan's sword-art like in those who'd been following orders against their will. And in the first place, there was something about the way Stride and Kurgan interacted that was far from the ceremonial fanfare of a master-servant relationship.

The way he spoke candidly about Stride's attitude, the way he offered him advice, the way he was helping him out like this. Maybe the way he interacted with Stride was because—

Wilhelm: "—You two are like parent and child?"

Kurgan: "Yes, though not by blood."

Wilhelm launched a flurry of attacks at him that whirled around like a spinning top. Kurgan met that high-speed attack, scattering sparks everywhere as he gave his mutter of assent.

Kurgan and Stride's relationship was that of a parent and child who weren't related by blood—In other words, he was his foster parent.

Wilhelm: "I'm sorry but a bastard like you has no real talent for raising children."

Kurgan: "I do not disagree with you either. I hope you do not make the same mistakes I made, though alas, you may not end up seeing the face of your unborn child."

Wilhelm: "Whatever you say."

Wilhelm's flurry of slashes grew in intensity as he said this. Kurgan brought his cleavers down and continued to parry his blows, his eyes widening a bit in response; the fact of the matter was, a rust had grown in his Demon Cleavers.

That was a sign that Wilhelm's ongoing cascade of sword slashes were all aiming for the same place, with little deviation—And a split second later, the monstrous skill of the Sword Demon's blade finally shattered one of the Eight Arms' cleavers.

Eight arms and four cleavers, with this, the tide of battle he'd been contending shifted in one go.

Wilhelm brought his Holy Sword down and stepped forward to defeat him with a single blow—

Kurgan: "—Demon Cleavers."

Suddenly, a chill of the likes he'd never experienced before rose up across his entire body.

In front of him, Kurgan swung his eight arms out in different directions, and his three Demon Cleavers came bearing towards him with three separate trajectories. His empty hand had grabbed a hold of Wilhelm's sword blade and made use of it as a pivot.

Kurgan's grip strength was pitted against Wilhelm's strength to shake him off; and when Kurgan released it, destruction came bearing down on him from three different sides.

Kurgan: "Let's see if you're able to dodge this, Sword Demon."

If he pulled through this, he would win, but if he didn't, he would be defeated—Struck by that challenge, the Sword Demon clenched his teeth.

And let out a roar.

Wilhelm: "RHHHHHAAAAAAA!!."

—Death approached him at the same time from three sides.

5

—Let's recount an aside to the story.

The succession to the throne as Emperor of The Sacred Vollachia Empire is determined by quite harsh means.

The Emperor of the Vollachia Empire marries a great number of wives, and begets them with a great number of children in various places in the Empire. And then, the children who obtained the rights to inheritance compete to kill each other. The last one remaining then succeeds the Emperor.

The Empire's people must be strong—That was the way of the Vollachian Empire. The Emperor led the way in showing the Empire's Citizenry the way to live by. Thus, the Vollachian Emperor only came to be after they eradicated their own brothers and sisters.

—Stride Vollachia was likewise one of these children dragged into this inheritance conflict.

The sequence of events that led Kurgan to taking charge of a still young Stride weren't anything too complicated.

Ever since birth, Stride had been weak and frail of body leading his family to conclude that him succeeding the Emperor was impossible. They quickly proposed to offer the renunciation of his inheritance rights to another family, and Stride ended up being exchanged for a suitable recompense.

On the surface, the messenger that brought Stride along had said that he hoped that the child would grow up to be strong in mind and body under the Eight Arms But, it was obvious that in truth he was meant to be unable to endure Kurgan's harsh training, and in the process lose his life.

Bearing the name of Eight Arms, Kurgan had been granted an elevated position as the Empire's unparalleled hero. Still, even he had lost his aspirations in these times of languor, and he'd just accepted that role to pass the time. Or perhaps, it may have even been that he had a grudge towards that blood relative of the Vollachian Emperor, who'd put him in this position.

But, whatever the case may be, those thoughts didn't hold any sort of meaning.

—Kurgan's heart throbbed in excitement at the bottomless darkness lodged in the eyes of the child he'd agreed to take in, Stride.

His idle days had come to an end. His heart had throbbed as a premonition of the times that were to come, the times where he would again smell the choking scent of blood.

In fact, Stride grew to adulthood under Kurgan, and as a young man, in accordance with his duty as a successor, took care of the siblings he shared blood with one by one using various schemes, bringing himself ever nearer to the throne.

However, in contrast to his outstanding resourcefulness, Stride had an issue with the Emperor succession. Ever since he had once succumbed to a high fever, he had lost the ability to make children.

No matter how qualified he was to be the Emperor, he couldn't devote himself to one of the greatest duties, the prosperity of the Empire. Being infertile, Stride was unfit for the seat of Emperor.

That was probably why the Former Emperor had tried to poison his own son, Stride, in an attempt to rob him of his life.

For three days and three nights, Stride kept coughing up blood. For seven days and seven nights, he sported a terrible fever and verged between the boundary of life and death. Finally, after three months, having drifted between the vast oceans of reality and dreams, the poison left his body—

Stride: "—Listen, Kurgan. My venerable self saw the truth in the midst of my delirium. My venerable self saw the way the Observers are, seated in the heavens above, looking down upon us with scorn, toying with us as if we were mere pieces upon a board."

Stride was more thin and ragged than ever, he'd ended up like a walking corpse. However, the longing lodged in his eyes was no longer set on his once desired throne, thus Kurgan revised his own path.

Kurgan: "No matter how foolish the path trodden is, Stride is my son. I shan't follow the empire that orders death, and not life, upon mine son."

Even if no one else would, just he would love his lonely, foolish son, who wasn't able to even love anyone.

When his final moments came, this man was probably going to be scorched by the flames of loathing and fury, his remains were probably going to be made a mockery of by just about everyone, and they'd likely cruelly deny his quintessence.

He deserved that. He deserves that. I am not going to not stop that.

If that was the path he was going to take to the journey to the end, then they would walk along that path together.

Along with the demons of vengeance, the Twin Shura, who'd had their hometown burnt to the ground. Along with the Ashen Bride who cursed her blood after being shunned for her Evil Eye. And along with the now fallen hero, the Eight Arms, together they would see where the Destruction Wish arrived at.

—That was his own kind of love he could give to his foolish son, a Father, who they'd even called the War God.

6

Wilhelm: "…"

Faced with Death that had been unleashed at him from three sides at once, the Sword Demon's answer was decidedly simple.

If death unavoidable was coming for him, then he only had one yearning as a swordsman—To use his silvery steel to thrust death faster at him.

His sword sublimated to a might that went from super-speed to hyper-speed, to hyper-speed to the speed of god, until finally transcending the very concept of steel.

Upwards, leftwards, rightwards—He had no way of knowing what sort of feeling must have gone through the Eight Arms' heart the moment that he'd parried all three of his critical attacks head on.

Wilhelm: "…"

Wilhelm himself couldn't comprehend in the very moment how stunning of a feat that it was he'd accomplished. Perhaps his sword technique had rivalled the time when he'd defeated the Sword Saint Theresia at the ceremony to mark the end of the Civil War; in other words, the Absolute Sword that had reached the very pinnacle—

Kurgan: "—There was once a man who thoroughly mastered the sword."

Wilhelm: "…"

Kurgan: "That man's sword was beautiful, wild, serene, fierce and immensely strong."

It was a dream that many swordsmen in the world longed for.

If the longing for the uttermost sword power was envy for the Sword Saint, then the longing for the uttermost sword technique was called—

Kurgan: "—You've placed your foot down on the steps of the Heavenly Sword?"

Wilhelm: "…Cut the bullshit out. The hell would I know about the Heavenly Sword."

He spun his Holy Sword Astrea around in his hand and placed it back in its sheath. He then turned around, and before his eyes stood Kurgan bearing deep wounds from chest to abdomen.

He was bleeding heavily from his eight arms, and his three cleavers had rolled down to his feet.

Kurgan: “Magnificent.”

Blood spurted out from Kurgan’s lips straight after he said that. His massive body crumbled to its knees and fell forward with a loud thud.

Seeing that, Wilhelm breathed a heavy sigh of relief.

Wilhelm: “Finally. He was one hell of a tough bastard…”

???: “—Wilhelm!”

He didn’t feel anything like the triumphant afterglows of victory at the close of his spar to the death with this man. Nevertheless, Conwood, with his face burning red, had run over to him as he staved off the exhaustion that was weighing his body down.

Conwood: “You did it! You pulled through against Vollachia’s Eight Arms, you’re truly…”

Wilhelm: “Is this really the time to be saying this? The battle still isn’t over yet… What about the citizens?”

Conwood: “R-Right… I’m getting the people who are uninjured, or only have minor injuries to help out with taking the wounded out. Though we focused on being on the defensive, there’s still been a lot of victims.”

Wilhelm: “…I’m also worried as hell about Grimm and Roswaal who were whisked away. But above all…”

Wilhelm looked up at the sky. There’d been a change in the Black Dragon, which had before been circling around the Spire.

The three-headed Black Dragon was greedily devouring something, as if it were scrapping for it. It finished its ravenous meal and then started to fly up to the heavens. Everything would have worked out perfectly if it continued to fly up and vanished into the great beyond, but that was never going to happen.

The Black Dragon released three rays of heat in three different directions from its heads, burning the city. The city was overrun by its white light and the shrieks and cries of everyone who'd come back to their senses started to resound throughout.

Conwood: "The Dragon…!"

Wilhelm: "Seems like it can't stomach being summoned by that jerk… It'll only be a matter of time before the country is in ruin unless we stop it."

Standing in front of Conwood, whose face had turned pale, Wilhelm slowly pointed his feet towards where the Black Dragon was. Conwood cried out when he saw what he was about to do.

Conwood: "Wa-Wait, Wilhelm! Are you seriously going to fight it… a Dragon?"

Wilhelm: "Are you trying to tell me that slaying Dragons in the Dragon Kingdom is a bad idea?"

Conwood: "That's not what I meant! But like you're fighting a thing like that."

Conwood couldn't tell him "You can't." Wilhelm had turned around to look at him and his blue eyes hadn't let him say these words.

Wilhelm: "Conwood, get the citizens as well as our troops out of here. The messenger we sent should eventually bring us reinforcements. I'm gonna slay that lizard asshole using the full strength of the Kingdom."

Conwood: "…"

Wilhelm wasn't speaking about what he could or could not do. Since he'd said he was going to slay it, he actually would.

Thus, Conwood took a few moments to catch his breath and then nodded,

Conwood: “…Don’t you dare die without even seeing your kid’s face, Wilhelm.”

Wilhelm: “I’ll have you look for my wife as well. You don’t look like the sort of guy who can fight whilst looking for a girl.”

Wilhelm left only those words behind before he sprinted off.

He kicked off from the desolate street, ran up the wall of a building that had been burnt by the flames, climbed over its burnt rooftop and swung his Holy Sword at the Black Dragon perched in the twilight sky.

Wilhelm: “HYYAAAAAAAAAAAAAA—!”

At the wings of the Black Dragon, which had never considered that such a puny being would have put up a fight against it. The silver beam of the Sword Demon pierced into its eerily beautiful wings as if it were being sucked in.

7

—He ran, first at a steady pace, then at a hurried pace, and finally at full sprint.

Grimm Fauzen desperately kept on running straight through the city that had turned into a battlefield.

Rays of heat had aimlessly ripped through the city. The city had been burnt by the white beams of light that had come fired from different directions, enveloping it in bright red flame. It had turned into a hell, where even taking a breath would scorch his lungs.

The setting sun in the sky, along with the flicker of the dazzling flames on the ground, were each trying to scorch the world in red.

Cries of anger filled the sky, sorrowed screams swept through the ground, all the while as Grimm ran towards the sounds of echoing steel.

Grimm: “‘~~ilhelm~~…!”

The battle that was going on overhead had long transcended what humans could fathom.

How do you take on a Dragon that has wings, is several times larger than yourself, has scales stronger than steel, and is a being that has marked its status as a creature of myth. How do you even get the guts to try and fight something like that?

How could such a puny human being take on such a mighty creature alone?

Who would be able to stop themselves from cowering in fear and dropping their swords? Who would be able to stop themselves from shrinking back with tears in their eyes?

—Nevertheless Grimm pressed on. He couldn’t fight alone in a place like this.

Grimm: “…~~H̀a̤n̈̃ǵ-ón̸~~.”

I’m on my way. Setting out, right this second. Without fail, I’ll reach you.

—I won’t let you fight alone. Ever.

Wilhelm: “HYAAAAAAAAA—!”

He swung his Holy Sword out and parried away, with all the strength he could muster, the Dragon’s Claws that had come scything towards him. Both of his shoulders creaked as he received the impact, some of his muscles ruptured, and it felt like he’d chipped some of his molars from clenching them so hard.

Fragile. I’m shoddier than ever. My sword was too shoddy right now.

I need to recall my finale with Kurgan. The moment where I avoided that guy's blow of certain death, and get as close to it as I can. Or—get close to the levels that my sword technique was at when I snatched Theresia away from the Sword God.

The Black Dragon: "KRAAAAAAAAUGH."

The Dragon let out a thunderous roar, the sheer strength of its vibration buffeted Wilhelm who'd placed his feet on the tower. He barely dodged its tail, which had come swinging down straight at him, and he braced himself through the aftershock that blew up part of the tower rooftop, before then running back up its tail onto its back again.

Wilhelm: "GYHAAAAAAAAA—!!"

He stabbed his sword into the tip of its tail and ran through, blood spurting out from it as if it were chasing him. It looked like even Dragons bled red. After all, it was a living creature, he could probably kill it if he pierced its heart.

Wilhelm: "'Cause otherwise it'd be one huge pain in the ass to kill it by cutting off its heads!"

The Black Dragon: "KRAAAAAAAAUGH."

One of its three heads bared its fangs at Wilhelm when he'd let out his angry shout on its back. If it lay its teeth on him, it'd crunch him up into tiny pieces, thus if he stopped moving, his life would be immediately forfeit.

Wilhelm brought his sword towards its looming fangs, flicked them away and lunged again towards its next movement. —One of its other heads aimed for him from a different angle so to prevent his strike. Smelling the feeling of death rushing towards him from behind, he braced his arms with strength. Yet, his aim was still at the Dragon's head in front of him.

The attack coming at him from behind didn't bother him. Because—

Wilhelm: "—GRIMM!!"

Grimm: “H~~GYAAAAAA—~~!!”

Responding to his war buddy’s call, Grimm clambered onto the Dragon’s back and caught its fangs with his greatshield. Yet, it wasn’t the sort of enemy that could be opposed by the physical strength of man. When he received its blow, one of his knees crumpled at the impact and broke with a shrill crunch. He bit down his screams.

Grimm: “W~~ILHELM~~!!”

Responding to his war buddy’s call, Wilhelm spun around on the Dragon’s back and jabbed his Holy Sword through its fangs. He slid it through towards its face and sliced up and down, tearing through its maw. Some of the Dragon’s fangs were torn away by the sheer force and fresh blood spurted out, caking Wilhelm in even more.

The Black Dragon “GRAAAAAAAAUUUUUUGH.”

Writhing about in the agony of having one of its faces torn through, the Black Dragon corkscrewed around in the sky. Both Wilhelm and Grimm were bucked off into mid-air from being swung about by its momentum.

There was nothing Grimm could do being crumpled over clutching his knee, unable to stand properly. Wilhelm kicked off against a wall, forced his way over to him and grabbed him by the arm, both of them just barely managing to tumble down onto the top of a different building.

Wilhelm: “Ghaa! Shit… What a goddamn reckless idiot you are…!”

Grimm: “A~~haha~~…A~~s if you can talk~~.”

The corners of Wilhelm’s mouth couldn’t help but curve up into a smile after Grimm had chewed him out in his grazed voice. Then he looked up overhead, at the Black Dragon roaring in anger.

Wilhelm narrowed his blue eyes and tch’ed.

Wilhelm: “What a stubborn son of a bitch.”

Grimm: "—?"

A trace of confusion flitted across Grimm's pained expression when he heard what Wilhelm had muttered. Wilhelm breathed out a short sigh in response, and thrust his beloved sword up towards the Black Dragon in the sky,

Wilhelm: "Look at the way it fights, it's goddamn awful. Do Dragons really fight like that? The way they're going about it is like an amateur who hasn't got a clue how to."

Grimm: "~~Then~~…"

Wilhelm: "It's no Dragon. —It's that bastard Stride."

Grimm grew speechless at Wilhelm's declaration. His reaction was a natural one. Even Wilhelm hadn't said it as a statement with clear basis, yet, Grimm's intuition was screaming at him, telling him it was like that.

Stride's manner of evil had been to bind other's souls with his curse-rings and make them into his puppets. So, in the last of the last, that man had gotten his hands on the biggest, baddest puppet of the lot.

Wilhelm: "In the worst case we can stop it if we kill its puppetmaster, Stride, but…"

Grimm: "…~~That's impossible~~… ~~He's dead~~."

Wilhelm: "—. That's what I thought."

Wilhelm gritted his teeth in response. In exchange for his own life, Stride had taken away the means to stop the Black Dragon from the Kingdom. Then did this mean that even at the very end, the situation was still in the palms of that man's hands?

Wilhelm: "…"

Wilhelm turned around. Grimm had collapsed onto his back, his right knee was in a sorry state; it was going to be impossible for him to continue fighting. It was going to take time before the reinforcements arrived, and Bordeaux being fighting fit was also way off. Roswaal was probably going to have a tough time fighting too if they didn't show up.

There was no way she would prioritize her own safety in a situation like this. That was the kind of woman she was.

—How much am I going to be able to do alone?

Grimm: "…~~Wilhelm.~~"

Grimm spoke up from his side.

Wilhelm once again looked at him and then gulped. That look on his face.

Grimm: "~~You are not alone.~~"

An answer came, through his words which were full of belief and conviction.

—Voices began to rise up from everywhere around the burning city.

Wilhelm: "…"

Wilhelm lifted his head up at the sound of those voices, and his eyes swung wide open. From everywhere around the City of Picoutatte, people were raising their voices, lifting their swords up and glaring at the Black Dragon in the aether.

They'd had their hearts broken by the Black Dragon's baying, they'd had their streets scorched by its fiery breath, and they'd sunk to their knees; nothing but that, and yet, like Wilhelm who'd been fighting alone, they raised their voices as one.

And, standing next to the standard-bearer, Conwood, with the Zergev Corps who were leading this rousing cry was—

Wilhelm: "—Theresia."

There, propped up by Carol right beside her, was Theresia's figure with her red hair swaying in the searing breeze.

His pregnant wife stood there majestically at the head of the most valiant men in the Kingdom, her chest held out proudly. Their hearts were deeply stirred by her voice, and their shattered souls roused once more. Now, the people on the streets rose up.

Theresia: "—Wilhelm."

Standing at their head, Theresia's lips stirred as she gazed at the frozen in place Wilhelm. Only Wilhelm knew right away that she'd called out to him.

She wasn't carrying a sword, and had remained a Mother, yet she was still inspiring everyone as the Sword Saint.

—Man, what an amazing wife I've got.

The Black Dragon: "KRUUUUUUUARGH."

Not a single person had given in. Not a single person had yielded. Not a single person had turned their gaze to the ground.

Their will was made directly known to the Black Dragon in the sky; it forgot its pain and trembled in anger. Then, its three heads began to build up its fiery breath again, preparing itself to release a horrific amount of heat to the ground. —But in an instant,

Wilhelm: "WHAT THE HELL ARE YOU DOING TO MY WOMAN."

For one of its heads, he stabbed his Holy Sword through the bottom of its maw, stopping it from releasing its fiery breath.

For another of its heads, he slammed the greatshield down its maw, making it so that its scorching heat exploded within its throat.

For the final head, he grabbed its maw that had been cut up, and twisted it around so that it released its fiery breath at its own wings.

The Black Dragon: "GRAAAAAAAAAAAAAAGH."

There was an explosion mid-air, and the Black Dragon let out a roar as it fell down to the top of the tower. The Sword Demon began to fall down to the ground at the same time as that, with half of his body covered in flames.

Wilhelm continued to drop head-first down to earth, having greatly wounded the Black Dragon. At this rate, he was going to fall to his death. Yet, below him was—

???: "—You have no idea how many times you'd have died without me around. You absolute dumbass."

Wilhelm was caught by a pair of thick, muscular arms. He managed to force his eyes open amidst his pain, and he could see a man there giving him a resolute grin—Bordeaux.

Wilhelm gave him a wry smile in return.

Wilhelm: "You're the one who almost died, just how goddamn tough are ya?!"

Bordeaux: "…As a matter of fact, I was woken up by a voice that I've dearly missed in my dreams."

Wilhelm: "…"

Bordeaux: ""This is no time to be sleeping, Young Lord", he told me. Like whoa, I was lucky to wake up."

Wilhelm closed his eyes in response to what he'd said. A voice that he could no longer hear, the symbol of the regrets he had carried, manifested by his entrancement by the Evil Eye. He didn't think that the product of his delusion could have affected reality.

But if it weren't for that sort of miracle, he wouldn't have been alive here today, that's for sure.

Bordeaux: "You hung in there admirably. This battle is your victory."

Wilhelm: "Don't be so hasty, you dolt. It's not like the Dragon is dead yet."

Wilhelm clambered out of Bordeaux's arms and said that as he panted for breath. However, Bordeaux shook his head at what he'd said.

Bordeaux: "Nope, wrong. The battle has ended. —His Majesty has stirred."

Wilhelm: "…His Majesty, Gionis?"

Hearing those unexpected words, Wilhelm furrowed his brows in doubt.

The King of Lugunica, Gionis Lugunica—He was a good natured person, on that point there was no need to talk about the innate goodness of his character, but Wilhelm couldn't see how he was going to be the deciding factor in this battle.

It's not like he'd be grabbing a sword and rushing over to the battlefield to try and fight the Dragon himself—

Wilhelm: "…"

And right at that moment, Wilhelm's breath caught. The reason why had been surprise, and the cause behind his surprise had been his own actions.

Wilhelm had kneeled down, without him even realizing that he'd done so, and bowed his head.

Looking around, Bordeaux who had been standing next to him was acting the same way. And other than him, he knew in his bones that everyone else was acting the same way. —The city had plunged into silence.

The people's voices who'd risen so bravely to quell the roars of the Black Dragon had disappeared. Everyone had ceased to speak, and bowed their heads down to that Being

Because—

???: "—In accordance with the covenant of antiquity, for the descendants of the Lion King, I hath hastened to thee with mine wings at thy service."

Because of the arrival of the blue Divine Dragon who truly ruled the heavens above, with the blood red setting sun at its back.

Wilhelm: "…"

Faced with its overwhelming presence, its sense of awe that made every instinct in you want to prostrate yourself in front of them, its tone of voice that made it impossible for you to even think about going against it, and the shock it brought, as if it were whispering directly to your soul, every single soul in the city kneeled.

Thoughts were dyed in white, voices froze in surprise, and the senses in their bodies stopped working.

Even so, a name, a name everyone in the Kingdom knew, fear towards The Absolute, floated to everyone's minds.

The noble being who had made the covenant with the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica, truly a being that was a true Dragon—

Volcanica: I, am Volcanica. I hath hearkened to the appeal of the blood of mine old friend, and so manifested here

The Divine Dragon Volcanica had descended down with its wings at their service, because of that, the situation was already decided.

"CRASH BANG THUD CRASH."

On the battlefield where everyone remained kneeling out of reverence, sounds of destruction crushed the world ruled by tranquility into savagery. Those sounds were from the three-headed Black Dragon raising its enormous body from the top of the Spire and rending down its stone tower completely.

Even the Black Dragon was awestruck. It feared the unfightable being. How come it looked so small now?

Compared to the Divine Dragon that had descended down to them, the Black Dragon's being was so frail and small to the point that it looked pitiful.

The Black Dragon: "KRAAAAAAAUGH."

It was as clear as day to anyone that there was a massive gulf in strength between them.

There was no way that the Black Dragon's instincts couldn't understand it's hopeless position. Yet the Black Dragon didn't give in, a will to fight was lodged in all of its eyes on its three heads, and it unfurled its wings at the Divine Dragon.

It let out a roar. A roar that resounded throughout Picoutatte's blood red sky.

—Had it been an illusion of Wilhelm's, or had its cry been filled with jubilation?

Volcanica: Valgren, thou art a pitiful child. Hath thou fallen into wickedness, burnt by thine undue hatred?

Volcanica's voice was full of only pity that stirred their hearts.

Volcanica was a Dragon in the true sense of the word, with pale blue glittering scales across his entire body and a massive body that was several times larger than Valgren, the Black Dragon that Volcanica had called by that name.

He had intelligent eyes, a beyond-human intellect that allowed him to comprehend their speech and vast amounts of Mana cladding his entire body—The sky twisted and turned, the flames on the ground were cleansed, and the world which should have burned began to heal.

—No, it didn't just stop just at that.

Wilhelm: "There's no way…"

Wilhelm realized that every single wound he'd sustained on the battlefield had been cured. Bordeaux next to him, and Grimm on the top of the building, peeled their eyes wide open seeing his healed wounds.

It seemed that the Divine Dragon's grace had rained down on the city. Everyone who had been wounded, or had been on the brink between life and death had been healed. They looked up at the heavens at the miracle that had arisen.

This was a miracle that the Dragon had brought them, the Dragon that they had said had abandoned the covenant. Everyone had been convinced that the Dragon would never have come to them in the Kingdom's predicament—

Volcanica: It shalt be better for thee to be at rest. Thou hath been twisted into what thou art now, mine brethren.

Valgren: "KRAAAAAUGH."

The Black Dragon replied with a grating roar hearing Volcanica's voice which was full of mercy. The Black Dragon Valgren, whose heads had been gravely wounded by the attacks of the Sword Demon, looked up to the heavens with all of its heads and took a deep breath, preparing itself to let loose its fire.

Staring at it with sorrowful eyes, the Divine Dragon once again flapped its wings, and descended to the same height as the Black Dragon—Would the Black Dragon even have noticed that it had done so out of consideration, to make sure that its own breath wouldn't scorch the earth?

Valgren: "KRAAAAAAAAARGH."

Either way, no one knew the answer to that.

The Black Dragon let out a roar, and let loose three beams of white light from each of its mouths. The rays of heat coalesced and became one, firing straight towards Volcanica.

In front of them, Volcanica's maw opened, and—

Volcanica:—

—The Divine Dragon filled the sky with a blue light and dispersed it without paying any heed to mounting a defense against the looming white light.

The breath of the Divine Dragon went straight forward, and swallowed the body of the Black Dragon up, without causing any damage to anything else en route to it. It hadn't been a cruel death, rather, the Black Dragon had been transformed into dust with a power that felt appropriate to be Purification

The Black Dragon's existence, which had been trapped in madness, and forced to do other's bidding against its will, was annihilated by the breath of the Divine Dragon.

Wilhelm: "…"

The immensely divine light cleared up, and the next moment, the Black Dragon's figure was nowhere to be seen.

The Dragon's overwhelming strength, along with the vow it had abided by in accordance with the Covenant, had wiped out the threat that had assailed the city of Picoutatte.

Stride Vollachia was dead. All those who had supported him had fallen. And finally, the Black Dragon he'd summoned had also been destroyed by the Divine Dragon's assistance.

???: "…We won."

He heard someone say that in a hoarse voice.

Starting with that voice, people looked at each other to make sure that both their, and their companion's lives were still there. Then shouts, shouts of exultation, started to fill the streets.

"Cheers."

Picking himself up, Wilhelm likewise looked at Bordeaux next to him, and Bordeaux returned his gaze. Rushing down from the building he was on, Grimm, whose broken leg had been healed, emerged onto the ground as well.

And, making their way over to Wilhelm and the others was—

???: "—Wilhelm!"

A high-pitched voice rang out, making him turn around. Jogging through the street directly towards him was a lovely woman with long swaying red hair, with an anxious look on her face.

She wanted to make sure her husband was okay as quickly as possible. With eyes that conceived such intention, Theresia made her way over to Wilhelm—But her feet had gotten caught on something and she was about to fall over.

Wilhelm rushed over to her and kept her up, giving her a firm embrace.

Theresia: “Wilh…”

Wilhelm: “…”

Wilhelm didn’t need to say anything. All he did was press his lips against hers.

She was here, she was definitely warm, both of them were safe, and the battle was over.

He didn’t need anything more right now.

—Here, the Subjugation of the Evil Dragon came to a close, and Stride Vollachia’s nightmare ended.

—And so, the tale of the Sword Demon Battle Ballad only has the final act remaining.

Curtain’s Close

1

—It was raining on the day the funeral was held.

???: “I bet she would have been the type to say “This is the right weather for a funeral”.”

Conwood, who really didn’t suit his formal dress of a Knight, looked up at the sky as he said that.

Wilhelm nodded and said “Yeah for sure” in reply to his joking words. Though it hadn’t just been him who’d replied like that, everyone else who’d heard him had also raised their voices in agreement and accord.

She’d been the kind of woman who’d liked to say things that could get on people’s nerves. After knowing her for so long, everyone had had at least one experience of getting fed up with her attitude.

That’s why the men in attendance could easily share what they felt about her. Even the white bouquet of flowers Conwood had offered gave off an impression like it didn’t suit this gruff man.

—More than ten days had passed since the Subjugation of the Evil Dragon had taken place in the Commercial City of Picouatte.

The shocking truth of the Black Dragon’s appearance had shook the nation to the core and made everyone aware of the immense power of the Dragon. Nevertheless, the repair-works of the heavily damaged city had slowly begun, and everyone’s minds gradually turned back to their daily life.

People couldn’t stop moving on ahead, regardless of what happened.

They would have to move on forward with the passage of time, holding their grief and fear.

Therefore, the national funeral to commemorate the victims of the incident, held at the King's decree, was likewise accepted by everyone as a necessary rite to keep moving on.

The evil clutches of the Destruction Wish Stride Vollachia had spread all throughout the Kingdom, though most notably with the turmoil caused by the Black Dragon he'd summoned in Picoutatte. They'd initially presumed that the number of casualties in the city caused by the Dragon's onslaught were going to be massive.

However, a later investigation revealed that the number had been less than a third of what they'd expected, a miraculous figure according to everyone involved—at least compared to the scale of the incident.

Behind that miracle was the immeasurable grace of the Divine Dragon who'd been instrumental at getting the situation back under control.

The Divine Dragon Volcanica had appeared to save the Kingdom from ruin in accordance with the covenant. It had defeated the crazed Black Dragon, the Three-Headed Valgren, and brought those on the battlefield the miracle of healing. Its immense power had even saved the lives of those who'd been on the brink of death.

As a result, the lives of many of those who'd been in the city had been saved by its miracle. This was one of the reasons why the number of casualties had been far fewer than originally predicted.

Of course, there were still casualties despite that. The Divine Dragon's miracle had brought them healing, but it couldn't bring back the lives that had been lost. —Even the Dragon couldn't undo death.

Those who'd lost their close ones exercised their rights to grieve their death and curse their absurd fate. Their profound sadness could be seen clearly pretty much everywhere across the state funeral.

Losing a loved one was always an excruciating feeling, like that of being cut apart in a place where blades couldn't reach. That pain made no distinction between adults and children, bringing everyone to their knees equally.

That reason alone made the attitude of the person standing in front of Wilhelm worthy of deep admiration.

???: “—You must be Wilhelm-sama. My Mother has told me a lot about you.”

A young child who wasn’t even ten years old yet said this to him, giving him a deep bow.

He had shoulder-length indigo hair, a well-proportioned face that gave an inkling towards his future good looks, and he was wearing formalwear over his slender, prepubescent body. He was gazing straight at Wilhelm with his eyes of blue and yellow.

It felt to Wilhelm like it’d be the greatest sort of insult to his benefactor if he didn’t meet that gaze properly.

Therefore Wilhelm corrected his posture and received the boy with the courtesy of a Knight of the Kingdom.

Wilhelm: “I am a Knight of the Kingdom, Wilhelm van Astrea. Your Honored Mother helped me out so much. I am incredibly indebted to her. That’s why…”

Wilhelm trailed his words off there and then closed his eyes once again. He gritted his teeth, trying to bite down the waves of emotion swirling around his chest. He opened his eyes again and once again looked at the boy’s face.

He looked for his war-buddy’s—Roswaal J Mathers’ features in his childish face.

So that he could tell her son his condolences—for the friend he’d lost in the battle.

Wilhelm: “I won’t ever get the chance again to tell this to your Honored Mother, but thank you. Truly, you’ve done so much for me. I want to repay that favour. If you ever find yourself in any kind of trouble, please let me know.”

Wilhelm kneeled down as he said this. He removed his beloved sword from his sheath and laid it down at his own feet. Then—

Wilhelm: “—I will without fail, help you out.”

Wilhelm turned towards the young boy, Karl Mathers, and vowed this, giving him a Knight’s most respectful bow.

A great number of people were crowded in the place they were holding the national funeral at, they’d been in the middle of their various conversations. Naturally Wilhelm’s respectful bow had grabbed their attention. But perhaps the biggest factor why it had grabbed their attention was the solemn atmosphere drawn out between them rather than the specialness of the act.

Wilhelm’s respectful bow had been beautiful, as crystalline as a ceremonial sword itself.

He didn’t care about the gazes from those around him. All that mattered to him was his comportment towards the boy in front of him.

He wouldn’t forget the debt of gratitude he owed him. His vow as a Knight was absolute. Therefore, no matter how many trials and tribulations would come, he’d always make sure to fulfill his vow.

Karl: “…”

Karl kept his silence faced with Wilhelm’s respectful bow. But his expression showed neither surprise or bewilderment. All that was there was a solemn emotion.

Eventually that emotion silently melted away, and,

Karl: “…Am I hearing this right, the exalted Sword Demon can speak to people in a manner like this; I’m sure Mom would’ve been surprised by that as well.”

Wilhelm lifted his head up hearing his somewhat joking tone of voice, and he gasped.

He’d been surprised by the expression that had appeared on the boy's face. His lips had loosened into a forlorn frown, as if he were looking at someone he loved. The look on his face really did look a lot like his mother's.

Karl: "I bet Mom would get in a huff and stamp her feet in frustration if I told her that. Because from what I've heard, Mom seems to have really been attached to you, Wilhelm-sama."

Wilhelm: "…I'm kinda scared to ask you what sort of stories she's been telling you."

Karl: "Don't worry. I'm not going to tell anyone else."

The boy placed a finger against his lips and looked at Wilhelm from only his blue eye. Wilhelm let out a sigh, then he slowly got up and brushed off his knees.

He could really sense the influence Roswaal had had on Karl from the reply he'd given him right now. He felt like she was definitely breathing inside of him, yet despite the joy it brought him, his head grew heavy.

Wilhelm: "Karl-Dono… Wait, no, won't you take on the family name when you succeed as the new head?"

Karl: "Yeah, I will eventually. But not right now. I'm lacking in just about everything currently, so only after I make up for this lack will I be able to call myself Roswaal. Until then, please call me Karl as you've been doing."

The name Roswaal, head of House Mathers, had been passed down for generations. It wasn't an unusual custom for old houses to do this, but it didn't sit well with Wilhelm that inheriting it didn't discriminate between male or female. That was the sort of thing he'd thought when he'd first heard about the name from Roswaal.

Wilhelm: "Your Honored Mother's original name was Julia, wasn't it? I first found out about it from her epitaph."

Karl: "It's an unspoken agreement for us to hide our former names after we change them. Though you know, sometimes you might be able to tell a spouse, or a very close friend about it."

Wilhelm: “I getcha.”

Wilhelm gave a quick nod of his head. He’d known her for five years. He couldn’t for one second say that they’d had the sort of friendship where they always got on with each other, but in those years, she’d never once mentioned her real name. She’d probably never thought about revealing it to him. Even so, that didn’t exactly mean that it was proof that their friendship had been a shallow one.

Because foremostly—

Wilhelm: “It’s too late for such a girly name like Julia right now. Your Honored Mother will always be Roswaal for me.”

Karl: “I’m sure Mom felt that way too, which must be why she didn’t tell you.”

Wilhelm agreed with what Karl had answered with. He felt in awe at the same time. Was he really talking to a child who wasn’t even ten years old yet? He was speaking for what his Mother had felt without so much as a trace of hesitation.

It was exactly as if he was speaking word for word for Roswaal herself.

Karl: “I’ll definitely keep in mind what you said before. Someday, somewhere, I may borrow the help you offered me, Wilhelm-sama. And when that happens…”

Wilhelm: “I will come to you, whatever the problem may be. —A Knight’s vow is true.”

Karl: “…Mom sure was blessed. To be adored this strongly by people.”

Karl looked down, an awfully grown-up look adorned his face as he muttered that. But his expression changed in the blink of an eye, and the boy corrected his posture and said, “Then.”

Karl: “I hope you’ll take the chance to get in touch again after things at home settle down. My Butler keeps looking towards me, like he’s telling me that it’s time to go greet the others.”

Wilhelm: “Your Butler…”

Behind Karl, who’d given him a wry smile, was the figure of a young man in his Butler’s uniform loitering near them. Wilhelm gave him a drawn out, elegant bow as soon as he spotted him.

That figure was Clind’s, the Butler Roswaal had introduced him to a while ago. His placid, good-looking face betrayed no emotion, and Wilhelm couldn’t read how he’d reacted at heart to his Mistress’ death.

Nevertheless, he knew from his attitude that he would still carry out his duty to serve the Mathers Family.

Karl: “Right now I’m still dependent on Clind, but one day I’ll bear the responsibilities for my house. Thus, I hope you’ll continue to keep in touch with us Mathers.”

Karl bowed his head as he said so, and then started to walk over to Clind. Staring at his small figure, Wilhelm’s breath caught for a moment and his lips quivered in hesitation.

But he quickly ridded himself of that hesitation.

Wilhelm: “Karl Mathers-dono.”

Karl stopped in his tracks, and then turned around. Wilhelm continued his words.

Wilhelm: “Thank you. Both you, and your Honored Mother, thank you. —I’m much obliged. For everything you’ve done.”

Karl: “…”

Wilhelm spoke to him, not with humbled words, or with the decorum of a Knight.

Though they looked like words that had been rehashed from before, it wasn’t like that. They were words that he’d conveyed downright honestly.

Karl’s eyes had widened in surprise for a moment when he’d received them—

Karl: "—Take care that you don't get hurt, so that you live a long life."

This time he turned around and took his leave, after having left him those awfully mature words.

2

???: "Karl-sama sure does have a strange vibe to him."

Carol had seen that their conversation had ended and came over to him to say that.

She wasn't wearing her usual striking formal garb of a Knight. She was wearing a black dress with a white flower on her chest, one that was typically worn by women at funerals.

Wilhelm felt that although she was the kind of woman who'd stubbornly put her femininity on the backburner, it was a good change of pace.

—Roswaal's death had likely played a big part in regards to her change of mind.

Even Wilhelm could tell that they'd been very close friends.

Carol: "Wilhelm?"

Carol stared at Wilhelm, who'd sunk in silence thinking about that, with a puzzled look in her eyes. He shook his head at her gaze, and said "Ah no,."

Wilhelm: "It's nothing… You're right, he's a bit strange. I doubt I could have conducted myself that well when I was around his age. He's rather elegant."

Carol: "Yeah. Mathers-sama has educated him well. An education worthy of respect."

She stared off in the distance, to where Karl was walking away, and her eyes teared up slightly. Pretending he hadn't seen that emotion, Wilhelm started to speak again with a "Hey,."

Wilhelm: "Were you able to talk to him about Roswaal?"

Carol: "—. I told him "Your Mother died to protect me." I'd been prepared for him to curse at me and hate me, but…"

Carol paused for a moment, and her lips loosened into an awfully sad smile.

Carol: "Karl-sama didn't blame me. On the contrary, he placed his hand on my shoulder as I looked down in shame and told me, "Mom would be delighted from the bottom of her heart that you're safe"… It's gonna make burst into tears."

Wilhelm: "…Then what's there to smile about."

Carol had been dragged into Stride's schemes and went through indescribable suffering. Amongst that, she'd lost her close friend and had been forced to wield her sword against her patron's family.

The wounds consuming her, in her heart, were surely deeper than Wilhelm could ever imagine.

Even so, she wasn't going to be crippled by them. She had Wilhelm's wife, who really cared for her with how long they'd known each other for, as well as—

Wilhelm: "Right, you've got someone else to go and shed tears to. You can go to Grimm… to your husband."

Carol: "Grimm will give me all the comfort I need after. Right now, I just wanted to talk to you… Sir."

She shook away the tears that had started to well up in her eyes, then the type of smile she had on her face changed. It had been a forlorn one, but now it had changed into a warm one. Seeing that, Wilhelm gave a deep sigh.

He placed his hand on his forehead. It'd really been something he'd never heard her say before.

Wilhelm: “The heck is up with you calling me Sir. What kind of a joke is this?”

Carol: “It’s not like I want to either, but you need to be aware of it… With the death of Bertol-sama, the position of head of the Astrea House has passed to its successor. Theresia-sama’s brothers are all deceased.”

Wilhelm: “So the mantle’s passed to me, since I’m Theresia’s spouse? Are you for real…”

He cocked his head in puzzlement at Carol’s words before looking up at the sky from outside of the building they were in.

Was the drizzle pouring down onto the ground from the wisps of cloud the sky’s tears expressing its condolences for the victims, or was it someone mourning their deaths, even up there? It’s not like he was going to get an answer to that from the rainy sky.

—The Kingdom of Lugunica’s national funeral somberly continued. As if to affirm the boundaries between the dead and the living.

3

The room had been arranged a little too precautiously to be called a guest room.

In buildings, an architect’s sense of aesthetic tends to be present throughout its overall design philosophy. The larger and more expensive the building was, the more pronounced it was. The mansions which noble families and the like lived in were prime examples of that.

That’s why this one room was something that clashed heavily with the architect’s sense of aesthetic, and contradicted their original design philosophy.

Its beautiful stone walls were reinforced with crude iron bars, all of its paintings and ornaments that had been meticulously arranged were unsparingly removed, the necessary furnishings were all bolted to the walls or the floor, and to top it all off, men with a grim air to them were standing guard outside. The tense feeling drifting in the air was a mark of their professionalism, you could easily call this an iron-walled stronghold, definitely worthy of the words “High-Security” and “High-Alert”.

???: “But, when things are lacking, things are lacking, even with all these arrangements. Hmm, ‘tis such a pity that I’m so bereft of power.”

Miklotov sat himself down on a sofa in this iron-walled guest room, looking rather imposing. He’d been acclaimed as a wise man, involved as a key figure of the Kingdom since a young age. But, at the end of the day, he was a Civil Servant who had no talent with the sword. If his opponent were to resort to violence, he’d have his life snatched away without being able to put up much of a fight.

His private guard waiting outside the room were probably anxious, fearing that, but—

Miklotov: “—I’d say all of these precautions are unnecessary. Don’t you think so?”

???: “You’re asking that to me…? Don’t push your luck, boy.”

The person sitting in front of Miklotov replied to his casual tone with displeasure. He was a man with a large build, like, his body was, without exaggeration, huge. He was sitting directly on the floor rather than a sofa.

Even so, the reason why their eyes had locked without him needing to look down was because his opponent was from the Giant tribe. —He was the sort of person he couldn’t reveal the existence of.

His stocky limbs and torso were all thick enough to match, and his deep voice rumbled like a quake. The clear sense of hostility in his voice though seemed to be far more of a threat than a quake.

Despite being faced with such strong malice, Miklotov kept the composed look on his face.

It was only natural. There was no need for him to worry himself sick keeping his guards up when he didn’t need to.

Miklotov: “Even if you harm me, you wouldn’t be able to do anything after. You’re the one who can’t act recklessly.”

The Giant: “Quit with the sarcasm. It’s the result of my recklessness that led me here. No?”

Miklotov: “If we rephrase it to say that depending on your last resort as a result of a stalemate is to be reckless, then no I don’t think so. You had a plan B, you had something else up your sleeve… And this time around, we were saved by it.”

Miklotov cast his gaze down and let a modicum of gratitude trickle into his words. His opponent frowned in annoyance as soon as he sensed that and let out an awfully loud tch.

His unfriendly attitude caused Miklotov to smile wryly.

Miklotov: “I’d doubted His Majesty Gionis’ thinking, like I always do, back when he entrusted me with you.”

The Giant: “That’s pretty reasonable I reckon. That geezer’s touched in the head. But he convinced me as well. If that blundering fool’s head is like that, then it stands to reason that his limbs are also moving on their own.”

Miklotov: “…Be it for better or worse, His Majesty is a fine, upstanding gentleman.”

Miklotov pictured his liege’s good-natured smiling face and then slowly shook his head. Then he turned back to face the Giant again.

Miklotov: “But it still surprises me, even now. You should have hated the Kingdom, along with us humans. So why did you help us out?”

The Giant: “There’s no past tense here, I hate you. I still hate all you cunts. Never have I let the fire in my heart that makes me want to exterminate every single one of you go out.”

Miklotov held his tongue, having been struck by his words of clear hatred.

His flames of loathing were like burning lava, yet bitingly cold. However, that cold anger of his quickly vanished from his eyes.

The Giant: “But I don’t like the way they were going about it. There was no distinguishing people with what they did, even my brethren would have died. That’s not remotely what I want. —That’s the only reason why I helped you out.”

Miklotov “Hmmm… I see, I get you.”

Miklotov sensed that their discussion was coming to an end, and so replied in a dismissive tone. That, and it wouldn’t be a good idea to prolong his stay and further incur his displeasure. That was it for today.

Miklotov: “Oh, that’s right, I almost forgot.”

Miklotov, who’d gotten himself off of his backside, called out to the Giant before he left the room. The Giant glanced towards him with indifference in his eyes. Miklotov nodded at him, and said,

Miklotov “I’m not saying this to win you over, but do you have any discomforts? I’d like to accommodate you as much as possible, as thanks for what you did.”

The Giant: “…”

His eyes, which had been full of indifference, were now wide open in response to his words. Miklotov knew that he’d been stunned for a moment.

Then, a split second later—

The Giant: “—Gh, hah, haha, hahahaa! Did you say discomforts?! He said discomforts, to me!”

The man opened his mouth and let out a booming laugh.

He then held up his arms—showing him the thick chains that kept him bound to the floor, clattering them about.

The Giant: “If it’s discomfort we’re talking about, I’ve been feeling it ever since I was born. My heart has never, not even once, known what it's like to be free. It makes me laugh that you're asking about whether I, of all people, is in discomfort."

Miklotov: "…"

The Giant: "Take a good look at me now, Kingdom of Lugunica. I haven't thrown anything away yet. Someday, when these chains are snapped to pieces, you will realize. —You will realize just who it is who ought to be truly chained."

Miklotov was scorched by his emotional outburst as well as the look of fury in his eyes. He regretted that he'd said something so careless. At the same time, it felt like he was underestimating the flames of anger that were constantly simmering in the depths of this man's heart.

There was nothing Miklotov could do to extinguish the blaze that was hidden inside him. Perhaps no one would be able to manage that. With that in mind, he spoke,

Miklotov: "Did you say the same things to His Majesty Gionis as well?"

The Giant: "…"

He didn't reply to his question. Nevertheless, he took his silence as an answer.

Would there ever come a day where he would be able to talk to this man without chains or guards?

Or would there be no resolution between them other than death and blood?

Would an answer ever emerge someday whilst he was subject to his hatred, his curses and his flames of anger?

Miklotov: "…Hmmm. What a thankless role this is, even though I asked for it."

Miklotov muttered this to himself just before he left the room and then let out a brief sigh.

4

???: “—I never imagined that I would be the only one that would be left to live in dishonor.”

There was a sense of humiliation and chagrin, just as he’d alluded to, in the Eight Arms Kurgan’s reminiscence as he stepped down from the Dragon Carriage. It felt to Wilhelm like there’d also been some sense of relief mixed in with it.

Kurgan had been the sole survivor from Stride’s faction, who’d been responsible for giving rise to the Subjugation of the Evil Dragon

For a warrior who had been touted as the Empire’s Strongest, and had been fated to breathe his last on the battlefield, losing out on his place of death must have been indescribably regretting. That was made even worse by the fact that he’d been defeated in a duel with his archnemesis and left in a position to wait for his death.

Wilhelm had slipped through his eight arms and deeply wounded his chest with his sword. Kurgan’s fate should have run out then. However—

Wilhelm: “The Divine Dragon’s miracle healed everyone’s wounds in the city. You included.”

Kurgan: “Quite so.”

Kurgan solemnly affirmed Wilhelm’s words.

Kurgan had been the only member of the Stride faction who’d had his life saved by the Divine Dragon’s miracle. He’d bore the full blame for the chaos that had happened in the city and was to receive his punishment in his native Empire of Vollachia.

Kurgan’s eight arms and two legs were bound in fetters, and he was being brought to a frontier station on the border by Dragon Carriage. Wilhelm, who was accompanying him on this transfer, had a lot of mixed feelings about it.

The road there was quite long, but the two of them hadn't exchanged a single word on the way. The feelings they needed to exchange had already been done plentily so by their swords. It was something both of them felt the same about.

By some fatality, the opportunity that had come around should have been, from the start, taken away forevermore by the cycle of life and death. Though you could think of it as a disgrace, or an untruth—

Wilhelm: "It feels absurd even to get so stubborn about it, no?"

Thoughts in that vein allowed Wilhelm to reply to Kurgan's reminiscing.

Kurgan turned his back to the border and looked over in the direction of the Kingdom, as if he'd sympathized with what Wilhelm was thinking.

Kurgan: "Merely I, the warrior, remain; my son, his wife and those Shinobi twins perish. Impermanence at its finest."

Wilhelm: "Yet you don't seem perturbed."

Kurgan wasn't cursing the absurdity of his fate. On the contrary, his eyes were calm, as if he'd just had an evil spirit exorcised from him and was quietly accepting his end.

It was almost like he was saying that even their defeat had been what they'd wanted.

Wilhelm: "Don't tell me you're saying you were going to cut lose to fight another day."

Kurgan: "I care not about victory or defeat with Stride. In terms of that, it was always one defeat after the other. However, in his final moments, my son fulfilled his long-cherished desire. That makes me content."

Wilhelm: "His long-cherished desire…"

Kurgan: "He called a Dragon. Not an Evil Dragon, but a real one. —

By twisting the fabric of reality.”

Wilhelm had no idea what kind of aspiration that man had been granted. Most likely Kurgan didn’t know either. No one could know what was going on in that man’s mind.

That man had trampled over the world at his will and died fulfilling his insane wish in the end.

He lived, and then he died. Yet such a man had people who had tried to love him, even if they didn’t understand him.

Kurgan: “—Fare ye well, Sword Demon.”

This time, they didn’t exchange any more words between them.

Kurgan didn’t show a single sign of resistance until they handed him over to the Empire’s envoy. That had probably been where Kurgan drew the line as a warrior, or perhaps as a parent.

Wilhelm: “What’s going to happen to him back in the Empire?”

Wilhelm asked Bordeaux, who was standing next to him, as they saw off the Dragon Carriage leaving the frontier station driving off to the Empire. Bordeaux, who’d been charge of the transfer, folded his burly arms, and then spoke,

Bordeaux: “The Empire owes us a great deal for this. Their member of royalty who fled his country kicked up a stir with the intention of overthrowing another country. Our relations deteriorating seems like an inevitability.”

Wilhelm: “…It would be like that if they acknowledged Stride’s existence, I guess.”

Bordeaux: “Yeah.”

Bordeaux gave him a bitter nod and Wilhelm tch’ed.

The Empire had strongly denied any connection with the Stride faction from the very beginning. Stride being a member of the Vollachian royalty came only from his own claim. They needn’t even bother to touch on the credibility that the crazy washout's words held.

It might have been a different story if Stride's corpse had remained, but his body had been swallowed by the Black Dragon and the Dragon itself had been reduced to dust. It was impossible to prove his claim.

It was likely that even in his home country of Vollachia, all of the evidence showing that he really existed would have been buried.

Wilhelm: "But then, wouldn't that put Kurgan's life in jeopardy if he's gonna testify against them?"

Bordeaux: "I get your concern, but that's not going to happen. They don't convict their powerful heroes. Their doctrine of blood and iron where the strong are revered will save Kurgan's life. Though I'm not sure if I can call that a blessing."

The fact remained that Kurgan had cooperated with an unknown mastermind, even if they didn't admit that the main culprit had been affiliated with the Empire. Thus Kurgan had been transferred to the Empire, and would receive the blame.

Their apologies and reparations to the Kingdom were probably going to be reported officially as being Kurgan's fault.

Wilhelm: "So this is what politics is like."

Bordeaux: "Just a part of it. These are things which both you and me aren't very good at, since you can't solve 'em by smacking them."

Bordeaux said that with a wry smile on his face after Wilhelm spat those words out.

It was as he said. Both Wilhelm and Bordeaux sucked at settling things when they couldn't use their swords. Even so, Bordeaux, unlike Wilhelm, had to affront that battlefield which was full of that.

Bordeaux: "This will be the last time I'll hold my ax."

Wilhelm: "…"

Bordeaux: "I'm getting a bit too slow to stand on the frontlines. I reckon it's about time now."

Bordeaux announced that he was going to hang up his boots, as if corroborating what Wilhelm had been thinking.

—Bordeaux had been a man of battle as well.

Wilhelm knew that the days he'd spent wielding his ax and training with it were not few at all, as well as how anguishing his decision to hang up his boots was.

Bordeaux: "In the last battle I was able to fight with you, Grimm, the corps members… and Pivot. My life was spared, and I even got to look up at the majestic figure of the Divine Dragon. The show ends here for me."

Wilhelm: "So you're going to hang up your boots and devote yourself fully to the world of politics? Are you really gonna be able to manage that?"

Bordeaux: "I hope you'll give it your all in the Zergev Corps in exchange. I expect great things from you, my junior."

Wilhelm: "When you refer to me like that, does that have something to do with looking after the Gildark family?"

Wilhelm tilted his head in confusion when he said that in response to Bordeaux who looked like he was in contemplation.

Unsurprisingly, a substantial number of the citizens of Picoutatte had fallen victim in The Subjugation of the Evil Dragon. The group that was most affected after them were the members of the Subjugation Force who'd been dispatched to defeat Stride.

From the names he knew of these victims, there was Roswaal's, as well as—

Wilhelm: "Razak Gildark, though I didn't really know him that well."

Bordeaux: “He was a fine individual. He was in charge of training the new recruits back during the Civil War… You may have skipped his bootcamp, but Grimm and stuff should’ve been looked after by him.”

Wilhelm: “I imagined you’d say something like that.”

Razak, one of the Great Knights of the Kingdom, had joined the Subjugation Force to keep his Kingdom safe.

He’d been one of the people who’d lost their lives in the battle, protecting the civilians that had been turned into a mob.

Wilhelm: “I heard that he died protecting a child.”

Bordeaux: “Yeah. It was the son of the Hoffman Family who’d happened to be visiting Picoutatte. I was devastated to learn of Razak-dono’s death, but…”

Wilhelm: “But?”

Bordeaux trailed off his words, and then smiled at Wilhelm’s question,

Bordeaux: “He was bold enough to say “I want to tread in Razak-dono’s footsteps.” I’m looking forward to seeing Rickert’s future as well.”

Wilhelm: “Aren’t you taking too much onto yourself considering that the heir to the Gildark family still hasn’t come of age yet?”

Bordeaux: “What, I’ve put my ax aside, so both of my hands are free. So grabbing onto the future should be a piece of cake, right?”

Wilhelm: “That way of putting it is really unlike you.”

He snorted, and then Wilhelm smiled too.

Wilhelm looked up at the sky absentmindedly; he felt as if he’d seen those clouds drifting about in the azure before. The drifting wisps flew away in the breeze and slowly changed shape. That, for some reason, tugged at his heartstrings.

Things were moving, change was always happening, time never stood still.

Bordeaux: “Wilhelm.”

Wilhelm: “…”

Bordeaux: “You be sure to stay true to who you are at your core.”

Wilhelm couldn’t laugh off Bordeaux’s oddly sentimental words.

Nevertheless, he just silently vowed that he would try to keep those words in mind, and sink them into his heart should he ever need them.

5

???: I’m going to tie the knot with Carol

Grimm awkwardly handed him a scrap of paper he’d written on after a while of drinking together.

They were in their usual bar, and night had just started to fall. The bar was full of people talking, and the smell of booze hung in the air, making it the ideal place to lose yourself in idle chatter.

Wilhelm: “…What’s the right thing to say here? It’s about time? Or congratulations?”

Grimm: Both would be like you

Wilhelm: “I see. Yeah, I guess so. Then it’s about time, and congratulations.”

Wilhelm gave his blessings to Grimm’s written confession, who’d placed his glass of liquor down onto the table and smiled.

He was going to tie the knot, in short, he was going to make his marriage proposal. It was no secret that they both really loved each other and had been dating for a while. So much so, that those around them had been eagerly waiting for when it was going to be.

Their difference in social status—what with Carol being a noble, and Grimm from common stock had been related to their delay. Though it was chiefly only the two of them who saw that as a problem; everyone else who knew them didn't really think it was a big deal.

Wilhelm: "So I guess this means you've gotten past that problem of social status with the merit you were given?"

None other than Grimm had been granted the highest merit from the people of the Subjugation Force in what had happened recently.

He'd fought the mastermind Stride, rescued the captured Sword Saint and even helped out in the battle against the rampaging Black Dragon. It was safe to say that he'd played an active role pretty much everywhere.

Of course, everyone who knew Grimm knew that he didn't want to take credit for it, but regardless of that, there had to be some sort of reward for all the great deeds he'd done.

Hence, Grimm had quietly been given the honor of being a Great Knight, thus giving him the same qualifications as a noble, though only during his own generation. That meant that his status difference with Carol had vanished.

Thus, now that the impediment had been removed from the two lovers, the rest was history.

Grimm: Mathers-sama left some dying words for Carol you see

Wilhelm: "…"

Grimm: She said that she wanted her to find happiness with me. What an odd person she was

He'd used a rather straight to the point expression to refer to her, but Wilhelm couldn't deny it either.

Roswaal had been an odd woman. She'd stepped off the stage of the lives of Wilhelm, Grimm and many others without that impression of her changing.

She'd jaunted off, without even being able to say goodbye.

Wilhelm: "After all, she was a woman who always liked to pull the wool over people's eyes."

The corners of Wilhelm's lips crinkled up into a small smile. Grimm gave a laugh, as if he were saying Yeah and then nodded.

Wilhelm: "When's the wedding going to be?"

Grimm: Not too long from now. I'm going to talk to Carol about it

Wilhelm: "You're going to invite me, right?"

Grimm: It shocks me that you even considered the possibility of not being invited

Wilhelm and Grimm continued to drink more liquor as they chatted. Lately they'd been drinking more bad liquor than good. He could say, in that sense, that tonight's liquor was especially rich in flavor.

Nevertheless, Wilhelm knew that Grimm hadn't finished what he wanted to say yet.

Grimm tapped his fingers against the table with a rap-rap-rap. It was the easiest gesture for him, due to his lack of voice, to grab the attention of people near him. Wilhelm looked up at that sound and their gazes intersected.

Wilhelm realized that the time had come from the serious look on his face.

He let out a sigh, breaking the silence that had momentarily hung over them,

Wilhelm: "You're quitting?"

Grimm: I'm quitting the Knights Order

Grimm unfolded the piece of paper he'd prepared in response to Wilhelm's question. What he'd written there would have been weird to broach the subject, but suitable as a reply.

Grimm cast his gaze down slightly, and scribbled down a continuation to what he'd said on the piece of paper.

Grimm: I'm going to marry Carol and retire from the Knights Order. That's what I've decided

Wilhelm: "…But why?"

Grimm: I want to stay by Carol's side, being together with her is what I live for. I realized that clearly with what happened recently

His writing was frenzied and his sentences seemed to leap off the page at him. Wilhelm closed his eyes in reflection, faced with his seemingly forward-leaning attitude.

Come to think of it, he'd always been betraying his impressions of him ever since they'd met.

He was ordinary in appearance and of no remarkable origin. The reason why he'd left his hometown and gone to the Royal Capital to become a soldier in the Royal Forces had been a banal one. He was definitely just an ordinary man.

However, he'd miraculously survived his first battle by sticking with Wilhelm after he'd defied his superior's orders; he'd stayed alive in the Zergev Corps, one of the toughest squadrons in the Royal Forces; and before he even knew it, he'd become his indispensable close friend.

A man who didn't fit the mold, a man you couldn't fit in it. That's why his decision to retire from the Order was indeed like him, having been granted enough merit to be recognized as a Knight and having taken his wife as a just reward for that.

Besides, this was his pièce de résistance since it was for the sake of staying by the side of the woman he loved.

Wilhelm: "You're such a big idiot."

Grimm: I don't want you to tell me that

Grimm thrust out a scrap of paper with his response at the same time Wilhelm spoke, as if he'd predicted he'd say that. Wilhelm reacted in embarrassment, causing a broad smile to break out on Grimm's face.

Grimm: The Remendis Family will be succeeded by Carol's brother. So she's going to be Carol Fauzen. We're going to live together and keep on supporting each other

Wilhelm: "…I see."

Wilhelm had no objections to Grimm's plans. He'd cast aside such crass thoughts as soon as Grimm had told him he was going to quit and told him the reason why.

He was abandoning everything for the woman he loved. Grimm was definitely a big idiot. Wilhelm also knew of another big idiot like that.

That's why he had nothing more he could say.

Grimm: I'm leaving the Zergev Corps. Conwood is best suited to replace me

Wilhelm: "Well, I suppose he's a worrier too. He'll definitely keep an eye on me so that I don't end up in an early grave."

Grimm: That's your role as commander you know. Also, the Zergev Corps are about to change in essence too

Implied in Grimm's writing was something real they'd been offered the chance of a few days ago.

Everyone from the Zergev Corps, along with its Commander Wilhelm, had gotten a certain offer from the Kingdom, after they'd taken into account their toils in the recent events, as well as in the Demi-Human War—

Grimm: Is it not an honor to have the squad admitted into the Royal Guards and be asked to be its commander?

Wilhelm: "You, the guy who's about to give up his place as deputy-commander from that honorable role, is saying this to me?”

Wilhelm clicked his tongue as he said this to the slick-looking Grimm. Their admission into the Royal Guards had been as a result of the Zergev Corps’ peerless service. The Royal Guards were responsible for protecting the most important positions in the Kingdom. With all due respect, positions within it couldn’t be granted to Knights of middling caliber. This was because its roles were decreed by the King himself.

Wilhelm: “It’s all because the Astrea Mansion, along with Lord McMahon’s Mansion, were attacked by Stride’s group. Ironically what happened now hasn’t made it as necessary for us to keep a close eye on the workings of the Empire, at least for a while. All the other nations should know by now that our covenant with the Divine Dragon is still alive and kicking.”

Grimm: Our military will start to shift back towards its peace-time state. So the most important duty of the Royal Guards, as guards for the Royal Castle and His Majesty, has been assigned to the Zergev Corps, strongest in the Kingdom.

Wilhelm: “Though, I can’t help but imagine this as maybe being one of His Majesty Gionis’ whims.”

Wilhelm could count the number of times he’d exchanged words with King Gionis on one hand. Yet he knew just how optimistic Gionis’ personality was, despite knowing him for so little.

However, Gionis had taken the Black Dragon’s appearance seriously and even had shown his determination to step forward and make use of the covenant despite all the naysayers.

Wilhelm too had realized that there’d been no shortage of people who’d offered their swords to him and vowed him loyalty.

That’s why—

Wilhelm: “I’m going to accept the invitation to the Royal Guards. Though, I don’t know about being its commander in chief.”

Grimm: Don’t worry. I know you’ll do just fine

Wilhelm: “Well when you put it so simply… Wait, no.”

He reflexively hesitated to finish his response. He paused to think for a moment, then gave a quick nod,

Wilhelm: “—If it’s you saying it, then I reckon it may be so.”

Wilhelm was amazed that he’d replied so openly. What irked him was that there were no traces of surprise on Grimm’s face, just proud relief.

From his attitude, it was as if he knew more about Wilhelm than Wilhelm himself.

Wilhelm: “Quit laughing at me. —You can’t even draw out your sword, damn coward.”

He blurted those words out before he could stop himself. A tinge of surprise streaked across Grimm’s face when he heard him say that. —Not the bad sort of surprise, but the good sort.

It looked like he remembered. That was when they’d first met—

Grimm: I will muster my courage and lift up my shield

Once upon a time, Grimm, who couldn’t figure out the meaning behind why they fought, hadn’t been able to answer his question. Wilhelm had been disappointed in him acting like that, and had cursed him as a coward.

More than seven years had passed since then, and now, finally, he’d given him an answer.

—Meaning that their relationship had been completed thanks to this.

Wilhelm: “What are you going to do after you quit? Are you going to take over the family business, or something?”

Grimm: My lil’ bro took over that. Besides, it troubles me to hear you speak about it like its someone else’s problem, eh, Sir

Wilhelm: “…HEY.”

Wilhelm ran his eyes over his text then raised his voice when he reached the final sentence. He’d heard himself being referred to by that way only recently from Carol.

Wilhelm: “Don’t tell me…”

Grimm: Your Mother-in-law, Tishua-sama, has already given her consent

Wilhelm: “But I’m supposed to be in charge of the family right now…”

Grimm: Good luck with that, Sir

Pressed by his cheerful tone, Wilhelm curled his lips open and took a swig of his liquor.

Wilhelm: “I would have felt better if you’d said I didn’t have to see your face around here anymore.”

Grimm: “…”

Grimm gave him a literal silent laugh, in reply to his sore-loser-like words.

6

???: “I’m marrying Grimm.”

Theresia, who’d been passing her time idly sitting on her rocking chair, couldn’t help but burst into laughter.

Not because she was surprised, but because she found her adorable.

Carol had come to her with a serious look on her face saying she had something important to tell her. And with her face still flushed, it had taken her a long, long time of trying to find the words to blurt out just that much of a confession.

Carol: “Th-Theresia-sama? What are you laughing for?”

Theresia: “Well Carol, it’s because the face you’re making looks like you’re about to propose a duel. Just when I was wondering what you were going to say with that, you say this… You are sososo cuuute.”

Carol: “Please quit teasing me…”

Carol pinched the hem of her dress tightly with her head hung down sadly. Each of her gestures looked adorable, definitely because she was no longer hiding her love for him.

Carol used to be stubborn and never showed her feelings, but now that Grimm had been knighted and their difference in status had vanished, her stubbornness looked like it had dissolved with it.

—Though, that mustn’t be the only reason why she’d become so honest with herself at heart.

Carol: “Theresia-sama?”

Carol suddenly called out Theresia’s name with a surprised look to her face. Theresia lifted her head up in response and tried to reply to her, but couldn’t. Both her cheeks and eyelids were trembling.

Reason being that tears were flowing. They ran down her cheeks, down her chin, leaving behind a trail that dripped down onto her clothes. She finally realized there that she was crying.

Carol: “Are you not feeling well? I’ll call for a doctor right away…”

Theresia: “It’s, it’s not like that. Don’t worry, I’m fine. It’s just that I…”

Carol: “It’s just that you?”

Theresia: “It’s just that I’m so glad you’ve finally taken a decision that makes you happy.”

Theresia forced her trembling lips to move and somehow managed to put the thoughts she was feeling in her heart into words.

Theresia truly cared about Carol. Because she was someone who sucked at finding happiness, or, if she were pressed to say more about it, then she was someone who always kept putting off finding her own happiness.

That's why Theresia was intimately glad that Carol was going to marry the person who made her happy, and had actually found a person who looked like he wanted to do so.

—Without even realizing that Carol had felt the exact same way about her.

Carol: "…Pardon me, Theresia-sama."

Carol said those brief words and gently brought Theresia's head nearer to her with her outstretched arms. She then splayed her red hair out against her chest and wrapped her arms around her in a warm embrace.

Theresia could feel her comforting warmth and hear her heartbeat right there.

Theresia: "Are you going to become Carol Fauzen? Or is he going to be Grimm Remendis?"

Carol: "Fauzen, I'm going to take Grimm's family name. House Remendis will be succeeded by my little brother, so my parents say that they don't mind me abandoning my family name."

Theresia: "…You're going to quit the lineage of the Sheaths and leave me alone?"

Carol: "You're going to make me angry, Theresia-sama, even if it's you who's saying that."

She definitely wasn't going to abandon her. Theresia stuck her tongue out and apologized to her for her insecure remark.

We've always been together like this, so I want us to stay together in the future as well.

Then for this as well—

Theresia: “Are you truly okay with Grimm-kun? Like, is he the one who makes you the happiest of all?”

Carol: “Theresia-sama.”

Theresia: “I just want you to be the happiest in the world Carol. That’s why I want you to be with the person that makes you the most happy. Does Grimm-kun fit the bill? Is he your destined person? Is he Wilhelm?”

Carol: “Theresia-sama, you’re confusing me. It would be wrong of me to say that the expression you used is insulting, so I won’t say that, but…”

Carol soothingly patted Theresia’s back with a complex look adorning her face. Snuggling her cheeks against her in response to her gentle action, Theresia tightly wrapped her arms around Carol’s body.

She hugged her, tighter and tighter. Her baby shifted around in protest in her swollen womb.

Theresia: “Your Mom’s in the middle of an important conversation right now. You need to stay quiet.”

She said this in a strict voice, and as a result, her baby went quiet.

Theresia: “Nice, good child… Hey Carol?”

Carol: “I’m, I’m sorry… Just, I already knew this, but I’m confident that I can say you’ll make a great Mother, Theresia-sama.”

Carol gave her a firm nod, having barely suppressed her urge to laugh. Then she gently stroked Theresia who was still held in her arms, and said,

Carol: “Yes, I won’t regret it. I’m going to be the happiest person in the world. Grimm is my destined person. No, to put it more aptly, he’s the person I chose.”

Theresia: “…Good, in that case, you can trust that far more than stuff like destiny.”

She gave her a smile back in response before her lips formed into a pout.

Theresia: “But this isn’t faaair Carol. I can’t say anything back when you put it like that. I’m going to end up not believe anything you say now.”

Carol: “Yeah. You can count me among the people who’ve beaten the Sword Saint with this.”

Theresia: “Mhm, shall do. Yeah, I’m the weakest and most pitiable Sword Saint in all history, who just keeps on losing. So from now on, you’ll have to keep on beating me, won’t you.”

Carol: “You can count on me. —I’ll always be at your side, Theresia-sama.”

Carol kneeled down as she said this. Then, as she glanced up at her, Theresia gave her a mischievous smile.

Theresia: “On that subject, if me and Grimm-kun were in danger, which one of us would you choose first?”

Carol: “The man I love can get out of sticky situations on his own. So naturally I chose you Theresia-sama.”

Theresia: “I really like that part of you Carol.”

Carol: “P-Please quit teasing me…”

Theresia figuratively stuck her tongue out at Carol, whose face was flushed in embarrassment.

It was extremely unlikely that she’d grant that one wish. She knew that her habit wasn’t a good one, and that Carol was bothered by it, but she couldn’t stop herself.

After all, Carol’s embarrassed face was just as cute as her smiling one. That’s why Theresia would definitely get along with anyone who knew that fact.

Standing right now in front of Carol who was embarrassed like this, the smile on Theresia's face was like that of a flower in full bloom.

Theresia wanted to express her thanks, her heartfelt gratitude…

…To everyone who'd helped out in keeping these peaceful times ongoing.

7

—Thus dawns the final act on the long-running Sword Demon Battle Ballad.

???: "Carol and Grimm-kun look really happy, don't they?"

???: "Mhm, yeah."

???: "I was kinda unhappy that he ended up taking Carol away from me, but… yeah. You've got to put your hands up when she's been made this happy."

???: "Mhm, yeah."

???: "…Wilhelm, aren't you lonely too now that Grimm-kun's been taken away by Carol?"

Wilhelm: "Mhm, yeah."

???: "Ugh! You're not listening to a word I'm saying!"

Theresia burst out in anger at Wilhelm who kept mhmhm'ing back at her. She puffed out her cheeks and glared at Wilhelm who was right beside her—No, so near her that he was practically on top of her. However he paid no attention to her, still with his ear on her belly, listening for their baby.

Wilhelm: "Be quiet Theresia. I can't hear our child."

Theresia: "I want you to listen to your adorable, cherished, precious, lovely wife properly."

Wilhelm: "Later."

Theresia: “Dismissed just like that! You’re so awful!”

Theresia moaned about her husband’s dismissive attitude, but it wasn’t like she could afford to run away while holding her stomach. Wilhelm had a look about him that indicated he was approaching the situation seriously, so it wasn’t like he was messing about either. That made her glad.

Wilhelm: “So much has happened you know. I’m worried about you and our unborn child.”

Theresia: “You’re such a worrier. We’re fine, we were given a thorough check-up by Garritch Sensei on Miklotov-sama’s recommendation.”

Though the name of that familiar healer cropped up, Wilhelm’s worries weren’t allayed. He wasn’t showing his anxiety on his face, but unluckily for him Theresia was able to read what he was thinking.

Wilhelm wasn’t as unfeeling or uncaring as he thought he was, so he couldn’t fool her. Though, she was likely aware that it was the bias of love that made her find that part of him cute as well.

Theresia: “…So, now that you made your wife shut up, were you able to talk with the baby?”

Wilhelm: “No, not at all. I can’t hear them at all. They don’t seem dead.”

Theresia: “Don’t say something so frightening! They’re alive! See, they’re moving about now!”

Wilhelm: “What are… Oh, you’re right.”

Her baby shifted around in her womb a bunch, as if objecting to what Wilhelm had said along with their mother. She took Wilhelm’s hand and placed it on her belly so as to show him.

Time passed slowly between them with their hands held like that somehow.

It was a peaceful, uneventful period of time. It had been getting difficult lately to spend time like this due to them having to deal with the aftermath of the Subjugation of the Evil Dragon

Because of that, Theresia herself reckoned she'd treat herself more than usual.

Wilhelm: "You're overthinking things. I want to stay with you as well."

Theresia: "…No fair. I didn't even say anything right now about that."

Wilhelm: "I can tell even if you don't say anything."

Theresia: "Am I that easy to read?"

Wilhelm: "I don't know if you are. I just figured it out I guess because you're my woman."

Theresia: "Grrrrr."

Having been told that so clearly without facade, Theresia plunged into silence.

He really didn't hesitate to cut in at crucial moments. Just how many times had she been made a fool of by what he said, just how many times had she been brushed off?

Theresia: "I bet in the future you're just gonna keep on doing this…"

Wilhelm: "—? What are you talking about?"

Theresia: "I'm talking about you, you meany… Anyways, we're going to stay together today, right?"

Theresia looked up at Wilhelm from her rocking chair. Wilhelm faltered for a moment receiving her gaze, but he nodded straight after and said "Yeah."

Wilhelm: "I've finally sorted out all the stuff I needed to do…

Though, I’m sure I’m going to get busy pretty soon.”

Theresia: “Ugh, the Royal Guards, right? Like I’m glad they recognized you, but…”

Wilhelm: “It’s complicated for me.”

Wilhelm folded his arms and then cocked his head.

Theresia: “Complicated, why?”

Wilhelm: “You get fewer chances to go out from the Royal Capital when you’re part of the Royal Guard. So few that I’m gonna get even less chances to swing my sword about. Even so, thanks to that, I can stay at your side.”

Theresia: “…”

Wilhelm: “So it’s complicated. I think my feeling of gratitude is the stronger one though.”

Theresia was flabbergasted that Wilhelm had seriously placed her and his sword on a set of (metaphorical) scales, what’s more with a complex look on his face. Though at the same time, she thought hard about it.

Should she be Honored or angered that within him he’d taken her as an object to be compared with his Sword? Which one should she feel as the wife of the Sword Demon?

Theresia: “There’s nothing I can do about it, so I’m going to have to slowly tip them towards me.”

Wilhelm: “Anyways, we can stay together for a few days. Leave everything to me, including meals and baths.”

Theresia: “…Ignoring the meals for a second, I’m not letting you help me with my baths.”

Wilhelm: “I was just looking out for you, you know.”

Theresia: “I-I don’t need your extra concerns. I’m pregnant, I’m a pregnant woman”Wilhelm: “You know that doesn’t make you any differe…”

Theresia: “Ah! Ah! Enough! Yes, enough with this! This ends here! End of story! Yes, give me a hug, a really tight one, and that’s it for today!”

Theresia waved her hands about frantically and told him what she wanted without holding back. Wilhelm shrugged his shoulders in response while obediently giving her a tight hug.

She felt the loving touch of his strong arms. It was different to the one he’d given her when they’d reunited back in that city and he’d pulled her into him with all his strength. Still no matter how many times it was, she ended up falling in love over and over again with this new Wilhelm.

So much had happened, there’d been so many goodbyes, including Wilhelm and Carol’s dear friend and her own cherished father. Even so, would they forgive her for relishing in her happiness like this?

—You needn’t even worry about that.

Theresia felt as if she could hear her father, Bertol saying that. Indeed, she was sure that he’d have probably said that.

That’s why, suddenly, those words came blurting out from her mouth.

Theresia: “…I really wish my father had managed to name our child.”

That had been what Theresia had desired at the end, in that world where crime and punishment congregated, in that world where she was reunited with the family she thought she’d never seen again.

Even though Bertol had replied to her, saying that he wanted to rack his brains and decide after giving it some thought.

Wilhelm: “…Theresia, there’s something I haven’t told you yet.”

Theresia: “Huh?”

Wilhelm overheard Theresia's murmur, and while still holding her, whispered that gently into her ear. Then he removed his arm from around her and put it in his pocket.

And—.

Wilhelm: "—It's something your Honored Mother gave me. She said she wanted me to pass it on when the chance came."

Theresia: "…"

He pulled out a crumpled letter and presented it to her. Theresia took it looking confused. Part of the paper was torn, and it had even been folded over a bunch of times. The dark stuff on its edges were probably bloodstains.

Theresia opened the letter with trembling fingers and what she saw written there was—

Theresia: "—Oh."

Wilhelm "It seems like your Honored Father had been giving it quite a lot of thought."

Theresia let out a short quivering gasp in response to Wilhelm's words.

There was a long, long list of names written on the letter she'd opened—More than she could even count. Many of them had traces of being marked, considered, rejected or signs of excitement around them.

—But only one amongst them, just one, the last one remaining, had a circle around it.

Theresia: "—Heinkel."

She put it into words. She let it roll off her tongue and voiced out the name.

Heinkel, that name ever so gently tugged at Theresia's heartstrings.

Wilhelm: “It seems like he only came up with boys’ names. I guess you could call it being dead set on that… That sort of stuff too was rather like of your Honored Father.”

Theresia: “Yeah, definitely, for sure. It was really, definitely, absolutely like my Father…”

She’d never asked him to do so directly. Despite that, he must have rushed off to do it on his own, and racked his mind day and night, really struggling to think up a name.

Theresia: “He kept our promise.”

She’d thought that the promise she’d made with her father after he’d died, a promise that he shouldn’t have been able to keep, wouldn’t have been fulfilled.

Even so, Bertol had kept his promise. He’d kept his final promise to his beloved daughter.

He’d been someone who could do that. He’d been someone who’d done that. That’s why he—

Theresia: “—Heinkel, Heinkel, Heinkel.”

She repeated that name over and over again, so that it would reach her unborn child.

Wilhelm: “Heinkel Astrea.”

Wilhelm likewise spoke the name out to his child, as if he understood what Theresia was trying to do.

They’d just laughed a moment ago thinking about what would happen if her baby wasn’t a boy.

But that didn’t matter, the two of them called out their child’s name.

—Heinkel will be your name. A name that your brave, wonderful grandfather thought up for you. A name that will be called out with love many many times from the moment you’re born.

Theresia: “It’s been tough for you even before you were born, and I’m sure that it’ll be tough for you after, but me and Wilhelm will be here for you. After all, your Mommy and Daddy love you.”

Wilhelm: “And it looks like Grimm and Carol will be sticking with us for a while too. So ya know, that means you definitely won’t be bored when you come out.”

Wilhelm continued from where Theresia had left off. Hearing those words, she slowly looked at her beloved husband with her blue eyes and gave him a lovely smile, similar to that of a blooming flower.

Theresia: “I love you Wilhelm… What about you?”

Wilhelm gazed back at his beloved wife, and said,

Wilhelm: “—You know that.”

As adorable as it was that this part of him didn’t change, she really wished he would say it back.

8

—And thus this tale too comes to an end.

A tale about a man and a woman who were toyed with by the evil of the Destruction Wish and their love that was first tested and then responded.

There’d been many farewells, and the balance between what had been lost and what had been gained was out of equilibrium. But no one should be able to quantify the value of happiness and unhappiness in others.

For now, you ought only listen to the ballad of the battlefield.

What did the demon of the sword who was ablaze with love desire at the end of it? What did this lumbering demon who could only speak through the battlefield desire at the end of it?

—May the tomorrow he dreamed of be there at the end of the Sword Demon Battle Ballad.

The Sword Demon Battle Ballad FIN

Ex 6:
Sword Demon Battle Ballad

Sword Demon Battle Ballad: Finale of the Eight Arms

1

???: “—Hey, Jumbo! You, do it over here too!”

Catching the excavation tools thrown at him alongside the vituperation with the arms on his back, the colossal man sluggishly upraised his face.

The gargantuan man measured close to two metres in height. The skin of his muscly, brawny body was blue, and affixed above his neck was a visage terrifying enough to scare away Witchbeasts in hurried escape. However, what was more peculiar about him than his face or physique, were his eight arms hefty as logs.

The Multi-Arm Tribe largely had individuals with four to five arms on average; even amongst them, those with eight arms were rare, and there was about only one renowned in history.

Anyhow, his presence was enough to compel anyone to re-examine whether they had the correct person to be treating roughly. —However, to much misfortune, the person was not mistaken about who they were pushing around, and they possessed the right to be pushing him around, at the very least the party being pushed around believed such.

After all, the one pushing him around was the Supervisor of this site, and the gargantuan man was a prisoner beneath his employ.

Cuffed around his neck was a “Meteor” called the “Collar of Subservience”, and should he purchase the Supervisor’s displeasure, he would be granted punishment per his will in this position. The will to defy did not even as little as surge. —To begin with, he had not a smidgen of intent to oppose.

Supervisor: “What’s thi~s? That defiance in your eyes. You got any problems?”

???: “None. This is how my eyes have appeared from the onset.”

Upon him shaking his head against the faults appended to him, the Supervisor’s eyes tapered with a hint of sadism. Expecting punishment to befall him upon this indication—

???: “Supervisor Lehare! The Governor is calling you!”

Lehare: “Tch, lucky bastard… keep at it till I come back!”

Receiving a summon from the other side of the avenue, the Supervisor grimaced and left those words behind. Seeing off his frame, the gargantuan man looked down onto the digging stick in his hand and muttered, “Lucky, huh”.

???: “For me to be lucky, what an ironic thing, isn’t it, Stride.”

Murmuring this ruminative utterance, he raised overhead the digging stick for the construction site behind him— the massive, enormous build of foundation for the rampart under construction.

2

—Once, there had been a legendary warrior named the Eight Arms.

He came from the rare tribe, the Multi-Arm Tribe, living in the Vollachian Empire, and as his alias denoted, he used all eight of his arms to manipulate weapons, the strongest existence who vanquished every kind of adversary. Availing himself the name of the strongest per his will in the Empire that prized fighters, the Eight Arms befitted esteem.

—However, that was about thirty years ago.

Lionized as the strongest in the Empire, his name having promulgated far and wide, the Eight Arms declined as an unofficial felon for being a member of the party to have committed an act of war against the neighbouring Kingdom of Lugunica. Taking into account the achievements of the Eight Arms till then and even the strength that he possessed in person, he could have taken the option to enact his discontent through exercise of strength and firmly refused accepting such a position.

However, the Eight Arms abstained from doing so, and accepted the judgement the country cast upon him without resistance.

As a result, the Eight Arms was assigned labour without parole, and had been engaged in construction of the firm, powerful rampart of the Fortified City of Garkla in the northern region of the Empire, for days worth many decades and still counting.

With that flow of time, the legend of the Eight Arms became an old and rusted article, reaching a period where the many individuals who supervised him, as he pursued labour, were unbeknownst to who he was.

The people rounded up for the ceaseless construction work of walls, for it to be sturdier, for it to be firmer, were predominantly either criminals same as the Eight Arms, remnant soldiers defeated in battle, or roaming wanderers with no homeland.

And even amongst those in the same environs as him, the Eight Arms was disdained as a traitor to his appearance, scorned as a frightened old wolf who undertook neither rebellion nor resistance.

—Until that day arrived.

It should have been a day with nothing remarkable.

Light clouds convened over Mount Gildray which functioned as the provincial border with the neighbouring country, a refreshing breeze also penetrated into the Fortified City adjacent to the mountain. Lately the weather had been continually humid and sweat-inducing, so today's labour would be given considerable respite, was the kind of talk also flitting about the construction site.

However—

???: "—Sa~y, I'm telling you to bring forward the one responsible."

Accompanying the remark akin to the tantrums of a displeased child, was fearsome destruction.

The discharged shockwave upturned the city's ground, and every person, thing, and building set upon it was literally blown off by their roots, refashioned into a variegated meld of ruin. With just that, one-third of the extolled firm and sturdy Garkla collapsed, generating ten thousand worthless sacrifices.

A beat subsequent to the devastation, the screeches and wails resounding as cries of agony amplified, and the man who walked on trampling them underfoot ran a hand through his white hair,

???: “Goodness, on top of being made to bring myself to this dusty place, to run into someone so short of courtesy is truly such bad luck. Even though I’ve gone out of my way to come all the way here, such lack of consideration towards the toil the other party has had to undertake. The forethought one would call natural, you know.”

Grumbling complaints and discontent, the man casually snapped his fingers. —The subsequent instant, a smaller scale of destruction coiled onto all that was ahead of his snapped fingers, further augmenting damage violating the city.

The man scattered about inexplicable destruction, as he then surveyed the devastation in apparent boredom,

???: “In the end, even after I so kindly identify their mistakes, nobody comes forward to apologize. The way they’re all such self-seeking humans is so repulsive. Don’t you think so, number one hundred and thirty four.”

No.134: “—Yes, I believe it is as per Husband-sama’s say.”

The one to quietly respond to the man’s inquiry was a brown-haired woman walking right behind him. The man nodded in satisfaction with a “That’s right” upon the woman’s reply, her features and conduct well-ordered, emotionless as a doll.

There—

???: “—Stand in line, criminals! Be useful!”

A sharp voice tore through the space of agonising cries, followed by a succession of footsteps. Upon hearing that, the white-haired man furrowed his brows with a “What’s this?”, capturing in his sight the crowd deploying before him.

They were about thirty men in squalid guises, made to wield crude weaponry.

Their races and ages were sundry, but what they all shared in common besides their squalidness were the collars on their necks,

???: “So, now what? Do you, at last, intend to recognise the blunder you committed and welcome me all huddled together? I want to make it clear that I’m not particularly seeking any grandiose sort of hospitality. What I wish for is treatment natural for and as a human. And also, with what I’m looking for prepared. It’s not that I personally want it, but it’s something I was requested to acquire—”

???: “Do it—!!”

It was when the man was in the midst of verbosely elucidating his objective.

Behind the row of men, a person garbed in the Empire’s military uniform diffused his instruction and the weapons were cast. They rushed toward the man straight ahead, and coercively shut his yet prattling mouth—

???: “…I was in the middle of talking just now, wasn’t I? To interfere with that amounts to an infringement of my rights. That’s, not something I can forgive!”

The man standing upright stretched his arm, preventing only the thrown weapons from landing upon the woman behind him, himself defenselessly bathing in the lethal weaponry yet roaring without injury.

The man’s indignation also birthed damage onto the men lined up before him.

The avenue dissipated, however many people were turned to mincemeat, the ones who yet survived seemed to lack the option to run, wielding their fortunately saved lives as weapons, only able to bound towards the man all wearing grim expressions.

???: “All of them, a horde who just can’t listen to someone. —From the bottom of my heart, I find it repulsive.”

Snapping his fingers at the one leading the vanguard of their plunge, the man retched in annoyance stemming from his heart.

3

Lehare Yvsant, the Supervisor, was pursued by many decisions in the chaotic situation of turmoil.

For Lehare, who originally was nothing more than the Supervisor for the rampart’s construction work, the report and orders to manage that descended upon him patently exceeded his duties, but there was nothing he could do about it in the present circumstances.

After all, the Governor of the Fortified City of Garkla had been engulfed in the first range of destruction and turned to a spatter of blood.

The Governor’s aides had also been blown off altogether, so the official chain of command of Garkla at present was in absolute chaos. In the time it would take to confirm that, wounds might spread to a fatal extent.

Thus, Lehare had no option but to act as the temporary Governor representative. —Naturally, it was not the mere Supervisor Lehare who made this audacious determination.

The one to push for this determination was—

Lehare: “The enemy is, a singular individual, is it? And they are scattering the labourers to dust? This report…”

???: “—Is some kind of mistake, you think? Is that judgement what your common sense has illuminated to you? If so, then does the occurrence presently unfolding in this city conform to your common sense? Use your head.”

Lehare: “Th-Then, Prince, do you truly think the city was reduced to this by one person?”

Prince: “Of course, I am also maintaining the possibility that they are not alone within consideration… the problem is, their goal.”

Setting a hand on his mouth, the one deep in ponderance was the person who had perchance been visiting the city for inspection—before the wisdom of the young Prince about ten years of age, give or take, Lehare resolved in heart to follow his command with all his might.

That Prince, less than half his own age, had a ghastliness to him that did not accord with his age. A presence and dignity commanding to proclaim this was how the Sword Wolves of Vollachia ought to be.

Prince: “…Albeit nobody but myself dislikes it most.”

Lehare: “Prince?”

Prince: “Ignore it. More importantly, further spread of damage must be stopped. Sear it in yourself to move swiftly and multifacetedly. —Furthermore, the Eight Arms is supposed to be in this city.”

Lehare: “Y-Yes! …Yes? Wait, the Eight Arms, you say? That’s…”

His resolution immediately swayed, Lehare’s eyes rolled backward.

Whom the Prince had alluded to was a labourer in this city assigned to physical labour. Although a member of the Multi-Arm Tribe, he was unambitious, a being who failed to live up to any such alias as the Eight Arms.

Lehare: “In regards to him, Prince, how do you…”

Prince: “Fool.”

One word, a flat reprimand, and Lehare was sweating profusely whilst the Prince gazed outside of the window.

Viewing down upon the cataclysmic spectacle of the city without any safe zones left, hearkening the incessantly audible notes of devastation and impact, he resumed.

Prince: “Hearing your name, this is how many react. —Do you find that acceptable, Eight Arms.”

“…”

Unable to spot the blue sky beyond the light clouds, Kurgan straitened his eyes, fallen to the ground face-up.

The bones of his entire body creaking, apparent serious damage to his internal organs, difficulty breathing.

Whilst labouring, he was often recipient to punishment of electric shocks via the Collar of Subservience on the Supervisor’s whims, and was often beaten by other labourers as a distraction, but none of those ached as befitting of pain.

But, these grave wounds begot genuine pain. —However, the one to enkindle this was far from a genuine fighter or warrior, a terribly contemptible and despicable being.

Kurgan: “That, my end…”

Would be something so trifling, was the sentiment that predominantly inhabited Kurgan’s heart.

Several decades ago, he had assisted his son, with whom he had no connection by blood, in his rebellion against the world, and after all of his comrades allied with it had died, he alone survived in solitude, a long time had elapsed since then. At the summit of having lived that long time in indolent dormancy, he would be killed by the absurdity called calamity in the shape of man. That was, the finale of Kurgan—

Prince: “—You, do you find that acceptable! Fulfil your duty!”

Kurgan: “…”

The subsequent moment, that voice seized hold of Kurgan’s soul as he verged closing his eyes in negligence.

The words he was pelted with, themselves were no different than instructions from the Supervisor impelling them to become meat shields towards the threat, making Kurgan and the other labourers obey through Collars of Subservience. Yet, different from the Supervisor who had been entangled in the attack and died, for what reason did this invigorate Kurgan's soul.

Because in that voice dwelled the franticness for accomplishing something, with one's life on the line.

This same franticness had also also dwelled within Kurgan's son, Stride Vollachia—

Prince: "Drop them!!"

Declared the same voice, and a heavy reverberation fell in proximity of the collapsed Kurgan. It was invisible to tell what that was from Kurgan's position. But, he knew what it was even without seeing.

The note of slicing the wind, and the heavy low tone perforating into the ground, it was impossible for Kurgan to misapprehend that.

Kurgan: "—Demon Cleavers."

Prince: "These are what your armaments ought to be, are they not, Eight Arms! They were things that happened to be present at this time, in this place! Thus you shall fulfill your duty! For you are a Sword Wolf of Vollachia!"

Awakening his body as though strummed, he bounded towards the voice's point of descent, and impaled into the ground there were four sizable longswords of bulky width— Demon Cleavers, he pulled them out and gripped them tight.

It had been however many decades since he had ascertained their weight and texture, but the void of time was replenished in an instant.

Naturally, bereft of maintenance, the sharpness of the longswords had strikingly declined, but—

Kurgan: "Specifics, accepted."

His low, murmuring voice, Kurgan himself felt astonished at its enlivening.

An instant prior, he had accepted death wielding nothing here. Heedless, the moment he ascertained the presence of his favoured longswords— no, his surging fighting spirit was from a different impetus.

Ordering to turn over the Demon Cleavers to Kurgan, it was the black-haired youth atop the fortress— imbued in his voice was the tenacity of the soul, which had catalyzed rebellion in the Eight Arms's soul.

Here, he must not let the proprietor of that voice die. For which he must swing his longswords.

Kurgan: "…"

An unhurried exhale, and Kurgan focused toward the front. Meeting eye-to-eye with the white-haired man at the end of the road, by whom he had been blasted away across the other direction.

And—

Kurgan: "—Eight Arms Kurgan."

Regulus: "Witch Cult Sin Archbishop, representing Greed, Regulus Corneas."

4

—It took about an hour for the Fortified City of Garkla to fall.

Many who heard of this truth were mightily, powerfully engraved with the terrifying essence of the Witch Cult Sin Archbishop, begetting an exceedingly swift annihilation of the city acclaimed as a firm bulwark.

However, that one hour was due to it being delayed or otherwise it would have originally taken less than its half, was a truth unknown to most humans.

The brief stretch of time the Eight Arms Kurgan had laboured for against the Sin Archbishop, a calamity of the world— however, had borne the fruit of minimising the devastation brought by Greed to its lowest.

Kurgan: "…"

All of the longswords he wielded shattered, and finally losing all eight of his arms altogether, shedding copious volumes of blood, Kurgan sunk to his knees.

Not a trace of injury upon the man before his eyes, he continued to nullify Kurgan's attacks with some obvious foul play.

The man was not a warrior. Kurgan harboured not the slightest of deep emotion toward that.

However, upon witnessing an upraised flag behind the man in his vision bleared by the bloodloss, his lips untied into a smile.

The national flag of a wolf pierced by swords, it was a message by the one who had commanded Kurgan to battle that he had used this time to accomplish his purpose—

Kurgan: "—Magnificent."

Regulus: "Magnificent? It provokes no sentimentality to hear that after all this time. To begin with, it was fairly obvious before you did what you did up to this point that it would be useless. I don't know if you're just plain stupid or your brain is malfunctioning or what, but you robbed my time to its hilt just because you were unable to come to that realisation, so even if you do call me magnificent this late."

The man blathered on with his grumblings, but nugatory talk did not enter his ears.

Ignoring it, Kurgan's consciousness slowly faded. In his mind, the question whether there was any meaning to him having lived through that battle and subsisted in this place for a prolonged length of time.

Through his battle here, for him to have left something for the future, wishing for it to become even a slight blow onto the Observers of the heavens whom Stride loathed, was what sojourned in his mind.

—In the years to come, the young prince who had been present in that circumstance, endeavoured to restore the name of the Eight Arms.

The new Governor of the Fortified City needing reconstruction and revival, Lehare Yvsant, restored the Eight Arms's broken longswords and adorned the topmost floor of the fortress with them, as a symbol to extol the rigidity of the city.

The battle was heralded by many as the vanquish of the Eight Arms, but only those who were saved in that hour, with Lehare at forefront, retold it as Kurgan's triumph.

Such was the legend of the Eight Arms, who survived an old battle and died for a new future.

END

Sword Demon Battle Ballad: The One Who Succeeds Astrea

1

—Sword's tip slicing through the wind, a glint of silver capered through the rays of the sun in a fierce waltz of light.

???: "…"

With nary a word, the silent swordsman brandished steel, however, more eloquently than words ever could, the depth and accumulated repetition of that individual's training spoke volumes.

Within the fighter's swordsmanship, naught could be perceived as akin to a form founded in a school of training.

The sum of his swordsmanship was the crystallization of self-study, the pinnacle of a self-taught style—in fact, having reached an existence crowned as the apex of the sword, it was a height befitting the term mastery.

Whilst it was a self-taught style, bereft of the sword techniques that had continued to be passed down, for what reason was it enacting a sword dance without any opponent to confront? —That was because, therein laid the essence of form.

The "form" in swordsmanship was, in every sense of the word, something composed by conceptualizing a real battle. To ingrain oneself with a "form", was tantamount to instilling oneself with the resolve and technique for a real battle.

Thus, if one could swing their sword with a prudence to always be conceptualizing combat, to always conduct themselves as if on a battlefield, then even without knowing any "form", they would at least end up producing the same results as would one with a "form".

Henceforth, imagining the phantoms of all the mighty foes he had faced until now, within the sword dance of the swordsman as he crossed blades with them head-on, was reflected all the thickness of his advancement, the same as what would be seen upon witnessing "form".

For those who aspired to the martial arts, it was a sword dance that would likely reap benefits by mere observation.

Making a generous display of that, when the slice of his sword disarmed his imaginary opponent's weapon, the swordsman halted the motion of his sword dance, and catching his breath, he wiped the sweat off his brow.

The sweat running down his forehead and cheeks, was evidence of just how earnestly the swordsman had enacted the dance of the blade—then, the swordsman turned to face the one he had been displaying his whole-hearted sword dance to,

Swordsman: "Just now, was a reenactment of when I fought against a guy who had eight arms."

???: "—Uu."

Swordsman: "Though, given that the opponent couldn't deliver any counters, it can't be considered a perfect reenactment. But, if we ever end up fighting again, I'll do it just like this time, without taking even a single hit."

???: "—Aah…"

Swordsman: "After I catch my breath, we'll move on to the next opponent. Next would be, that's right… finally, the figure of the Sword Saint."

Wanting to make a display, the swordsman—Wilhelm, attempted to continue.

However, he was interrupted. By none other than the very Sword Saint in question.

???: "That's more than enough, Wilhelm! What do you think you're doing with Heinkel?!"

A shrill voice was raised, and receiving it unexpectedly, Wilhelm turned around.

Glaring with strict eyes at Wilhelm as he stood right in the center of the mansion's yard, standing in a daunting pose with her hands on her hips, was the Sword Saint—Theresia.

The focus of her ire was Wilhelm, and the focus of her words was the one present by Wilhelm's side—the couple's child, Heinkel.

Wrapped up in a blanket, the infant had been laid within an inclined cradle upon a chair for the tea table. The reason for the cradle being inclined was simple; for if it were that way, it would make it easier to see. —The sword dance.

And, why was a sword dance being displayed? That was because—

Wilhelm: "It'd be best to get him accustomed to the sword early on, yeah? I've also made sure to place an order for a small sword that a baby can hold."

Theresia: "You, big sword dummy Wilhelm—!!!"

Far louder than her initial shout, it resounded through the gardens of the Astrea Mansion.

As if to follow the voice of its mother scolding its father, the baby also began to cry loudly.

2

—The child Wilhelm and Theresia had eagerly awaited, Heinkel Astrea, was born.

Given that this was directly preceded by an emergency that shook the Kingdom of Lugunica, His Majesty Gionis, wishing to spread good tidings, had wanted to raise a grand celebration throughout the nation for the birth of the couple's child, but they firmly refused him.

Of course, they were happy to be celebrated, but Heinkel was their own child—first and foremost, they had wished to prioritize the blessing of his life with family alone.

With that reasoning, His Majesty Gionis gave up on holding a festival, and thus, Sword Demon and Sword Saint, the son of those two heroes—Heinkel Astrea, was born into this world with ordinary celebrations.

Frankly, the journey leading up to Heinkel's birth could by no means be called an easy one, but he had been doing well after birth, and without undergoing any congenital illness or loss, he was given the stamp of approval of a healthy body.

Thanks to that, they could hope for him to grow up without any anguish, but—

Theresia: "No matter the case, you don't just try to put a sword in the hands of a baby who's not even one year old! You're also forbidden from swinging your sword all about the air right next to his cradle!"

Wilhelm: "Wait, don't just decide that all on your own. This is from my own experience, but when I was a brat, I always found myself wishing that I'd encountered the sword sooner. So, introducing him to the sword as soon as possible would be the quickest…"

Theresia: "Don't use your own abnormalities as a reference! You aren't normal, Wilhelm!"

Wilhelm: "You fell for such a man, and yet you say all those things?!"

As Wilhelm froze with his eyes wide open, Theresia's cheeks flushed red as she refuted in complete desperation with, "Yes, that's right, that's absolutely right."

It was a continuation of their argument in the yard from earlier. — After Theresia did her best to soothe the crying Heinkel, they left him in Grimm's care, ever-reliable as he was. Having had many younger siblings, Grimm was quite accustomed to looking after children; they were always being rescued by him and Carol.

Be that as it may, given that it was her own child, Theresia wished to be with Heinkel as much as possible. For that reason, this issue needed to be resolved.

Theresia: “You see, Wilhelm, people can’t live by the sword and the sword alone. Even if he is our child, I’ll need you to respect his wishes.”

Wilhelm: “…I get what you’re trying to say. But, Heinkel will be the next Sword Saint. You should know that.”

Theresia: “Uh, that’s…”

Wilhelm: “Since the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint is a Divine Protection that gets passed on, Heinkel’s life will be entwined with the sword no matter what. And so, the best way for him to get involved would be to learn about it early on. Am I wrong?”

Wilhelm narrowed his long-slitted eyes as he made a direct argument, causing Theresia to falter.

Despite having proved his lack of common sense by displaying a sword dance to their child up close, and attempting to give his favorite sword to the zero-year-old baby, was it not unfair for him to say something that sounded so reasonable here?

—In reality, Wilhelm’s concern was not a matter of overthinking things.

Theresia: “…After all, my brothers are all gone, and so is my father.”

As Wilhelm had said, the succession of the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint did not appear in individuals outside of House Astrea. And, Theresia had been bereaved of all her brothers, as well as her father, Bertol. Of course, there was likely a decent number of distant relatives related to the Astreas with diluted blood, but there was no past precedent of a Sword Saint emerging from those collateral families.

Ergo, the candidate to be the next Sword Saint would inevitably be Heinkel.

Theresia: “…Even though Heinkel is so small, and so cute…”

Wilhelm: “I understand your feelings. I also think he’s cute. But, when he saw his own face reflected in the blade of this sword, he laughed. He has a natural talent for the sword.”

Theresia: “…Wait. You put a sword that close to Heinkel’s face?”

Wilhelm: “…Shit.”

Having slipped up in his intent to persuade her, Wilhelm’s cheeks stiffened up. With a glare that seemed to bore a hole through Wilhelm’s expression, Theresia recovered her emotions.

The things he had been saying were somewhat believable, but it all seemed a sophism for the purpose of placing a sword into the hands of a zero-year-old.

To begin with—

Theresia: “The moment a person receives the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint, their ability as a swordfighter is elevated to the absolute limit. After all, I’m living proof! Even though I hadn’t held a sword even once up to that point, I completely trounced Thames-niisama despite him having always given it his all.”

Wilhelm: “Oi, don’t talk about your honorable elder brother like that… even if it’s true.”

Theresia recognized that she had indeed gone too far, and apologized to her brother in her heart.

Within the dream that Melinda’s Evil Eye had shown her, Thames had seen her off with a smile, but she imagined that even he would probably be hurt by what she had said just now, so she reflected a great deal.

To add on, as Theresia reflected so, Wilhelm continued, “Besides”,

Wilhelm: “Sure, you may be a precedent, but if we rely on that and don’t teach Heinkel anything about the sword at all, what then…? There’d be no guarantee of his safety until the Divine Protection is passed on.”

Theresia: “Wilhelm…”

Wilhelm: “A man of Astrea will invariably be faced with trial and tribulation. —Those were your father’s words.”

The words Wilhelm added on were weightier than anything else for Theresia.

Theresia’s father, as the one who had named Heinkel, Bertol’s sword arm was of little avail, but as a matter of fact, he was a man more worthy of the name Astrea than any other.

With the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint inherited by his younger brother, the path to becoming the Sword Saint was thus closed to him, but this did not dishearten Bertol in the slightest, and he was always thinking about the future of the Astreas. He may have gotten a little overly involved in Theresia’s future, but that too was out of love.

There was the weight of the words her father left behind, and the duties that the Astreas must fulfill.

Theresia: “…For the sake of the Kingdom, the Sword Saint must not cease to exist.”

Wilhelm: “That’s the important duty levied upon House Astrea. A duty that almost came to an end.”

Theresia: “…”

To keep the peace of the Kingdom of Lugunica, the Sword Saint had the duty of swinging the sword. Hitherto, twice had Theresia prioritized her own circumstances, and turned her back on that duty.

The first was in the midst of the Demi-Human War, when she could not muster up the courage to fight and had lost her brothers.

The second was when she was defeated by Wilhelm, and deprived of her role as the Sword Saint.

Thus, she could not afford to go against it a third time by failing in her duty of passing the torch of Sword Saint to the next generation.

Theresia: “…I’m sorry.”

Wilhelm: “…Why are you apologizing.”

Theresia: “It’s inexcusable to my mother, to His Majesty Gionis, and to you, Wilhelm… If my body was still able to have more children, such concerns would—”

Not have been necessary; Theresia had intended on continuing so.

—Amidst a series of difficult circumstances, Heinkel Astrea had been born safely. For that in itself, it was difficult to feel anything other than joy. However, in exchange for that, Theresia’s body became incapable of having another child.

Garitch Fabless, currently the best healer in the entire Kingdom, made the diagnosis. Provided with that diagnosis, it was difficult for them to hope for any more children. It was a matter regarding her own body, so Theresia also generally understood it.

Hence, the potential to inherit the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint, remained in Heinkel alone.

And so, for narrowing down the options in her own child’s life, and simply for being unable to have any children other than Heinkel, Theresia attempted to apologize. —But, she had been unable to do so.

Theresia: “…”

After all, as if to cut off her would-be next words, Wilhelm had stolen her lips.

Wilhelm: “In your case, this way is far more effective than striking you.”

Theresia: “~~Hk.”

As Theresia widened her eyes at the sudden act, Wilhelm spoke thus after parting lips.

She blinked her blue eyes in surprise, and in fact, each and every one of Theresia's various regrets and ruminations up until a moment prior were shaken away.

And then, before Theresia could regain her composure, Wilhelm mercilessly continued.

Wilhelm: “First of all, don't you dare apologize about that. You gave birth to Heinkel, and made it out alright. For me, there's no greater fruit of war. In this battle, you've achieved the highest rank of distinguished service.”

Theresia: “H-Highest rank of distinguished service…”

Wilhelm: “Be grateful. Grimm was able to marry Carol thanks to that.”

Theresia: “Hooray, yippie… like I would ever say…”

Wilhelm: “I'll say this once more. You won against that bastard Stride's plottings.”

Pressing his finger against Theresia's nose as she tried to continue to mumble, Wilhelm silenced her to an “Uh” and then crowned her so.

She had triumphed over Stride, the Destruction Wish. Even if she was told this, the ones who had defeated Stride were Wilhelm, Grimm, and the rest, so Theresia did not really feel like she had won—

Wilhelm: “That bastard probably had no intention of letting Heinkel… of letting you give birth to the baby in your belly. Once he killed Heinkel, you would have no longer been able to bear any kids. That ought to have been what he was aiming to do.”

Theresia: “…”

Wilhelm: “But, Heinkel was born. It was your total victory. He's probably crying out in vexation from the pits of Hell.”

It was an excessive proclamation of victory, but by no means could it be called unreasonable. After all, Stride had actually placed a curse on Heinkel when he was still in Theresia's womb.

Not only did he make Heinkel into a hostage, but he also applied further pain unto Theresia, so if he had indeed been planning to sever the future of the Kingdom, it would not have been strange. —Only, considering the love Melinda bore Stride, she could not be sure if that was truly what he had intended to do.

And, there no longer remained any means in this world to ascertain that.

Wilhelm: "You think I don't know that? That's why, I've no choice but to believe it. And once I believe, I've no choice but to build up grounds so that it can be believed."

Theresia: "Grounds, so that it can be believed? That means…"

Wilhelm: "It's a given. —The sword."

As he suddenly brought his face close, Theresia readied herself for another kiss, but blinking her eyes at the words of Wilhelm that followed, she spilled out a sigh.

Theresia: "…Ultimately, you return to that?"

Wilhelm: "Of course. From beginning to end, that's what we've been talking about."

Theresia: "Seriously now, you're really straightforward, and I respect that about you."

Half respect and half exasperation, with such feelings, Theresia drooped her shoulders, and Wilhelm shrugged his shoulders with a face as if to say he found that unexpected.

To be perfectly honest, she had quite a few reservations on the matter. The things Wilhelm was trying to do whilst thinking in a way only Wilhelm would were not wrong per se, but there were all kinds of problems with the way he was going about it.

Only, she also thought this. —It made her happy how Wilhelm earnestly loved Heinkel, how he earnestly worried about his future, and how he earnestly was trying to protect him in a way he knew how.

Before this child was born, Wilhelm too must have been anxious. Even Theresia had been so, and thus Wilhelm must have been as well.

Would they really be able to become good parents? Would they really be able to protect their child well?

Cutting down such various apprehensions, Wilhelm was trying to be a father. For Theresia, there was nothing that made her happier.

Theresia: “Alright, understood. Even if we discuss this together, you and I won’t reach an agreement, Wilhelm… so, we’ll take a vote together with Mother, Carol, and Grimm-kun as well.”

Wilhelm: “…Your mother ought to understand the duty of House Astrea.”

Theresia: “If that’s what you think, then feel free to openly insist on that to Carol and the rest.”

Wilhelm: “Wait… that’s it! Asking Heinkel himself should be the most fair. We’ll let Heinkel hold a sword, and if he laughs then we can go with my way of…”

Theresia: “Yeah, yeah, I won’t be hearing it. I’ve made up my mind!”

Wilhelm persisted without knowing when to give up, so Theresia turned her back towards him, and began to walk. Hastening to keep up by her side, Wilhelm did his best to mend things, but she had decided she would not listen to him.

Seeing how desperate Wilhelm was, Theresia thought this. —He had said various plausible things to her, but Wilhelm’s true motive was undoubtedly the following:

He wished to share that which he loved with his son as soon as possible, unbearably so.

Wilhelm: “It’s not just that. The sword, it’s what brought the two of us together…”

Hearing Wilhelm’s excuses, Theresia deliberately picked up her pace. If she continued to listen to Wilhelm’s fervent pleas like this, it was quite possible that she might be moved.

After all, this senseless person who only thought about the sword, was intolerably dear to Theresia.

—In the end, this day’s quarrel concluded with a unanimous vote for Theresia.

Nonetheless, the obstinate Wilhelm would still attempt to familiarize Heinkel with the sword whenever he saw an opportunity after that, inciting the wrath of Theresia, Carol, and the others.

And, that would only continue without end until subsequent years, when Heinkel developed an awareness of his surroundings and became eager to swing the sword of his own accord, and Wilhelm began swinging swords together with him whilst wearing a triumphant look on his face.

END

Sword Demon Battle Ballad: The Flower Field of That Day

1

???: “…”

Beholding the sight of dianas, swaying with their yellow petals as they filled the flower bed, Carol Fauzen involuntarily caught her breath, and stood stock still.

They were visiting the principal residence of House Astrea for the first time in a long while; provisioned for the Kingdom of Lugunica’s Royal Selection, it was currently being used as the base of operations for Felt, who House Astrea was supporting to become the next generation’s Monarch. Since the old Fauzen couple, serving House Astrea, was originally charged with maintenance of the secondary residence within the Royal Capital, the frequency of their visits to this location had reduced to once a year or not at all.

In addition, this occasion was not for the purpose of managing the mansion, but rather to ascertain whether Flam Remendis and Grassis Remendis—two of their granddaughters, were doing their jobs of serving Felt and taking care of her necessities properly.

Six months had passed since the Royal Selection began, and precisely because Felt’s Camp had now begun to operate on a full scale, she wished to remove any elements of unease. If there was perhaps any lack of ability or issues with their granddaughters, she would begin to consider exchanging duties with them—such was her attitude.

But then again, those fears of Carol’s were disavowed by the relevant parties the moment they arrived.

Felt: “I wrote the same thing in the letter as well, but there ain’t any problems with Flam or Grassis. They’re fully capable of their jobs, and they get on well with Rom-jii and the others. They aren’t timid with me in the slightest, nor are they putting me up on a pedestal just ‘cuz I’m a Royal Candidate.”

Welcoming Carol and Grimm’s arrival, Felt answered so upon hearing their concerns.

It had been quite a while since their parting at the Royal Capital, and while they had exchanged words through letters, the girl whom they had not come face to face with in a long time gave off an impression of having grown tougher since they had last seen her.

It was often the case that one’s circumstances and positions would change them, and Felt had indeed adapted well to her situation, unmistakably growing as a person.

Because it was Felt saying such things, Carol immediately believed that it was not a statement made out of favoritism or consideration regarding her granddaughters, and Grimm seemed to share that view.

With that being the case, Carol’s actions of saying this and that to convince Grimm and then spending several days to arrive at the principal residence, had ended up as mere overthinking with a jump to a wrong conclusion.

Felt: “Ah, just ‘cuz I have use for Flam and Grassis doesn’t mean you two are unneeded, Granny? There’s a buncha spare rooms, so you can stay here as long as you’d like. And if you do, I’ll eat up the sweets you bake everyday, Granny Carol.”

In baked sweets alone, Flam and Grassis were no match for Carol. —Thus, as Felt added that last bit, Carol gratefully presumed upon that thoughtfulness.

Grimm did not have any particular objections, and thinking to join in for another training after a long time with the trio that Felt had picked up in the Royal Capital, he stretched out his elderly shoulders as he headed to where they were. Grimm had been born a commoner, so he likely could not help but dote on youngsters trying to climb their way up from similar positions.

Though, since his lack of a voice made him short of words, and given that his teaching method was the way that the Zergev Squadron was trained, it seemed like Grimm's intentions were being effectively communicated to the trio.

Anyhow—

Carol: "I shall accept your kind offer, Felt-sama. In addition, would it be alright if I go have a tiny look around the mansion? Even if you say my grandchildren are doing their jobs properly, I am nonetheless worried."

Felt: "Don't mind in the slightest. Though I dunno if you'll find anything interesting while you're looking around."

As she spoke, Felt put both her hands behind her head as she trailed alongside Carol.

She ought to have been in a busy position, but to be able to make such considerations without any special awareness of it was a virtue of Felt, leaving Carol impressed at how well the girl had been raised.

Even if her foster parent was an individual whom Carol and Grimm had several reservations regarding—whilst harboring those feelings as they walked, she came to an abrupt halt upon arriving at the mansion's garden.

—That was the moment in which she had come to stand stock still, beholding the bed of yellow dianas.

Carol: "…Felt-sama, excuse me, that yellow flower field would be…"

Felt: "Hm? Ahh, gotcha, gotcha. Indeed, that there's something that you wouldn't have known about, Granny Carol, so I guess it caught you off guard."

Felt crossed her arms and spoke in good humor, to which Carol endured the discomposure, and did her best to muster a brief "Yes" in response.

—The diana flowers blooming on the surface of the flower bed, they had etched themselves deep within Carol's mind, and were tied intimately to certain recollections of the past. She had never thought she would have had another opportunity to witness them again like this at the principal residence of House Astrea.

Carol: "…Is it my grandchildren who tend to this flower bed?"

Felt: "Nah, they sometimes seem to harvest vegetables from the vegetable garden by the edge over there, but the flowers are different. That's something I'm making Reinhard do."

Carol: "—. The young master…"

Felt: "It was a miserable sight to see how this place had been left to run amok. So I told him, like, since it's your house, wouldn't it be better to grow flowers or something, and this here's the result. That guy, no matter what I make him do, he ends up doing it well, it's damn irritating."

That was something difficult to agree with as a servant, however, hearing that it was Reinhard who cultivated this flower field, Carol's thoughts were not focused on that.

A diana flower field and House Astrea, Reinhard and Felt, and—

Carol: "—Theresia-sama."

What suddenly spilled out from Carol's lips, was the name of a person whose loveliness could not be diminished by even the passage of time.

Hearing that faint utterance, Felt looked at Carol in a startled manner.

Felt: "G-Granny, why are you suddenly crying? Is something wrong?"

Carol: "F-Forgive me. The tears just… as I get older, I suppose I mustn't let the tears come so easily."

Felt: "Like I'd ever let such a flimsy excuse fly! Ahh, geez, over here! Sit! Settle down for now! Take deep breaths, and focus on me!”

The untactful deception failing to work, Felt pulled Carol by the arm, the latter’s tears not coming to a cease even when she wiped them, and vigorously dragged her along to the edge of the garden.

Unable to go against the forcefulness of that hand, Carol felt as if the figures of those who had done similar things for her overlapped with the back of the girl as she lumbered on, causing just a few more tears to run down her wrinkled, elderly cheeks.

2

Carol: “I used to serve the young master’s predecessor as Sword Saint, Theresia van Astrea-sama. Those flowers, they are the flowers that Theresia-sama loved tremendously.”

Felt: “Predecessor… Reinhard’s grandma, huh?”

Carol: “Indeed. During her lifetime, she and Tishua-sama… that would be Theresia-sama’s mother. They were close as mother and daughter, and so more than just a flower bed, they turned the entirety of the mansion’s surroundings into a flower field. —When Tishua-sama passed away, as her casket was filled up with flowers and sent off, the mansion’s flowers…”

At the edge of the garden, the two sat side by side on a bench, and Carol spoke bit by bit as she looked at the flowers in the flower bed.

Carol recalled Theresia and Tishua, the two of them were truly so harmonious as mother and daughter, that their relationship seemed to be as carefree as that of sisters. The reminiscences of those two, tied to that flower bed as they were, could only be described as ones that began with smiles, and concluded with smiles.

But, even so—

Felt: “If I’m recalling correctly, she was done in by the White Whale, Reinhard’s grandma.”

Carol: “…Yes. In the Great Conquest fourteen years ago, Theresia-sama participated in the subjugation squadron in the position of Sword Saint as a representative of the Kingdom. Neither I nor Grimm were able to accompany her.”

Felt: “…”

Carol: “Since then, the flower bed went neglected and untouched. I, too… while it was a presumption, was reluctant to let anybody other than Theresia-sama lay their hands on the flower bed, and so…”

In the principal residence of the house she served, her excuse of the flower bed having been beaten down by the weather, had been the worst of the worst.

Set adrift by emotion, if she were to be criticized as having lost sight of her duty as a servant, Carol would have no words to object. Even if that caused her entire track record in serving House Astrea for many years to be written off, it had been a mistake regarding which she could give no excuse.

However, as Carol tightly clasped her hands together on her lap, Felt took a short breath, and,

Felt: “Granny Carol, you really held Reinhard’s grandma dear, I get that. I ain’t someone who knows the circumstances, so I’m in no position to say all this and that about it. Only…”

Carol: “Only, what exactly?”

Felt: “The White Whale’s dead. The Royal Candidates… the duchess nee-chan and the half-devil nee-chan, as well as Anastasia-neechan, all grouped together to kill it. He was also there, yeah? Reinhard’s grandpa was there to avenge Reinhard’s grandma.”

Carol: “…”

Felt: “Even though she was avenged, have your feelings not brightened up yet, Granny? When you look at that flower bed, are there only bitter and tough emotions that come welling up? So then, doesn’t that mean vengeance served no purpose whatsoever?”

Carol: “That is not… hk.”

At Felt’s following words, Carol’s voice involuntarily grew coarse. But, before it could turn bitter and rigid, her feelings dispersed upon looking into Felt’s eyes.

Felt’s red eyes peered at Carol, who had gone as quiet as a great lake.

Feeling as if her own face was being reflected on the surface of that lake, Carol’s voice quivered,

Carol: “That is not, the case. There was significance, in that vengeance. With Theresia-sama avenged, I too feel relief from the bottom of my heart… if only the master would hence return…”

Felt: “If he returns…?”

Carol: “…Would the state of House Astrea not return to how it was before, I wonder?”

Guided by a girl far more youthful than she was, Carol came to speak of her wish, and then became disgusted with her own wretchedness and lack of growth.

Merely getting on in years through idleness and futility, she even felt as if her heart had not grown in the slightest. When one grew old, they were supposed to learn how to come to an understanding, and gradually come to understand resignation and compromise.

And yet, Carol had not changed from the days when she had been young and foolish. —She was reluctant to come to a resignation, compromise, or understanding. After all, they were all Theresia’s direct family.

Wilhelm, Reinhard, and even Heinkel.

Carol: “When Theresia-sama passed away, all of the buttons were mismatched. The things that have occurred cannot be made to have not taken place. Even so…”

She did not wish for them to give up on struggling to recover something that could not be recovered from.

In order to not relinquish something that must absolutely never be relinquished, the man who accomplished things thought impossible, could only have been the Sword Demon. That man had once reached the Sword Saint. In that case, she wished for him to once again succeed in reaching the Sword Saint.

After all, the subjugation of the White Whale ought to have become a definite impetus for that.

Felt: "—I see. I finally get just how big a deal the White Whale's death was to you and the rest, Granny Carol. That goes for that damn Reinhard too."

Carol: "Felt-sama, the young master is…"

Felt: "Yeah, he doesn't show it on his face in the slightest. Even when he heard that the White Whale was struck down, all he said was that the group that killed it accomplished a considerable feat… fucking shit! Really, that damn blockhead!"

Sat on the bench, Felt raised up her legs and kicked the grass. For a while, Felt's anger did not subside, and she repeated that a few times with rough breathing out her nose,

Felt: "You know why he doesn't talk about that sorta thing, Granny? He says things like he doesn't want to impose on me or anyone else around because of his own circumstances. He's always imposing on people as much as he pleases, and yet this is how it is when it comes to his personal matters! It seriously pisses me off!"

Carol: "P-Please calm down, Felt-sama. The reason the young master cannot easily speak of his own wishes is because…"

Felt: "Because he's the damn Sword Saint! If he doesn't like it then he oughta just quit!"

Carol: "…"

Baring her high canines, Felt shouted in anger and left Carol speechless.

For a person of the Kingdom of Lugunica to so flippantly and thoughtlessly suggest that the Sword Saint leave their post was by no means a good thing to say, much less for a Royal Candidate. — However, there was once a man who had done exactly that.

Loathing the fact that she was Sword Saint, yet still bearing it as her duty, a woman had once attempted to forfeit her own happiness in order to save the futures of many people, and by that very man she had been saved.

Though, what Felt desired here was not the same thing as that.

Carol: "…The young master does not seem to wish to give up on being the Sword Saint."

Felt: "I know that, dammit! Ahh, shit! That's why it pisses me off so much!"

Scratching at her head, Felt glared at the sky in frustration. As Felt desperately tried to fight against something, Carol found her figure to appear extremely radiant.

Theresia and Reinhard had different circumstances. Of course, Felt and Wilhelm were also different.

The former two were both Sword Saints, and the latter two were both positioned to make some influence on the Sword Saint, but, the circumstances surrounding them and the conclusions they desired, both differed from the other—

Carol: "—No, what is being desired, is happiness."

At least, that was the case for the conclusions. From the bottom of her heart, what Carol desired for Theresia, for Reinhard, for Wilhelm, for Heinkel, and for the individuals of House Astrea, was that and that alone.

For that alone, why was it so difficult to intersect with, and bring to fruition?

Carol: "Felt-sama, do you perhaps have an idea of what the young master is thinking?"

Felt: “Ah? It’s actually pretty easy to tell what he’s thinking. Isn’t the problem not what he’s thinking, but why the hell he thinks that way?”

Carol: “…”

Felt: “He’s been acting as the Sword Saint since he was a brat, and there’s the stuff with his grandma and grandpa… and also, that father of his. I’ve only met him once, but his father reeked of booze. And then there’s…”

Carol: “—Louanna-sama. The young master’s, lady mother.”

As Felt counted out the problems on her fingers, Carol brought forth the final name—Louanna Astrea, afflicted by the Sleeping Beauty illness, was Reinhard’s birth mother, under an eternal slumber for the past seventeen years.

Her slumber and the death of Theresia, were the foundation of House Astrea’s distortion.

Felt: “I’ve got no choice but to speak with Reinhard’s father at some point. After all, the headship of House Astrea is in his hands. If I’m careless, it’s quite possible that he’ll evict us from here.”

Carol: “Heinkel-sama would…”

Felt: “Not even Granny Carol’s or Gramps Grimm’s knuckles could discipline him. That damn Reinhard doesn’t seem like he’d be all too eager to either. —In that case, there’s no choice but to do it myself.”

Carol: “…”

Felt: “At first, I was being dragged around against my will, but ultimately, I’m the one who’s deciding what to do. No matter how I may look, I’m Reinhard’s master, after all.”

Taking a long, deep breath, Felt cleared her throat at the end with an “Ah” in displeasure.

After her valiant and reliable proclamation the moment prior, Felt immediately seemed to grunt like a stray cat; Carol was taken aback, and then she felt exhausted.

After getting on in years, it was rare for her emotions to be shaken—such a thing would be a bold-faced lie. Even at an age where she had grandchildren, Carol was thoroughly impacted by every single action of the people precious to her.

Carol narrowed her blue eyes, gazed over the flowers in the flower bed swaying in the wind, and suddenly uttered.

Carol: “Felt-sama, do you like flowers?”

Felt: “…”

Carol: “Felt-sama?”

Felt: “Sorry, I was just thinking ‘bout how Reinhard’s asked me the same thing before. Back then, I answered that I neither liked them nor disliked them, but…”

Wearing a frown, Felt glanced around the area. Carol inclined her head as she witnessed that behavior, and then Felt brought her face up close to her, and whilst speaking in a hushed voice,

Felt: “Recently, I’ve started to think that they’re actually relatively pleasant. Keep it a secret from him, alright?”

Carol: “…Although, I am very sure the young master would be delighted to hear such a thing.”

Felt: “That’s why I don’t wanna tell him! At the very least, I won’t tell him until he directly asks about it.”

Saying that, Felt stuck her tongue out with a “Behhh” and stood up from the bench, stretching her back out.

Carol saw her away as she walked towards the flower bed, and, in the vacant seat of the bench, Grimm suddenly sat himself down.

Grimm: “…”

The wordless Grimm was not sweating, but it seemed like he felt fulfilled from his time with his favorite disciples. Perceiving that from the side of his face, Carol gently rested her head on her husband's shoulder.

Grimm nestled close with his invariant reliability and kindness, and whilst reflecting on how beloved and treasured he was to her, Carol ruminated on her preceding conversation with Felt many times over.

It might still be too early. To lament how she had been unable to do anything, it was too early.

If perhaps her wish could still yet be granted, then please, just once more, she wished to swear to Theresia from the bottom of her heart.

—That she, Carol Fauzen, once again wished to cherish the girl who had shouldered a tremendous fate whilst standing amidst a field of yellow flowers, and serve as her strength.

END

Volume 40

Chapters 14-23

Prologue:
The Days Spent Chasing that Star

—Over and over again, when made to loop through an endless hallway, Aldebaran took a moment to ponder, and then flung open the door he had first entered through.

???: "…I have been saying this for a long time now, but I am able to accept any outcome as interesting no matter the result, and I consider having my preconceived expectations overturned an experience that makes my heart throb."

Aldebaran: "Heh, so then?"

???: "And yet, I wonder why this is? Even though your current actions fulfill both of the prerequisites I raised as examples… I feel somewhat annoyed."

Aldebaran: "That's probably because you're discontent with the fact that I pulled the right answer on my first go!"

As soon as he had opened the door, the Witch made an evidently displeased expression, and then began to prattle on about her mindset; to her, Aldebaran raised his voice in such a manner.

The endless hallway he had been tossed into, a space that continued to loop, to phrase it as the Witch would, it was a place of great intrigue, but—

Aldebaran: "Sorry, but I tend to pull the right answer on the first try when it's these sorta rules. Though, from the perspective of a GM, they'd probably want me to step through all the events they'd prepared for me."

Witch: "—. "Jee Emm", this is the first time I am hearing that word. May I ask its meaning?"

Aldebaran: "Game master. It refers to the person who has control over the location, events, and the space as a whole… basically, that's what you are here, Teacher."

Witch: "I see, I shall remember this. "Jee Emm", "Jee Emm"… GM, hm?"

Muttering several times so as to familiarize it to her mouth, she immediately got a hold of the pronunciation.

Her ever constant learning ability displayed to him, Aldebaran felt admiration as well as a sense of unease. The knowledge-thirsty Witch had a keen interest in the unknowns being emitted from Aldebaran.

However, the tree bearing fruits of knowledge would eventually dry up, ceasing to supply her with the apples she so dearly coveted.

When that time came, by the Witch, Aldebaran would be—

Witch: "Why the long face? Is something the matter?"

Aldebaran: "…"

As Aldebaran suddenly plunged himself into thought, the Witch peered at him from a defenseless proximity.

The smooth fluttering of beautiful white hair, and the black eyes that seemed to be adorned in a blanket of snow from her long lashes; with those refined facial features and thin lips so close, Aldebaran reflexively clasped the other person's face with both his hands.

The Witch's cheeks were smooshed in with a "Mmghuu", and thus made so that he would not feel flustered even at this close range.

Aldebaran: "Phew, that was a close one."

Witch: "Wait wait wait, is that not strange?! You are handling my face so roughly, and instead of feeling guilty, you are feeling relieved?! "

Aldebaran: "That's what's called a difference in perspective."

Witch: “Let~go~of~me-.”

With her mysterious air from a moment ago having vanished somewhere, the Witch grabbed the hands of Aldebaran which were clasping her cheeks, and tried to wriggle her way free from this treatment.

But, even with the Witch’s desperate resistance, she was far too weak and feeble.

Aldebaran: “Or maybe, fragile…!”

Witch: “I am curious about which term you would select to best describe me, but for now just get your hands… wah-wah!”

Pitying the excessively weak Witch, the moment he released her, she tumbled over backwards. Promptly supporting her with a “woah there”, he was surprised by how she was lighter than she looked.

Aldebaran: “You’re a woman who seems like she would die easily.”

Witch: “Thanks for the help. But, I find what you said there a bit unexpected. Not to mention, the expression “die easily” is ill-suited to my current self. Would you not agree?”

Aldebaran: “…”

Witch: “Also, if we are to give points from the perspective of dying easily, you would have me beat by an overwhelmingly high score. I am not referring to your Authority, but to your very way of life.”

As the Witch deliberately and thoroughly added on, Aldebaran became unable to say anything.

Aldebaran: “…My bad.”

What she was saying was correct. To the point that he wished for her to be wrong, it was correct.

Reluctant to have that pointed out once again, Aldebaran turned to face the door behind him, and asked, Aldebaran: “That hallway, just what was your intention in preparing it?”

Witch: “I thought it might serve to let you take a breather, and serve as training for your ability to think logically. Unfortunately, it was far too short to be a breather, and instead of your logical thinking ability, you surmounted it through intuition.”

Aldebaran: “Good grief, even though it was a work you were so confident in. I guess you could hope for it to be recycled for somebody else one day. Make sure to write down the methodology in a book.”

The grand aspirations of the pen-ready Witch notwithstanding, Aldebaran understood that the space he had so carelessly spoiled was the crystallization of tremendously advanced Yin Magic.

It was neither something fine to create so casually, nor was it something fine to irresponsibly do too often.

Aldebaran: “—The more you know, the depths only get deeper, and the mountains only get higher.”

He only had an understanding of the fact that the time he was spending was luxurious, and was terribly unconfident regarding how much of a true sense actually accompanied those thoughts.

All of those things could only begin to manifest once he had a point of reference outside of himself. And, in Aldebaran’s world, there existed not much other than himself.

In particular, those were the Witch before his eyes, and—

Witch: “—菜月Natsuki□昴Subaru“

As if to cling to his ears, as if to besmear his eardrums, as if to implant into his brain; each and every time he heard it, those six syllables scratched at Aldebaran’s being, disallowing his composure.

Normally, he would think nothing of each of those six syllables, but only when strung together in that order, did they distort his soul.

Knowing that full well, the Witch who had spoken that name to Aldebaran smiled,

Witch: “Well then, shall we begin, Aldebaran? Yesterday, how long did it take again?”

Aldebaran: “—One hundred times, exactly.”

Witch: “Aldebaran?”

Even though he would never forget that, the Witch who had enquired because she wanted to make Aldebaran say it, was abhorrent.

Abhorrent as she was, the fact that he could not fully hate her was painful, stressful, humiliating, and pathetic.

—If this person abandoned him, just what in the world would he have left? For himself, who by no means would ever be able to be reflected in those amethyst eyes, the eyes he desperately wished would look at him the most, what would be left?

Inclining her head, the Witch peered at Aldebaran.

Despite the black eyes of that Witch and his own black eyes both being the same black, was the reason they did not appear as the same hue perhaps a result of the contrast between himself with the Witch?

If he contrasted them like that, which one would—ahh, those sorts of things did not matter.

He would fulfill the role desired of him. Rather than being desired by nobody, this was a hundred times better.

That was why—

Aldebaran: “Ahh, that’s right. It’s starting, Teacher. So that I may be myself.”

Chapter 14:
The Strongest

1

???: "…"

Red hair blazed as a brilliant flame, blue eyes imprisoned the perfect clarity of the azure skies; from head to toe, this was a being created with heroism untainted, with naught an impurity.

The birth of such a being had been blessed by the world, a chosen one who had perpetually existed as his own antithesis.

Standing imposingly in the center of the sprawling Sand Sea, under the chill of night, Reinhard cast his gaze, causing all the hairs on Aldebaran's body to stand on end.

—The Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea.

Needless to say, in the Kingdom of Lugunica—nay, even if one were to search far and wide across the entire world, he was a being who went without peer, and one of the two greatest obstacles in Aldebaran's plan.

Still, the other of the two had been none other than Natsuki Subaru, but his entrapment via Ol Shamak alongside Beatrice, who likewise had been a matter of concern, had already been completed successfully.

Hence, among the individuals with whom a clash was certain, this man remained as the greatest barrier.

—Very well, Reinhard van Astrea was the strongest.

The Blue Lightning, Cecilus Segmunt, was faster; the Admirer, Halibel, made greater use of techniques; the Mad Prince, Vague Adgard, was further distanced from death; the Great Spirits enrolled among the Four Greats exceed him in Mana; the Sin Archbishops of the Witch Cult possessed irrational Authorities; the Witches of Sin had taken far more lives; many virtuous individuals were better at lying; and many scoundrels were more unfalteringly obstinate.

When looking at individual aspects generally, there were plenty of individuals who surpassed Reinhard.

Nevertheless, Reinhard van Astrea's seat as the strongest would not be shaken. —Tearing down that definitive strongest bastion, was the absolute victory condition levied upon Aldebaran.

Aldebaran: "If I do say so myself, this is the worst situation to be placed in."

"Aldebaran": "It's too late to be complaining about the lackluster hand you've been dealt. Be sure to make good use of me as a joker."

Aldebaran: "…When you look at him, Dragon me, what do you make of the Sword Saint?"

"Aldebaran": "I'd say the same as you, human me… but I guess not. From what I can sense of his strength with this body, I think it might be even worse than what you're thinking."

From behind Aldebaran, that which narrowed its golden eyes as it gazed upon Reinhard was a supreme lifeform that spoke in a manner lacking the dignity of its station, the Divine Dragon Volcanica—nay, the empty dragonhusk into which the Memories of Aldebaran had been installed, the Divine Dragon "Aldebaran".

Sharing the same fundamental knowledge, thoughts, ideas, and even objectives in the present situation, "Aldebaran" was a dependable lifeline for the near helpless Aldebaran.

"Aldebaran" had also asserted that it ought to be utilized as a joker effectively. Showing restraint had never been in his intentions, but with that he resolved his heart to squeeze the utmost usage out of it.

And, as Aldebaran finished re-ascertaining the cards in his hand—

Reinhard: "—From the lineage of Sword Saints, Reinhard van Astrea.”

Aldebaran: “…”

As his skin tingled with gooseflesh, Aldebaran narrowed his eyes within his helmet.

To announce one’s name and title before an opponent in a standoff was common courtesy amongst fighters in this world. As astonishing as it may seem, it was a courtesy that even the Sin Archbishops abided by; for some it was to uphold their pride, for some it was out of respect to their opponent, for some it served to immerse themselves in a superiority complex, and for some it invigorated their cowardly selves; it was something that people levied upon themselves for a variety of reasons.

And the reason as to why the Sword Saint, Reinhard, was conforming to that courtesy, was plain from the look in his eyes.

In this situation, Reinhard was paying respect to Aldebaran. —Albeit he would have supposedly learned of what Aldebaran had done in the Tower from Flam, he still did so.

Such was Reinhard’s virtue, which simultaneously was the source of the unbridgeable gap between him and others. The way in which Aldebaran interpreted it, was not something he would specifically reveal, but—

Aldebaran: “Sin Archbishop of the Witch Cult, representing Pride, Stride Vollachia.”

Reinhard: “—Hk.”

Aldebaran: “Now wouldn’t it be amusing if I said something like that?”

—He made the decision to merely trample upon his opponent’s respect in insult.

“Aldebaran”: “—BOHRRRGGGHHH!!!”

The response was one akin to sticking out his tongue to an outstretched hand, causing Reinhard's eyes to widen; then, simultaneously with a clumsy roar, a white light surged towards the Sword Saint as he stood unflinching.

Unaccustomed to piloting the freshly hijacked dragonhusk, it was a terribly misshapen attack—however, the power of the Dragon's breath unleashed from that almighty body was very much authentic.

If the breath unleashed upon Garfiel and Ezzo on the highest floor of the Pleiades Watchtower right after overwriting its Memories were a sneeze, then this blast was charged with a definite intent for destruction.

To demonstrate the difference in accumulated destructive force, a surging wave of white energy engulfed Reinhard, one that would alter the form of the deserted Sand Sea for the rest of all eternity.

He did not think it could kill him. But, if done without the intent to kill, there would not even be a fight.

As proof of that—

"Aldebaran": "—Hk, fall back, me!!"

Aldebaran: "Uooooaahhhh?!"

After the entirety of its breath was expelled, white smoke drifting out of the enormous crater it had created in the Sand Sea, "Aldebaran" suddenly reached out its talons and hooked Aldebaran, flinging him to the side without restraint.

Split off from his literal alternate self, Aldebaran's body was tossed about by the sudden betrayal, and across the mostly flattened sand he tumbled, tumbled, and tumbled until he braked.

Then, expelling the sand that had intruded through the gaps in his helmet, he looked up—he saw that in truth, "Aldebaran's" actions had not been betrayal, but instead had been providing cover.

Reinhard ought to have taken a direct hit from the Dragon's breath, but unscathed, he had leapt towards "Aldebaran", thus commencing the grand decisive battle between two monsters of mismatched size.

"Aldebaran": "You didn't even get a burn?! I'm not saying that ain't praiseworthy, but what's the principle behind that?!"

Reinhard: "I borrowed the power of the Dragon Sword. Even if the day of this world's ruin were to come, this sword would not be destroyed. That is how it was forged to be. And so, I parried."

"Aldebaran": "Though from that answer, ultimately what's incredible isn't the sword, but you! That still doesn't explain how you didn't get burned!"

Reinhard: "That would be the effect of the Divine Protection of Sunburn."

Whilst giving an apathetic reply, Reinhard spun around in the air and unleashed a kick. Clashing head on with the dragonclaw tearing through the sky, a sound akin to nearby fireworks or cannonfire boomed in an explosion.

Each and every blow delivered a destructive power that even warriors who had undergone the most assiduous of training would be unable to withstand, but to the horror of many, those were standard attacks for the Sword Saint and the Dragon both.

That was to say, this combat continued without pause or pull.

Aldebaran: "Shit, gahhhhh…!"

Both combatants strung out chains of rapid attacks giving rise to an unbelievable symphony of explosions, and with each strike, the resultant shock waves blew away the sand of the Sand Sea, and made an attempt to tear Aldebaran away from the ground that he clung to.

The clash between two of the strongest living beings in the realm, for one spectating from several dozen meters away as it unfolded, guaranteed no place was secure. However, Aldebaran could not opt for leaving the battlefield due to his own pathetic self. —There was a limit to the updates of his matrix.

Currently, if he were to get too far away from the position at which the matrix had been defined, his Territory would come crumbling down, and Aldebaran would end up losing the few advantages he possessed against Reinhard.

That must be avoided at all costs.

Reinhard: "—. Powerful. However, it is far too different from before."

Meanwhile, as Aldebaran clung to the battlefield, Reinhard moved back a great deal to open some distance after having traded a great many blows against the Dragon, and muttered so.

Placing a hand upon the hilt of the Dragon Sword, the Sword Saint was not even a little short on breath, and as he displayed his serious countenance "Aldebaran" groaned an "Ahh?" without a hint of exhaustion.

In response, Reinhard shook his head to the side with a "Nothing",

Reinhard: "The other day, when I was proceeding towards the Watchtower together with Flam, Ezzo-dono, and the rest, I ended up quarreling with you… with the Divine Dragon Volcanica due to a misunderstanding, but compared to then, your movements and intentions are far too different."

As Reinhard pointed that out, "Aldebaran" maintained silence. However, his judgment had been accurate. In reality, that which Reinhard had previously fought against was the real Divine Dragon Volcanica—though, it would have been in a dragonhusk state, bereft of its contents after producing a dragonkin.

When comparing between now and then, it would have undoubtedly seemed that he had undergone a complete change in personality.

And having guessed the correct answer, upon verifying his insight, Reinhard continued.

Reinhard: "The current you is weaker than the last time. Why is that?"

“Aldebaran”: “…Argh.”

Reinhard: “—?”

“Aldebaran”: “No, no no, no no no, it’s only natural for you to say that. It’s just as you say, I can’t get full use out of this body. So, I guess I’m kinda weak, eh? Were that the case, there wouldn’t be even a single thing strange about it whatsoever. Only—”

At Reinhard’s unmalicious misgivings, “Aldebaran” broke off his words there. Then, with the profile of a Dragon that differed far too much from that of a human, he gave a sneering grin that could nonetheless be understood as such,

“Aldebaran”: “Now, I’m kinda wanting to show you a thing or two.”

Directly following that declaration, “Aldebaran” spread its wings, giving rise to a gale as it soared.

Closing the distance on Reinhard in an instant, it swung down its arms, each akin to great trees, aiming to crush him flat. Seeing that transparent offensive, Reinhard seemed to disregard his poor footing—in fact, as the Divine Protection of Sandplay allowed him to disregard it, he leapt between “Aldebaran’s” arms towards its chest, and drove a counterattack into it.

“Aldebaran”: “Gohk—!!”

Spreading his long legs, one to the heavens and the other to earth, Reinhard delivered a kick, landing a direct hit on the Dragon where a human’s solar plexus would have been located, tossing the gargantuan creature straight upwards.

Instead of flying through the air with its wings, “Aldebaran” had been forcibly launched upwards, and chasing it, Reinhard leapt up and caught up to the skybound Dragon—nay, he pulled ahead. Then, stepping upon the soaring Dragon with the tips of his toes, he forcibly halted the upward momentum.

Reinhard: “Apologies, but this is as far as it goes.”

Reinhard appeared to be standing upon the back of “Aldebaran” midair, and the hand he held aloft, brandishing naught as he readied a karate chop, was sharper and more lethal a blade than any commonplace renowned sword.

That brandish seemed as if it could likely sever even the Divine Dragon’s dragonhusk, but—

“Aldebaran”: “I said I’d show you a thing or two… go along with me a little while longer.”

Right before it could bask in the karate chop, “Aldebaran” muttered so after being pushed around at Reinhard’s will. Hearing the Dragon’s voice, with a hint of scheming mixed in amidst the bitterness, Reinhard slightly frowned.

Witnessing that from afar, gazing up at the supreme beings in the aether from down on the surface, Aldebaran spoke.

Aldebaran: “—Plan A.”

Reinhard: “—Hk.”

Given the distance, it was unthinkable that Reinhard could have heard Aldebaran’s voice. On the other hand, one might think that it would not be out of the ordinary for him to have heard it, but there would be no point in asking.

—After all, the light of a star twinkling in the night sky was plummeting down, aiming directly for the Sword Saint.

2

—Al Shario.

This spell, regarded as a specialty of a Witch of yore, was one accepted to be a forbidden technique.

Shining down from beyond the sky, stars were perpetually burning masses of Mana, and by utilizing the property of attraction between Mana of the same type, the unbelievable marvel of casting one to the earth could be realised.

But naturally, to bring a star down upon a precise location required both delicate control over magic and an unfathomable quantity of Mana. In exchange for the difficulty of realizing such a technique, the Mana contained in the star's light could rival the amount held by a Great Spirit, even extolled to have once felled a weyr of Dragons.

In terms of destructive power, it easily surpassed even the ruinous breath of Dragons, beings bestowed with the right to tear the world asunder with just their roar, and so it could therefore be proclaimed to be the pinnacle of destructive acts.

???: "Magic, it is a miraculous discipline with the hidden potential to make anything one imagines into reality, were you unaware? The creation of a spell so powerful that it would cause one to scoff at something like a Dragon's breath was inevitable when considering there were those who wished to surpass it… eventually, a spell even more powerful than the magic capable of plunging a star will be born. Is it not wonderful, that humans truly possess such Greed?"

Such had once been stated to Aldebaran by a Witch with beautiful white hair, a smug expression drawn upon her face.

It was still irritating to remember her smug face from back then, but he did believe that it was no lie or bluff. After all, that smug-faced Witch had personally shown him the real thing.

In other words, this what surpassed even the breath of a Dragon, stood as the zenith—or rather, stood as the zenith of destruction at this point in history.

Aldebaran: "Piece of shit."

For any given pinnacle, there remained the possibility to surpass it by means of new ideas and the magic to bring them to life.

Al Shario was no exception. Gritting his teeth as he made the correction in his head in accordance with the Witch's teachings, Aldebaran wished for the fruit borne of that starlight.

—He would rather not admit it, but by studying under the Witch, Aldebaran had been bequeathed all sorts of knowledge.

Amidst the wisdom bestowed unto him, knowledge about magic was present in no small amount. However, even if he were able to learn the theories and methodologies behind implementing magic, Aldebaran lacked the essential talent required.

Even supposing a person knew how to heat water, a bathtub could not be filled with a single cup's worth of water.

In that case, why had the Witch imparted knowledge of magic unto Aldebaran if he would be unable to utilize it?

Did she merely wish to show off her knowledge, to don that smug expression? Was it because even if he was unable to use it, there would be some obstacles possible to overcome with a knowledge of magic, and so she had wished to make her pupil's path a little smoother?

Either one of those would be nothing more than by-products of the Witch's main objective in doing so.

The real reason for which the Witch had crammed Aldebaran full of magical knowledge, that would be—

"Aldebaran": "—Al Shario."

Launched up into the midst of the sky, the Dragon voiced the incantation to cast a star down towards the nighttime Sand Sea.

Whilst holding immense power, the Divine Dragon, Volcanica, was left vacant after its soul had been excised—"Aldebaran" now housed its Memories within that dragonhusk, finally completed as an existence capable of fulfilling the requirements to make shine the long-unused treasures the Witch had granted him.

To rephrase, it was with precisely this motive that the Witch had filled Aldebaran with knowledge.

The specific combination of Aldebaran's knowledge and the acquisition of the Dragon's dragonhusk by "Aldebaran", these were the means by which he would surmount the greatest wall at the extremity of the bricks laid to an extent that one might take as the realm of a billion.

Reinhard: “…”

Looking up at the sky from atop the Dragon’s back, even Reinhard’s eyes went wide.

The starlight cascading down from the heavens was as mighty as that unleashed by Sphinx in the midst of the final battle in the Vollachian Empire, a battle which had shown premonitions of the world’s end.

After making free use of all sorts of dirty moves, Sphinx had finally been able to perform this forbidden technique. Though Aldebaran now trembled at seeing this extraordinary Dragon perform it without any external support, he kept a watchful eye on Reinhard’s movements in the sky.

That Al Shario could not be defended against, he would not take such an optimistic viewpoint.

In fact, the Blue Lightning, who was considered to be on par with the Sword Saint, had achieved a feat of supremacy unbounded by slaying a falling star with a single slice of his katana during the decisive battle for the Imperial Capital.

That star had been cut down through the combined effect of Cecilus’s swordsmanship and the Dream Sword’s power; he did not think that Reinhard, unable to draw the Dragon Sword as he was, could replicate such a feat.

But, even if it was grounds for being careless, that was no reason to underestimate him.

Therefore—

“Aldebaran”: “OH, OHHHHH—!!!”

Before Reinhard could do anything in response to the starlight, “Aldebaran” roared and made a half-turn midair, rotating to face Reinhard who had his back to it, and struck him with its wing.

Reinhard promptly received this blow with his elbow and knee, but the Dragon's aim was not to cut him with its wing, but rather to blow Reinhard away with the impact—towards the star.

"Aldebaran": "—HAAHRAAN!!"

As had been the case at first contact, Reinhard possessed the means by which to dash through the sky—no, to use the clouds as footholds, by means of the Divine Protection of Clouds he possessed. Before he could regain his balance, "Aldebaran's" roar mowed down the clouds in the vicinity and launched Reinhard further into the sky.

With naught a foothold, with naught an escape route, Reinhard would defenselessly collide with the airborne starlight.

With conditions substantially worse than what they had been for the starslayer during the decisive battle for the Imperial Capital, even Reinhard would have no means of dealing with the incoming blow of this star—

Reinhard: "—I have received it."

At that moment, Reinhard stretched out his leg as a last resort, his toe making contact with the star, and the consequent explosive energy swallowed the Sword Saint, setting off a star-rending explosion—was what should have happened.

However, the explosion that was supposed to occur never came about, and instead, Reinhard walked along the side of the star.

Aldebaran: "What…"

"Aldebaran": "The hell?!"

When the collapse of the heavens that ought to have forced him to choose between the twin options of oblivion or evasion came, both were sidestepped, thus the astonished voices of Aldebaran and "Aldebaran" echoed across the Sand Sea.

To the bewilderment of both, Reinhard walked up the side of the star, and after arriving at the top, Reinhard: “Divine Protection of Ball Balancing.”

“Aldebaran”: “Ball, Balancing…”

Aldebaran: “You’re treating it as a fireball, eh?”

Upon receiving his answer, he became speechless at the beam of destruction being treated as a fireball. However, that speechlessness was soon painted over by a rising sense of dread.

If one believed that the Divine Protection of Ball Balancing was what it sounded like, then a ball balancer at a circus did not merely stand atop a ball, but controlled it at will—

“Aldebaran”: “Shit.”

Reinhard’s feet appeared to lightly tap the star’s surface.

In the next moment, the trajectory of the star dropped by Al Shario changed, and veered towards the caster, “Aldebaran”, causing the fierce starlight to rapidly approach it.

Witnessing it the Dragon spat a curse, meeting the attack with its almighty breath.

Aldebaran: “…”

A moment later, dazzling crimson and white light consumed the sky, creating the illusion that the night had come to an end.

Originally, the scene was supposed to be that of Reinhard being struck by a star, but with this event’s occurrence being actively perverted, the night sky being set ablaze was the conclusion, simple as. —False, as the story was not drawing to a close yet.

The shattered star burst into innumerable glittering fragments, carpet bombing the Sand Sea.

Aldebaran: “Gu, uuu…”

Naturally, Aldebaran, who was on the ground, was also blown away, his entire body accumulating several burns as he collapsed onto the sand.

Soon, he heard a rumbling that did not resemble that of a falling star from not too far away, and with difficulty he turned his neck to look towards the place it came from, where he saw “Aldebaran”, with a broken wing and another that had been severed, having powerlessly fallen to the ground.

And then—

Reinhard: “It is regrettable that it had to come to this.”

Towards the collapsed Aldebaran’s side, Reinhard walked.

Leaving aside the half-dead Dragon and Aldebaran, he had been swallowed by the cataclysmic light of a star, yet did not seem to bear any signs of such.

He had heard that the Sin Archbishop of Greed had killed Reinhard once, but how had that been done?

Alas, Reinhard, bearing a look of shame, believed that the fight had already come to an end, and perhaps sadly, Aldebaran had no method with which to overturn this.

Indeed, Reinhard had judged correctly. —For the eight-thousand-four-hundred and sixty-sixth time, it was his victory.

But—

Aldebaran: “—Next.”

At that moment, behind Reinhard, “Aldebaran” raised its head from where it had unceremoniously fallen to the ground, and unleashed a fearsome Dragon’s breath towards them.

The Dragon’s breath had been shot in an imperfect state, a mere shadow of its perfected form, but Reinhard could not possibly ignore it. —That was because Aldebaran was also in its line of fire, and would have been unable to escape the fate of being turned into charcoal if Reinhard were to dodge.

Reinhard: “I cannot approve of this way of doing things…!”

Turning around as drew his yet-sheathed Dragon Sword, Reinhard slashed the breath away head-on.

Reinhard’s voice overflowed with righteous indignation, his heart filled with anger at this murder-suicide attempt, due to the fact that “Aldebaran” had unleashed an attack that would swallow up its ally Aldebaran.

How so truly kind of him. Next time, he would incorporate that into his strategy.

With this decision, Aldebaran unwrapped the drug package in his mouth, and gulped down the poison contained within.

Reinhard: “Wha…!”

Having noticed that something was wrong, Reinhard turned around, his face stiffening. Within his vision, Aldebaran was twitching and convulsing on the ground, drowning in bloody froth as his consciousness went to the beyond—

× × ×

???: “—That will be as far as you go.”

A dignified voice cut through the cold, frozen sky, and a beam of light pierced the airborne Dragon obliquely.

While the impact rattled through his entire body, Aldebaran, with a reflex that he had finally conditioned after falling to his death hundreds of times, clung onto a protrusion on the Dragon’s back, avoiding the opportunity to go skydiving without a parachute, and together with his literal alternate self, plummeted towards the ground.

And then—

???: “I advise you surrender. If possible, I would prefer to not cut you down.”

Aldebaran: “Quit putting on airs, hero. I’ll win regardless. —Your stars were bad.”

—For the eight-thousand four-hundred and sixty-seventh time, Aldebaran’s battle commenced.

3

—His encounter with the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, had begun in night skies over the Augria Sand Dunes after having fled Pleiades Watchtower.

The battle had begun when they had been pierced by light, and came crashing down, but Aldebaran saw that as something that was bound to happen sooner or later, and was not surprised by his arrival.

Although it was a confrontation he had understood would happen at some point, he felt like it had come upon him a little too soon.

Rather, it would have been more desirable to be able to fight at a time when he was at a minimal level of exhaustion. —And even that optimistic tough act was only possible before he had heard “—That will be as far as you go” a hundred times, as when hearing “—That will be as far as you go” for the next eight-thousand odd times, his bravado would completely fall apart.

In reality, after the first “—That will be as far as you go”, he would go on to hear it more than a hundred times before he was gently caught by the Dragon’s wings and land safely upon the Sand Sea.

Until then, he had met fates such as breaking his neck or spine in a crash landing, forcing him back to the “—That will be as far as you go”, giving him no choice but to try over and over again for reasons unbeknownst to him.

Aldebaran: “So the one who’s been saying “—That will be as far as you go” was Reinhard this whole time! I was so moved when I realized that…”

It was not really good for one’s psyche, being in a situation of being unaware as to what could have possibly been attacking them.

For Aldebaran, receiving physical damage was unpleasant, but it was not the worst possible thing. What he feared was not so much physical injury, but mental injury.

In that respect, upon finally uncovering the true identity of the one repeating "—That will be as far as you go", he felt as if he had finally escaped from a labyrinth. But then again, that cheerful mood vanished right away.

Aldebaran: "I guess I should count myself lucky that I didn't get softlocked…"

Depending on the situation, it being possible to establish the matrix just before a dead end was the only real thing that could be considered a weakness of Aldebaran's Authority. Miraculously, it was a mistake he had never made up to this point, but there was no guarantee that it would remain that way in the future.

Moreover, at that moment, he had been defining and redefining the matrix every fifteen seconds in preparation for any unforeseen circumstances. Thanks to that, he had been able to return to the point just before Reinhard had said "—That will be as far as you go," but if he had established the starting point of the matrix to be just after the "—That will be as far", he would have been starting from the "…as you go", chipping away at his heart without him being able to do anything about it.

Once the matrix was updated, it was impossible to go back to previous tasks.

That was to say, Aldebaran had no choice but to conquer the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, using the matrix that began with the declaration of "—That will be as far as you go".

For that reason, he had already gone through over eight-thousand repetitions of "—That will be as far as you go".

It was a daunting battle, comparable to scaling a hopelessly high mountain at the pace of a tortoise, but "Aldebaran" was there with him, so it was not as if they would be completely incapable of contesting against Reinhard.

Thanks to this, preparations to conquer Reinhard were steadily underway.

To conquer any enemy, not limited to just Reinhard, what was required was a breakdown of elements.

By deconstructing the elements that made something what it was, one could naturally expose the core of their opponent. Reinhard, too, was not simply the strongest. —There were reasons that made him the strongest.

Aldebaran would break him down into the individual elements of Heart, Technique, and Body, and would unravel him.

Body. —Reinhard harbored ridiculous physical abilities not brought about by his Divine Protections, but due to Reinhard's own extraordinary Od, which produced an efficient and explosive synergy of the Mana inside and outside his body without any loss in the slightest, allowing him to utilize it naturally.

There was a technique known as the Flow Method that could be acquired through outstanding talent and years of training, which allowed the body to be strengthened by circulating Mana throughout it. Reinhard had been born with congenital Excess Mana Circulation Constitution, so he was able to naturally manipulate this technique from birth, and it was normal for him to remain in an constantly enhanced state.

That was roughly equivalent to saying that the simple act of Reinhard breathing normally had hundreds of times the effect of an ordinary person taking a deep breath, all the while still leaving room for Reinhard himself to take a deep breath.

Technique. —Based on Aldebaran's prior knowledge and what he had identified after eight-thousand clashes, Reinhard possessed at least two-hundred-and-fifty-one Divine Protections. His Divine Protections ranged from his signature Divine Protection of the Sword Saint, to combat-useful ones like the Divine Protection of Initiative and the Divine Protection of Projectile Evasion, to environmental ones like the Divine Protection of Fog and the Divine Protection of Sandplay, to poor jokes such as the Divine Protection of Shoelaces and the Divine Protection of Wearing Layers.

Reinhard possessed so many rare and powerful Divine Protections that each one could be a unique representative for every country, numbering significantly more than the fingers on both hands, and his ability to adapt was so outstanding that even if a trap were to be prepared to ensnare and kill the world's cleverest Witch, he would easily break through.

Heart. —Finally, the ethos of Reinhard, bearing the duty of the Sword Saint.

Reinhard's declaration of merely being from the lineage of Sword Saints could perhaps serve as proof that he believed he did not meet the ideal standards of how a Sword Saint ought to be, but to those who bore objectives that differed to his, and stood in opposition to him, that self-consciousness of Reinhard's was irrelevant.

Regardless of how Reinhard himself might have felt, his feats and devotion to his duty made him worthy of being called the Sword Saint, and to the enemies of the Kingdom—nay, to the enemies of the world, he would turn no blind eye.

The Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, was a cog in the machine for the express purpose of destroying the world's enemies.

This was the result of Aldebaran's analysis of Reinhard's Heart, Technique, and Body.

To rephrase, in order to conquer Reinhard, it would be essential to crush these elements that had been revealed through his breakdown, one-by-one.

Ergo—

Reinhard: "—That will be as far as you go."

With that, as the Dragon was pierced by light, Aldebaran's next battle commenced.

—Eight-thousand eight-hundred and eighty-eight.

???: “—That will be as far as you go.”

Amidst the successive battles, he became convinced that for Reinhard, who possessed the Excess Mana Circulation Constitution that inordinately absorbed ambient Mana and circulated it throughout his body, the Augria Sand Dunes, which were infested with Miasma, a tainted form of Mana, was the worst possible location imaginable.

In other words, across the entirety of the world, there was no other field where Reinhard would be so weakened, save for the Augria Sand Dunes.

Even when exposed to the supergravity-generating Al Karum, despite being engulfed in a gravitational field so intense that even “Aldebaran” had been crushed under its own weight, Reinhard had overcome it through sheer strength, and yet, in the Augria Sand Dunes, Reinhard’s physical abilities were at their weakest state.

Aldebaran: “—Next.”

× × ×

—Ten-thousand-two-hundred-and-twelve.

???: “—That will be as far as you go.”

Utilizing the refraction of light, the fact that the surrounding area had been veiled in a wall of ice was concealed. That airtight space, sealed with ice, was then filled with mist, and the water within was made to vaporize all at once, causing it to explode.

The explosive decompression of a sealed space caused by a steam explosion was an outcome that could not have been anticipated, since the cause of which was a phenomenon that had yet to be fully elucidated given this world’s level of civilization; it was an attack borne from the synthesis of magic and science.

The plan had been to simultaneously trick both the Divine Protection of Fire Avoidance and the Divine Protection of Water

Avoidance not by using simple fire or water, but rather a steam explosion; but, by him receiving the Divine Protection of Fireplay that rendered explosions harmless and the Divine Protection of Waterplay that neutralized water damage, this attempt too had been overcome.

Aldebaran: "—Next."

× × ×

—Sixteen-thousand and eight.

???: "—That will be as far as you go."

The temperature gradient between Fire and Water Magic was used to create thunderclouds, and by applying Wind and Earth Magic, he caused the Dragon Sword to be imbued with an electric charge. Following the principle that formed the basis for lightning rods, inescapable bolts of lightning struck Reinhard.

To escape the sheer speed of lightning, not even Reinhard was capable of such. The bolts of lightning, reminiscent of the speed of Cecilus's swordsmanship that transcended human limits, a sight that had become all too familiar to him in the Empire, struck Reinhard chaotically.

Reinhard completely neutralized this with his Divine Protection of the Lightning Cloud, and although the lightning could not seize Reinhard, it did take hold of the Dragon Sword, causing the sword to become highly magnetized.

Taking advantage of it, he moved on to the next plan, which had been prepared in advance. —Using this magnetic force, he immobilized his opponent with the abundant magnetite-rich sand that lay in the Sand Sea, and drove an attack into the lethal gap he had opened.

However, this too was circumvented by the Divine Protection of Sandplay and the Divine Protection of Mud Slippage, ending in failure.

Aldebaran: "—Next."

× × ×

—Sixty-four thousand seven-hundred and ninety-nine.

???: "—That will be as far as you go."

Responding to the previous failure had caused him to momentarily forget the conditioning that should have been ingrained in his soul.

In that instant, he had forgotten the routine of clinging onto the protrusion that adorned the back of the Dragon; his whole body was enveloped by a floating sensation, and he was swept up by the wind, losing sense of up and down, left and right, as he was tossed about.

In the distance, unable to pick up the falling Aldebaran, all that could be heard was the crying roar of the Dragon.

His tongue probed the insides of his mouth, and for what felt like the umpteenth time, the deadly poison he carried was unleashed once again.

A fall from that height would have undoubtedly killed him upon impact. However, a one-in-a-million oddity occurring this time would be problematic. So, just to be safe, Aldebaran gulped down the poison.

Before hitting the ground, struck by an intense pain akin to all of his blood boiling, his mind was blotted white—

Aldebaran: "—Next."

5

—One-hundred thirty-two-thousand and fourteen.

???: "—That will be as far as you go."

Alas, over the course of the battle he had repeated over, and over, and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over and over again, a battle that nonetheless did not last longer than two minutes on average, Aldebaran had become more proficient.

Aldebaran: "Quit putting on airs, hero. I'll win regardless. —Your stars were bad."

Standing off against Reinhard to the fore, gaze trained upon him, Aldebaran reached into his pocket, pulled out a singular book, and raised it aloft over his head with its pages open.

That was a Book of the Dead he had taken out of the Pleiades Watchtower—Aldebaran's own Book.

By showing its contents to Reinhard, he would perturb his mental state—such a strategy had already ended in failure as a plan quite some time ago.

Reinhard possessed the Divine Protection of Nightmares, which combated pollutants to the mind, so he was extremely resistant to brainwashing attacks that would directly disturb one's mental state. Still, it likely could not completely nullify the effects of an Authority, but just by making it possible to disregard the majority of the influences, it was sufficiently effective.

To put it briefly, Reinhard was not the person to whom Aldebaran was showing the Book of the Dead.

It was the other "Aldebaran", on standby behind him.

“Aldebaran”: “—Synchronization complete.”

Guessing his intent, “Aldebaran” had lowered its eyes down to look upon the pages of the yet-soaked Book of the Dead; the contents of the Book were drilled directly into its brain, and its Memories were updated.

The Book of the Dead he had brought with him had recorded all of the one-sided fierce battles against Reinhard that Aldebaran had experienced. —By showing that to “Aldebaran”, Aldebaran could allow the partner who was left behind by the Territory to draw level with him at any time.

Both failure and success—at present, there had yet to be a successful plan, but of the plans that had ended in failure, just by knowing how they had been thwarted and what actions “Aldebaran” had taken in them, “Aldebaran’s” own proficiency would increase remarkably.

For that purpose, Aldebaran had made sure to watch over every battle with his own eyes.

Aldebaran: “—So long as I don’t give up, there’s nobody who can win against me.”

That was the absolute conviction with which Aldebaran had continued to struggle against defeats that reached beyond a count of one-hundred-thousand.

I won’t waver, no matter what. —It’s with that resolve, that I started this.

Reinhard: “—From the lineage of Sword Saints, Reinhard van Astrea.”

Alongside “—That will be as far as you go”, this was an introduction he had heard over one-hundred-thousand times.

Taking it in, Aldebaran inhaled, paused, and continued.

Aldebaran: “I’m… a following star.”

A declaration that seemed to be spoken on a whim, Reinhard accepted it, and advanced.

The distance between the two vanished in an instant, and despite him being in his worst condition due to the Miasma filling the Sand Sea, the Divine Protection of Sandplay allowed him to disregard his poor footing, and the Divine Protection of Night Skies granted him strength in the midst of night; bearing the sheathed Dragon Sword on his waist, the Sword Saint closed in.

"Aldebaran": "—Haahraan!!"

Having installed the Memories of over one-hundred-thousand battles, a roar that was no longer unshapely morphed into a white light of destruction, intercepting the incoming Reinhard head-on.

A Dragon's breath was not magic nor anything of the sort; it was simply an exceedingly powerful torrent of Mana, pure, primitive to its objective, destroying anything that dared to make contact.

A blast that seemed it would decimate the vast Sand Sea for the rest of eternity, its radial expansion left no escape, and not even Reinhard possessed the means to evade it. —Hence, he did not evade.

Reinhard: "Shh—"

That instant, a flash that rivaled the Dragon's breath cleaved the white light directly in twain.

That which had done so, swinging up from down below, was the Dragon Sword Reid, still in its scabbard. The legendary blade had yet to make contact with the air, but by combining the strength of the sheath, which nobody was capable of destroying, and his own sword power, Reinhard had severed the Dragon's breath.

But, thereupon—

Aldebaran: "Plan D23!!"

"Aldebaran": "—Al Goa."

Aldebaran yelled, and without any words of confirmation, the Dragon scorched the world in an explosive inferno.

He had long predicted that he would undoubtedly end up fighting against Reinhard. —Hence, Aldebaran had prepared a plethora of plans for when the time came for him to battle the Sword Saint, and those had been shared with "Aldebaran" alongside his Memories.

Between Aldebaran and "Aldebaran", no strategy meetings were necessary.

Aldebaran: "…"

Without letting the swell of the inferno become a fireball, a stretch of the Sand Sea was engulfed by flames right away.

The midnight Sand Sea was illuminated by a bright-red radiance, instantaneously transforming the chilly atmosphere into a burnt hellscape.

The might of the flames kneaded out of the extraordinary Mana of the Dragon was so absurd that as the blaze engulfed the Sand Sea, the grains of sand all melted in unison, morphing them into glass.

The scene that resulted was reminiscent of the scene of Al Shario's starlight destroying the Sand Sea. Were there to be any differences, it would be that, this time, the way the Sand Sea had been destroyed was more atmospheric; were there to be any similarities, it would be the emergence of the Sword Saint from its epicenter—.

Aldebaran: "Divine Protection of Fire Avoidance."

A man with blazing red hair boldly stepped forward into the fiery, red world that would have turned any normal living being to ash, or at the very least, to charcoal.

Clearing the flames away with a swing of his arm as he emerged, Reinhard had avoided the majority of the damage with his Divine Protection of Fire Avoidance, and if he were exposed to more intense flames, he would receive the Divine Protection of Fireplay, allowing him to fully demonstrate his enhanced abilities within the inferno.

That being the case, neither fire attacks, nullified by the Divine Protection of Fire Avoidance, nor terrain changes, nullified by the Divine Protection of Sandplay, were Aldebaran's true aim.

His real intentions were—

Reinhard: "—Hk."

At that moment, Reinhard, standing amidst the blazing flames, furrowed his brow, and put his hand to his throat.

He ought to have realized. —He was in a critical situation in which he was unable to breathe.

"Aldebaran": "—Haahraan!!"

Upon seeing Reinhard's reaction, "Aldebaran" decided it was time to attack and unleashed its breath. The power and explosive force of the white light left Reinhard unable to move, and a look of determination came over his face.

It was not a look of remorse or pain, but one of facing hardship during battle.

Aldebaran: "Finally…"

Seeing that face, Aldebaran clenched his fist at achieving a result after tens of thousands of tries.

The phenomenon that afflicted Reinhard had been caused by the flames consuming all the oxygen around him, creating an area devoid of oxygen.

Due to his Divine Protections, the effects of earth, water, fire, and wind were all ineffective against Reinhard, but he should not be able to survive in an oxygen-free environment, as that would be against the laws of nature.

With that aim in mind, he had created an oxygen-free environment. —And there, he pinned the Sword Saint in place.

Aldebaran: "Have a go at trying to figure out what's going on there without any science lessons!”

With just magic, or science at a theoretical level, Reinhard could not be defeated.

Even Reinhard, the Sword Saint, who forced magic and science to bend to his will, was finally driven into a corner by a phenomenon that even Od Lagna, who favored him, was unaware of.

By killing his Technique with a phenomenon that a Divine Protection could not protect him from, as well as killing his Body with a Miasma-filled battlefield, he managed to seal away two of the elements necessary for conquering Reinhard.

And then—

Aldebaran: “Plan L29—!!” & “Aldebaran”: “Plan L29—!!”

The opportunity to press forward came, and Aldebaran and “Aldebaran” were in agreement.

While “Aldebaran” used its breath to hold Reinhard in place, Aldebaran carried out the necessary procedures, and thereupon poured in the vast Mana of the Dragon.

The size of the Gate and the shape of the Od were night and day.

Even so, it was a secret move that could only be used by Aldebaran and “Aldebaran”, who shared the same magic signature that was unique like a fingerprint—two long, cylindrical vertical formations were laid out in the air, and they, clad in purple lightning, crackled and emitted a pale-blue light and the sound of radiating heat, turning its barrel towards Reinhard.

Two magical rails stretched across the sky.

In other words, that was—

Aldebaran: “—Magia Railgun.”

A magically-powered railgun, loaded with bullets that were neither fire, ice, nor lead.

With the dao Aldebaran had created using Earth Magic, he had scraped off the scales of the Dragon—these became bullets that were fired at lightning speed and struck the oxygen-deprived Reinhard.

No matter how fast Reinhard was, he could not outrun lightning.

That was a fact that Aldebaran had already learned from his previous battles.

Reinhard: "—Hk!"

The Divine Protection of First Sight and the Divine Protection of Projectile Evasion were activated simultaneously. Reinhard's instinctive reaction to the attack he was seeing for the first time was to notice that the railgun's firing line wavered slightly.

Because of that, Reinhard leaned forward slightly, and the railgun, which had only just missed its target, narrowly passed him and gouged out a semicircle in the Sand Sea.

However—

Reinhard: "—Guh."

There was a burst of blood that sprayed out over the Sand Sea, and a cry of pain escaped Reinhard's throat.

The railgun had not been a direct hit. It had only grazed him. But as long as the attack was deadly, even Reinhard would not come out unscathed from only a glancing blow.

Bleeding profusely from his right shoulder, Reinhard, for the first time in over one-hundred and thirty-thousand battles, showed definite damage, and thereupon—

"Aldebaran": "Fire!!"

The second Magia Railgun fired, and the scale pierced the dead center of Reinhard.

An inescapable blast wave wreaked havoc on the Sand Sea, and Reinhard disappeared. —No, he did not disappear. He was swept away with the scale, right in the line of fire of the railgun.

Even Reinhard could not withstand the power and speed of a direct hit.

Provided he did take the blow directly, that was.

Aldebaran: "—The Divine Protection of Second Coming."

With his blood-spurting right arm limp at his side, Reinhard gripped the Dragon Sword with his left hand, and he had once again blocked the railgun blast that had threatened to pierce the center of his body with the sheath.

Unable to withstand the impact, he had been knocked off his feet, but he had avoided fatal injury—no, rather, he had not been knocked off his feet, but he had flown backward to match the railgun and disperse the deadly blow.

"Aldebaran": "—Al Karum!"

The moment "Aldebaran" saw the same thing as Aldebaran, it performed the incantation, and a magical black sphere that generated extreme gravity was born behind Reinhard.

It was a rehash of a spell that had not worked some eight-thousand loops prior or thereabouts—no, in this extreme situation, "Aldebaran" had also broken past its limits and evolved the spell to the next level.

What came to emerge there was not merely a powerful force field that exerted an extremely heavy gravitational force.

What did appear was a destructive singularity of mass, similar to a black hole, which warped space by concentrating an amount of Mana large enough to bring down a star into a single point.

Upon making contact with Reinhard as he was being blown away, the life of the Sword Saint was pulverized—

Aldebaran: "—The Divine Protection of Shedding Blood."

In the next instant, the tip of the Dragon Sword thrust into the singularity, and the black sphere was forcibly destroyed.

The Dragon Sword was said to be indestructible. Its strength had been proven beyond doubt, but Reinhard's left arm, which had held the Dragon Sword as it disturbed the singularity, was destroyed.

The railgun had damaged Reinhard's right arm, and the singularity had damaged his left arm.

It was the combination of two of his most powerful plans, and however horrifying it was to think that even all this had still failed to defeat him, this was the greatest damage Reinhard had ever suffered.

As it was—

Aldebaran: "—The Divine Protection of Projectile Striking."

The next moment, Reinhard, his toes planted on the sandy soil that had been razed by the railgun and the singularity, with his bloodied arms still hanging limp, kicked up the fallen Dragon Sword with his foot—and sent it flying.

"Aldebaran": "—Gohk."

Light pierced the center of "Aldebaran's" throat, and the Dragon fell violently.

The dust and turbulence resulting from the fall of the Dragon caused Aldebaran to topple over helplessly. He inhaled the rising cloud of dust and choked. He coughed.

And then—

Reinhard: "—That will be as far as you go."

Looking down at the collapsed Aldebaran on the ground, the bloodied Reinhard so announced.

The Sword Saint, with his arms hanging limply at his side, stood by the Dragon Sword sticking out from the ground, and after ascertaining that “Aldebaran” was unconscious with its eyes rolled back, he looked at Aldebaran.

After forcing him into such a corner, having done so much, it was a loss nonetheless.

He aimed beyond the realm of a billion, and failing to reach it, he had betrayed the expectations of many, just like back then.

Robbing him of both arms, and conquering his Body, had not been enough.

Launching an attack that his Divine Protections could not defend against, and conquering his Technique, had not been enough.

The Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, was far too strong.

And so, Aldebaran took a long, deep breath, and—

Aldebaran: “—Your old man’s been captured by an accomplice of mine.”

In order to conquer the Heart of Reinhard van Astrea, a trump card was played.

Chapter 15:
The Defeated

1

???: “—Your old man’s been captured by an accomplice of mine.”

The moment he employed that trump card of his, Aldebaran felt his own defeat to a painful extent.

One-hundred-and-thirty-two thousand and forty-four, such was the number of attempts in the Matrix it had taken him to solve this one problem; the Witch had conditioned him into the habit of counting them up, and this marked the second occasion in his life the count had reached this number.

And thus, much like what had happened that first time, once again had Aldebaran been defeated.

The preparations laid out had been flawless, all possible stratagems had been put in place, he was possessed of limitless chances to fine-tune his plans so long as his heart did not shatter, and yet, he lost.

How frail his own heart must be; he was truly, oh so truly disgusted by it.

His heart was frail.

Far more than his lack of talent, far more than the lack of rewards for his efforts, far more than nobody loving him, that frail heart was the deadly poison that everlastingly made Aldebaran loathe himself so.

???: “…”

Vic.II20

By way of the repeated trial and error alongside the Dragon, he had finally succeeded in having the Sword Saint spill blood.

This successful experience, too, was overruled by means of the Divine Protection of Bloodshed, a ridiculous Divine Protection that made him more powerful the more blood he shed, yet the figure of Reinhard, both his arms having been rendered useless, served as the spoils of battle.

In frankness, since Reinhard would have gone through most of the battles in his life without sustaining injuries, his hope had been that giving him a taste of pain would cast a shadow upon he who was the strongest.

Alas, the man strongest in the world, the man strongest in generations, the man strongest in history, stood likewise firm in the face of pain.

Henceforth, albeit his arms had been torn to shreds and into ribbons, his complexion had not changed whatsoever.

Therefore—

Aldebaran: "…I get'cha."

To his fore, as Reinhard looked down on him toppled amidst a sea of sand, Aldebaran nodded in assent.

Never mind the discomfort of having soil in his mouth, the flavor of blood pooling on the inside of his cut cheek, the unavoidable sluggishness and pain throughout his entire body from being rocked by the shockwave; he still could not help but declare so.

Amidst the bouts whose grand total surpassed one-hundred-and-thirty-thousand, not once had Reinhard's complexion changed, even when his arms had been reduced to such a state. —That face had thus contorted into a thing of dreadful sorrow.

Aldebaran: "I get'cha."

Reinhard's face looked very much akin to that of a child who had let go of the parents' hands and lost sight of them whilst shopping at a mall, to which Aldebaran piled on words of understanding.

Piling them on, he continued.

Aldebaran: "Family, it's what always holds us back."

Reinhard: "—Hk, how can I know what you say is true…"

Aldebaran: "Why don't you take a look? For example… with that, with the Duchess's Divine Protection of Wind Reading. If you can discern if someone is lying with that or something similar, then you could see whether I'm being truthful or not."

Reinhard: "That is—"

Aldebaran: "Not something you can do? —I guess you do have some trauma from taking away someone's Divine Protection."

When he pointed that out, anguish flashed across Reinhard's expression.

A miniscule opening was born in the defense of the invincible, of the impregnable Sword Saint. Akin to water starting to overflow from a levee. The more the water seeped through, the stronger Aldebaran's feelings of defeat would grow.

Neither his Body nor his Technique could be outrivalled. As a result, he would have to torment his Heart, a most foul approach.

And that strategy had been evidently effective.

What Aldebaran had attempted more than a hundred-and-thirty-thousand times, and failed to do, he would now accomplish by playing dirty, shedding not a single drop of blood or sweat.

And, that was no fault of Reinhard van Astrea, the young man born carrying the expectations to become the Sword Saint.

Aldebaran: "In that case, how about we use logic alone?"

Reinhard: “…Logic?”

Aldebaran: “Indeed, logic.”

Raising his body upon the sand as it creaked, Aldebaran gave pursuit to Reinhard.

Perhaps, had “Aldebaran” been able to get up, they would have had the option to fight while still instilling uncertainty in Reinhard.

But, with no signs that the fainted “Aldebaran” would come to its senses, he had already deployed the key to conquer the Heart. So, the only option left to him was to use this key to pry open a closed route. —Aldebaran resolved himself to do so.

Aldebaran: “As you can tell from getting to this point, I’ve taken every possible measure, and laid preparations to face off against you, Sword Saint-san. A mountain of plans, the Augria Sand Dunes riddled with Miasma, and in addition…”

Reinhard: “—Enlisted the Divine Dragon Volcanica, to your cause.”

Aldebaran: “Strictly speaking, that one was only managed via a secret trick… but yes. However, though I went that far, I had no confidence that I could take you down, and in fact, it was no good. You understand then, right?”

Reinhard: “…”

Aldebaran: “Your old man, he was a collaborator of Princess’s. I had plenty of chances… of opportunities.”

Aldebaran was convinced that this reason was certainly not the one for which Priscilla had allowed Heinkel into her Camp.

Haughty, arrogant, unafraid to profess that all things in the world belonged to her, was Aldebaran’s beloved woman; the beautiful and the ugly she forgave equally, regardless of her likings.

She would not have used Heinkel for the purpose of dealing with Reinhard, nor would she have shunned Heinkel, deliberately hurting him for his way of being, in any way.

The source of her intent lay concealed within her heart, her heart that was fierce like flame, whence it could not be laid bare.

—Or perhaps, that was what he should have done.

Minding not the conflagration, Aldebaran, having been dispossessed of his left arm, ought to have fumbled and groped around in the flames with his other arm, steeled with the resolve to let it turn to charcoal, to let it burn to ash.

Had he done as such, Priscilla Barielle would still be—.

Aldebaran: "…She's, no longer among us."

Reinhard: "Al-dono?"

Aldebaran: "I haven't got even a single reason to hesitate. I'd take those sorta measures with no qualms whatsoever."

With Aldebaran asserting thus, Reinhard's eyes narrowed a smidgen.

Reinhard did not wish to be bestowed with the Divine Protection of Wind Reading due to various reasons, but surely even he had been provided with sufficient info as to believe Aldebaran.

Reinhard: "…"

From what he could tell by a glance, Reinhard's injured arms had yet to commence being healed.

Blessed by the world, and loved by fate, it was said that when Reinhard sustained wounds on his body, the Spirits in his environs would flock to him so that he may be healed; the Augria Sand Dunes were riddled with Miasma however, the natural enemy of Spirits. Accordingly, Reinhard's little fangirls were unable to assemble.

It was possible that, since the dawn of history, no one but Aldebaran had ever cornered Reinhard to this extent, so given such an unprecedented situation—

Reinhard: "……You, what do you desire from me?"

As if wringing that out of himself, Reinhard took a seat at the hostage negotiation table.

Hearing that, Aldebaran let out a long, long breath, relief that tormenting the Heart had indeed been worthwhile,

Aldebaran: "Nothing outrageous. I ain't gonna give you an unreasonable demand, like asking you to join me like the Divine Dragon. Nor will I have you betray your master, or do anything I wouldn't like being done to me."

Reinhard: "Inscrutable, I cannot believe that. You use my father as a shield, and try to say you have a conscience?"

Aldebaran: "What a terrible shameless person I am, eh? Having to deal with a guy like that, I kinda feel sorry for you. —My request is simple, I only wish that you let us go on our way."

Reinhard: "Let you go?"

Impossible, was the nuance that reply was laced with, to which Aldebaran shook his head up and down.

Ordering Reinhard to commit suicide, or having him halt the Council of Wise Men's actions in exchange for his father; unreasonable negotiation demands of the sort were not within his intentions.

It was already clear to him, from the start. —Reinhard would not go along with hostage negotiations.

Reinhard: "…"

He was seriously concerned for Heinkel's safety, he did not want to let Aldebaran, hostile as he was, die, and he was worried about his comrades, Flam and Ezzo, who yet remained in the Tower.

And all of that human compassion, he would be capable of gathering together and heartlessly sacrificing in order to protect the world's equilibrium if necessity arose.

Reinhard would be able to sacrifice Heinkel, for whose safety he was seriously concerned; he would be able to slay Aldebaran, who he did not want to let die, hostile as he was; he would be able to abandon the comrades he was worried about, Flam and Ezzo, who yet remained in the Tower, leaving them to meet their deaths. — The Sword Saint, was simply that sort of being.

Henceforth, only those individuals willing to sacrifice their own selves to protect the greater good could become the Sword Saint.

Aldebaran: “Lemme tell you one thing, letting me off the hook here won’t result in any huge differences in the world. If anything, it’ll remove two users of cheat techniques from the Royal Selection, increasing your master’s chances of becoming the Monarch.”

Reinhard: “A throne attained through the elimination of her opponents, is not what Felt-sama desires.”

Aldebaran: “How virtuous. But, I guess that adds up. If her personality wasn’t one that minded such things, she could’ve put an end to the Royal Selection by process of elimination the moment it began.”

This would not serve as a bargaining chip. Of this he was well aware.

Through many twists and turns, Priscilla had ultimately come to approve of the four other Royal Candidates. For those who had lived up to her standards, going along with boorish dealings of the sort was by no means a possibility.

In the end, these hostage negotiations themselves were merely a farce of conclusion foreseen.

No matter how much he rambled on, the fact that Aldebaran was a dangerous existence had already been demonstrated by Reinhard’s wrecked arms. Even if he were to insist he was a harmless man, there was no margin to believe that.

There was no way that the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, could have ever let Aldebaran go.

Then, just what could the purpose of this dialogue possibly have been? The answer was obvious. —Everything Aldebaran had devised, had been for the sole purpose of accomplishing what he had set out to do beyond this point.

Aldebaran: "—Has it arrived?"

That minute alteration in the air was first perceived by Aldebaran because unlike Reinhard, who had not anticipated it, the former had been waiting for it impatiently. —For the coming of one who could bring his unending battle with the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, to an end.

That was—

Reinhard: "—Absurd."

Lagging half a second behind Aldebaran, Reinhard grasped its presence, a voice rife with dumbfoundment spilling from his lips.

It was likely that, in the life he had lived thus far, half the length of Aldebaran's own, Reinhard had peered into many abysses of the world, which all others of his generation had never seen.

Even when the Divine Dragon Volcanica, with whom a strong relationship of trust existed as per his link to the Kingdom of Lugunica via a Covenant, had turned into an adversary, he had handled it with serenity rather than discomposure.

That Reinhard was now utterly speechless. No wonder. This was the first time he had ever laid eyes on it.

The Pleiades Watchtower, built upon the Augria Sand Dunes—the reason why the Tower had been erected, was neither for a battle-worn Sage to go into retirement, nor because that was where a knowledge-hungry Witch had wished to place the tasteless Library she had tricked Od Lagna into creating.

Reinhard: "—The Witch of Envy."

—It had been, for guarding that which had been sealed.

—It was around the time that Aldebaran’s one hundred thirty-two thousand and forty-fourth battle had begun.

???: “I’ve given first aid, but…”

Having said that, Petra finished bandaging up one of the two injured people and watched over them with concern.

Petra had just finished treating the limp and unconscious Garfiel. She had carried Garfiel and Ezzo, who had collapsed on the top floor, down to the fourth floor and treated them as best she could.

Petra treated Garfiel, and Ezzo was treated by—

???: “I am finished with my treatment as well. Thank you for lending me the equipment.”

Petra: “No problem, but are you okay, Flam-chan?”

Flam: “Yes. Fortunately, Al-sama only managed to restrain me, so I was not harmed.”

Flam responded by indicating her own body with her hand.

Petra’s expression darkened slightly when she heard that name. Flam was safe, but Garfiel and Ezzo were in critical condition—and that was all thanks to Al.

He did not bring harm to Flam, and not only that, he did not raise his hand against Petra and Meili either. However, this did not mean Al’s actions could be justified or forgiven.

???: “Are you two~, done treating the~m?”

Petra was silent and clenched her fist in frustration. It was Meili who called out to her from behind, having looked into the room. Meili, who had declined to help the injured on the pretext of guarding the Tower, had a small Crimson Scorpion on her head, and looked at Garfiel and Ezzo, who were wrapped in bandages, Meili: “Both fanged onii-san and Sensei-san are all bandaged u~p.”

Petra: “…Both of them have terrible burns all over their bodies. It would have been better if one of us could use proper healing magic.”

Flam: “I am sorry, but being around the young master has drained my motivation to learn magic.”

Meili: “Petra-chan, don’t get discoura~ged. I can’t even apply bandages right, let alone use healing magi~c. When treating Elsa, I made it up as I went alo~ng.”

Even after hearing excuses that were no excuse and words of comfort that were of no comfort, there was no relief for Petra’s heart. While she also had a lack of aptitude for healing magic as a form of water magic, the reason Petra had not acquired the necessary skills was undoubtedly due to her lack of resolve.

Petra: “If only Garf-san would wake up…”

Even though he would be left to treat himself, Garfiel was the one in the Emilia camp who could use healing magic the most proficiently. His strength was found in his toughness and durability, thanks to the fact that he would become lively just by standing on the ground due to his Divine Protection of Earth Spirits, and he could even use healing magic while doing so.

So, it would have been fair to say that neither Petra nor any of the other camp members had expected that Garfiel would have been the first to become unable to fight. —No, it was not Garfiel who was the first to be incapacitated this time.

Petra: “Subaru…”

With her clenched fist held against her chest, Petra’s lips called out that name.

Subaru and Beatrice were nowhere to be found within the Tower. It seemed to be that Al took them out before moving on to Garfiel and the others, but where could they have gone?

She did not want to think about it—but she imagined the possibility that all traces of them were erased without leaving any dead bodies behind.

Meili: “Judging from how Helmet-san was acti~ng, it doesn’t seem like that’s the case, does i~t?”

Petra: “You are just trying to make me feel better…”

Meili: “I’m not just trying to make you feel bette~r. I would have lied to you if I was, but this is not a lie~. It’s what I really thi~nk.”

Petra: “…”

Meili: “I can borrow the power of the Witchbeast-chans, so it’s a little differe~nt, but it’s actually pretty hard to make a body completely disappea~r. So I think Helmet-san didn’t kill Onii-san and Beatrice-chan, but took them away some other wa~y.”

With a finger on her lips, Meili speculated, to which Petra winced at the unsettling experience that backed her reasoning.

Meili was right; the best case scenario would be if Subaru and Beatrice were not dead. If they were taken somewhere, they could be rescued.

Just what was Al thinking—

Flam: “—Whatever Al-sama was thinking, his scheming will soon be foiled.”

Meili: “O~h, you sure are full of confide~nce.”

When Flam suddenly interjected, Meili closed one eye and tilted her head, playing with her long braid. Flam nodded back with a, “Yes,”

Flam: “I will not go into the details, but I informed my younger sister, Grassis, of what happened here. Grassis is with the young master now, so she will have passed on the same information to him.”

Petra: “The young master…”

Flam: “The young master is the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea.”

Flam seemed proud of herself when she said that, and puffed out her chest.

Petra’s eyes widened at the mention of the Sword Saint, but Meili, who had come over, reacted with a “Wow” that felt as if it were tinged with both disdain and sympathy.

Meili: “If Sword Saint-san is going to swoop in, it looks like whatever Helmet-san had planned will be for nothing. I’m starting to feel so~rry for Helmet-san.”

Petra: “I don’t know how you’re able to say that, Meili-chan…”

Meili: “Sword Saint-san clashed with Divine Dragon-chan as if it was no big deal, ri~ght? Oh, but now Helmet-san has Divine Dragon-chan by his side, so maybe I shouldn’t feel sorry.”

Petra: “…I wouldn’t feel bad at all if Al-san got beaten up.”

Rather, Petra could not help but think that he should have been beaten up.

The fact that Al trampled on Petra’s feelings was not so bad. Petra hardly knew Al, so the pain was not so great, even if her feelings towards him were betrayed.

The ones who were truly hurt were the people who knew Al better than her.

Both Subaru and Emilia were genuinely concerned about Al, which is why they made the time for this journey despite having to sacrifice their own time together. —But Al betrayed them.

Petra: “I don’t want to forgive you…”

At times, Petra found herself thinking that she was a narrow-minded, unpleasant person.

It was not just the anger she felt towards Al. From the time of the incident within the Sanctuary, she had never forgiven Roswaal, and in the Empire, she had also come across many things that she could not forgive.

Her heart simply could not forgive them, and she did not feel like forgiving them either. Petra only wanted to be kind to those who did not do the things she could not forgive.

When she was around genuinely kind people, she felt like a very unpleasant person.

Meili: “Petra-chan, you’re very ki~nd. I can tell you that for su~re.”

Petra unconsciously looked to the ground, and Meili patted her head with a light touch. When she looked up at the feel of her palm, Meili was making a strange face.

She had a strange expression on her face, as if she was disgusted with herself, or perhaps with Petra.

Petra: “…It will be tough, but let’s take Garf-san down the stairs. With his Divine Protection, it might be better to lay him flat on the ground to help him heal.”

Petra made that suggestion without commenting on either the expression on Meili’s face or the hand on her head.

Fortunately for them, Garfiel and Ezzo were not particularly large compared to other men. More importantly, Petra and Meili were just weak girls, but—

Flam: “That is fine. While we are at it, we can also take Ezzo-sama. It is much more inconvenient to take them down the stairs separately.”

As she spoke, Flam unexpectedly lifted the two men.

Despite being the same age as Petra and Meili, her physical abilities were incomparable. She was a servant at the Sword Saint’s mansion, and perhaps that was the reason for her strength.

Anyway—

Petra: “It feels like this is not over just yet.”

Al, after having done something unbelievable, left the Tower with the Divine Dragon and, not long after, was pursued by the Sword Saint, Reinhard, who had been contacted by Flam.

While both Meili and Flam seemed to think that there was no way Al’s plans would work out, whatever they were, Petra was unable to be so optimistic.

This might have been because Petra did not know Reinhard personally.

But more than that, she thought it was a little strange that Al, who had Subaru at his mercy, had not taken any countermeasures against Reinhard.

If even Reinhard was unable to stop Al, what would they do then?

Petra: “—Huh?”

It happened just as Flam carried Garfiel and Ezzo out of the room. Petra and Meili were packing their travel gear, which had been unloaded, and were about to follow her. —Petra was packing her equipment into her bag, felt something strange at the bottom, and pulled it out.

It was—

Petra: “…A book?”

Petra’s hand fell on a book that had been in her bag—it looked familiar. It was one of the many Books that were stacked upon each other within the Tower.

There was no doubt about it. This was one of the many Books of the Dead arranged on the third-floor Library’s shelves.

The presence of a Book of the Dead was not strange in itself.

However, it was strange for it to be here. Ezzo had sternly warned them in advance not to remove the Books of the Dead from the Library, and everyone was in agreement.

And yet, a Book of the Dead had turned up in this bag. Moreover—

Petra: "—Subaru's… bag."

The bag at hand was one containing the personal belongings of Subaru and Beatrice.

For some reason, in a bag that contained items such as the Beatrice Growth Diary that Subaru had been writing, and necessities such as changes of clothes, a Book of the Dead had been secretly hidden away.

Petra: "The place where the name should be, is unreadable…?"

Gulping down her saliva, Petra furrowed her brow as she checked the spine.

She had heard that upon the spine of a Book of the Dead, the title would be written—in the case of the Books of the Dead, that would be the name of the person whose life and death was documented in the Book. In fact, regardless of whether or not one possessed the qualifications to read any given Book of the Dead in the Library, they would have been able to ascertain the title written along the spine.

However, the title of this Book was unreadable. It had been scratched off to ensure that doing so would be impossible.

Petra: "…"

Petra wracked her brain to imagine the name that had been scratched off the Book and the significance of it having been hidden in the bag.

The intent behind scratching out the title was obvious; in order to conceal whose Book of the Dead this was. And the reason for hiding it in this bag, was probably to hide the presence of this Book of the Dead.

And, since this Book of the Dead had been hidden in Subaru's bag—

Petra: “A book, that Subaru hid…”

Meili: “Petra-chan? I’m done with packing up the stuff over he~re. How about yo~u?”

Petra: “…Meili-chan.”

Petra, who had stopped what she was doing, turned around as she heard Meili’s voice. At first, Meili tilted her head at Petra’s unusual behavior, but she was startled when she noticed the Book in her hands.

Meili: “Petra-chan, what’s with that Bo~ok…”

Petra: “…I found it in Subaru’s bag. Just maybe, with this…”

Meili: “With that Bo~ok?”

Petra: “—There may be a hint as to what is happening right now.”

With a firm grip on the Book’s binding, Petra concluded that it was not a completely wrong assumption.

Al’s sudden, reckless behavior in the Tower—originally, Al’s goal had been to read the Book of the Dead of Priscilla Barielle, the deceased Royal Selection Candidate. It was possible that he had also had another goal in mind but, in any case, his objective would have resided in the Tower.

What if his goal had been this Book of the Dead, and Subaru had decided not to give it to Al, instead hiding it in his bag?

What if that had been the cause of an irreparable rift between Subaru and Al?

Petra: “If I read this Book, maybe I will be able to find out.”

Meili: “…I don’t think it’s safe, so I wouldn’t recommend i~t.”

Petra: “…”

Meili: “Bu~t, I also understand your feelings, Petra-chan, that you don’t want to just sit around and do no~thing.”

Meili said that with a worried look, and Petra stuck out her tongue slightly and said, “Sorry”.

No matter what Meili said, Petra intended on going through with it. —Subaru and Beatrice had told her over and over again that reading a Book of the Dead was incredibly dangerous.

In any case, Ezzo had boasted that the trick to reading a Book of the Dead was to close off one’s mind and empty it, but Petra was not sure if she could do that.

However, Petra Leyte was not the kind of girl who would allow herself to sit quietly and do nothing.

And so—

Petra: “—Meili-chan, if anything happens, I’m counting on you for later.”

Meili: “Asking me to do such a thing, Petra-chan, you really are such a poor judge of cha~racter.”

After that exchange, Petra took a deep breath, and slowly began to turn the page of the Book in her lap—

Petra: “—Ah.”

—With Memories that were a Taboo of this world, she thus came into contact.

Vic.ll2o

3

As to how soon that might have happened, Aldebaran had borne no confidence.

Perhaps, if the girls were frailer of heart than Aldebaran had imagined, anguished in their crying as they failed to accept the events that had transpired, a situation in which this trap card had never been triggered would have arisen.

Had that been the case, it was possible that Aldebaran would have ended up looping another one-hundred and thirty-thousand times, bound to lay the bricks up to the realm of a billion forever and on without end.

However—

Aldebaran: “I merely thought that those lil’ misses in particular would’ve pondered that much.”

The girls who had been left behind, Petra, Meili, and even Flam, all were owners of wisdom and experience beyond their years, blessed with rare talents by their circumstances.

Aldebaran had predicted that once they finished rescuing Garfiel and Ezzo from the verge of death, rather than coming to a standstill, the girls would begin to act in a constructive fashion.

And thus, in their attempt to do so, the girls would find it. —Inside of Natsuki Subaru’s bag, they would find a Book of the Dead, a profound significance in its concealment.

With nothing to rely on, with naught a sign leading the way, it must have seemed to the girls as the sole possibility that Natsuki Subaru had left behind. If they could reel in the thread of that possibility, they would assuredly arrive at a light that enabled them to escape a sealed-off dead-end.

The leeway to realize that this was a trap set by Aldebaran, they possessed not.

That Book of the Dead—

Aldebaran: “—Belongs to 菜月Natsuki・昴Subaru.”

Belonging to one who violated the natural laws of this world, ‘twas a Book of the Dead that truly ought to be deigned a Taboo.

As to what might occur were somebody to read it, witnessing that sight first-hand would be far more intuitive and difficult to misrepresent, compared to it being explained through language.

That was—

Reinhard: “—Absurd.”

His blue eyes wide open, Reinhard once again uttered selfsame words in dumbfoundment.

However, no matter how much he attempted to deny that reality, it would not be rescinded. If the Sword Saint, Reinhard, was one blessed by the world, that was one whom the world cursed.

Blessings and curses were but two sides of the same coin; the power balance not one in which either was stronger.

Henceforth—

Aldebaran: “The Sword Saint aside, nobody can stop that.”

Plunking himself down into a cross-legged position, he gazed over Reinhard’s shoulder to the nighttime sand sea—the sight, illuminated only by faint starlight, contained a threat that unceasingly painted the world an even deeper shade of black.

At the very eastern edge of the world, even further east than the Tower inhabited by the Sage, coming forth from the sealed shrine that caused all beings alike to turn away, laid a symbol of upheaval, and of ruination.

Ferociously surging forth like a tidal wave of black, were the Witch’s magic hands, kneaded from her Miasma.

With the Taboo violated, the Witch of Envy would intervene in the world.

That, was the colossal time bomb that Aldebaran had prepared for use against Reinhard—

Reinhard: "—Hk, I must…"

Aldebaran: "If you're gonna say you need to take me down first, then I'm also gonna fight back with all I've got. I'll say this now, but if you don't go, the world's gonna be destroyed. Not that it'd particularly matter to me."

Reinhard: "What are you…"

Aldebaran: "Even if the world's destroyed, I won't perish. —That will keep ignoring me, after all."

For that reason as well, Aldebaran himself could not have served as the switch for the bomb.

Only a being of keen eye and intellect, with the bravery to break this deadlock, could serve as this switch.

Aldebaran: "Reinhard, I don't wanna destroy the world. Rather, it's the opposite."

Reinhard: "Kuh…"

Aldebaran: "I won't lay a hand on your old man. —Go."

Reinhard: "Al-dono, please do not believe everything is going to go smoothly for you."

Gritting his teeth in frustration, he had likely utilized the most foul language he was capable of. Nonetheless leaving behind his overly refined chivalry, Reinhard kicked off the sand.

Turning his back to Aldebaran and "Aldebaran", Reinhard launched a ferocious onslaught—intercepting the magic hands of the Witch of Envy directly as they raced to swallow up the Pleiades Watchtower.

—That instant, Aldebaran experienced the illusion that sound, color, light, heat, and all things that ought to be present were eradicated from the world.

Aldebaran: “…”

The white strike of the Sword Saint met the black oblivion of the Witch, giving birth to a color that was neither black nor white.

That was something that rivaled the cataclysmic big bang of starlight, of lightning bullets, of flames that scorched eventide to ash, yielded during the fight between the Sword Saint and the Divine Dragon just a moment prior.

And now, this big bang ceased not with just that one collision; it continued, and continued, and continued.

Over and over, again and again, without end, without cease, knowing no end; as if to birth heat, as if to birth light, as if to birth color, as if to birth sound, as if to birth the world anew, as if to cleanly divide the world that was from the world that would be, they collided.

—A battle that could never reach its terminus, between one who would never cease, and one who would never perish.

???: “…I got put to sleep. What happened?”

The stratagem was fulfilled, successful in getting Reinhard to clash with the Witch of Envy.

The legendary conflict between the Sword Saint and the Witch of Envy, despite unfolding in the vicinity of the Tower several kilometers away, was so fearsome that its aftershocks could be felt at their location.

Perhaps due to the sensation of those aftershocks, the fainted “Aldebaran” had woken up.

Spread-eagled atop the sand, “Aldebaran” was exposed to disgrace unbecoming of the strongest Dragon, but narrowing its golden eyes at the shockwaves being propagated from over yonder, “Aldebaran”: “Seems like things went pretty damn well.”

Aldebaran: “Yeah. A half-asleep incomplete Witch of Envy, and a Sword Saint not in perfect condition due to the Miasma and his injured arms… It was worth traversing a hundred and thirty-thousand severed threads. You good to go?”

“Aldebaran”: “Aside from having a sore throat, and being seriously low on Mana for a Mana-Tank dragonhusk. Flying away from the sand sea shouldn’t be a problem.”

Aldebaran: “Excellent. As for what happened while you were sleeping, it’ll be better to sync you up later. For now—”

Let’s go; the moment he attempted to stand up, something came flying in from afar with tremendous vigor, aiming at Aldebaran’s legs, which “Aldebaran” promptly swept away with its tail.

Deflected, what rolled upon the sand was merely a small pebble. —Likely, it was something that Reinhard had fired at Aldebaran as he held back the magic hands of the Witch of Envy.

“Aldebaran”: “They’re coming one after the other! It might keep going until my eyes can’t keep up with ‘em anymore!”

At the persistent onslaught of tiny pebbles, “Aldebaran” spread its wings to protect him, leaving Aldebaran to marvel at Reinhard’s sense of duty.

On top of understanding his role as a savior, he nonetheless devoted his everything into the aspects not encompassed in that role. —This Sword Saint seemed avaricious, even more so than the personification Aldebaran knew.

Whilst thinking that it was surely due to the influence of someone close to Reinhard—

Aldebaran: “—I told you, hero. I’ll win regardless. Even if it means losing a hundred-thousand times.”

Leaving behind words that would never reach, Aldebaran ascended to the sky once again in the grasp of “Aldebaran”.

Amidst the sand sea of night, the Sword Saint, holding back the obsession of the Witch of Envy darker than even night, seemed a martyr facing the great tidal wave all by his lonesome.

But then again, were the world to be destroyed, this martyr would be the lone person left standing in the aftermath.

“Aldebaran”: “Right now, wouldn’t it be possible to do a pincer maneuver alongside that, and bring down the Sword Saint?”

Aldebaran: “…And what then? If Reinhard were to die, then the lid holding down hell would vanish. We need him to play the part of the lid.”

“Aldebaran”: “I’m just saying.”

Aldebaran: “It’d be troublesome if he happened to die.”

From the outset, he had not had even the slightest intention of letting Reinhard die.

Only, had they not utilized attacks powerful enough to kill, they would not have achieved the feat of injuring him. He had simply recognized that the Sword Saint was that high of a wall.

Aldebaran: “Don’t believe everything will go smoothly, huh.”

The towering wall, the martyr who would be left behind in the world, the words he had spoken upon their parting came to mind.

Was this perhaps the power of some other Divine Protection? Supposing it was, it was possible he had received something like the Divine Protection of Vital Spots or the Divine Protection of Weak Points, and activated it at that juncture.

Verily, through an unlimited number of attempts, Aldebaran had the power to bring about the results he desired.

But despite having such power—

Aldebaran: “So far in my life, nothing I’ve ever truly wanted to go well has ever gone well. Not a single time.”

Despite making it through a struggle numbering one-hundred thirty-two thousand and forty-four, within the heart of one divorced from blessing and curse alike, that sense of defeat did not vanish.

Chapter 16:
The Complicit

1

—The first feeling of “that”, was something akin to having a nightmare whilst fully awake.

???: “Bbh, bhbb, bbbbb…”

A sensation akin to rejecting understanding, stemming not from the head, but from the soul.

A sensation that felt as if “what laid before” had been severed like a taut thread being cut; wholly separated from their current self it was, and yet, while the body accepted it, the soul would not.

The nightmare, it persisted.

Something made its way into the body through the mouth that had opened for the purpose of raising a scream, and due to the contents of their body being gorged upon from within there was an unbearable sense of loss, an impossible sense of finality, an impermissible sense of desecration.

The feeling of one’s own existence being devoured, who, just who could possibly endure that?

Yellow bile spilled from the corners of their mouth as they convulsed on the cold, hard ground.

That dimly-lit space, a place so incongruous for the start of a life, was testament to the fact that a soul tattered in torment by a never-ending nightmare had already been through this many times before—

—Why.

Such a question, was birthed in their mind.

Towards outrageousness, towards absurdity, towards unthinkable misfortune, towards reasonless malice, towards unforgivable threats, towards a vicious cycle unending, a query of “For what reason”, was posed.

—Why, why, why, why, why.

For what reason must they be made to go through something like this? Had they committed anything evil to such an extent? Was the size of their sin so great as to warrant receiving this punishment?

If this erring had been irreversible, then before accreting it to this extent and patching together retribution to the point of drowning in it, it would have been preferable had they been left to start atoning.

And yet, “for what reason” must it be so?

—Why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why, why.

To that unceasing question—

???: “You are invited—To the Witch’s tea party.”

A voice pregnant with such rapture, as if a blessing, as if a curse, was spoken.

2

???: “—Petra-chan!”

Petra suddenly lost her balance just in front of Meili, but she quickly gave her support.

Petra, having made up her mind, turned the pages of the black-bound book—the Book of the Dead, and after five seconds, she had succeeded in reading it. The atmosphere surrounding her revealed that she succeeded in its reading.

The Books of the Dead were magical books that allowed one to relive the history of a person who had died.

However, one could not read any Book at will, and there were conditions for reading—it was limited to those who had some connection with the person whom the Book was about.

One must not engage in such a distasteful pastime as endlessly peering into the history of total strangers.

Of course, it was debatable whether it was a polite thing to look into the history of someone you knew. Either way, since Meili had searched for a Book of the Dead that she wanted to see herself, she had no right to question the morality of the matter.

What was important was that, judging from Petra's reaction, she had fulfilled the requirements for reading that Book of the Dead—a Book whose name had been scratched off that had been found in Natsuki Subaru's bag.

And then—

Meili: "Petra-chan, Petra-chan, wake u~p! …This isn't good, she's not waking u~p."

She gently tapped Petra's pale cheek, but the girl, whose eyes were closed, did not seem to be waking up. She had either fainted, was in a trance, or had fallen unconscious.

Stirred by Meili's concern, the Crimson Scorpion on her head began to busily snap its pincers as if trying to wake Petra up. Of course, it was to no avail.

Anyone who read a Book of the Dead would have someone's entire life stuffed into their head.

The mental strain must have been considerable. Flam mentioned that Ezzo, who had apparently put in so much effort that he read more than ten books, foamed at the mouth on his first reading, urinated, and passed out.

Fortunately, Petra did not appear to be suffering in a way that would damage her maidenly dignity—

Petra: "—Hk."

The unconscious girl's expression was one of agony or distress, with pained breathing that made it seem as if she were suffering from a high fever.

Meili: "Petra-chan, just whose Memories did you se~e…?"

Meili glanced at the Book of the Dead that had fallen from Petra's hand, and with her outstretched foot, she kicked the Book on the floor away.

Although the spine was facing away, it would be a problem if Meili were to accidentally see the contents and collapse like Petra. —Not many people shared the same commonality with Meili and Petra as to be affected by that Book of the Dead.

Meili: "It couldn't be Elsa's, could i~t?"

The only dead person in common between Meili and Petra was Elsa Granhiert, her face flashing in Meili's mind.

Considering the purpose of this journey, it would not have been a surprise if Subaru, after he found Elsa's Book of the Dead, had hidden it in his bag so that it would not fall into Meili's hands.

But, however—

Meili: "…Hmm, I guess s~o. Onii-san wouldn't scratch off the spine to hide it from me~."

Meili quietly nodded in response to the protest of the Crimson Scorpion, who swung its long tail from side to side.

This was due to Meili's strong trust in Natsuki Subaru.

He told her that she did not have to forget about Elsa Granhiert. —If he had found Elsa's book, he would have been worried and hesitant, and in the end, he would have told her.

Even his hesitation would not be for himself, but out of concern for Meili and Elsa.

So, this must have been someone else's Book of the Dead—

Meili: "—?"

The Crimson Scorpion on Meili's head suddenly stiffened, to which she slowly raised her head.

The Crimson Scorpion changed its direction on top of Meili's head, and its red compound eyes were fixed on an empty space—no, on the wall of the Tower, sending a shiver down Meili's spine as she came to realize this fact.

It was a kind of premonition, and not a good one at that. Sensing a slight change in the air, Meili and the Crimson Scorpion felt an unpleasant presence outside the Tower and in the distance beyond the sand dunes.

Meili: "This is~… it can't be~!"

Immediately after the thought crossed her mind, Meili, still holding Petra in her arms, slipped the Crimson Scorpion into her collar with one hand. Suddenly, it was as if the contents of a pot that had been boiled for too long had overflowed, and something—no, it was not something so vague which came from behind the wall.

She could feel the fearsome power of the Witch approaching.

That thing from before, which was able to send Natsuki Subaru and Rem all the way to the Southern Empire, was coming.

Meili: "This, this isn't fun~ny…!"

At that time, the Divine Dragon Volcanica, at the top of the Tower, fought off the Witch's power.

However, at this moment, the Divine Dragon had inexplicably left the Tower with Al, and no one could do anything about it. She could not imagine that without the Divine Dragon the outcome would be as cute as being sent somewhere else by the Witch's power.

In other words—

Meili: “Is this, the en~d?”

Meili muttered this as she heaved a sigh at the prospect of a sudden and unexpected demise.

As she let out a sigh that seemed to acknowledge her hopeless reality, Meili felt a sense of relief—she realized that Petra was still held in her embrace.

Unconsciously, she was trying to protect Petra against the power of the Witch.

Meili: “Onii-san, you idi~ot…”

Meili had no idea why she had said those abusive words.

However, as if to block out her own weak voice, Meili covered Petra’s body with her own. This flimsy shield of flesh would offer no kind of protection. She felt regret that she had not eaten more meat—

—Immediately after that, just before the Witch’s power reached the Tower, something intervened.

Meili: “…”

As it was, the events beyond the wall were unknown.

However, light and sound cut through the thick walls of the Tower, blowing Meili and Petra on the inside to the back of the room.

Meili: “Ahh!”

Meili screamed, and her body was pressed against the wall and floor while still holding Petra.

Fortunately, they happened to be close to the wall and lying on the floor. If they had not been, they might have been knocked against the wall and suffered more pain and injuries.

Even so, their hair and clothes were disheveled, and the room was in a terrible state with their luggage scattered around. However, by a miracle, it seemed that Meili and Petra did not suffer any serious injuries.

Meili: “What happ~ened…?”

???: “Petra-sama! Meili-sama! Are you safe?!”

Blinking with bleary eyes, Meili sat up. Petra, limp in her arms, remained motionless with her eyes closed.

Immediately after confirming their safety, Flam rushed into the room in a panic.

Flam, who had carried Garfiel and Ezzo down to the lower levels before Meili and Petra had discovered the Book of the Dead, lowered the corners of her eyes slightly when she saw them, then quickly became serious,

Flam: “That is the young master. He is holding it back.”

Meili: “Hold back? What does that me~an…?”

Flam: “It is…”

Meili: “—You are talking about the Witch of Envy, ri~ght?”

When she mentioned that name, Flam’s face went distinctly pale.

Despite being betrayed by Al and knowing that even the Divine Dragon had turned against them, she had not been this shaken up before. Seeing the evident fear in her eyes at the name, Meili apologized with “I’m sorry~.”

It was a natural reaction. Meili could only remain somewhat calm because this was the second time.

For most people, just the mere sensation of the existence of the Witch of Envy would be enough to make one’s blood run cold and render one unable to move.

Meili: “Emilia Onee-san and the others are quite extra~ordinary…”

Either because she was highly determined or had the courage and nerve to do it.

Either way, expecting everyone to be like that was unreasonable, and Meili stood up, still supporting Petra.

Meili: “Sword Saint-san is fighting outside right now, isn’t h~e?”

Flam: “—. Yes, the young master is holding it back. However, it seems that the young master cannot push through.”

Meili: “…If we stay here, we’ll be in the wa~y.”

She did not know the cause of the Witch of Envy’s outburst, but from Meili’s perspective, the two times she had an outburst were both when she was in the Tower. She certainly did not want to think she was the cause of the Witch of Envy’s anger, so perhaps it was for the best to think that the Witch did not like her continued presence in the Tower for long.

Just as she had thought that, she was lightly poked on the nape of her neck by the Crimson Scorpion’s pincers coming out of her clothes.

Meili: “I’m sorry, you were with me both times, to~o.”

Flam: “Meili-sama! We should hurry and leave the Tower. I will take Petra-sama…”

Meili: “—. No, it’s fi~ne. I’ll carry Petra-chan, so please prepare Patrasche-chan and the others, Flam-chan.”

Meili, refusing Flam’s offer, shook her head slowly as she tentatively stood up, carrying Petra on her back.

Flam looked unsure about what to do for a moment, but quickly nodded and left.

Flam: “Go down the spiral staircase! I will prepare the dragon carriage.”

Meili: “Yes, than~ks.”

Losing sight of Flam’s back, Meili started to chase after her.

Just before she left, she was drawn back by the sight of the scattered luggage in the room—in particular, the presence of the Book of the Dead, which had caused Petra to lose consciousness, but,

Meili: “No time to think about that n~ow.”

Once again, encouraged by the snapping sound of the Crimson Scorpion returning to the top of her head, Meili firmly held Petra and quickly ran out of the room.

If she really needed to know the contents of the Book of the Dead, she could always ask Petra later. —After Petra had safely accepted the life of that “someone” into her own.

Thinking this, Meili started to run as hard as she could. Petra, now being carried by Meili, let a single tear fall from the corner of her closed eyes, framed by her long eyelashes.

And then—

???: “Sorry… I am so sorry, Subaru…”

A weak, tearful apology spilled out, as if it was tearing apart the girl’s heart.

The heart-wrenching plea for forgiveness from the girl’s nightmare was drowned out by the aftereffects of the impossible clash between the Sword Saint and the Witch of Envy, and fell on deaf ears.

3

???: “—Milk, cold.”

Plunking himself down at seat by the counter, Aldebaran gave his order to the owner of the establishment.

In Mirula, the town closest to the Augria Sand Dunes, this was the one and only tavern. This bar held an ambiance reminiscent of the run-down taverns of a typical Western, and no other customers could be found within.

However, to thus conclude that the place was unpopular would have been quite parochial.

After all, Aldebaran's visit to this tavern was in the interval between late-night and early-morning—a time when those who were night owls and those who were early birds were both at the zenith of drowsiness, thus, it was no surprise that such a time would be outside the working hours of a countryside tavern.

Nevertheless, the owner opened the doors of his business for Aldebaran, who had sought his services at such a time. How considerate and understanding of the owner, truly an exemplary proprietor in the service industry.

Aldebaran: "Hence why I respect your work ethic. I wouldn't even think of doing something so terrible as bringing harm to someone like you. I'll pay you properly as well."

Propping his elbow on the counter in a display of poor etiquette, Aldebaran shrugged at the bearded barkeep.

The establishment seemed to be used as a residence as well, for the owner had been woken in the dead of night, still wearing his nightclothes, but Aldebaran would not criticise him for opening shop in that attire. Rather, his complaint had to do with how the owner was quite hesitant to get started on fulfilling his order for milk.

However, even that—

???: "Oi oi, honestly, it'll sound like a threat regardless of what you say, me."

Aldebaran: "Well, no matter how you look at it, I guess that'd be so, huh."

???: “After all, wouldn’t a one-armed man with a helmet over his face suddenly barging in during the dead of night be reason enough to hesitate to receive him into one’s living room?”

Aldebaran: “And if I had to say what the biggest reason for that was…”

Speaking from outside the wall was the Divine Dragon—the being most revered in the Kingdom of Lugunica, and rather than being easy to get along with, it had an air to it that was rather like a gangster, so there was no way around it.

Of course, there was no way that “Aldebaran” could fit inside the tavern, so the Dragon was made to wait in the street outside, somewhat cramped. Though, it was doubtful that would do anything to bring peace of mind to the shopkeeper.

Thus, a late night visit by a suspicious man and the Divine Dragon—that would be the rough description of the unfortunate incident that the owner of this tavern had come to experience.

Shopkeeper: “…Your milk.”

The owner, who had taken his own sweet time to settle down, had finally brought out the milk in a wooden tankard. Having received it with a “Thank you”, Al gestured towards the outside of the tavern with a nod.

Aldebaran: “While you’re at it, be it water or milk or something, could you serve it in a barrel to my pal outside? Anything but alcohol. Never know what might happen.”

“Aldebaran”: “What, I think alcohol wouldn’t really be any issue. There’s no way a legendary dragon would be a lightweight.”

Aldebaran: “There’s that Dragon of myth who got exterminated with liquor, yeah? For the time being, it’d still be troublesome if you were eliminated… Even if you’re not gonna be of much use as a partner for a while.”

“Aldebaran”: “Tsk, owner, please.”

With a click of the tongue as loud as a gunshot, “Aldebaran”, who had been peering into the premises through the window, withdrew its head. Having watched the scene play before him and momentarily hesitating, the owner seemed to have made up his mind as he shouldered a barrel and proceeded outside the tavern.

Thereupon realizing that one of his legs was a prosthetic, Aldebaran regretted having made such a troublesome request. Aldebaran felt that it would have been better had he carried the barrel himself.

He felt so, but—

Aldebaran: “…Seriously, I’m tired, much more than I usually am.”

Physically, all his joints were aching, but compared to the mental exhaustion he felt, it was nothing.

When it came to the fatigued state of his mind, he was exhausted to an extent akin to having fought a formidable foe one hundred thirty-two thousand forty-four times. —No, that was putting it mildly. To be precise, it was to the extent of having been defeated one hundred thirty-two thousand forty-three times in a row, and having finally put an end to it on the one hundred thirty-two thousand forty-fourth try.

For the most part, following the plan he had devised beforehand, it could be said that they had been successful in ensnaring the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea. Be that as it may, Aldebaran felt no sense of accomplishment whatsoever.

What he did feel, was an intense sense of defeat and an overwhelming sense of powerlessness, slightly tinged with—

Aldebaran: “Relief, that we made it through… huh.”

Despite the fact that both of the two individuals who served the greatest obstacles to Aldebaran’s objective had been magnificently immobilized by him, the fact that all he felt was a feeling of relief went to show how insignificant he was.

Of course, the notion that he had magnificently cornered them appeared as naught but an irony. —At the very least, Aldebaran had already wounded everyone at the Tower to shreds, including Reinhard. And that count would still rapidly and exponentially increase after this.

That utmost critical situation, was still underway—

Aldebaran: "—The Sword Saint against the Witch of Envy, in the battle of the century."

Raising the jaw of his helmet to drink the milk from his tankard, Aldebaran muttered so.

In the corner of his vision, outside the window where the Dragon had withdrawn its head—he could hear and see glimpses of it, the aftershocks of the fierce, apocalyptic battle that was unfolding in the Sand Sea beyond.

Flashes of white seemed to cleave through the night above the sea of sand again and again, and as sandstorms visible from afar were being kicked up, the battle roared out with one thunderous clap after another.

No matter how unfamiliar one was with battle, no matter how dull their perception, people would instinctively know that this scene was the same as what would unfold on the day of the world's end.

That was why, despite the hour of this morning gray, a time neither night nor day, the residents of Mirula had gotten out of bed, went outside, and stared across the sand sea in a daze.

???: "…"

Even as the sun rose to mark the beginning of a new day, that battle would not come to a cease.

As long as they did not decide to give up somewhere along the way, the people would end up spectating that battle for eternity. However, he felt like without some kind of impetus, the residents would just remain standing here.

It was not as if they lacked a sense of crisis, or felt that it was unrelated to them.

It was only that, when awash in light of a caliber that far exceeded their capacity, people were invariably dazzled.

And thus, once dazzled, they would be unable to walk away in fear of danger. Consequently, in many cases, the dazzled followed the voice and traces of the light that dazzled them.

Blindly, as if moths to a flame, they would be drawn towards that blindingly dazzling light.

That was why, the reason to blame for the people standing motionlessly was—

???: "—Wowee~! Seeing it up close, it rea~lly is a Dragon~! To be honest, I couldn't really tell for sure until I got up this close."

The fierce atmosphere reminiscent of the midst of war was abruptly torn asunder by the shrill voice of a young woman.

Cheerfully out-of-place, the voice brimming with youthful enthusiasm could be heard from outside the tavern as Aldebaran was getting drunk on milk.

Hearing it, Aldebaran slid off his stool, and turned to face the entrance.

The following moment—

???: "—You in there, Aldebaran?! Get out here now!"

Marching in as if tearing down the tavern's entrance, the red-haired man spotted Aldebaran, and strode up right before him with a violent and rough gait.

The man unsheathed his sword with vigor, and thrust its point before Aldebaran.

At that excessively threatening attitude, Aldebaran raised his single hand with an "Oi oi",

Aldebaran: "Even though you told me to come out, if you're gonna force your way in and pressure me like this, that won't be possible."

Man: “Don’t get all nitpicky with my words now. More importantly, the thing that’s outside, that! That’s gotta be, it’s gotta be…!”

Aldebaran: “The thing that’s outside?”

Man: “Don’t you play dumb with me!”

As soon as he tilted his head, he was grabbed by the collar before the matter could be settled, forced up, and pushed out from the entrance of the tavern.

A sharp sensation was pressing into his back, and even when he tried to say “I’d go along even if you didn’t do all that”, the other person was unwilling to lend an ear.

There was no helping it. —After all, from his perspective, the object of his heart’s desire was right before him.

???: “Oh, Al-sama, there you are… why does it seem as if you’ve become a hostage?”

Aldebaran: “Hey there, I guess a little excess blood’s gone to his head. You shouldn’t provoke him either. You’d be putting me in danger.”

???: “There you go again~, saying things like that. Even though you won’t die no matter what anybody does, Al-sama~.”

Waving her hand at Aldebaran, who had a sword fastened against his back, was a young woman wearing a maid outfit adopted from a Japanese style with a red base.

Emanating a whimsical aura akin to that of a cat, the young woman said that to him in a relaxed demeanor. Albeit knowing that it was not such a lighthearted thing as it seemed, he made no objection.

Saying anything would be futile, and that must never be made known to her.

Anyhow—

“Aldebaran”: “Doesn’t it look like the carnage is about to continue, me?”

Aldebaran: “Don’t say that as if it doesn’t concern you, me.”

And, as the Divine Dragon gazed down at him with its head high above, donning an amused smile, Aldebaran took a deep breath and retorted.

Then, as he spun his body around—

Aldebaran: “Good grief, this is quite the promising party.”

—Hijacker of the Divine Dragon’s dragonhusk, “Aldebaran”.

—Acknowledged as such by himself and others, the Parasite of the Kingdom, Heinkel Astrea.

—The female shinobi who once aimed for the life of the Sun Princess, the Crimson Sakura, Yae Tenzen.

—Together, they made up the entirety of Aldebaran’s henchmen, as he moved to take on the world.

4

—Sixteen.

In the attack on the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, the existence of his father was a true vital spot, and had served as a trump card.

Regardless of whether Aldebaran had wished to use that trump card or not, ignoring his own emotions, he would never have allowed himself to be careless enough to not prepare it in advance. Hence, he succeeded in persuading him.

Heinkel had sunk to the rock bottom of despair for a differing reason from that of Aldebaran’s, but so long as he did not mess up the manner in which he formulated his words, Heinkel would gather his wits enough to at least hear him out.

While belonging to the same Camp, the relationship between Aldebaran and Heinkel could by no means be called a friendly one, but it was easy to tell that the latter's desire remained consistent.

An earnest love, perhaps it ought to be phrased as such. —For the man who made the very core of his being that which Aldebaran admired and simultaneously abhorred, a promise of compensation after cooperation had been particularly effective.

But then again—

Heinkel: "—You promised me Dragon's Blood! And right now, there's a Dragon sitting right in front of us! And yet, you're still telling me to wait?!"

Eyes bloodshot and spittle flying, Aldebaran had imagined that Heinkel might shout at him like this.

Even now Heinkel was threateningly applying pressure, ready to brandish his sword at any moment; the tip of the blade was directed towards "Aldebaran", lying down like a pet dog on the town's road.

Strictly speaking, the tip was being pointed right at the Dragon's chest—aimed directly at the heart pulsating inside the dragonhusk, in which the Dragon's Blood was stored.

—Dragon's Blood was capable of bringing about a bountiful harvest to the land, and could cure all manner of afflictions on the spot.

That was a legend passed down since times of yore in the Kingdom of Lugunica, said to be one of the three treasures that the Divine Dragon bestowed upon the Kingdom at the juncture when the Three Heroes drove away the Witch of Envy.

It was the last drops of heart's blood spilled upon the final pulse of a mighty Dragon's heart, and now that the vast majority of Dragons had fled the surface, the means by which to procure the substance had been limited to taking up arms in a frontal assault.

The potential to obtain that Dragon's Blood was now directly in front of him. —That reality set the soul of Heinkel Astrea ablaze, a man who had been chasing a miracle for over a decade.

Heinkel: "Finally, Louanna will finally…!"

Aldebaran: "…Is that, the name of your wife?"

Heinkel: "That's right. My, wife's… she's been asleep for so, so long, but with the Dragon's Blood, it should be possible for Louanna to wake up. That's why I went along with your shit!"

Aldebaran: "Yeah, I'm aware of how you've contributed, and I'll acknowledge it. Tell you the truth, it was thanks to your insurance that I was able to subdue your son."

Heinkel: "If that's the case…!!"

Rather than a back and forth argument, perhaps a more accurate description would be to say that since Heinkel's feelings were so restless, no proper discussion could take place.

As he secretly updated his Matrix, Aldebaran was about to decide on his next words to see if he could say something to calm Heinkel down—

Yae: "Umm~, sorry for interrupting your chat, but there's something I'd like to ask about~."

Heinkel: "What is it, maid?! Right now, I'm having an important discussion with this guy…"

Yae: "Over there, towards the sand dunes where there's sparking lights and crackling sounds, is that not maybe your son, Heinkel-sama?"

Heinkel: "—Ah?"

With hair a color somewhere between pink and vermillion swaying in a single bob, the young woman—Yae pointed over yonder to the sand sea, where the battle raged on, unable to be tipped toward either side.

It seemed that Heinkel had been solely focused on the Divine Dragon of his dreams, and now, blinking his blue eyes upon witnessing that fierce bout,

Heinkel: "…Oi, what's going on with that? The ones fighting over there'd be—"

Aldebaran: "As you can imagine, the Sword Saint and the Witch of Envy."

Heinkel: "—Hk! Wh-Why… how the hell did it even come to that?!"

Eyes wide in astonishment, Heinkel scowled in the direction of the sand sea, where his son clashed with the Witch. Then, his shoulders seemed to tremble in fear, and,

Heinkel: "This isn't what I signed up for! You were supposed to use me to stop him. Those were the conditions… stop them, stop them right now! The Witch of Envy, you say? What kinda fucking bullshit is…!"

Aldebaran: "Sorry, but I can't grant that request. Your compensation is the Dragon's Blood, old man. To stop them here goes against the initial conditions. I won't grant you a second thing."

Heinkel: "Gh, kuh…! In that case…!"

Aldebaran: "In that case?"

Heinkel: "—Uh."

However enraged he was, his words continued not beyond that point, and Heinkel's eyes dashed about to a dizzying extent.

Aldebaran could not view the weakness of Heinkel's will as anything but pitiful. —Aldebaran felt sorry for Heinkel.

Stuck with a family beyond his own stature, he too was a clay doll that fate fancied toying with.

Oblivious to Aldebaran's heart of hearts, Heinkel raised and lowered the tip of his sword many times over,

Yae: "Heinkel-sama, y'know, I really don't wanna get entangled in your personal affairs, so could you maybe stop moping around and throwing a hissy fit like that?"

Unable to just stand there and watch, Yae ended up showering him with a terribly chilly voice.

Those words caused Aldebaran to place a hand on his forehead, and Heinkel to widen his eyes and glare at her. Meeting his gaze head-on, Yae smiled as she inclined her head.

And, unlike the smile on her mouth, her unsmiling eyes fixed their gaze upon Heinkel,

Yae: "Once you've decided to do something, it's too late to then complain and waver about it after the fact. If the things you desire are in two places, isn't it obvious that you can't reach out a hand when you're already reaching one out the other way? You aren't a kid."

Heinkel: "—Hk, but he'll always just be a brat no matter what age he is!"

Yae: "Good grief, there's really no getting through to you~. —Al-sama?"

Heinkel had lost all composure, and, fed up with him, Yae turned to Aldebaran. Understanding the meaning behind that narrowed gaze, Aldebaran shook his head sideways.

Yae did not know how to show restraint. Murder was the only method this woman was ever taught.

Hence—

Aldebaran: "…Counting on you, me."

"Aldebaran": "Sure thing."

The following moment, "Aldebaran" swung its forearm downwards, slamming into Heinkel as he glared at Yae, and knocking him to the ground.

With a "Wow~", Yae's eyes widened as she basked in the tremendous updraft, and before her eyes a picture was painted of Heinkel, buried face down in the ground.

Aldebaran: “Sorry old man, but I can’t give you Dragon’s Blood yet. For the time being, it’d be troublesome if the Divine Dragon’s heart were to stop beating.”

Yae: “This might kill the mood a bit, but might Heinkel-sama be dead? Just now, that was a blow that would’ve even put me on the verge of death, y’know?”

“Aldebaran”: “He won’t die. Restraint… though I may not have shown any, he won’t die. For a long time now I’ve thought that the old man here was unduly sturdy but, I see now.”

Yae: “…I haven’t properly confirmed it or anything, but this Divine Dragon-sama who speaks an awful lot like Al-sama here, how exactly did you manage to pull that off?”

Aldebaran: “I’ll tell you later. Time is of the essence.”

Giving such a response to Yae as she sought explanation, Aldebaran squatted down beside where Heinkel had been buried, and was about to return the latter’s sword to its sheath. —It happened then.

Aldebaran: “Oh?”

When his outstretched arm was seized by the wrist, Aldebaran’s breath caught. And the perpetrator of that act, having taken an unrestrained hit from the Dragon, was Heinkel.

Heinkel’s eyes were currently unable to focus, but he was glaring at Aldebaran with a bloodcurdling expression. Guessing the meaning behind that gaze, Aldebaran sighed, and,

Aldebaran: “I’ll keep my promise on the Dragon’s Blood. I also won’t let Reinhard be swallowed up by the Witch of Envy. —On that, well, you’re just gonna have to trust me.”

Heinkel: “…”

It was unlikely that he had sincerely believed Aldebaran’s response. But, Heinkel languidly hung his head upon hearing that, and bearing witness to that gesture, Aldebaran wrenched his seized wrist loose.

Then, seeing Yae raise her heel aloft, about to deliver a kick to Heinkel,

Aldebaran: “Look, I’m tired, and I only got one hand, can I rely on you to carry the old man?”

Yae: “Do I have any say in that? If so, I’d like to decline.”

Aldebaran: “You don’t. That’s an order. You carry him.”

Yae: “Tsk~, Al-sama you brute~, fine, understood~.”

Sticking out her tongue with a “Behhh”, Yae bent over and unearthed the buried Heinkel. Next to her as she did so, Aldebaran looked up at “Aldebaran”,

Aldebaran: “Did you say something about the old man?”

“Aldebaran”: “Ah? Ahh, nothing important really. Just how he’s lively and sturdy.”

Aldebaran: “…And when you add that on top of the old man’s position and personality, his life must’ve been filled with pain, poor bastard.”

He was sorry that things had come to this, but he did wish for Heinkel to live in as strong a manner as possible.

Although his circumstances were considerably harsh, it was not as though Heinkel’s misfortune was the greatest throughout the world. Though, Aldebaran did not think that he would lend an ear to such a canned consolation.

Aldebaran: “Besides, the relationship in which that sort of consolation could get through to him ended just now.”

He neither bore the qualifications to find that regrettable, nor the right to wish to make amends.

Because he had that self awareness, Aldebaran refrained from expressing any further feelings. Instead, calling out “Yae” to the girl hard at work,

Aldebaran: “Money.”

Yae: “Isn’t that the worst possible thing to hear all of a sudden? Here~ you go.”

Yae fumbled around in her clothing and threw over a leather pouch, which Aldebaran then caught. From within, he pulled out a gold coin, and flicking it with his thumb—

Aldebaran: “A little extra to make up for the trouble. Keep it.”

With those words, he passed it over to the owner of the tavern, who had been watching over their exchange in silence.

Beside “Aldebaran” was an empty barrel of water, and the shopkeeper had thoroughly served their orders. They had likely caused him a fair bit of anxiety, but Aldebaran had been able to converge with his henchmen, and take a short rest.

Yae: “Though it was with my money.”

Aldebaran: “Shut up, you. I know you just arrived, but can you get back on the move right away?”

Yae: “The shinobi training regiment is crazy, y’know. They make us run nonstop from the Imperial Capital back to the village with no sleep or rest over half a month, with just a single bamboo cylinder of water.”

Aldebaran: “Your crazy shinobi episodes never miss the mark, huh.”

She probably wanted to communicate that because she had gone through such a hellish experience in the past, this amount of travel would not tire her out; however, what Aldebaran got out of her words was the sheer insanity of the shinobi, and the corroboration of that fact by the disheartening memories of suffering through the severity of the most terrible shinobi in the Empire.

In any case—

Shopkeeper: “W-wait…! I mean, please wait.”

Just when Aldebaran and co. were about to depart, the voice of the shopkeeper halted them.

In addition to being this ragtag of a group, the Dragon had also displayed a violent attack a moment prior. To call out to them would have required substantial courage, but gulping down his saliva as he turned to face Aldebaran's party, the shopkeeper spoke,

Shopkeeper: "That… um, the calamity unfolding at the Pleiades Watchtower, could you please stop it? You're the Divine Dragon Volcanica-sama, aren't you?!"

Aldebaran: "Ahh…"

Hearing the shopkeeper's plea, Aldebaran fiddled with the metal fixtures of his helmet, and sighed.

Now that he looked around, he saw that the residents of Mirula had surrounded Aldebaran's group at a distance, casting an imploring gaze towards them—no, towards "Aldebaran".

Within their eyes dwelled fear and apprehension, but at the same time, reverence and hope.

Bearing witness to the legendary and renowned Divine Dragon Volcanica from nearby, the possibility of it putting an end to the cataclysmic battle unfolding afar filled their minds.

However—

"Aldebaran": "Sorry, but right now, it isn't my job to stop that."

Shopkeeper: "—Hk."

"Aldebaran": "The Sword Saint will likely stop it at any expense, but that doesn't mean the aftershocks won't reach here. It'd do you best to leave town for a few days."

Shopkeeper: "A few days… that would be, how long exactly…?"

After putting his trust in the Divine Dragon, and receiving a reply that betrayed his expectations, the shopkeeper did not yet give up, and seeking an excuse to quell that which was discomposing their hearts, he asked another question.

Even if they left town, how long would that be for?

That would be—

Aldebaran: "—Seven days."

Shopkeeper: "…"

Aldebaran: "In seven days, it will be settled. —In seven days, the cause of the world's end will be removed."

Proclaiming so, Aldebaran turned his back to the shopkeeper, to the people of Mirula, and began to walk.

Behind him, Yae followed whilst carrying the unconscious Heinkel on her back, and finally, giving rise to a weighty sound as it lifted its body, "Aldebaran" too began to walk.

Having made an enemy of the world, Aldebaran and his henchmen advanced.

By no means, would their legs ever come to a halt.

Aldebaran: "I'll continue. —So that I may be myself."

Chapter 17:
Please, Don’t Forgive Me

1

—A white table and a parasol were placed atop a small hill of lush, verdant grass.

A clear blue sky, black hair swaying in a gentle breeze. Without knowing how, they found themself sitting in a chair, and across the white table, a young woman of black and white, was enjoying a cup of tea.

Warm vapor rose from a teacup, yet no fragrance could be sensed. —Just as if it had perfectly mimicked just the exterior of the element known as tea, in the manner of papier-mâché.

Such was the dishonest impression evoked by this individual.

???: “What… happened to me?”

A query.

One that sought an answer regarding the chaos induced up until a moment prior.

???: “Is that not something you should know yourself?”

A response.

One that could not be declared an answer regarding the chaos induced up until a moment prior.

With vexation towards the feeling that their question had been sidestepped, they endeavored with all their heart to come to rationality, to suppress the urge to vent the dissatisfaction in regards to the events that had just transpired to the young woman before their eyes.

And likewise contained within, was a pinch of “their” perspective as an onlooker.

???: “Echidna! Let me out of here now!”

Impatience and impulse were deliberately mistaken for courage, used as a provocation to propel the conversation forward.

Atop the hill of green, standing opposite a young woman proclaiming herself a Witch, once again were they assailed by an enigmatic sensation. —Indeed, once again, they were.

Again, and again and again and again, that had been the case.

Always, without fail, no matter the situation, each and every event had been a sequence of the inexplicable and the absurd. Faced with all that, they clenched their teeth, earnestly they raised their visage, and continued to struggle onward.

—They had continued to struggle on, giving of themself.

???: “Why not try it and see?”

—Please, stop.

—Please, I’m begging you, stop. Don’t let them say what comes next. Don’t let them say it.

???: “Taking action to procure the results one desires, is deserving of my respect. I am not going to veer from that opinion. In fact, I believe it is precisely such actions that make life worth living.”

—Please, stop. Please, stop. I’m begging you, please, stop.

—Stop, stop, stop, stop, stop, stop, stop, stop, stop, stop, stop, stop, stop, stop, stop, stop.

—Stop.

???: “Echidna. I can Return by—Death.”

—Ahh, ahh, ahh, please.

—Please, don’t suffer.

—Please, don’t cry.

—Please, don’t get hurt.

—Please, don’t be afraid.

—Please, don’t laugh.

—Please, don’t forgive.

???: “For your inquiry of “why”, you are qualified, and the doors of this tea party are open to you. And, by drinking the tea offered by a Witch, you are accepted as an honored guest. As the host of this tea party, I am obliged to welcome you. —Now, you may ask away.”

—Please, please, please, please, please, please, please, I’m begging you.

—I’m begging you, please, stop.

???: “After all, to agonize the mind in search of an answer is the greatest of bliss to me.”

—I’m begging you, so please, you must not help this person.

2

—The troublesome thing about mental exhaustion was that unlike physical fatigue, it was not visible to the eye.

Of course, there were clear indicators such as an inability to think straight, unavoidably heightened irritability, and circles darker than a bottomless swamp appearing underneath the eyes.

However, those indicators were physical changes, so ultimately, there was not that great of a difference from physical fatigue; at least that was what Aldebaran had concluded.

Mental exhaustion, in its truest sense, could not be soothed by touch, nor could it be healed by magic; that was the sort of thing it was.

And, what was required in order to recover that worn-out mind was neither words nor relationships. —To put it bluntly, what was needed was time.

Only time would grant kindness enough to iron out a mind whittled down to a rugged state.

That was why—

Aldebaran: “—Territory re-expansion, Matrix redefinition.”

In a whisper, after finally settling down, Aldebaran updated his Matrix.

It was his first time updating the Matrix in roughly six hours—the ability to prolong his own bodily experience of time as much as he desired, without the consequence of real time progressing, was the greatest merit of Aldebaran’s Authority.

Within the bounds of his established Territory, he could swallow poison to repeat a fixed period of time as often as he wanted, generating the time needed to smoothen out his mind. For his battle against Reinhard, too, he had taken full advantage of this merit to fine tune the plans he had prepared in advance in order to draw him into them.

Aldebaran: “Though, he did circumvent practically all of them…”

Ultimately, it had ended with him playing a card he had not wished to play, so Aldebaran found it difficult to say he had been victorious; at best it was a draw due to injury. To put it bluntly, it was a loss for both parties.

Anyhow, both his inability to think straight and his heightened irritability had gotten a little better.

Unfortunately, he did not know what had become of the bags under his eyes, but since he did not have the time to cover it with makeup, he would make do donning the black gnarled helmet that perfectly matched his worn-out body and mind.

Though his body and mind could have been described as worn-out, his body was actually in excellent condition.

As the strongest, supreme life-form, the Dragon's inexhaustible supply of—would be an overstatement, but the vast supply of Mana could be used to his heart's content. Welling up with healing from Water Magic and buffs from Yang Magic, this was the strongest Aldebaran had been since he had been born into this world, and none could object to that claim.

Aldebaran: "Be that as it may, it's something like an ant getting its power multiplied by a hundred; no matter how many buffs it stacks up, it can never beat a human."

Not to mention, when comparing his opponents to that standard, they were not humans, but rather elephants or lions.

Alas, since the specs of his receptacle were inferior from the start, even if Aldebaran was now the strongest Aldebaran in history, he would still only serve as fodder in a direct confrontation.

Setting aside that miserable self-evaluation—

Aldebaran: "—Seven days."

A single knee raised, leaning against a wall of dirtied wooden planks, Aldebaran counted his time limit.

This location, which they had selected to take a rest in, was a small hunting shed that Yae had found in the woods. Fortunately, the owner seemed to be absent given the time of year, so they had entered and were using it of their own accord.

It could not be expected to have amenities such as a fluffy bed or open air bath, but in the regard that it would not attract attention, it was just as favorable as a suite to Aldebaran at the current moment.

Whenever possible from here on out, they would need to avoid the battles they could avoid and proceed through events smoothly.

The little show they had put on at Mirula, the town closest to the Augria Sand Dunes, had been an exception.

It was the meetup point for him and his allies, and he also truly just could not help but want to drink milk. Furthermore, it had been necessary to inform the townsfolk about how transcendent the events transpiring were, and that there would be nobody present to save them from it.

After all, just ten-odd kilometers away, a battle between the strongest beings in the world was playing out.

Aldebaran's stratagem had brought forth the Witch of Envy, and Reinhard would likely put his life on the line in order to stop her. However, there was no reason to believe that its aftershocks would not reach beyond the sand sea. It was not likely for the constant flashing in the sky to settle down, so seeking refuge was essential.

And, Aldebaran's decided time frame of seven days was not unrelated to that battle. —Rather, it was actually quite closely connected.

As far as Aldebaran knew, the Sword Saint and the Witch of Envy were evenly matched. That battle would continue repeating the same moves for a thousand days, and no terminus would be reached in that back and forth combat.

But, that was only when the matter was constrained to being between the Sword Saint and the Witch of Envy.

Now that a battle between the two had been realized through Aldebaran's scheming, it would not actually continue on for a thousand days.

That was because—

Aldebaran: "The world will come crumbling down before their battle can reach a conclusion. If it ever comes to that, it's over."

Ere the world's ruination could transpire, it would be necessary to put an end to that battle.

In that sense, though he had been the one to make the matchup, that ultimate battle had also become a cause bringing about the world's end, and thus one of the things Aldebaran had proclaimed he would remove.

Aldebaran: “So many things… there are so many things I have to do…”

Placing a hand on the forehead of his helmet, Aldebaran took a long, deep breath.

He had quelled his mental exhaustion thanks to his Authority, forcibly recovered his physical fatigue through Water and Yang Magic, and yet it still seemed like he would go over capacity from the sheer size of the things on his mind and the things he was burdened with.

Of course, from the moment he started this onward, his complaints were not something he could let anybody hear, but—

???: “—Do~n’t you be so pointlessly stubborn now, why not just lean ri~ght up on someone else and relax for once, since you have one arm and all?”

Aldebaran: “…Yae, is that you?”

Yae: “Yes yes yes, Al-sama’s helpful all-purpose shinobi maid, Yae, reporting for duty~!”

With nary a sign or footstep, as if having literally appeared by suddenly springing out from a shadow, the young woman—Yae, cracked a joke with a smile.

As the girl walked towards him with her hands joined behind her back, Aldebaran shrugged,

Aldebaran: “Regardless of the helpful and all-purpose parts, being a shinobi maid is stacking too many character types.”

Yae: “That so? Even though I already had to sadly cut the beautiful, sweet, and lovely parts~. Okay okay, in that case what evaluation would you give of me, Al-sama?”

Aldebaran: “…Submissive cat-like shinobi maid?”

Yae: “U~wahhh, that way of thinking doesn’t seem like it’d be popular with the ladies. But then again, you do have a shinobi maid.”

Receiving a rather genuine look of scorn, Aldebaran clicked his tongue with a “Shut up, you”.

He was in the middle of confronting a challenge that required him to earnestly rack his brain. He did not wish to waste his time on the blathering of an ally whom he had no need to curry favor with.

Aldebaran: “First and foremost, I told you to keep an eye on the old man, didn’t I? Also, to check the paths that lead out of these woods, maintain vigilance over the vicinity of this hut, and prepare our food.”

Yae: “Don’t you think it’s like that super black~ thing you say? That’s how you say exploitation in Al-sama’s language, right? Right now, this whole thing’s super black~.”

Aldebaran: “You’re a helpful all-purpose shinobi maid, yeah? Put in the work so as to not tarnish that name.”

Yae: “Se~riously, Al-sama you’re like an Oni and a Beast combined into a brute~.”

Sticking out her tongue with a “Behhhh”, Yae talked back without trying to hide her discontent. When he stared her down, Yae raised a single finger with a “Fine, I understand.”

Yae: “The preparations for food are done. Though they are shinobi provisions. Vigilance of the shed’s vicinity has been completed. Even in these woods it seems that there are Witchbeasts~. Speaking of, I’ve discovered a path through the woods with sound footing. It’d do you good to train your legs and loins a bit more. And, about Heinkel-sama…”

Aldebaran: “What about him?”

Yae: “Even if we’re keeping him alive he’s just a carry-on, so maybe we could use him as bait to avoid the Witchbeasts… geez~, please don’t make that face, I was just joking.”

Aldebaran: “You shouldn’t be able to see my face.”

Yae: “I can see the signs you give off. You’re pretty loud, Al-sama.”

Saying something that seemed both understandable and unintelligible, Yae abruptly turned her face away. But, without averting his own gaze, Al continued to glare at her side-profile.

Before long, she seemed to give in, and taking a deep breath,

Yae: “Heinkel-sama is all tied up. I’ll be alerted if he happens to wake up, and if he tries too hard to run away, his limbs will be in pieces.”

Aldebaran: “In pieces, eh. Could you really manage that on that old man?”

Yae: “Even if he’s sturdy, he’s not a steelfolk or anything, some parts of him are more frail. My technique is to penetrate those parts. To begin with, even though you’re asking if I can do it, you’d get angry if I actually did do it, right?”

Aldebaran: “Guess so.”

Yae: “Then, I guess I won’t do it~. There’s no merit in me angering you, Al-sama, isn’t that right?”

Raising both her hands in a gesture of non-defiance, Yae showed that she meant no harm, to which Aldebaran relaxed his shoulders.

Her manner of speech was frivolous, and she also liked to jest, but there was no falsehood in Yae’s words. That which Aldebaran had done to Yae was nothing so easy such that she would still be plotting something here.

To the utmost extent of what had been possible, thoroughly and mercilessly, he had shattered her defiant spirit—no, he had shattered her heart.

The reason why Yae Tenzen was assisting Aldebaran right now was the result of having done so.

—Yae Tenzen was an assassin who had been sent to take the life of Priscilla Barielle.

Through the announcement of her entry into the Royal Selection, the existence of Priscilla Barielle also became known in the Vollachian Empire, so it was only a matter of time before people began to realize that she was Prisca Benedict, who had survived in a foreign nation after escaping the conclusion of the Imperial Selection Ceremony, which concerned the succession of the Imperial throne in the Empire.

Yae was intended to dash water over the live coals known as Priscilla as she produced smoke in the Kingdom; an assassin sent by a Divine General of the Empire, Chisha Gold.

In fact, the infiltration of the female shinobi had been performed magnificently, and put to use as Priscilla's chamberlain, she flourished as a hardworking maid in the Barielle Domain; Priscilla took a liking to her, and even Schult greatly adored her. Aldebaran, too, had thought of her as a coworker who was easy to get along with.

However, without forgetting her initial objective, Yae had aimed for Priscilla's life.

Hence—

Yae: "Al-sama was super scary on that day~. Under the pretext of the village's training, my body has experienced nearly all the terrible things that you can in this world… but, that was the first time in my life I ever felt so afraid."

Aldebaran: "…That's a story that makes my chest sting."

Yae: "You should at least feel my heartache. If you felt the way that I have ever since that day, when I was made the loyal servant of such a scary Al-sama, you should be able to bear it just fine. I kept away from the madam and Schult-chan… subservient to anything you would tell me to do, Al-sama, even letting you do whatever you pleased with my body…"

Aldebaran: “I never laid a finger on you though?!”

Hugging her own slender shoulders, Yae flirted in an attempt to draw sympathy, but Aldebaran rebutted.

V!c.1120

That statement had gone too far in damaging his reputation, and of course, having been said in the absence of any other ears, it was probably some form of pestering or discouragement towards Aldebaran.

But, Yae gave a flirtatious glance towards Aldebaran as he harbored that impression,

Yae: "…Sooner or later, why don't you try touching me without mentioning anything about where you've laid your fingers? You must be awfully fatigued, so, Al-sama, I don't mind comforting you in your weakened state, y'know?"

Aldebaran: "…"

Yae: "Oh? Ohohoho~? Does this silence perhaps suggest that you're considering it as an option? In that case, I'll go get the bed ready before you change your mind…"

Aldebaran: "You've got it wrong, I was just pondering over what I should say to shut you up. Besides, you…"

Yae: "What is it?"

Aldebaran: "You yourself said that there would be no meaning in having such a relationship with me, yeah?"

Pointing his finger at Yae as she produced a bewitching atmosphere, Aldebaran questioned her true intent.

Unfortunately, no matter how coquettishly she phrased her invitation, Aldebaran would never go along with it. Aldebaran had spent over ten years as a gladiator on Gladiator Island, where societal order was at its worst. He was tired of hearing those kinds of sales pitches.

Besides, this was not the first time that Yae had tried to seduce Aldebaran like this. Hence, neither was it his first time rejecting her, but as Yae caressed her own body in a disappointed manner, Yae: “This is also a shinobi weapon, so it’s hurtful for it to be dismissed so bluntly.”

Aldebaran: “Don’t cling to weapons that don’t work. Mistaking the means for the end can be a slippery slope.”

Yae: “Well, that’s quite the reasonable advice. —After all, if I could have gotten you to love me, Al-sama, then my tomorrow would have been secured forever, bu~t that hope fell apart when the madam died.”

Aldebaran: “…”

Yae: “That angry look on your face, I can see it y’know?”

As she slightly inclined her head, Yae’s words were a sharp blade that wounded Aldebaran’s heart.

It could not have been without malice. Yae was brimming with intent to wound Aldebaran, and Aldebaran had resigned himself to receive that blade. Neither of them had declared it, but Aldebaran had been intent on protecting Priscilla’s life, and Yae had also believed that the madam—that Priscilla’s life would be secure.

Now that the unspoken understanding had been broken, this torment from Yae was a natural punishment.

Yae: “I won’t say that you went back on your word. After all, I never ascertained it through your words. Only, since Al-sama loved the madam, I thought you would’ve naturally protected her til the end.”

Touching her lips, Yae spun words that tore Aldebaran to shreds.

In silence, as he tasted the sharpness of that blade, Aldebaran would listen to her next words. That was definite retribution he ought to receive—

Yae: “—Please don’t misunderstand. Al-sama, I’m not reproaching you for not having protected the madam, y’know?”

Aldebaran: “Ah?”

Yae: “I quite liked the madam. Though, I did try to kill her because of an order. She was classy, intelligent, beautiful, and surprisingly kind. But, if she ended up dying, then there’s nothing to be done about that. Those who die don’t come back. Though, for some reason it seems like they were brought back in the Empire~.”

Even though he had not shared the details of the events in the Empire until then, Yae brought up the topic of the Great Disaster, which she must have heard about somewhere. But, rather than where she got her hands on that information, Aldebaran’s attention was turned to Yae’s manner of progressing the conversation, leaving her true intentions unreadable.

If Yae had no intent of reproaching Aldebaran, then just what did she intend to accomplish by discussing Priscilla’s death and verbally attacking Aldebaran like this?

Yae: “My words are simply words, y’know~? Al-sama, you’re getting hurt by them of your own accord. All I’m doing is holding you accountable.”

Aldebaran: “Holding me, accountable?”

Yae: “Didn’t you ask about it yourself? About what my objective was in trying to comfort you, Al-sama… well~, perhaps your phrasing was a little more crude?”

Aldebaran: “…”

Yae: “Before, it was in order to have Al-sama love me and thus protect me. But, I now understand that it’s not an absolute, so my objective has changed from back then.”

As she spoke, Yae slowly walked right up before Aldebaran and folded her knees. Then, on eye-level with Aldebaran, as he sat on the dirty floor,

Yae: “My goal in my proposal to comfort you now, Al-sama, is not a seduction. It’s insurance, so to speak.”

Aldebaran: “Insurance…”

Yae: “Al-sama, it’s already begun, now hasn’t it~? You’ve betrayed those who’ve treated you well, you’ve even unleashed the Witch of Envy to ground the Sword Saint… this can’t be stopped, and it would be a problem to have it stop, so I can’t afford to have you fail. That’s why~…”

Pausing her words there, Yae gently reached out a white finger, and touched Aldebaran’s neck. As the fingertip of a short nail tickled his neck, Yae brought her lips to his ears so as to whisper,

Yae: “Please, accomplish what you set out to do, Al-sama. If it’s for that purpose, then whether it’s my body, my talents, my techniques, or anything else, please make use of them. I will serve to comfort you, be it to rest your mind or vent your anger.”

Her breathing was feverish, and with no falsehood in the voice that dedicated the entirety of her being, Yae flashed the high canines that could be seen in her mouth, and continued.

That was—

Yae: “—Then, after you’ve accomplished what you’d set out to do, please die, once and for all. Al-sama, if you don’t die, I don’t think I’ll ever feel safe for the rest of my entire life.”

Saying that in the most horrifyingly coquettish tone until then, Yae smiled.

That was the reason why Yae Tenzen was assisting Aldebaran, even if it meant making an enemy of the world. —Thus, Aldebaran himself could also assent to that conclusion.

It was something he had known since the beginning.

If Aldebaran ever accomplished his goal, all of his actions up until that point would not be forgiven, nor would they be exonerated. Much less would they be deemed acceptable or be understood.

He did not wish to be understood. Neither did he wish to be forgiven. Please, oh please, don’t forgive me.

Once all was said and done, Aldebaran would assuredly be burned at the stake.

That conclusion of him being burned to death was the hope of Yae Tenzen—nay, Aldebaran himself also desired it.

Were he to succeed in his objective, he would gladly be burned at the stake. Then, just like the woman who had burned herself to save her motherland, Aldebaran would likewise be reduced to ash.

—When that time came, finally would Aldebaran be able to undo his Territory, destroying the Matrix.

Aldebaran: "…"

In a mutual silence, Aldebaran and Yae locked eyes at a proximity where they could feel each other's breaths.

Therein was nothing akin to the desire between man and woman, but rather, a pitiful girl with the chains on her life in the clutches of a monster, and the dried out misery of a foolish clown exerting himself to play the role of monster.

Then, as their gazes continued to remain locked for a while—

???: "—Gwaahhhhh! Wh-what the hell?! How did I… Gwahhhh?!"

Suddenly, a voice that was neither Aldebaran's nor Yae's, but that of a third party, boorishly ripped apart the space between the two.

That which had been heard was a shriek from Heinkel, who had seemingly woken up. Though if Yae's report a moment prior had been the truth, the manner in which he had been tied up was such that if careless, he would end up in pieces.

Aldebaran: "…The old man's gonna fall apart. Go untie him before that happens."

Yae: "Are you glossing over me? It'd be fine even if Heinkel-sama were to fall apart."

Aldebaran: "It's not fine, I made a promise to the old man. When everything's finished, I'll arrange the Dragon's Blood for him. I keep my promises… Promises are, important.”

Yae: “Promises… alright, would you then make one with me? A promise, that is.”

Aldebaran: “…”

Yae: “If you make me a promise, and if you keep it, then fine. I’ll do it. Heinkel-sama won’t fall apart. I, Yae, am your faithful servant.”

Briefly poking out her red tongue, whilst concealing the murderous intent within her narrowed eyes, Yae asked of him.

At her words, Aldebaran closed his eyes within his helmet; then, slowly holding up his right hand, he extended his pinky.

As she witnessed that, Yae made a puzzled face befitting a girl her age. —He recalled when in the past, Priscilla had similarly been caught off guard upon seeing him extend his pinky like this.

And as he recalled it,

Aldebaran: “Entwining our pinkies and making a pinky promise, that’s my ritual for making promises.”

Yae: “Entwining our pinkies… how le~wd~.”

Aldebaran: “It’s not lewd. If you aren’t gonna do it, fine.”

Yae: “I will, I will. Have a look-see, Yae-chan’s pinky and Al-sama’s pinky are entwined.”

Her phrasing had been lascivious, but Aldebaran did not mention anything about it. Then, with their pinkies entwined, they rocked their hands up and down,

Aldebaran: “Finger cutting, ten-thousand fists, if you lie you have to swallow a thousand needles. —There, it’s a pinky promise.”

With that, he concluded the pinky promise of his own demise.

Aldebaran, wishing for his own death, had mixed feelings about

Yae's awfully delighted demeanour here, but he did indeed think that she really was a shinobi maid who suited those omitted aspects of beautiful, sweet, and lovely.

Heinkel: "S-somebody, somebody do something! Guh, gah! Gwaahhhhh!!"

Still, the pathetic cries of pain of the neglected Heinkel echoed loudly throughout the woods.

3

Heinkel: "Piece of shit, you'll regret this, maid…"

Yae: "Please don't use such dirty language~, Heinkel-sama. As you can see, we're isolated and shorthanded, so we can't afford to waste personnel to keep watch over you, Heinkel-sama."

Heinkel: "Then it would've been fine to just lay me on my side! The nerve you must have to pointlessly tie me up…"

Yae: "I just thought that seeing a little blood~ might calm you down~. Isn't it just the cutesy survival tactics of this delicate Yae to ensure that this camp isn't destroyed?"

Heinkel: "Why you little…!"

A red line streaked the back of his neck—as Heinkel rubbed where the blood had run down, he unconsciously reached down for the sword at his waist, indignant at Yae's talkative demeanour.

But, when Aldebaran spied a dangerous glint in Yae's eye at the same time, he had no choice but to intervene in their interaction with a "Wait".

Aldebaran: "Yae, don't instigate. Old man, Yae is just like this…"

Heinkel: "I don't care! By the time I showed up, this woman wasn't at the mansion anymore!"

Yae: "Yippity yep, Heinkel-sama and I narrowly missed meeting each other at the mansion. To think that the replacement of this beautiful and competent Yae-chan was Heinkel-sama, it must've been quite a shock to Schult-chan, ri~ght?"

Aldebaran: "…Surprisingly, Schult-chan got along really well with the old man."

Yae: "Heh~, that's really surprising. Even though that's not at all the case with your own son?"

Heinkel: "You little…!"

Aldebaran: "Yae."

Once again, Yae began to deliberately grate on Heinkel's nerves, and so Aldebaran directed a stern gaze her way; but, her only response was "Apologies~" and a bow with her hands clasped.

The two had met for the first time when he approached Heinkel with his plans, and had him leave the Fortified City in advance to converge with Yae, but their chemistry was worse than he ever could have imagined. Regardless of Heinkel not liking Yae, it seemed that Yae was also not considerably fond of Heinkel.

To be honest, Yae was unfriendly with Heinkel to an extent uncharacteristic of even herself.

Aldebaran: "Sorry, old man, but from here on out, both you and Yae are gonna have indispensable roles. I won't tell you to get along, so at least play your part well."

So, Aldebaran gave up on trying to reform Yae's attitude, and requested Heinkel to compromise. He was sorry to Heinkel, but so long as he desired the Dragon's Blood, he could not go against Aldebaran's plans or views. Obediently, he would be put to use.

And contrary to Aldebaran's expectation that there would be some natural backlash, Heinkel briefly muttered "Understood",

Heinkel: "More importantly, were you telling the truth? That in seven days, things will be settled?"

Aldebaran: "—. Yeah, but rather than calling it the truth, I'd say I'm serious about it. I seriously intend on concluding this in seven days.”

Heinkel: “When that time comes, give me the Dragon’s Blood of Volcanica. You absolutely must not break that promise… That and, the Witch of Envy…”

Aldebaran: “I’ve thought of a plan to have that withdraw. Before the battle between your son and the Witch of Envy can amount to anything, yeah? You don’t need to worry.”

Heinkel: “I’m not worried…!”

Aldebaran: “…”

Heinkel: “I’m not, worried…”

As his expression clouded over with shame, Heinkel did not wring out any further words. After gazing over Heinkel in silence, Aldebaran turned to face forward.

As Yae led the way, Aldebaran’s party was moving to exit the woods in which they had been hiding.

As mentioned previously, now that he had overcome the unavoidable clash with the Sword Saint, Aldebaran and his henchmen would have no choice but to avoid trouble as much as possible as they headed toward their target destination.

For that purpose, with a long way to go, they would have to continue traversing westward through the Kingdom of Lugunica.

Yae: “But~, will it really go so smoothly such that nobody gets in our way? After all, isn’t there a high probability that the Sword Saint-sama’s collaborators already know about your wrongdoings, Al-sama?”

Aldebaran: “Don’t call them wrongdoings… Firstly, my betrayal is undoubtedly known. When lil’ miss Flam contacted her little sister, it’s hard to think that the Sword Saint was the only other person present, and there’s no chance he just flew off without saying anything to anyone. Hence, we’re turning the tables on them.”

Yae: “And by turning the tables, you mean using the Divine Dragon-sama?”

Aldebaran: “That’s right.”

Responding to Yae’s question, Aldebaran pointed to the sky obstructed by the trees of the surrounding woods.

As Aldebaran’s party proceeded through the forest like this, “Aldebaran” did not accompany them. Of course, its large body would have been exceedingly conspicuous, but there was something that Aldebaran had wished for it to do by using its fame and absurdly noticeable body.

Aldebaran: “For now, the Divine Dragon is headed in a different direction from ours… I had it fly north. By having it draw attention there, I expect attention to be diverted away from us.”

He was unsure of the accuracy of Flam’s Divine Protection of Mindspeak, but if in addition to Aldebaran’s betrayal, she had conveyed the information regarding the antagonism of the Divine Dragon Volcanica, the sightings of Volcanica would be regarded as a threat to the Kingdom, and it would become the center of their attention.

Without Reinhard, they would need to mobilize personnel on the level of the order of Knights, or else they would be unable to even take seats at the negotiation table with Volcanica; such would be their viewpoint.

Thus—

Aldebaran: “Naturally, the opponent would assume that I’d be together with the greatest fighting strength.”

Nobody would arrive at the idea that he had parted with the Divine Dragon, which he had gone out of his way to gain as an ally.

But, considering Aldebaran’s objective, there would be no meaning in standing out more than necessary, so it was natural to exclude the inevitably conspicuous “Aldebaran” from acting with the group.

Having read Aldebaran's Book of the Dead, "Aldebaran" shared his objective, plans, and expectations, and thus would likely fulfill the role levied upon it.

In the meantime, Aldebaran's party would close the physical distance on their objective with success.

For that purpose, Yae's skills as a shinobi would also come in handy —

Yae: "—Al-sama, a problem has arisen."

As Yae suddenly stopped in her tracks and informed him so, Aldebaran held his breath.

Walking at the rear of the line, Heinkel also stopped, and called out to Yae with an "Oi". She responded not to his call, and silently directing her gaze beyond the trees—outside the woods,

Yae: "It's the "worst" that you get when you combine "most" and "bad", but we're being ambushed."

Aldebaran: "—Hk."

Heinkel: "Hahh?! An ambush?! So what the hell was all that for?! Your whole Dragon diversion thing!"

Receiving a report of unexpected circumstances, Aldebaran's cheeks stiffened, and Heinkel raised his voice. Heinkel was more distraught than he was angry, and Aldebaran felt the same way, even if he did not voice it.

There was no way they were being ambushed. The presence of the Divine Dragon Volcanica could not be ignored. That was, if they could not focus on anything else but the Divine Dragon Volcanica's strength—

???: "—Oi! You can hear me, can't you? I know you're in there, helmet bastard!"

Aldebaran: "…"

As if having calculated the time he had caught his breath, a voice struck at the precise moment he let it go.

But, that was wrong. That was not so. It was not that the time had been calculated. Unlike the have-nots, the haves would never miss the timing in these situations.

Such had been the case for the Sun Princess, Priscilla Barielle.

Thus, with equal status as Priscilla Barielle, for she who vied for the same seat of the Kingdom’s apex, it was simply that the selfsame marvel resided innately within.

Outside the woods, awaiting Aldebaran and his party, the second coming of the Golden Lion—

???: “Looks like you took care of my garbage Knight. Guess I got no choice but to clean up after him. —He’s not used to having it wiped by others, but the one who’ll be cleaning up his ass here, is me.”

Chapter 18:
A Hundred Times More Troublesome

1

—They recounted their lonely struggles, their days of ineradicable remorse.

A tale pertaining to their past, one that they had decided ought not be treated without the utmost respect, gravity, and caution.

Even after letting it all out, their never-let-go and forward-facing mindset was ephemeral.

???: “My compensation, that is.”

They could not help but detest the Witch who expressed the price for leaving this dream world as thus.

With a trace of their red tongue, with a hint of mischief hanging in the air, that vacuous beauty toyed with them, seemingly scheming to guide them as per their will.

Witch: “Alright, I’ve decided.”

The first time, she had demanded that they forget, but what would she decree for this second time?

As if to mock them, as they involuntarily stiffened, the Witch, who exuded the faint fragrance of flowers, brought her fingers to a white handkerchief that fluttered in the wind.

—It was embroidered with a Great Spirit in the form of a gray cat, with gold linings around the white fabric.

???: “The handkerchief Petra gave me when I left for the Sanctuary…?”

To scream out “Stop!” until their throat tore itself apart, they wished.

To scream out “Stop!” until their throat tore itself apart, no throat to do so could be found.

They wanted to throw themselves in front of the terrifying Witch and shout, “Stop!”.

There was nobody there to stand in front of the terrifying Witch and yell, “Stop!”.

Ergo, no matter how much they attempted to shout “Stop, stop it!” in their heart, no matter how much their soul attempted to step in, they could not stop them.

Witch: “The price for the tea party has been paid. From the bottom of my heart, I look forward to your next visit.”

The value of the payment was expressed, and a slight sense of relief and happiness grew.

More than feeling triumphant that they had been the one to have led to that, they were far, far, far, far more terrified that the Witch had taken an interest in them.

Just what their own self had become a part of, they knew not.

???: “Looks like Echidna kept her word. The tea party didn’t get erased from my memories this time.”

The dream world was enveloped by a white light, and they returned from the illusion to a dark, cold space.

Returning to the location where they again had met the Witch—something odd, they noticed.

???: “…Where’s Emilia?”

Their heart growing restless by her absence when she ought to have been present, they were filled with a sense of unease.

An overflowing sense of anxiety and a sense of incongruity seemed to seep out, as for one who had been forced to repeat this over and over again, it was a deviation from a base principle, a deviation that should not exist.

Driven by a sense of foreboding welling up from within, they hurriedly left the Tomb.

And as soon as they stepped outside the Tomb and into the moonlight, what they saw was—

???: “A shadow…?”

The Sanctuary, shrouded in the darkest of blacks, a tonality mark of a Witch even more terrifying than the Witch who had created said place.

No matter how much they shouted “Stop!”, how much they rejected it, how much they cried, how much they resisted, it would not draw to a close.

After all, this was the history of his unerasable path, that he had certainly tread.

—Amidst all that, did I contribute something?

2

—Helmet bastard; that voice declaring so had clearly been aware of Aldebaran.

Yae had sensed the presence of an ambush, and then came the familiar, assertive voice. It was not necessary to think very hard in order to understand that their deliberate act of separating their primary strength in an all-out diversion had ended in failure.

Having understood that, the problem currently awaiting Aldebaran was—

???: “Oi! That voice just now, it’s that blonde-haired brat! Reinhard’s master! What the hell’s she doing here… wasn’t it supposed to be that nobody could find us?!”

Heinkel’s distraught demeanor thoroughly exemplified the confusion of this situation.

His level of panic was the same as what Aldebaran felt within, but thanks to him disgracefully losing his cool first, Aldebaran had avoided becoming flustered.

Nonetheless, the situation was by no means promising.

Aldebaran: "…And I just updated my Matrix fifteen seconds ago."

The regular updating of the Matrix was intended to be a prudent measure in order to avoid unnecessary risk in the event of a surprise attack, but it appeared to have backfired here.

Aldebaran would have no chance to retry save for the fifteen seconds back from this current point.

This meant that the opponent's ambush was no longer avoidable. — An ambush like this was a far worse tactic for Aldebaran to face than any surprise attack.

Whether it was through good insight or just guesswork, the ambush had been sprung at precisely the worst timing.

Yae: "If you're talking about the Sword Saint's master, could this be the rumored Felt-sama~…? I wonder, is it already time to use Heinkel-sama as a human~ sacrifice?"

Heinkel: "—Hk, if you're trying to get through this by using me as a hostage, it'll get you nowhere! Those guys want nothing more than to have Reinhard succeed the headship of House Astrea. Right now, I'm the one in a bad position by being with you guys… if they have a good enough reason, they'll kill me without mercy!"

Yae: "We~ll… if that's the case, then wouldn't that make you even better suited to the role of human sacrifice?"

Heinkel: "I told you this ain't the time to be cracking jokes!"

Likely, she had not been joking. Heinkel yelled back at her with a dumbfounded look in his eyes while Yae asked, "What should we do~?", as she shrugged at Aldebaran.

Unlike the two shaken middle-aged men, Yae was calmly reacting to the situation which lay before them. Perhaps being the result of her shinobi training, her well-honed mental strength was admirable.

For Aldebaran, it seemed to be a state of mind he could never reach no matter how many millions of times he died—

Aldebaran: “In any case, there’s no point in us sending forth the old man.”

If what was waiting for them outside the forest truly was Felt and her allies, then per Heinkel’s grievous acknowledgment, it would be ineffective to use him as a hostage. In fact, if it came to pass that this opportunity was seized to take his life, it would have made quite the punchline for “Here rests the beloved and respected Heinkel Astrea” to be writ upon his grave.

And, the reason why naught but pessimistic pictures came to mind was because he lacked the materials to paint an optimistic picture.

Aldebaran: “Yae, old man, wait here. I’ll go have a look first.”

Heinkel: “Wh… are you out of your mind?! This woman’s a shinobi, isn’t she? If anyone’s going out there first shouldn’t it be her?! You tell him too!”

Yae: “—. Al-sama, that’s the best course of action, correct?”

Aldebaran: “Yeah.”

He gave that answer as he inclined his chin, and Yae readily withdrew, saying, “Ro~ger that.” Heinkel, his face still red with frustration, tried to continue pressing the issue, but,

Yae: “Don’t be so persistent, Heinkel-sama. You don’t need to worry so much; who else but Al-sama could come up with an idea like using the Divine Dragon Volcanica and actually pull it off? There’s no way he doesn’t have a plan.”

Heinkel: “Well, I… I, guess so…”

Heinkel reluctantly retracted his words in response to Yae’s backup.

As one would have expected, the prestige of the Divine Dragon was effective in many ways, regardless of whether or not the being in question was senile. Even in this situation where they were completely outdone, it gave one unconditional confidence that Aldebaran would not go down without a fight.

Unfortunately, it was now showtime for the lack of a plan that Yae had declared an impossibility.

Aldebaran: “Now, am I walking into an Oni nest or a snake pit?”

He would feel reluctant either way, but Aldebaran hid those uneasy thoughts inside his helmet and headed straight out of the woods, leaving the other two behind.

The information he needed in order to inform his next decisions consisted of the confirmation of the hostile opponents’ identities, and their fighting strength—

???: “—Heh? You got a lotta nerve coming out so boldly like that, must be fully prepared, yeah?”

His view, obscured by tall trees, suddenly cleared up, and a plain unfolded before Aldebaran’s eyes.

Standing imposingly on the other side of the plain with a smile baring her white canines was a girl of golden hair and red eyes; it was the person he had assumed, judging from the characteristics of her voice and the contents of her dialogue—Felt.

Aldebaran: “…”

This was what followed the encounter with Reinhard. That in itself was no surprise.

In addition, Aldebaran had already begun estimating his opponent’s strength as soon as he guessed that the opponent was Felt. —At the current point in time, her two star players, the Sword Saint and the Gray, had already been dealt with.

Referring back to his knowledge he had acquired from his time in the Watergate City of Pristella, would the other key members of this Camp then be the trio of former thugs, Flam's younger sister whom he had yet to see, and the old giant who had invaded the Royal Castle? Although Felt's own capabilities were yet to be confirmed, it was unlikely that she would come close to matching Priscilla's strength.

Even Priscilla would have been no match for Aldebaran if they were to have fought one-on-one.

Even in the unlikely event that Felt was secretly a very powerful individual, he would have had many ways of dealing with her. —At least, that was what Aldebaran had been thinking until he exited the forest.

However—

Aldebaran: "…Oi oi, what kinda joke is this?"

Aldebaran could not help but give a dry smile at the unexpected sight that unfolded before his eyes.

After all, his original expectation had been for five people, six at most. This was roughly a hundred times that—a group of over five hundred people were there to receive Aldebaran.

3

—Felt had grown up in the slums, and even though her position in society had changed, there still existed within her a mindset of poverty.

Although she no longer lacked food, clothing, or a place to sleep, those were things not of Felt's own possession; they were all attached to Reinhard and the Astrea household.

Indeed, Reinhard was Felt's Knight, but she was not so deluded as to think that this gave her the right to claim all of his possessions as her own.

Therefore, she had no intention of letting the "cards" she had originally held in her hand go to waste, even if the food she ate was delicious, the quality of her clothes changed dramatically, and she could sleep soundly until morning.

The “cards” in Felt’s hand were, simply put, a collection of traits she had cultivated in order to “live strong”.

Her keen eye for spotting easy suckers and her ability to escape, both honed during her time in the slums, her courage in the face of any situation, and her intuition for when she was in a bind—all of these had been sharpened further after the incident with the Bowel Hunter that had led to her encounter with Reinhard, and she continued to hone these skills even during her time spent receiving a higher education in preparation for the Royal Selection.

As a matter of fact, all of these “cards” were now much more useful than before. —And yet, she had still never been able to shake off Reinhard even once.

In any case, by continuing to hone her old “cards”, Felt’s perspective had broadened to a level that allowed her to see things which had before escaped her sight.

Felt’s confidence did not allow her to overlook the slightest sense of unease which might have bothered her.

—The same applied to when Flam, who had remained at the Pleiades Watchtower, sent word of the critical situation to her twin sister, Grassis, in the Royal Capital via the Divine Protection of Mindspeak.

???: “—Felt-sama, I must hasten towards the Augria Sand Dunes at once. I may have to do battle against the Divine Dragon Volcanica there. If the battle reaches beyond the Sand Sea, the damage would be far too great.”

Felt: “Wait a second… It almost seems like they’re going out of their way to start the battle in that sandy dump to me. I’m pretty sure you were saying something about how that’s the one place in the whole world where you’re at your weakest, yeah?”

Reinhard: “—. Yes, that is correct. I am not very compatible with the Miasma in that location. However, avoiding this is not an option. Flam and Ezzo-dono are in that Tower. In addition…”

Upon hearing the news from Grassis, Reinhard seemed to be driven by a sense of duty as the Sword Saint, to which Felt responded by saying “I know” and scratching her head.

That Reinhard was making that face at this moment was one of the things about him she was not very fond of, but there was no point in bringing it up. More importantly, she needed to get Reinhard to accept her next proposal.

That proposal was—

Felt: “Reinhard, I ain’t telling you not to go. But, don’t just go off alone. —Take us part of the way, too.”

Reinhard: “Felt-sama, that is…!”

Felt: “Hey, are you saying that you’re going off to do something reckless, but won’t let me do the same? Don’t be so conceited. Aside from you, everyone else is still entitled to do everything they can.”

Reinhard: “…”

Reinhard remained silent, unsure of what to say in defense, and it was easy to understand what was going on inside his mind from a glance.

After all, not only had their opponent completely defeated Ezzo and Flam, but he also had the Divine Dragon Volcanica accompanying him. This had the potential to be one of the biggest crises the Kingdom had ever faced.

It was truly a colossal task worthy of the attention of the Sword Saint.

Felt: “I don’t get it, though.”

Reinhard: “May I ask what you do not understand?”

Felt: “Even if he didn’t know about Flam’s Divine Protection, people would still find out about him as soon as he brought out the Divine Dragon. And as soon as that happened, it’s obvious you’d come flying. But still, that helmet bastard did it anyway.”

Reinhard: “…So, are you saying that Al-dono is acting in anticipation of that, Felt-sama?”

Felt: “Which is more likely in his case: anticipating that people will come for him, or believing that nobody will?”

Felt posited this with one eye closed, and Reinhard began to seriously consider the possibility.

He must have had some sort of measure in place to deal with Reinhard. In fact, it was quite possible that bringing the Divine Dragon to his side was a part of it.

With the poor conditions of being in the Augria Sand Dunes and the presence of the Divine Dragon, was it still possible for Reinhard to overcome this?

Reinhard: “Even if that is the case… Even so, I must go. Even if the enemy has taken effective countermeasures, I am the only one who can overcome them…”

Felt: “—Reinhard, don’t dodge.”

Upon giving this order to Reinhard, the eyes of the red-haired Knight, who was kneeling so as to speak to her, widened in surprise. When as instructed, he did not move, and Felt placed both of her hands on his cheeks.

Reinhard’s eyes were fixed on her, sullying his beautiful appearance which was the cause of much excitement in the streets.

Felt: “Moron, I told you I ain’t stopping. Just jump on the opponent’s invitation. Unleash your ridiculous strength and go wild. —I’ll pick up the rest from there.”

Reinhard: “—Ah.”

Bringing her face closer, she said this from a distance where their noses nearly touched, and just as she was watching his sky-blue eyes shimmer with surprise, the door to the room was violently slammed open.

Standing there was a group of familiar faces, gasping for breath—

Felt: “You’ve come back just in time. How’d it go?”

???: “Haa, haa… th-this is just insane…”

???: “Why don’t we just use one of our own sturdy dragon carriages that we don’t care about breakin’, milady?!”

???: “You idiot, that ground dragon… I thought we couldn’t take Romy with us. What the hell’s going on? Grassis didn’t give me any details, either.”

???: “Dragon carriage procurement, complete.”

The trio squeezed through the cramped entrance, shoulder to shoulder, with a sleepy-eyed Grassis following behind them.

Reinhard looked around at the crowd of people who had just arrived, and again his eyes widened in amazement. Felt snorted at the sight of that childish expression, one that did not fit his age,

Felt: “Hey, put a little more life into your face.”

Reinhard: “Felt-sama, this is…”

Felt: “Don’t get ahead of yourself and start thinking you can do everything on your own, Reinhard. You can’t even hold the hands of all three of them at the same time on your own, y’know?”

She said that while shrugging her shoulders at him, and Reinhard blinked, his eyes fixated on her. Then, he took a deep breath, and quietly letting the emotion in his eyes slowly begin to settle,

Reinhard: “—Yes. I am the Sword Saint who cannot even hold the hands of all three of them at the same time on my own.”

Finally, he nodded, donning the face of Reinhard, not just that of the Sword Saint.

4

After that, it was a race against time, as Felt worked Reinhard as hard as possible.

Carrying the dragon carriage that Grassis and the others had found, Reinhard went from the Royal Capital to the Augria Sand Dunes in a single flight, sending them to the Astrea Domain en route.

Reinhard: “I am leaving now, Felt-sama!”

Felt: “Go make a show of it and beat him down a hundred times over!!”

Truthfully, even with Reinhard’s Divine Protection of Wind Evasion, she had not wanted to experience that emergency trip again, but it had undoubtedly been worthwhile to make the detour.

The helmet bastard’s counters against Reinhard, their viciousness had far exceeded her wildest imaginations.

—The manifestation of the Witch of Envy in the Sand Dunes, which she knew was still keeping Reinhard at a standstill, had occurred shortly after his departure.

???: “To think, the Witch of Envy… even in my prime, I wouldn’t have considered such a method. That helmet bastard, I don’t know him, but was he really that crazy?”

Rom-jii, who was stroking his bald head with his large palm, sighed heavily at the distant report.

Rom-jii, who had joined them at the estate, was one of the two main strategists of the faction, along with Ezzo, who was no longer present. However, upon hearing Rom-jii’s report, Felt shook her head in disagreement.

Felt: “From what I saw, that helmet bastard wasn’t that crazy. His appearance and way of speaking were different, sure, but honestly, he was no worse than that cat-eared guy from Crusch nee-chan’s side or the black-haired nii-chan from Emilia nee-chan’s side.”

Towards Al, who had caused this situation and turned into an enemy, Felt did not have a particularly good or bad impression. —However, like the other Knights, she thought he had a strong sense of loyalty to his master, despite his frivolous attitude.

That was why—

Felt: "—When his Princess died, maybe he ended up falling into despair?"

—The death of Priscilla Barielle, caught in the internal struggle of the Vollachian Empire.

The unbelievable news delivered to the Royal Castle of Lugunica, naturally it reached Felt's ears while she was in the Royal Capital.

To be honest, she could not understand it right away when she heard it, and even now she did not feel it in any real sense.

That was how full of life Priscilla had been, so far removed from anything related to death.

Felt: "…There's no such thing as an immortal human. Us bystanders, we can swallow it like that. But, that helmet bastard wasn't like that."

Rom: "But, what's his plan if that's the case? Accordin' to the report from Flam, he's said to be commandin' the Divine Dragon, but is he plannin' on draggin' the world into a grand suicide?"

Felt: "I don't think that's impossible, but…"

To throw everything away, dragging the world with him to mourn Priscilla's death. —Felt thought it was unlikely to be such an outburst in that direction.

If Al's goal was such an obvious desire for destruction, then the biggest obstacle to that would undoubtedly be Reinhard.

???: "Yet, the helmet bastard didn't team up with the Witch… the Witch of Envy to kill Reinhard. So at least for now, it means world destruction isn't his goal."

Felt: “Oh, what’s this, Rachins? Just because Sensei isn’t here, you’re trying to be the voice of reason?”

Rachins: “Don’t mock me. Honestly, if you ask me, I just want to escape and run. The Witch of Envy showing up? This is beyond what we can handle.”

Exaggeratedly flicking his long tongue, Rachins snapped at Felt.

Beside him were Gaston and Camberley, who both anxiously agreed with Rachins, saying, “Yeah, yeah”,

Camberley: “Y-Yeah, that’s right, miss! Even if Reinhard stopped the Witch of Envy, the Divine Dragon is still running wild, right? That’s beyond what we can handle!”

Gaston: “Felt understands that much, right? We returned to the domain to evacuate the citizens on the off chance that…”

Felt: “Yeah, we’ll need to deal with that one too.”

Gaston: “See? Like I said… wait, did you say “that one too”?”

For a moment, Gaston’s eyes twinkled with relief at Felt’s response. Seeing his reaction, Felt laughed and nodded, saying, “Oh, I did, I did”,

Felt: “We have to think about the worst-case scenario, but we can’t make a huge fuss. After all, you guys are freaking out just because it’s a Witch.”

Camberley: “Of course we are! And you’re freaking out too, miss, aren’t you?! It’s a Witch, a Witch!”

Felt: “Your girlfriend gets called something similar, doesn’t she?”

Camberley: “Toto gets called “Wicked Temptress” but she’s cute in front of me, so it’s fine!”

Rachins: “Stop fooling around! The conversation’s getting off track!”

Interrupting the spitting match between Felt and Camberley, Rachins sharply glared at them as he said, “Okay?” and placed his hand on the map spread out on the tabletop with a thump.

Rachins: “We won’t get anywhere unless we decide on a course of action. Felt, what’s your plan?”

Camberley: “Hah, if it’s by majority vote, there’s no doubt the answer is to run. But…”

Rom: “—We all intend to follow your lead.”

Seeing Rom-jii’s serious tone, Felt briefly held her breath.

Looking around, Rachins had a skeptical look, Gaston’s face was grim, and Camberley’s legs trembled like a newborn deer, all waiting for Felt’s response without arguing.

Seriously, when did these guys become so reliable?

Felt: “That’s been me all along. I really hated it when something bad happened and people just sat around, waiting for someone else to fix it.”

Rom: “Sigh, such a fiery way of thinkin’. I wonder who she got that from.”

Felt: “Who knows. Ask my foster parent, have him think about it.”

After saying that to her foster parent, who slowly shook his head, Felt stuck her tongue out playfully. Then she turned around with enthusiasm, looking at the group waiting for her words.

And then, she declared.

Felt: “Alright, you guys, time to get off your asses. —This is someone who made a fool of my Reinhard. No need to hold back on him, so let’s crush him!”

5

—Resolved to fight, Felt and her faction had moved swiftly.

Far away at the eastern edge of the world, the battle between Reinhard and the Witch of Envy raged on.

And Al, the one who had given rise to such a predicament, had left the battlefield, departing the sand sea with the Divine Dragon in tow—they had been able to accurately grasp the opponent's movements until that point.

The problem was—

???: "There've been eyewitness reports that the Divine Dragon's goin' north. Take that at face value, and you'd assume the helmet bastard's gotta be accompanyin' it… That's to say, their destination'd be in the north, but…"

Felt: "If that's at face value, you're saying there's a thought pattern that branches another way?"

???: "Mm. Far as I've heard, the helmet bastard's plans were so meticulous that they included countermeasures for even Reinhard. So then, why go out of his way to stand out at the inn town by the exit of the sand dunes?"

Felt: "That'd be, to reinforce the impression that he's got a Dragon with him, yeah?"

???: "Indeed, he'd wanted to give us that impression. —After all, ain't the Divine Dragon flyin' at a height such that people can see it headed north with their naked eyes?"

Though he had prefaced that it might have branched another way, Rom-jii's conjecture was certainly unexpected.

Nearly all affairs had a simple way to interpret them, alongside a more twisted way to interpret them, and in the majority of cases, the simplest interpretation would result in the right answer.

However, a faint unease had restrained Felt's feelings in this case.

Felt: "Deliberately making a show of the Dragon going north, but why?"

Rom: “Naturally, it’s to conceal his true aims, oughta be. Showin’ the Dragon flyin’ ‘round is a card he played to distract us… so aside from the north and east, I presume his destination should lie to the west or south.”

Felt: “—. The Princess died in the Empire. If the Divine Dragon opened fire on the Empire, would it kick off a conflict with that country that’s filled with complex relations…? Nah, that probably ain’t it.”

If that guess was correct, it would certainly have yielded a great deal of strife between the Kingdom and the Empire.

However, that would have been in striking contradiction to the sovereign letter regarding the future of diplomatic relations between the Vollachian Empire and the Kingdom of Lugunica, sent back at the time of the news of Priscilla’s death.

Of course, there was also the possibility that, not wanting to get the Kingdom involved, it was a simple act of retaliation towards the Empire.

Felt: “If that were the case, there wouldn’t be much difference to a suicide bombing that drags the entire world down with him. That would mean…”

Rom: “—Mean what?”

Felt: “—My gut’s telling me west. Though, I can’t tell if it’s straight west, northwest, or southwest.”

Rom: “If the Dragon’s a diversion, we can eliminate the possibility of northwest. That narrows it down to two points. All that’s left is to —”

Felt: “Yeah, all that’s left is to—”

—Gambling everything on their interpretation, Felt lined up all of her Camp’s military strength upon the plain.

To put it bluntly, the Astrea Domain did not retain much of an army. This too was a malady of Reinhard being far too strong, but she had tasked those few soldiers with leading the evacuation of the territories that the opponent might pass through.

That was fine. Their strength was meant to protect. Right now, what was necessary was not that, but rather—

???: "—As I thought, there's something wrong with you, girl."

???: "Nah nah nah, I don't know about that. She's got a decisiveness I find desirable. If need there be, she doesn't hesitate to drag us vassals of violence into it. I can hold my nose high as her supporter."

???: "And where might that nose of yours be, I wonder? Those tattoos on your face are so vehemently assertive, and my eyes are unable to get a complete view of your facial features whatsoever."

With each speaking in their own respective manner, they were the representatives of the gathered military strength.

One was a large pig-human clad in a thick armor of muscle, of a huge stature that rivaled Rom-jii.

One was an eccentric of queer appearance, his face covered in blue tattoos of balancing scales.

One was a blooming beauty, coquettishly adorned in lascivious clothing unsuited to the situation.

—The Black Silver Coin, the Balance, and the Flower Prison Garden.

Although they were lined up, they showed not a tinge of amicability towards each other, but there was one thing they all had in common. —That, upon Felt's beck and call, they had gathered.

They were the big shots that governed over the criminal underworld of the Ground Dragon Capital of Flanders, a city northeast of the Astrea Domain, and since becoming acquainted with them during a previous incident, Felt networked with them.

Each and every one of them were scoundrels with guilty consciences, but at the same time they were a necessary evil who were supporters of Felt—numbering around five-hundred people in total, they trusted in Felt's instincts, and had accompanied her in this battle formation.

Felt: "Hah! What a magnificent sight! How'd this many end up gathering here?"

Making a visor with her hand, Felt raised her voice at the line-up of five hundred scoundrels.

In truth, when she thought of attempting to borrow strength from Flanders, she estimated that a tenth of this amount would have been satisfactory. Unexpectedly, she had gotten ten times that number.

Felt: "Even though I told them that the opponent was a guy who managed to outmaneuver Reinhard… geez, I know it's not the place or time for it, but I wish I could show you."

It was something she wished she could teach Reinhard, who was not present in this place.

That there were so many people who, instead of turning tail and running from a situation even Reinhard could not overcome, had gathered to clean up after his ass.

Felt: "Well, there are also probably some like Camberley who just can't back out."

Muttering so, Felt cracked her neck, and turned around with her allies to her back.

Ahead of her vision, parallel to the line-up of the troupe, the large forest—facing it, Felt inhaled in as large of a breath that could fit in her small body,

Felt: "—Oi! You can hear me, can't you? I know you're in there, helmet bastard!"

Indeed, she unleashed a declaration of war that served to commence the battle.

6

—Having had absolutely no idea that such an inconceivable move could have been played, Aldebaran could do nothing but stand still at the sight spread out before his eyes.

Aldebaran: “Oi oi…”

To the extent that a dry smile unconsciously emerged on his face, this situation had derailed Aldebaran’s calculations.

A situation a hundred times worse than he could have ever hypothesized, filled him with awe. Truly, this situation filled him with awe.

Lacking a sense of visual cohesion, the troupe was lined up across the plain; however, firmly sharing in the goal to oppose something, they were an army corps of unmatching steel.

Aldebaran: “…”

Still wearing that dry smile on his face, Aldebaran was at a loss.

The way his mind was abruptly thrown into chaos when things outside his expectations occurred, demonstrated the difference between himself and Yae, who instead stood impressed.

The grounds on which Yae acknowledged him as her superior, too, was nothing more than a fabrication secured by his cheat technique of an Authority.

In any case—

Aldebaran: “Quite the big shot, aren’t you now, lil’ miss Felt.”

Right in the center of that astonishment, Felt was the key figure who went above and beyond Aldebaran’s expectations.

The atmosphere she exuded that had convinced him so, had grown ever sharper in the three short months he had not seen her. As expected from such an outstanding talent, who had made Priscilla recognize her as a worthy adversary in the span of merely a year.

Her level of importance in the world fundamentally differed to that of Aldebaran. —Having said that, his resolve was not so cheap that he would back down for that reason alone.

Aldebaran: “Thanks for coming out to greet me. But, is it really fine for you to concern yourself with me? Even now, you guys’ Sword Saint is—”

Felt: “—Sorry man.”

Aldebaran: “…”

For the time being, Aldebaran was going to attempt to obtain whatever scraps of information he could through a battle of words. However, mercilessly interrupting his words, Felt scratched her head as she closed a single eye.

And then—

Felt: “Both me and Rom-jii agreed that shutting you up was the first thing that oughta be done.”

Aldebaran: “—Hk.”

That instant, Aldebaran’s body tensed up at a dreadful sensation. But, it was too late.

Before he could even react to that sense of dread, a small shadow that had been hiding in the entrance to the woods leapt out, and delivered a strong blow to the back of Aldebaran’s neck with a slender foot.

Aldebaran: “Kah, kuh…”

The intense impact jolted his brain, and Aldebaran’s knees buckled as they lost their strength.

In the corner of his vision, the one who had delivered that blow landed nimbly on the grass, their two bundles of peach hair swaying as they looked at Aldebaran with sleepy eyes.

A countenance he recognized—the young girl who bore a striking resemblance to that, her true identity was.

???: “Vengeance for Flam.”

V!c.1120

From those brief, matter-of-fact words, he understood that she was indeed Flam's younger sister.

Crumbling down from the girl's attack, as he began to lose hold of his consciousness, Aldebaran muttered.

Aldebaran: "Not, dead yet…"

Then, as his consciousness slowly faded down into the abyssal darkness—by reflex, he gulped down his poison.

Consuming the deadly poison kept behind his molar, was the singular action that Aldebaran had performed the most in his life, an exquisite skill deeply ingrained not just to his body, but to his soul.

This alone was Aldebaran's one and only special technique that not even the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, could get in the way of.

After all, there was not a single person in this world better at killing Aldebaran than Aldebaran—

× × ×

???: "—Oi! You can hear me, can't you? I know you're in there, helmet bastard!"

The sensation of his brain being scorched by poison was cut off, and what hastened his immediate recovery was a spirited, commanding voice pregnant with a hearty enmity.

The redefined Matrix—Aldebaran returned to when Felt gave her declaration of war, and brought the count up to one in his head.

???: "Oi! That voice just now, it's that blonde-haired brat! Reinhard's master! What the hell's she doing here… wasn't it supposed to be that nobody could find us?!"

Giving a sidelong glance to the exchange between the panicked Heinkel and Yae as she soothed him in a manner to provoke him further, Aldebaran went about updating the war situation in his mind based on the information he had just acquired.

An update to the military strength he had previously anticipated for the Felt Camp—moreover, a substantial update was needed.

After all, his prior expectation had been the three delinquents, the old giant, and Flam's younger sister, for a maximum of five people. It was approximately a hundred times that—with what seemed a party of over five hundred people, they had been waiting in ambush.

Aldebaran: "Really now, they've got a damn troublesome brain along with them."

In a form that differed to his showdown against the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, this was the worst case scenario for Aldebaran —

Aldebaran: "…Seriously, you're coming at me with the tactics I hate the most, lil' miss Felt."

—Between Aldebaran and an enemy that came at him with an onslaught of numbers, the unavoidable battle commenced.

Chapter 19:
Scuffle in the Shadows

1

???: “—I love you.”

The world being painted over through the power of those non-superficial words of love, they heard.

???: “…”

But in truth, that did not mean that “sound” was being produced.

The sound of something cracking, the sound of something being shattered, the sound of something being shredded, the sound of something being broken, the sound of something being sliced open, the sound of something being crushed, the sound of something being pulverized, the sound of something being smashed, the sound of something being pierced, the sound of something being hurled downward, the sound of something—.

???: “—I love you, I love you, I love you.”

But in truth, that did not mean that “sound” was being produced.

Rather, it was as an illusionary “sound”, that of all being lost; this affection, presented by the sable shadow, transgressed against the soul at the nexus of this world to such a degree.

A world, where everything was consumed.

A world, where everything would never-endingly descend into a darkness unfathomable.

There, amidst the deep, seemingly boundless darkness, a soul realized that everything, both important and unimportant, had been dissolved.

And yet—

Was it because they were weak, that they did not wish to admit it? —No, it was because they were kind.

Was it because they were weak, that they could not give up? —No, it was because they were kind.

Was it because they were weak, that they could not refuse love? —No, it was because they were kind.

???: "—I love you, I love you, I love you, I love you."

To those whispers of love, they raised their voice, rejecting it with everything they had.

But, they understood. They very much understood. That even rejecting it with everything they had, would not be able to turn it away completely.

???: "I love you, I love you, I love you, I love you, I love you, I love you, I love you, I love you."

There, a glimpse of a possibility was caught.

With the first, second, and third places in that person's heart having been taken entirely, a glimpse would still be attainable nonetheless.

For the cowardly, for the despicable love that sought to take advantage of this, they felt no sympathy.

The consequence of such conceit was, inevitably—

???: "I love you. I love you—Love me."

—There it was.

???: "Love me. Love me. Love me. Love me. Love me love me—Love me.”

They knew this would happen.

It was as clear as day. It was like stealing from a baby. It was easier than crushing a tometo, opening closed eyelids, or even breathing in and out.

They knew this would happen.

Because it was not for that other person’s sake. Because it was for their own.

If one did not have to consider the feelings of others, able to fill one’s heart and mind with only their thoughts and feelings, then naturally that would happen.

That was by far the most disgraceful aspect of it all, disgraceful to the point the shame would make one’s face burn.

???: “—I hate you.”

—They felt as if their heart was going to freeze.

???: “I am never, going to love you.”

—It was as if it was being said to them and not to anyone else, and they felt they were going to die.

However, even that fear of death was much, much, much, much, much, much better than what was behind waiting for them.

After all—

???: “Petra’s handkerchief…?”

—They were convinced that the time had finally come, and that the noose was about to be slipped around their neck.

2

—A band of roughly five hundred people had gathered to receive him.

That was the troublesome formation arranged by Felt to intercept Aldebaran.

Naturally, the moment he left Flam alive, Aldebaran's rebellion would have been communicated to Reinhard, and he had rushed to the scene, just as expected. As part of that course of events, he fully understood that the selfsame information would have been shared with Felt and the Council of Wise Men.

In order to eliminate the formidable enemies he had fully expected to come after him, Aldebaran's intention had been to deploy his strongest card, "Aldebaran", as a diversion, thus clearing out his own path.

However, by the unexpected initiative of a young girl whom he had underestimated, his calculations had been reset to square one.

Aldebaran: "Good grief, there's too many star players in this world that I can't compete with."

???: "I told you this ain't the time to be cracking jokes!"

As Aldebaran shrugged his shoulders and grumbled, Heinkel shouted at him—no, Heinkel was not yelling at him, but rather at Yae.

It was merely that his angered shout at Yae's proposed human sacrifice strategy had miraculously coincided with Aldebaran's mumbling.

In any case—

Aldebaran: "As the old man says, this isn't the time for jokes. We're going to deal with it."

As his cheeks tightened within his helmet, Aldebaran shoved aside his lament towards this absurd world and called upon his two companions to begin a strategy meeting.

Heinkel, his face pale, and Yae, her thin smile unable to be deciphered; these two, along with the talentless Aldebaran, were the cards in his hand, having used his primary strength as a diversion.

Aldebaran: “A bit shabby, but they don’t have their best members, either.”

Heinkel: “By dealing with it, what are you planning on doing? To begin with, the opponent’s…”

Aldebaran: “There’s roughly five hundred enemies, and although they don’t look like Knights or guards, they’ve got their fair share of experience with brawling. Also, I’m pretty sure we’re up against that lil’ miss Felt.”

Yae: “Five hundred people~, that’s quite a lot!”

Yae put her finger to her lips, impressed at how they were able to gather so many people in such a short amount of time.

Aldebaran was in complete agreement; without taking nearly the best possible moves and strategies, they would not have been able to bring the situation to this point.

Heinkel: “Wait, wait, wait! Five hundred?! And they’re not soldiers? What the hell is going on? First of all, how the hell did you even get that information?”

Aldebaran: “Stop right there, old man. It doesn’t matter how I know the opponent’s numbers. What matters is that it’s the truth. Besides, we made a deal at the start, remember? —If you want the Dragon’s Blood, don’t go against my plans.”

Heinkel: “Gh…”

Aldebaran: “People hate a man who can’t keep his word, you know?”

After being reminded, Heinkel fell silent, though visibly frustrated.

Heinkel’s situation was like that of a horse running with a carrot dangled before its face. Unlike a horse, however, Heinkel’s longing could only be satisfied by that particular carrot.

Hence, Heinkel could not defy Aldebaran, who dangled the carrot before him.

Yae: “Now that Heinkel-sama has been silenced, what will you do? Five hundred people is still pretty tough, y’know?”

Aldebaran: “Aren’t you supposed to be the greatest masterpiece of a shinobi to ever be made in Vollachia? Can’t you do something about it?”

Yae: “Even if you say I’m the greatest masterpiece, I did fail in my assassination attempt~? Besides, it’s not the job of a shinobi to slaughter a hundred or a thousand people on the battlefield. I’m no Blue Lightning, after all.”

Aldebaran: “Well, I guess you’re right.”

The Blue Lightning, whom Yae pouted her lips at as she brought up—Cecilus, was somebody whom Aldebaran had also worked together with, though only for a brief time.

His abilities were just as the anecdotal exaggeration that Yae had described, and he was a member of the same realm of incomprehensible outliers that included Reinhard.

If Aldebaran had that kind of power, he would have been able to take on even a thousand people in a head-on collision; but, unfortunately, he had given up such lofty aspirations when he was a teenager.

Ergo—

Aldebaran: “Realistically speaking, it’s a fool’s errand to venture out into a place where five hundred people are waiting for you. We already happen to be in the woods… we’ll take a detour such that they can’t find us.”

Judging from the tone of the voice that was thrown at them, it seemed an unreasonable plan to just pretend they were not actually there. But, if they knew exactly where Aldebaran and his henchmen were, they would have had Grassis launch a surprise attack.

So long as that was not the case, they simply knew that they were in the woods, but nothing more.

Then, depending on how they maneuvered, they could divide the five hundred enemies even further—

Yae: “Ah~, Al-sama, this might be a bit bad.”

Having decided on a course of action, just as he was about to move from their position, Yae lightly tugged on his sleeve.

When Aldebaran turned to see what was going on, she was looking in the direction where Felt and the others were waiting, and with a wary look in her eyes, she informed him.

That was—

Yae: “They seem to be working pretty quickly over there.”

As Yae spoke, Aldebaran saw the same thing. —Logs of firewood, producing white smoke, being tossed into the forest one after the other.

3

???: “Welp, guess we couldn’t hope that he’d just waltz on out here.”

Indeed, right in the midst of the troupe that had deployed across the plain, Felt complained whilst glaring at the forest in which the enemy hid.

Enemy; whether it was fine to declare that helmet bastard as such, was a matter she still had some indecision about. However, Al was neither a friend nor an ally who had gone rogue, nor an acquaintance with whom she had deep ties.

Above all, in order to rouse the morale of her gathered troops, calling him an enemy was more effective.

Hence, Felt plainly proclaimed that helmet bastard—Al, as an enemy.

And, this enemy was within the forest surrounded by Felt's faction.

Felt: "Then, there's no doubt about it, right? Otherwise, I'd be a humiliated sucker who just greeted an empty forest with a loud shout."

???: "Hahaha, don't worry so unashamedly, Golden Lion. Indeed, it may only be effective in one eye, but once I narrow down the scope this much, I'd see them even if I didn't want to."

Tinged with a bit of a distinct accent, the one who had answered Felt was the leader of the Balance, a man by the name of Manfred Madison.

Within the Balance, it seemed to be customary for one to ink a tattoo of balance scales somewhere on their body as proof of their loyalty towards the organization, but Manfred had gone overboard in proving his faithfulness. He was a person who had inked tattoos onto his shaven head, his face and neck, even his eyeball, and it was likely that the same went for everything that lay under his clothes.

And, that eccentricity of his was present not only in his appearance. —It extended to his way of being.

Manfred: "—The Divine Protection of Farsight."

Manfred's left eye—his lone eyeball with no visible tattoos, spun around, goggling with a stare affixed to the forest.

Up until a short while ago, that left eye of his also had been inked with tattoos. The reason why the tattoos were now absent was simple—the eyeball occupying the socket was one entirely different.

Right now, the eyeball sitting in Manfred's eye socket was the left eye of a man who formerly served as his underling—

Manfred: "As expected, one doesn't quite grow accustomed to the Divine Protection of another. Still, I saw them."

Felt: "While that might be pretty useful, it's also super gross. How'd you do it?"

Manfred: “I don’t dislike your straightforward wording. —However, the method of stealing Divine Protections is one of the Balance’s secrets.”

Without touching upon the method itself, Manfred confirmed the presence of their enemy within the woods.

In the past, Felt had experienced torment at the hands of that very Divine Protection of Farsight, so she had no room to doubt the credibility of the information it rendered.

Felt: “If they ain’t gonna come out…”

???: “Then there’s no other choice but to make ‘em wanna come out.”

Cracking his thick neck, Rom-jii finished Felt’s words.

The Great Strategist had used the results of Manfred’s defective Divine Protection of Farsight to the fullest in order to formulate a stratagem, and had been preparing the next move to be played against the opponent holed up in the forest.

That was—

Rom: “It’s tough for pyro tree lumber to burn up while it’s still green, so it produces lotsa smoke. It doesn’t stop fumin’ easily, even if you spray it with water. This strategem oughta be ideal.”

Voicing that, Rom-jii’s proposal was plain and simple: to smoke out Al.

Led by Gaston and other ruffians who all took pride in their physical strength, firewood from pyro trees, set alight, was being hurled into the forest one after another. As Rom-jii had said, the firewood was only producing smoke without spreading their flames to the surroundings, giving rise to a magnificent display of white fumes.

Rom: “The effects of the smoke don’t end at just robbin’ ‘em of their vision. While there’s also a psychological burden, the most worrisome aspect is the sufferin’ that comes after inhalin’ it.”

Felt: “I bet you’d have a terribly painful coughing fit.”

Rom: “Just so, it’s the agony of Hell. Moreover—”

As he spoke, Rom-jii narrowed his eyes.

Doing so, his gaze turned to Camberley and his girlfriend Toto, the proprietress of the Flower Prison Garden; they were directing her subordinates to bring about a magical gale and sending it forth into the forest.

The induced draft did not hew the trees, but instead gently brushed through the gaps between, a passage of wind—that was to say, creating a passage for the smoke, the white fumes began to spread throughout the woods.

Rom: “Far as I know, there’re no shortage of people who can shake off poison or deep gashes. And yet, in all my pointlessly long life, I ain’t never known somebody who could calmly bear the pain of bein’ smoked out.”

Witnessing his strategy marching closer to fruition, Rom-jii declared so in a low voice.

While that rang pleasantly within Felt’s ears, she once again got a keen sense that her foster parent was preeminent with absurdly dangerous knowledge.

What Rom-jii had done in his past, Felt did not know.

Only, she understood that it was not something that could be spoken of proudly, and that Rom-jii himself was ashamed of that past.

That was why, until Rom-jii decided to speak of it willingly, Felt would not pry.

Without prying, this was all she would say:

Felt: “How’d you like that? —My Rom-jii’s quite the formidable one, you know.”

Aldebaran: “—Smoke.”

The firewood thrown in—as he bore witness to it giving rise to white smoke, slowly encroaching through the forest, Aldebaran was astounded at his opponent’s unpleasant response.

Being surrounded by a large number of people was already the worst, but this just stacked a whole new level of worst on top of that.

Heinkel: “Th-those shitheads, they lit a fire! They’re trying to burn us to death!”

Yae: “Please calm down. An incendiary attack would leave them unable to confirm the corpses, and it would be quite possible for them to get caught up in it as well. When you combine “foolish” and “strategy” you get a “bad plan”.”

Heinkel: “Our opponent might have just enacted that bad plan! She’s a brat from the slums, you know?! Their kind doesn’t bother to think ahead!”

Yae: “Geez~, Al-sama!”

Aldebaran: “Got it! Old man, just shut up for a sec!”

With what little composure he had left smoked away by the fumes, Heinkel panicked, leaving Aldebaran to forcibly silence him with a reprimand.

Due to his desire for the Dragon’s Blood, Heinkel could not disobey Aldebaran. Be that as it may, the turmoil that came with being driven into a corner probably could not be treated the same way as complaints or objections.

Aldebaran: “—I agree with Yae, this isn’t an incendiary attack, more likely they’re aiming to attack us with smoke. Unfortunately, I’ve got no way to endure a smoke assault. Yae, how about you?”

Yae: “You’re asking if I can endure the smoke? No dice, I may have anti-torture measures and a built-up resistance to poison, but no amount of training can stop you from becoming teary eyed and coughing when inhaling smoke, y'know?"

Aldebaran: "Sounds about right. And so, no choice but to run from the smoke."

In order to avoid being smoked to death, they could reach no other conclusion.

The only problem was, that was exactly what the opponent wanted them to do. —Naturally, it was human instinct to flee from any danger before one's eyes, be it fire or smoke.

And thus, the artificial wind that had come blowing their way alongside the smoke was an untouchable hunter, aiming to smoke Aldebaran's party out—

Aldebaran: "I underestimated them, thinking that even with five hundred, they wouldn't be able to surround the whole forest…!"

Smoke for flushing them out, and a draft to guide that smoke.

With just that, then whether it be a small force such as Aldebaran's, or even a certain degree of military host, it would have been possible to force them to a desired position.

In doing so, Felt had completely surrounded a forest that could not be fully encircled by five hundred people.

Aldebaran: "Or rather, was it the brain of the group? Piece of shit, they've really got us here."

Clicking his tongue bitterly, Aldebaran pictured a map of the world in his head.

His destination was still far, far to the west from here—having already used up one day for rest and traversal, the time limit had shrunk from seven days to six.

He could not afford to get tripped up more than necessary against Felt here, dealing with a drawn-out battle.

Yae: “Al-sama!”

Aldebaran: “—Hk, Yae, point us the way the wind’s flowing! Old man, follow Yae’s directions, and charge straight ahead! Chop down any trees that stand in the way!”

Heinkel: “G-Got it.”

Yae: “I can’t he~ar you!”

Heinkel: “I GOT IT!!”

Overwhelmed by Aldebaran’s quick instructions, Heinkel cried out in desperation.

Then, in accordance with Yae’s directions, Heinkel quite literally cleared a path forward with his unsheathed sword. Following after his sturdy back, Aldebaran plunged into deep deliberation.

After moving a great distance, it would become necessary to reestablish his Territory; however, updating his Matrix would mean losing the option to return to before the smoke gambit was enacted.

At the very least, when Aldebaran had willingly exited the forest, Felt had not gone forth with the strategy of smoking them out. Of course, in that case it would have ended up being a head-on collision with five hundred people.

Aldebaran: “Which path would be better?”

—Ultimately, Aldebaran’s victory was guaranteed.

He had restrained the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea, and had neutralized Natsuki Subaru; not a single person in this world would be able to defeat Aldebaran.

Thus, Aldebaran’s victory was an absolute. —So, what did he seek outside of victory?

To accomplish that objective outside of victory, which path would have the highest potential?

Yae: “Al-sama, Heinkel-sama will die if you let him go by himself, y’know?”

Aldebaran: “—. Right. Let’s go!”

After a moment’s deliberation, Aldebaran nodded at Yae’s call, and began to run.

Simultaneously, he updated his Matrix at that moment, redefining it —once he prescribed the next starting point, he readily abandoned all attachment to the possibilities that had existed up until a moment prior.

Life was a series of choices. That went not only for Aldebaran, but for everyone.

Most choices were made in an instant, without any looking back on the unchosen alternative. But, that was fine. Aldebaran, too, would do so whenever possible.

What to eat for breakfast tomorrow? Which sock to put on first, the right or the left?

The choices made amidst a battle on which his life was staked, he would treat them as equivalent to trivial choices of that sort. The alternatives he did not choose, the alternatives that were not chosen, there was no sense in clinging to them.

Aldebaran and Natsuki Subaru were merely people who occasionally had more chances than most to cling to the alternatives. —If he did not make that distinction, he would end up stuck in a standstill for eternity.

Yae: “Heinkel-sama, the footing’s getting worse so take a right next. Take care of that big tree please?”

Heinkel: “Don’t say it like it’s so easy! You little…!”

Yae: “Ohh~, amazing! As expected, you’re strong when you’re not against a living being!”

Despite having cut down the large tree as instructed, Heinkel was agitated for some reason, and ground his teeth. Chasing after him, Aldebaran saw the density of the smoke thickening—by way of the wind, the smoke had begun to enclose on them.

In other words—

Aldebaran: "—An ambush's close at hand."

5

—Commanding the ambush unit, Rachins was positioning his battle formation at an exit of the forest.

In all honesty, he was filled with the urge to scream that he had been assigned a duty far beyond his capabilities.

In the first place, the mere fact that Rachins's life had somehow intersected with things such as the Sword Saint, the Divine Dragon, the Witch of Envy and so on, felt like a nightmare to him.

Rachins: "God fucking dammit… where the hell did my life take such a messed-up turn?"

Scratching his head furiously, Rachins let out an endless stream of complaints, trampling the grass beneath his boots in frustration.

It was nothing more than a petty act of venting. But, to Rachins's irritation, the damn weeds only bent softly without breaking or tearing, even as he ground them underfoot. Worse still, they pushed back against his sole, stubbornly asserting their vitality.

They were the very embodiment of weeds, shameless, persistent, unyielding—among them, Rachins could not help but picture a few familiar faces, prompting a heavy sigh.

Before he knew it, he had walked a great distance from where he had started.

Yet, no matter where the wind scattered their seeds to take root, weeds remained weeds. Their blades might take on a slightly different hue, their stems might grow a little thicker, but a weed would never become a tree or a flower.

Rachins: “Fuck’s sake, so no matter where I end up, I can only ever live the way I know how, huh?”

Rachins had not been told that by anyone in particular, though he felt like everyone had told him the same thing, and so he clicked his tongue. However, unlike his voice from just before, there was no trace of gloom or resentment in that sound.

All that remained was the burden of a troublesome task forced upon him, and the resolve to see it through.

And with that, just when a certain kind of defiance within him had finally settled—

???: “—Oi, there’s movement!”

The voice that raised the alarm belonged to one of the roughnecks stationed alongside Rachins in the field.

They were people of the Flanders criminal underworld, made of the same stuff as Gaston, Camberley, and Rachins—no, this lot was even more hardened than them in terms of villainy.

It was strange to be standing shoulder to shoulder with them, but here, their familiarity with violence made them dependable.

Drawn in by their reactions, Rachins turned his gaze toward the forest.

If things went according to plan, the helmet bastard and his companions, driven out by the smoke, would burst out from there. Then, crushing them with the power of sheer numbers would be Rachins’s—

Rachins: “—Huh?!”

The following moment, it was not the helmet bastard that sprang from the forest. —It was a cannonball.

—No, that was not quite right. To be precise, it was a massive tree, hurled with the force of a cannonball, spinning end over end as it made a mad dash straight for Rachins’s formation.

Rachins: “…”

The trunk was thicker than Gaston’s torso, and it was over ten meters long—this unfriendly tree cannonball was barreling straight for the heart of their formation.

Beholding the sight of that, the ruffians shouted, scrambling to flee in a panic.

However—

Rachins: “—El Goa!”

Boom, a thunderous explosion rang through the sky, and a bright red flower of fire bloomed against the blue.

The incoming tree shattered into countless pieces, and the force of the cannonball that by all rights should have torn a huge hole in their formation was now reduced to something that only hurt a little from the scattered fragments.

And, with his finger pointed skyward, Rachins had made that happen.

Rachins: “You fucks, this ain’t the time to be pissing yourselves! At times like these, the ones who’re scared lose! You’ve all heard that a hundred times, right?!”

Shouting at the bunch who had flinched in the wake of that attack, Rachins drew the knife at his waist. He aimed the blade at the forest and turned his head to look around, asking, “Got that?”

Frankly, due to his earlier frustration, the roughnecks had been underestimating Rachins, who was in charge of managing this location, and that reflected in their attitude. It was time to wipe that impression away.

Rachins: “You can probably tell if you saw that just now, but we’re the ones who got lucky! The helmet bastard’s coming out of there any moment now. We don’t have any time to be letting our guard —”

Down; it happened just before he could finish his sentence.

“Oi!!”, a voice cut through the air, and the roughnecks’ gazes shifted away from him once more. Annoyed, Rachins turned to face forward with anger in his shihaku eyes.

One after another, more giant tree cannonballs, each just as big or even larger than the last one, were flying toward them.

Rachins: “Goddammit it all!!”

Immediately after he cursed, a series of bright explosions bloomed in the sky—an unexpected defeat blew their formation away.

Rachins could only watch as a large number of the roughnecks were blown away, jostled by the impact, after which he clicked his tongue “Tsk” and raised his knife towards the woods again.

The situation had dizzyingly changed. If the opponent were to continue procuring locally sourced ammunition, it would be Rachins and his group left to their mercy.

Rachins: “—LET’S GO, HURRY YOUR ASSES UP!!”

Roaring so loud that he felt his voice might crack, Rachins charged in with a battle cry.

Doing so would rouse their fighting spirit. —Not his own fighting spirit, but that of those around him.

As was often the case in commonplace street brawls between ruffians, it was bad to be the first one hit.

Strangely enough, no matter how vicious a person might have been, their strength would plummet the moment they got hit. The idea that the more wounded and bloodied someone got, the stronger they became was just that, an idea; in reality, humans only became weaker as damage accumulated.

The same applied to one’s feelings. At that moment, Rachins’s side had taken the first hit in quite an unexpected way. That weakness caused by taking the first hit, needed to be overwritten with momentum.

And so—

Ruffians: “RAHHHHHHH!! CHAAAAAARGE!!”

The hot-blooded and simple-minded crowd was easily inspired by Rachins’s emotion-filled voice.

They furiously ran after Rachins’s lead, and with weapons in hand, they began closing in on the woods, and closing in, and closing in. Feeling them at his back, Rachins would provide them further support with his next act—

Rachins: “—AL GOA!!”

Hand aimed at the heavens, Rachins performed the incantation in a bloodcurdling shout.

In an instant, a gigantic fireball was born above Rachins’s head—it was a Goa-type spell of the Fire attribute, of which the degree of power had surpassed the basic, El, and Ul classes by going straight to Al class, the highest tier.

Anyone who possessed even a passing knowledge of magic would have known this, but it was a great achievement on Rachins’s part to recite the incantation, and succeed in producing an enormous flame.

The morale of the ruffians rose visibly, and Rachins gave the fireball momentum by shooting it into the sky, deliberately sending it high up into the air.

Naturally, the next group of fallen trees shot out from the forest were aimed towards that fireball.

No matter how many trees were incinerated, the opponent would stop at nothing to block that fireball—

Rachins: “Duuumbass.”

Rachins mocked his opponent by sticking out his tongue with a

“Behhh”, decorated with a colorful ring at the tip.

The large tree cannonballs were fired from the forest in vigorous succession, but most of them ended up missing their target. That was because the first shot had shattered the Al Goa—which, in reality, was just a flattened and stretched out Goa, a papier-mâché just for show, and the remaining shots merely dug pointlessly into the plain.

This was all in an effort to reduce the damage received by Rachins and his group of ruffians, by having the enemy waste ammunition attempting to intercept the faux Al Goa.

The plan had succeeded, and Rachins and the group of roughnecks charged into the woods all at once.

Rachins: “The first shot took us by surprise, and sorta reduced our power, but…!”

Still, with Rachins’s support, the group of fifty ruffians charged in nearly unscathed.

And then—

???: “—Ah~, geez, didn’t you only get in because Heinkel-sama got flustered~?”

The moment he heard that sweet, relaxed voice of a woman, Rachins’s feet stopped.

A bad feeling had taken over his whole body, and he instinctively stopped dead in his tracks—such was not the case. It was true that a bad feeling had taken over his body, but he did not stop of his own volition.

In an instant, he had lost all freedom of movement. Moreover, it was not just Rachins.

The same had happened to the fifty ruffians who had charged into the woods with Rachins all at once.

And, the perpetrator of that act was—

???: “No matter how good I might be at fighting many-on-one, there’s such a thing as a limit, really.”

So said the red-haired woman, who looked down through the gaps in the trees at Rachins and his group, who had been stopped in their tracks.

A slender woman in a maid’s uniform with a somewhat wafuu design was watching the immobilized men who were shouting in confusion and anger. —From midair.

The woman’s figure was high up in the trees. However, she was not using a tree trunk or branches as a foothold. She stood tall and proud in seemingly empty space, smiling as she watched Rachins and his group, who had lost their ability to move.

This was what Rachins had discerned, only able to move his head and eyeballs.

Yae: “After all, I can only tie together abou~t a hundred people at once, yeah?”

That this woman, whose outrageous combat abilities could be rivaled only by her even more terrifying personality, was accompanying the helmet bastard whom they were supposed to defeat.

Vic.1120

6

—Utilizing the trees that Heinkel had cut down, it was an attack that ought to be called a fallen tree cannon.

In order to implement such a thing without the use of the Divine Dragon’s vast Mana pool, it was necessary to make full use of physical labor on a level incomparable to that of making fried rice with whatever was on hand.

???: “Really now, you’re so rough in how you make use of me, Al-sama. When you combine “cruel” and “usage” you get “exploitation”.”

With the help of Yae, who could not help but complain at every turn, they had raised several of the large trees cut down by Heinkel into the air, creating a launch pad for them.

And in order to actually fire them, Aldebaran mobilized his scientific knowledge to—

Aldebaran: “Old man, on my signal, pull your arms as hard as you can. As hard as you can.”

Heinkel: “It’s not just that woman, I’ve also got some reservations regarding your attitude there, Aldebaran…!”

Aldebaran: “Remember now, Dragon’s Blood, Dragon’s Blood!”

Heinkel: “—Hk! Just give me the signal already!”

Ultimately, the application of scientific knowledge required an investment in equipment, so Aldebaran had to rely on the physical prowess of Heinkel, whose veins were bulging as a result of poor treatment.

Chased off by the smoke, they continued moving through the forest in a way that kept them falling further into their opponent’s trap. —Elite troops would naturally be lying in wait outside, ready to clash with Aldebaran’s group.

That was an issue that needed to be reduced to an extent.

Aldebaran: “Old man!”

At the signal, Heinkel grit his teeth and exerted his arms.

The muscles in his arms began to bulge, and even though he was an alcoholic who lamented his lack of talent, he achieved feats of strength in a domain Aldebaran could never reach—with ferocity, the fallen tree cannon was fired.

First would be a test fire, followed by hitting them with a second and a third; if the opponents thus got out of the way, it would be most satisfactory. Otherwise—

Aldebaran: “Pull ‘em tight—”

Those brave men would be crushed right in the nose, or so they had expected.

However—

Yae: “Heinkel-sama got so scared by that fireball… what are you, a beast~?”

The moment the gargantuan fireball appeared in the sky, so large that it could be seen even from outside the forest, an extremely shaken Heinkel fired the fallen tree cannon without waiting for Aldebaran’s signal.

As a consequence, they failed to destroy the majority of the enemy, resulting in them storming the forest.

Thus, Yae had been pestering Heinkel.

There was no avoiding that. —After all, she was the one who cleaned up the mess that resulted from his mistake.

The enemy force of about fifty men who charged in was halted by Yae’s skill alone. —By a weapon that had been strung up all across the surrounding area, stretching out from all ten of Yae’s fingers.

That was—

???: "—Are these… threads?"

Breathing heavily, the man seemed to realize the truth of what had bound his movements—he was a thug Aldebaran recognized. If he remembered correctly, a former thug currently working for Felt, Rachins.

At Rachins's words, Yae exclaimed with an "Ohh~" as she floated in the air.

Yae: "How perceptive. Of course, this isn't just any~ old sewing thread, y'know? This is what's known as a shinobi technique. Though, I've never seen anyone else who can use it except me."

As Yae spoke, she looked down on the men from high in the air.

Although she appeared to be floating without relying on anything else, in reality she did have a firm foothold. —Yae's specialty was the Steel Thread Technique, which she had used to string threads up all throughout the forest.

Aldebaran: "A Thread User, so to speak… amidst the numerous kinds of epic weapons, it's one that sits near the top of my ranking."

Yae: "Wow, how rare~. Did you just praise me, Al-sama? Is tomorrow the day spears come raining down?"

Aldebaran: "Don't worry, I was about to say that just because I like the weapon, the user's a whole different matter."

Yae stuck her tongue out at that reply, so without touching on her attitude, Aldebaran looked down upon the enemy below—having borrowed the power of Yae's threads to climb atop the trees, he looked down on them.

Even when one strained their eyes, Yae's steel threads were nigh impossible to perceive. Tightly strung up, they entangled Rachins and the other adversaries in a manner akin to a spider web, completely restraining them.

The ability to freely bundle together and skillfully handle all sorts of things was Yae's true value.

They had not only used the steel threads to restrain the enemy, but had also been able to come up with a device such as their fallen tree cannon from earlier, where they had tied and raised up the cut-down large trees in such a way that they would be sent flying in a spin when a thread was pulled.

Coiling many threads around Heinkel's arms, and having him pull them around like a work-horse, was just another job for him as a cog in their contraption.

In any case, relative to the impactfulness of the fallen tree cannon's appearance, the damages it caused had been minimal. Ultimately, they had ended up passing by most of the enemy, but in reality, if that many people had come freely swinging at him without Yae, Aldebaran would have been in for some exhausting proceedings.

Aldebaran: "When the fight's not one-on-one, the level of difficulty immediately explodes upwards for me."

As he had done in the Pleiades Watchtower, Aldebaran could handle the tag-team of Garfiel and Ezzo in plain combat, but if there had been one more person there, it would have been a completely different story.

The fact of his victory would not have wavered, but there was easily the possibility that his number of attempts would have changed by an entire degree of magnitude.

In that battle, too, he had done as much as he could to prevent a two-on-one; provoking Garfiel, and guiding him such that it would be a one-on-one in that space.

In a one-on-one, Aldebaran could find a path to victory even against Reinhard.

However, the more the number of opponents increased, the more astronomical a number of attempts he would need in order to find a path to victory.

Hence, Aldebaran was grateful for the presence of Yae, who was much more adept at fighting a large number of people than he was.

And, the value of Yae’s techniques could also be found elsewhere.

Heinkel: “Oi, what are you gonna do with these guys… Are you planning to… kill them all?”

Before he could explain that value, Heinkel voiced a question.

Heinkel, left on the ground as Aldebaran and Yae used the threads to escape into the sky, made a bitter face as he witnessed Rachins and the others entrapped by the steel threads.

Heinkel’s sword would falter when up against somebody powerful, but the reason for his bitter face in that moment was likely one that differed from that sort of cowardice of his.

In response to that cowardice, Aldebaran shook his head, and,

Aldebaran: “Nah, there’s no need to kill them. Rather, it’s smarter to leave them wounded. The dead won’t be paid any mind, but the living will need to be treated. This way’ll leave the opponent with less hands to spare.”

Heinkel: “I, see. Yeah. That’s right, I was just thinking the exact same thing.”

Yae: “Oh my, when you two old misters come to an understanding like that, Yae-chan feels left out.”

It was clear that upon hearing Aldebaran’s response, Heinkel felt relieved. Nonetheless, perhaps not touching upon that fact was Yae’s own sort of compassion.

In truth, it was essential for Aldebaran’s party to weaken the enemy’s forces. For that purpose, they would have to act wisely instead of recklessly taking their opponent’s lives.

That was why—

Rachins: “Heh.”

Heinkel: “Ahh? What? Feeling relieved now that you hear you’re being spared, punk?”

Rachins: “And which one of us is really feeling relieved here, you drunkard…? Seriously, the hair and the look in your eyes, even the parts outside of that, you really resemble him, that fucker.”

Heinkel: “…”

Flashing his teeth in a smile, the thug—no, Rachins glared at Heinkel. Rather than his threatening stare, it was the contents of Rachins’s words that silenced Heinkel.

From his reaction, Aldebaran judged that he ought not let that conversation progress any further. In order to interject, he leaned over from a thread wound around the trees—

Rachins: “Also, that goes for you too, helmet bastard!”

Aldebaran: “Oh?”

Rachins: “Both this drunkard and you, you’re too relaxed. You need a taste of s’more hardships, duuumbass.”

Being called names, he was involuntarily taken aback by the irrelevancy and lack of substance contained in those words.

But, right away, he realized that Rachins did not bear the eyes of a man who did things without meaning. The moment he realized, Aldebaran was made aware that the goal had been to take him aback.

Thus, he was too late. And the compensation for his tardiness, was paid immediately.

???: “—What, dull as a pig, you are.”

After all, the arrival of that voice was coincident with the fist of the King Pig crushing Aldebaran, caught in a distracted moment as he was, with a punch that felt akin to getting hit by a cannon.

Chapter 20: How to Use a Life

1

A streak of light pierced the pitch-blackness, and a flicker of hope filled their heart.

The inevitable end that loomed just ahead felt like it could be resisted, pushed away, escaped, which filled their heart with hope.

However, that's wrong, you are not that strong.

I had thought, I knew that you weren't strong. —I really did.

Without knowing anything about the truth, I just kept pecking away at the seconds you gave me, like a baby bird begging for food, without realizing what was being sacrificed for each second.

???: "Emilia…?"

Your excited heart beat violently as if you were doused with cold water.

From behind the veil as black as darkness itself, a face that should not have been seen peeked through.

Long eyelashes, beautiful amethyst eyes, well-shaped features, pale pink lips, she was so lovely.

Behind that veil, a face that should have been the most detestable was the same as the most beloved.

???: "—Hk."

With that moment of hesitation, their freedom was stripped away, and even their soul was trapped in a cage of eternal obsession.

The way to reject it is in your hand, that white piece of cloth wrapped in light.

Stop! I yelled, the strongest I ever have.

Make them stop! I implored, the strongest I ever have.

Make it all stop! I begged, the strongest I ever have.

All of it was too late, all of it was beyond my control, all of it was—

???: “I, no matter what—”

—Will definitely save you.

With that determination and vow within your heart—“I” killed you, Natsuki Subaru.

2

—Upon impact, Aldebaran’s body was completely crushed as he hovered in the air.

Having relied upon the steel threads wound around the trees to prop him up, his body was struck by a mighty fist that seemed to be around the size of his own head.

Those knuckles, akin to a large boulder, were connected to arms befittingly as thick as logs, and those arms likewise extended out from a torso clad in a bulky, dignified armor of muscle. That body was wrapped in a black suit out of place on the battlefield, worn by an enormous pig-faced man—

Pig-Face: “You don’t whine like a pig, do you?”

Voicing a worthless joke in a low growl, the pig-faced man snorted his pig-snout.

Standing a nigh two meters tall, whilst also weighing in at no less than two hundred kilograms, pig-face had jumped up into the air, closing in on Aldebaran like a cannonball, striking him with a fierce blow.

A perfectly enacted surprise attack; it was but a miracle that he had not died instantly—nay, this was no miracle.

???: “…In that sorry state, might your arm be headed for tonight’s dinner table?”

To Aldebaran’s side as he basked in the fierce punch, Yae muttered with an emotionless expression.

What she saw in those narrowed eyes of hers, was pig-face’s outstretched arm—the fist that had slammed into Aldebaran was being diced up from the finger upwards.

Yae’s steel wires, strung up throughout the air, had caught pig-face’s fist head-on, and with the brute strength of his huge body, he had hewn his own arm on the tenacious steel wire.

Consequently, Aldebaran had escaped an instant death, and pig-face had lost an arm.

However—

Pig-Face: “I suppose so. I’ll feed it to my underlings as a show of gratitude. Though their diets are unbalanced and full of fat.”

Yae: “Kyaa~, I love demi-human jokes that make fun of their own tribe! By the way, I recommend stewing meat that’s high in fat.”

Pig-Face: “Very well, we’ll stew it in a pot of your blood.”

Both pig-face, having lost an arm, and Yae, whose trump card had been surmounted by sheer force, were calm on the surface, but fostered an extremity of murderous intent in their eyes, exchanging it tactfully.

Doing so, they conversed on a level above that of those released from the yoke of common men, but Aldebaran, who remained on a level below, was already at his limit.

His body leaned against a large tree as he slid on the thread without falling, and unable to manifest the strength to support himself, he entered a free fall.

He had escaped an instant death, but unfortunately his head was smashed in, and within his helmet were likely various things sloshing around that must not be spilled outward.

Of course, since he could not progress any further in such a state—

Aldebaran: “Yaeh.”

Like so, he called out to Yae with lips unable to articulate properly.

The next instant, a steel thread wrapped around Aldebaran’s neck as he plummeted, and braced taut—as his field of vision greatly snapped, Aldebaran’s head bid a tearful farewell to his body.

To ensure he would not suffer an unexpected defeat, even if Aldebaran failed to take his own life, he had arranged for Yae to function as a safety valve to activate his Authority.

Aldebaran: “…”

Simultaneous to ascertaining this method’s effectiveness, Aldebaran witnessed the world spinning around him, and focused his mind on “what lay ahead”.

And then—

Aldebaran: “Nekst.”

× × ×

???: “—AL GOA!!”

An incantation that rang out as an angered bellow, and following that, the bright red swell of a second sun—the papier-mâché fireball that feigned itself so; the faint spread of its flames were as frail as the paper nets used in goldfish scooping.

At a closer look, it lacked sufficient control, and if they just waited three short seconds, it would scatter and disappear, such was the shoddiness of this masquerade—however, when thrown into the midst of a hecticly progressing battle on a makeshift battlefield, it worked as a fine stratagem.

Aldebaran: “Old man! That’s a fake—”

Heinkel: “Uwoahhhhhh!!”

As a corollary of that, and since it was right after he returned, Aldebaran’s call for restraint did not make it in time.

Alarm bells ringing in his head, Heinkel panicked and pulled on the steel threads, firing the loaded fallen tree cannons one after another directly towards the faux Al Goa.

Since he could not stop it, the outcome of that remained the same. —Internally, he clicked his tongue. Not at Heinkel who had been unable to listen, nor at Rachins who had covered up his inexperience with guts; he was angry at himself for messing up.

By the time of its lackluster explosion, contrary to its appearance, the two aside from Aldebaran, who had cheated, also were made aware of the enemy’s masquerade.

Regardless of his lamentation, it was already too late, and unable to stop the vigor of the incoming enemies, Aldebaran relied on Yae’s strength, thwarting their charge with a cage of steel threads as they had done before.

However, to make sure that this time did not end up the same as the last, he did not escape up into the trees, but instead deliberately jumped backwards, and changed course to standing beside Heinkel.

Thus, this time would—

???: “—What, dull as a pig, you are.”

He had been readied for the blow to come, but it had arrived from directly above him together with some cruel dark humor. Socked right in the head by an intense strike, Aldebaran’s head was buried in the dirt floor of the forest.

He had changed his position. He had exercised caution. And yet, it had all been painted over by an attack from above.

Heinkel: “Wha, ah?! Where the hell did… Gohakh!”

???: “Don’t cry like a pig. You’ll be put on display at the butcher’s.”

Flying in with the force of a missile, while bearing wounds all over his body from the steel threads, the bloodied pig-faced man swung his arm, slamming Heinkel, unable to do a thing, into a large tree behind him.

Buried in the ground, it seemed like Aldebaran's spine had been broken, his resolve to fight unable to reach his limbs. It sounded like Yae had jumped down and had begun to clash with pig-face, but he could not even lift his head to watch that unfold.

Only, a suspicion in need of verification was born. —Whether he was in the air, or on the ground, pig-face would somehow come to strike Aldebaran first.

Carrying naught but that information—

Aldebaran: "—Next."

Before he could analyze Yae in the air, Aldebaran swallowed his poison on his own.

A fierce, sweltering heat lethally scorched Aldebaran to naught from his throat and organs—

× × ×

???: "—AL GOA!!"

???: "Uwoahhhhhh!!"

Fearful of the fake sun, a futile resistance was fired in the form of large trees; with that in the corner of his eyes, Aldebaran quickly examined his surroundings, and searched for a new place to take refuge that was neither in the air nor on the ground.

Verification, was necessary. —To ensure he did not relinquish what little chance of a best course of action he had.

3

—Seventy-three times.

The Matrix resumed from the point when the faux Al Goa was launched into the sky; what Aldebaran had grasped from performing verification on this from various angles, was that no matter where he tried to run or hide, the pig-faced man's burly arm would reliably come to pulverize him each and every time.

That was to say—

Aldebaran: "My exact position's being leaked."

Regardless if he was beside Yae or beside Heinkel, if he was on the ground or floating in the air or in the shade of a tree or if he tried to get away from the battlefield, Aldebaran could not escape the pig-faced man's fist.

A punch enacted with the resolve to lose an arm was difficult to defend against even with Yae's Steel Thread Technique. —Of course, if it was just a matter of surviving the first blow, such a feat would be possible via the combination of Yae's steel threads and Aldebaran's magic.

However, even if he withstood a single punch, there remained another arm, and two legs if necessary. And, pig-face was made of such mettle that he would always kill his opponent, no matter how many limbs he lost.

Neither pain nor loss would serve as a reason for pig-face to halt his step.

Having said that, even when Aldebaran made an effort to extract a little personal information out of him—

Pig-Face: "—Don't pipe and squeal like a little piggy."

Pulverized by that brief utterance, he was not willing to listen in the slightest.

From Aldebaran's experience, the most troublesome opponents were those who had fully decided what they needed to do, hardened in their resolve, and stubbornly unwilling to budge.

Against people like this, Aldebaran's trial and error would lose all meaning. After all, people who had decided to kill him no matter what they were offered in exchange, would assuredly kill him, no matter what he might offer in exchange.

Hence, in order to greatly shift the circumstances, he needed an impetus that would bring about a great shift.

Aldebaran: “First of all, how’s he getting ahold of my location?”

In order to relentlessly pursue Aldebaran, and reliably kill him, some sort of method was being employed.

To begin with, despite having used the Divine Dragon as a diversion, it was unnatural that Aldebaran’s party was being chased around in the forest like this.

If he did not expose the method that perfected this encirclement here and now, then even if he evaded pig-face, and set Felt’s faction out of the way, a second and a third arrow would be fired, and his seven days would be squandered.

In order to prevent that from happening—

Pig-Face: “—What, dull as a pig, you are.”

As pig-face’s familiar yet worthless joke arrived alongside his fist, this time Aldebaran’s cervical vertebrae was shattered after he had attempted to use Rachins as a meat shield.

Side note, just before his stream of consciousness was cut off, he caught in the corner of his eye a glimpse of Rachins suffering miserably as he was caught up in the blow—

× × ×

???: “—AL GOA!!”

???: “Uwoahhhhhh!!”

The feigned great magic rose into the sky, and with alarm bells ringing in his head, Heinkel acted immediately.

Catching the familiar sight of the fireball's explosion in the corner of his eye, Aldebaran summoned Yae, who wore an astonished expression at Heinkel's rash behavior, and tightened a string different to the one for the cage that would have welcomed Rachins and the others.

A new steel thread launchpad, after firing many fallen trees up until this point, what it launched next was—

Aldebaran: "PUUULL!!"

Bewildered, Heinkel did as he was told and pulled the thread, his mind having fallen into a state incapable of thinking. With the propulsion gained from his remarkable physical strength, it was the duo of Aldebaran and Yae who drew a parabola as they flew into the sky.

Feeling as if he had been released from the forces of wind and gravity, Aldebaran soared over the treetops with Yae clutched in his single arm, fleeing from the battlefield onto which Rachins and his squadron were storming.

Left by his lonesome in that place, Heinkel would likely be mobbed by Rachins and the others, but this attempt was a throwaway in order to ascertain something he wished to ascertain.

Amidst this verification, he would turn a blind eye to Heinkel's noble sacrifice.

Yae: "Don't bite your tongue, please~!"

As he glanced back at Heinkel, feeling guilty for deserting him, Yae swung her arms while held in his arm.

Her wrists were slender, and upon each of her even more slender fingers were fitted undecorative rings, from which superfine threads of steel extended, barely visible even to strained eyes.

The shinobi were known to possess preeminent abilities, and among them she was the only one who had mastered the Steel Thread Technique—maneuvering it to perfection, Yae affixed threads to the trees ahead of them as they soared, and they rapidly gained distance as they drew arcs swinging on ropes like Tarzan.

However—

Aldebaran: "—Hk."

Swinging with all their might, Aldebaran and Yae went through the escape path that had been guided by the smoke—that was to say, a region still mercilessly enshrouded in white fumes.

Forcing their way through with steel threads, Aldebaran and Yae went against the current of the white smoke that had chased them out, flying to ascertain one final thing after a series of verifications.

Only, even if they crossed distance at a speed incomparable to that of running on the ground, the only chance they had to breathe was at the highest point of their swing, the moment in which they broke past above the treetops, outside the smoke.

Moreover, the more they progressed the more difficult that became, and as the smoke grew taller and more dense, the agony that gave no quarter began to encroach on his lungs, his eyeballs, his every membrane.

If they recklessly swung around like this, setting aside the superhuman that was Yae, Aldebaran, equipped with naught but mediocre specs, would be done in by the smoke immediately.

Hence, he would have to carefully determine their destination, or else—

Aldebaran: "—Northwest."

Bringing his mouth up to Yae's ear as she extended steel threads and swung, he directed her so.

His target was northwest, no doubt about it. —After all, he had already checked all the other directions.

Unable to draw out the right answer until the very end of the end, luck had truly abandoned him in all regards. Not once in his whole life had he ever thought himself blessed by fortune.

Aldebaran: "…No, there was just one time."

—The fact that he had happened upon her, was undoubtedly Aldebaran's one and only fortune. Even now that he had lost her, he did not think that meeting her had been a mistake.

Aldebaran: "—Hk."

Enduring the strong emotions surging up in his chest, he firmly clenched his teeth, and in that moment the situation changed.

Tearing through the white smoke in their swing, the moment they broke out above the trees, throwing stones came flying from outside the smoke at a ferocious pace, aimed at the airborne Aldebaran and Yae.

Simple stones, as a barrage of them closed in with ridiculous strength, Aldebaran promptly created a wall of earth, overcoming the first wave by sheer force.

But, the stones would likely only continue to come. So, before that could happen, he would split off.

Yae: "—Al-sama!!"

Yae's shrill voice reverberated in his helmet, and feeling his eardrums go numb, Aldebaran lost his connection to her mid-air, and was thrown high up into the sky.

At the highest point of their swing, he was sent flying even higher up by Yae.

Aldebaran: "OHHHHHH—!!"

Bellowing, he covered his frontside with an earthen wall as he soared, charging to meet the stones head-on.

Having lost his stability, he could not make the earthen wall thick or weighty, so it was brittle; it would not protect him any more than a blanket would against the oncoming stones.

But, even so, Aldebaran had escaped the white smoke, and had once again exited the forest.

He had escaped to the plain where he had first received the declaration of war, and had basked in a thorough blow from Grassis, who thus succeeded in her vengeance for her elder sister.

And, present there just as Aldebaran had hoped—

???: "—Come to subdue the leader on your own, have you? Ain't that a piss-poor plan you'd arrive at faster by countin' up from your worst options?"

Below Aldebaran as he flew out from the white smoke, the bald old giant spoke while looking up at him. —A person whose long, burly arms of a giant, were equipped with gauntlets each fitted with several Conversation Mirrors.

Witnessing that, it finally clicked. —All of these traps had been schemed by this old giant.

Aldebaran: "So you were the brain…!"

There was far too much of a gap between his appearance and the image of his position, so he never would have guessed.

Rachins's appearance was very much like a thug, but Aldebaran would have been less surprised to hear that he was the military strategist. Normally, giants were in charge of the front lines, where they could best leverage their physical attributes. For one to work as the brain—this also went for Ezzo, but for that to have been the case for both a dwarf and a giant was too much.

As his head flooded with such useless badmouthing, Aldebaran realized.

Aldebaran: "Lil' miss Felt—"

Was nowhere to be found on the plain. —This, too, was a serious blow to Aldebaran.

Naturally, putting an end to this battle by completely wiping out five hundred enemies was by no means realistic. Hence, as an objective that was possible to achieve, capturing Felt had always been present in Aldebaran's mind. That possibility had been completely blocked by the opposition.

It was a matter of course, but the most obvious victory condition for him, would also have been the most obvious defeat condition for the opposition. Loathe to say, it made sense for Felt to fall back.

Aldebaran: "Shit."

Aldebaran's victory would not waver. That was settled.

Therefore, all that remained was to search for the key to victory, and yet.

???: "You, don't be looking off to the side now!!"

Aldebaran: "—Hk!"

The moment he updated his victory condition in his head, an impact pierced him from directly above that head of his.

The audible voice was thick, but the words cast to him were not the familiar joke of pig-face. From what he could see, it was the thug with the large build—Gaston, who had jumped up to Aldebaran's flank, higher up than the white smoke, and had joined his hands together to swing down and deliver a crushing blow.

Aldebaran: "Seri… ously…?"

At the attack of an opponent who had unmistakably mastered the Flow Method, Aldebaran cried out in pain.

The Flow Method could not be mastered by any ordinary training, and was the barrier that determined whether one could become a first-rate warrior. At the addition of a threat who could wield that technique, Aldebaran revised his evaluation of the opponent whose strength he had underestimated.

As he revised it, that strike knocked him into the ground.

Aldebaran: "Gah, guohhhh…!"

Immediately failing to brace himself, his clumsy impact to the ground fractured his right elbow. In agony over the pointless pain induced by the broken bone piercing through his flesh and skin, Aldebaran grazed his helmet across the ground.

It hurts, it hurts, hurts hurts hurts hurts hurts, hurts, it hurts, but he had seen, what he wanted to see.

Aldebaran: “From here on out, it’ll be a battle of wits, between you, and me… hk”

Grinding his teeth to the extent that they cracked, with the sensation of magnifying anguish as the smoke permeated his lungs, he opened the package of poison with his tongue in a motion he was well accustomed to.

The smoke was far too thick, and it was quite possible that he might almost cough out the poison. By no means did he think that old giant had aimed that far, but the fact that he was having so many unfavorable draws was a problem.

He had no choice but to overcome this unfavorable tide. Thus, searching for the path to victory that ought to have been somewhere, searching, searching searching searching searching searchingsearchingsearchsearchsearchsearchsearsearsearchch—ah.

4

???: “—No need to add anymore pyro tree logs. Any further and there’s a fear that the opponent could take advantage of it. It’ll be just right if they find our plan a little unsatisfactory.”

Instructing the end of the strategy to drive them out with smoke, Valga Cromwell—no, the former Great Strategist of the Demi-Human Alliance now known as Rom-jii, worked his elderly head as hard as he could.

Completing the encirclement of the deceased Priscilla Barielle’s former Knight, who had won himself the popular nickname of “Helmet Bastard”, all that remained was to carefully reel the opponent in. However, they needed to be on guard.

This opponent had devised a plan that employed the Divine Dragon Volcanica and the Witch of Envy to suppress the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea. He could not help but admire such an ingenious scheme.

But then again, the presence of such a dangerous and cunning “enemy” was exactly what Rom-jii had hoped for.

Many giants were of an exceedingly belligerent and rough nature, and their instincts sought battles of boiling blood and throbbing flesh—it was not for any such foolish reason.

What he desired was a peril that shook the Kingdom, and the prestige of removing its presence.

—For Felt to win and advance in the Royal Selection, she was in need of renown gained in the absence of the Sword Saint.

The Royal Candidates repelling the great cataclysm brought about by the Witch Cult in the Watergate City of Pristella was an event still fresh in his memory, but the result of that had been the stocks of each of the five candidates rising by an equal amount.

Their relative standings in the Royal Selection would not change. Hence, Felt would need to gain achievements independently.

The actions of this helmet bastard were capable of shaking not just the Royal Selection, but the entire world, and thus would prove sufficient for such an achievement.

Rom: “‘Course, Felt probably ain’t thinkin’ ‘bout that sorta thing.”

After all, the reason Felt stood here now to take on the helmet bastard was not for any long-term outlook that included such calculations, but because she had the power to fight off the imminently approaching peril; that, and for the sake of her one and only Knight, who bore the duty of being the first one to hasten into such situations.

Hence, it was fine that the only ones scheming to benefit from this situation later were himself, who was rather underhanded in contrast to his large body, and the dirty adults who controlled the criminal underworld.

The three notorious organizations of the Ground Dragon Capital of Flanders, the Balance, the Flower Prison Garden, and the Black Silver Coin; by putting their ruffians to use, they would secure fruits of battle to win the crown for Felt.

—Initially, Rom-jii had taken a firm stance against Felt participating in the Royal Selection, against her getting involved in the center of something as large as the Kingdom of Lugunica.

For Rom-jii, who knew about Felt's birth, about the karma of the blood that ran through her veins, it was a matter of course.

On the other hand, however, Rom-jii had continued to keep Felt in the Royal Capital. If he had felt so inclined, there had always been the option to bring Felt far out to live in the remote countryside before she gained awareness of herself or her surroundings.

Nevertheless, Rom-jii had not done so. He thought that likely, that was because he had fostered a premonition deep down in his heart. —That a large, unavoidable undulation would eventually catch up to them both.

When that time came, if he could be by Felt's side, he would wield his pointlessly large body to its utmost capability, and carry out the duty of shield or armor or aught else required.

However, there was a sufficient possibility that he would be unable. He had grown old. He could not yet feel any pressing emaciation, but even if he was a giant, it would be no strange affair for death to come knocking on his door hereafter.

For that reason, it was necessary. A guarantee that Felt—that his adorable grandchild would be protected for the rest of eternity, was necessary.

If the promissory note for that meant the apex of the Kingdom, he would crown Felt himself.

For that purpose, he would not hesitate to once more swing the baton of command he had vowed to never swing again.

Rom: “Though compared to the past, my chances’ve decreased an awful lot… to this day, the nightmares won’t let me go.”

Almost half a century had passed, and the Demi-Human War was a distant memory.

Even so, throughout that long, long time, the embers of regret had only continued to simmer in a pot within Rom-jii. When he gained a chance to see the light of day, the lid of that pot was opened.

Back then, the foolish Valga Cromwell had been insufficient. —Time had made up for that foolishness of his, and while his asininity remained unchanged, Rom-jii would wield his intellect.

That was to say—

Rom: “This here’ll be a battle of wits between the helmet bastard and myself.”

5

???: “—Are these… threads?”

The moment Rachins charged into the forest, his whole body was immediately entangled and restrained in extremely fine steel threads; as he spat out his frustrations, Aldebaran listened to him from a position within arms reach.

Aldebaran had deliberately exposed his position to his opponents, beckoning the enemies to rush toward him, ensnaring them right in his trap.

At the hand of Yae’s Steel Thread Technique, fifty-two enemies were bound.

He had already been associating with these enemies long enough that he had finished counting them all, but of course, it was not as though Yae had subdued them through simple physical strength.

Yae: “As you can see here, Yae-chan has slender arms, y’know? By using nearby trees, other obstacles, or even the bodies of the people in question as fulcrums, I’m suspending these guys while their feet are still touching the ground.”

And so, Yae disclosed the trick that had been performed, but the gist of it was still unclear to those who had heard it.

At any rate, Rachins and his group were trapped in a web of steel threads coiled around many times over, and it would be nearly impossible for them to escape against Yae’s will; so long as that fact was clear, it was top-notch work.

On top of that, receiving a glare from the shihaku eyes of Rachins, who was powerless to move even with his target right before him, Aldebaran forcefully laid his hands on Rachins’s clothing and rummaged around in his pockets.

Rachins: “Wh-what the hell, you fuck?! I ain’t into this kinda thing…!”

Yae: “Wo~w, how bold of you, Al-sama! No wonder that you never seemed interested in Yae-chan no matter how much I enticed you. Coincident with this newfound understanding, my pride as a woman is rapidly being restored…”

Aldebaran: “Stop screwing around! There’s a mirror! Find the mirror! One of them has it… old man, you search too!”

Holding down Rachins as he writhed in an attempt to escape, Aldebaran yelled at Yae and Heinkel, who then began shuffling through the belongings of the immobilized men, searching for the Conversation Mirror.

—The speed and accuracy of information transmission had the capability to change the nature of war.

Such a thing had been used in all manners of fiction from all over the world, past and present, but this concept that he had previously only vaguely understood at face value had finally hit home for Aldebaran.

The old giant, who served as the brain of this operation, had prepared gauntlets fitted with a multitude of Conversation Mirrors.

With that, the old giant had become the central commander of the faction, and by exchanging information in real time, he was able to control all five hundred fighters at will. If Aldebaran's location and number of allies continued to be leaked in this way, this side would never have a moment to catch their breaths.

Therefore, it was essential to ensure that they shattered each unit's Conversation Mirrors.

To that end—

Aldebaran: "—Found it!"
Heinkel: "—Found it!"
Yae: "—Found it!"

Finding the sensation he sought at his fingertips, Aldebaran pulled it out and held it aloft, cheering—but, his joy was drowned out by the voices of the other two, which were raised nearly simultaneously with his.

Letting out a "Ah?", Aldebaran turned around and saw Yae and Heinkel, who had been conducting a search of the other ruffians while he was groping Rachins, staring with their eyes wide open.

—Both of them were holding a small mirror in their hands.

Aldebaran: "Conversation Mirrors are Meteors that can be replicated, but the cost would still be stupidly expensive…"

He understood why Rachins, who was most likely the commander of this unit, would have one.

He also understood why his aide would have one, not wanting to leave communications to the commander alone. But, he did not understand why anybody else would be carrying one.

No matter what, it would have been impossible to equip the vast majority of a military force with Conversation Mirrors.

In other words, these was—

Aldebaran: "—Are these… dummies?"

Rachins: “Duuumbass.”

At Aldebaran’s dumbfounded mutter, Rachins stuck out his tongue and fired an insult at him.

Seeing the colorful ring swaying on the tip of that long tongue, Aldebaran reflexively used his own tongue to unwrap the package of poison hidden behind his molar. —It was at that moment.

???: “—What, dull as a pig, you are.”

The poor joke that he had heard so many times that calluses were starting to form on his ears arrived alongside a punch, and Aldebaran could not distinguish whether it was the impact or the poison that had ended his life.

Only, the thoughts that came to his mind were not vulgar curses towards that pig-face, but rather—

Aldebaran: “That shitty old geezer.”

It was an insult that amounted to nothing more than praise for an adversary who was pulling the strings of a plan that was not just formidable, but downright unreasonable.

6

???: “—Are these… threads?”

The feint achieved by masquerading a Goa as an Al Goa had succeeded, allowing Rachins to charge at the enemy with minimal damage received from the fallen tree cannon. Having realized that he had been immobilized by threads fine to the point of being nigh invisible, he could not hide his astonishment.

Had he been the only one ensnared, he could have still forced himself to accept it.

However, it was not solely Rachins who had been immobilized, but also the fifty ruffians who had charged into the woods with him.

Were he to try implementing something like this himself, the mere thought of recreating the intricate geometry of the cage of wires set up in the forest within his mind would have made him give up. That was how extraordinary this feat had been.

But, what was far more astonishing to Rachins, even beyond the woman who had bound him in thread—

???: "—Sorry, but I'll be shattering that."

With those words, the helmet bastard searched the breast pocket of one of the ruffians—the man chosen for the duty of being the mirror-bearer, pried out the Conversation Mirror, and dropped it on the ground, readily crushing it underfoot.

Rachins: "—Hk, gotta be fucking kidding me."

As if it were being wrung out of him, anger reflexively spilled out of his mouth, and the threads that constricted Rachins dug even deeper. Rather than a result of his own resistance, it seemed more like a warning from the thread spinning red-haired woman for his cursing.

However, at this moment, his anger ran far deeper than the shallow cuts from the threads upon his flesh.

Rachins: "What, just what the hell's going on here?! You fuck, how'd you get it on your first shot…?"

Helmet Bastard: "It wasn't in one shot. Wasn't even in ten or twenty shots. My draws, are absolutely pitiful."

Rachins: "Ahh?"

As the helmet bastard seemed to have no intention of providing a proper response, Rachins firmly grit his teeth.

Through some unknown means, the helmet bastard saw through the fact that they had established a communication network with Cromwell—with Rom-jii at its heart, through the use of Conversation Mirrors. Moreover, thoroughly ignoring the decoy mirrors, which would have bought them time even if they had been seen through, he acted in a manner as if he had assuredly taken out the real one.

Despite the warning just a moment prior, Rachins raised his head.

Towards those whom he was powerless against, his surging feelings of inferiority would not allow resignation.

???: “Oi, what are you gonna do with these guys… Are you planning to… kill them all?”

Outside of Rachins’s innermost thoughts, the one who interjected was the middle-aged man of red hair—it was Heinkel.

He had heard that this man was Reinhard’s father. Indeed, including the red hair, blue eyes, and an excessively lavish Knight’s sword, there were numerous features reminiscent of House Astrea.

From the moment he heard that Heinkel had chosen to support the rival candidate Priscilla instead of Felt, whom his own son supported, he had thought of him as an idiot who could not make the right choice even regarding where he stood, but he was much worse than Rachins had imagined.

Rachins: “—That braindead moron.”

Rachins hated Reinhard.

In any case, Reinhard likely did not think much of Rachins, but they were similar in that they both had been born into families of a certain status, and both had conflicts with their fathers. Of course, there was a difference in the weight of what their births had burdened them with, and he knew that Reinhard had never considered abandoning what Rachins had so selfishly thrown away.

Born into a noble family, Rachins ran away due to his inability to form an understanding with his family, and somehow or another, he ended up working for Felt; on the whole, he was a half-hearted person.

But, even if Rachins and Reinhard shared the same troubles, there remained a fundamental difference.

Rachins's father was a respectable man. He disliked him, but he was respectable.

Rachins: "But, there's no hope for a fuck like you."

To be so emotionally anguished over a dispute with a father not even worthy of respect, Reinhard was a moron.

Hence, he would remove the reason behind Reinhard's misery.

Rachins: "…Goa."

Even when tied up, incantations could be performed.

His entire body entangled in the threads, creaking as the Gate within pulsed, Rachins conjured a fireball directly before his face, prompting alarm in the helmet bastard and his gang.

However, what emerged was a tiny clump of fire no bigger than the tip of his thumb.

Heinkel: "Ah, trying to frighten me now? That petty a trick, you think I'd fall for it twice?!"

A faux Al Goa had been cast before him earlier, and out of spite for having been fooled by its appearance, Heinkel, his face red with anger, slashed at the fireball with his Knight's sword.

For just a moment, that casual flash of the sword seemed so refined to the point of searing itself into his eyes, but that was fine.

Right now, what was more important than such deep impressions—

Rachins: "Duuumbass."

Sticking out his tongue and hurling derisive insults with the best sneer he could muster, took priority.

—He had stretched a Goa out thin to masquerade it as an Al Goa. Then, in a similar vein, an Al Goa could be masqueraded as a mere tiny fireball.

???: “Rachins-kun, you may not have any outstanding talent, but you have a firm foundation. Steady progress will assuredly grant you the power to reach wherever you wish to get to.”

Ezzo had introduced Rachins to magic, and remembering all the times he had been lectured by him with an arrogant pomp despite his short stature, Rachins apologized to him internally with an uncharacteristic “Sorry”.

Ignoring his firm foundation, and misusing magic by skipping tiers, was first on the list of things that would upset Ezzo.

But, since he would have never gotten another opportunity, it was something like his own excuse—

Rachins: “…”

The fireball basked in the tip of the sword and unraveled amidst the air, releasing the enormous firepower compressed within, and a hellish inferno that would incinerate the area in one fell swoop spread explosively.

Just before being swallowed by the flames himself, Rachins found that he was no longer filled with the lament of “where the hell did my life take such a messed-up turn?” from mere moments ago, and he could not help but feel a bit strange.

And just like that, even wearing a smile upon his face, Rachins’s body was engulfed in the flames—

Helmet Bastard: “That will be as far as you go.”

The flames he had staked his life on, which ought to have activated, were crushed in the hand of the helmet bastard, who had intervened as if he had known it would happen, and its firepower failed to be unleashed.

7

—Two-hundred sixty-four times.

???: “…”

The steel threads binding him having caused his body to lose its strength, Rachins hung his head, looking as if he had given up.

But, such a thing was unthinkable. Rachins would absolutely never give up on defeating his opponent, even in this situation.

Hence—

Aldebaran: “That will be as far as you go.”

Upon speaking it, he recalled how vexing it sounded, and internally he clicked his tongue.

Outside of his loathsome emotions, Aldebaran pushed Heinkel aside, and the Goa he had carelessly sliced apart—no, this time the activation of that great magic in disguise was thwarted.

The large firepower that was going to rise into the air, attempting to scorch the whole region, was undone at its formation; while still nothing more than a kindling, it vanished as Mana that had lost its direction.

If he did not preempt this, the mighty flame would have scorched the whole region, Aldebaran’s party would suffer tremendous damage, and the battle would be unable to continue.

He felt sorry for Rachins’s resolve, who was about to stake his life on a desperate suicide bombing, but trying to accomplish something by laying down one’s life, was the most meaningless action to perform in front of Aldebaran.

No matter what one might wager their life on, Aldebaran would squander it without exception.

Therefore, it was futile. Staking one’s life, would have no meaning whatsoever.

It was futile. Futile, futilefutilefutilefutilefutilefutilefutile, futile.

Futile, and yet—

Rachins: “Goa…”

Aldebaran: “STOP!!”

His initial kindling extinguished, Rachins nevertheless performed another incantation; bellowing at him, Aldebaran raised his fist overhead and hammered it into the body of the man incapable of moving.

He socked him right in the cheek, drove a kick into his abdomen, and struck him in the head once more. Unable to brace himself to withstand the impacts, Rachins had to take it all as a punching bag.

Even if Aldebaran was just a second-rate or third-rate warrior, he could overthrow even Garfiel if he pressed his vital points. And yet—

Rachins: “Go, a…”

—Rachins did not cease his incantations.

Aldebaran: “WHY?!”

Once again crushing the kindling as it tried to come alive, he slammed the fist that did so into Rachins.

However, even when hit by a series of punches, the signs of new magic, attempting to interfere with the world, did not cease to be born around Rachins.

That was to say, even if his final stratagem had been seen through, Rachins would never yield.

Yae: “—Al-sama, there’ll be no end to this.”

In Aldebaran’s ear, out of breath as he was, such a voice was gently raised.

Subsequently, the bound Rachins’s head was lifted in front of him, around his neck a steel thread was tightly wound, wringing his slender neck—not just that, it was starting to attempt to decapitate him.

Yae: “His eyes are speaking. As long as you don’t kill him, he’ll keep doing the same thing over and over. A truly admirable thing. Isn't that the dearest desire of all boys? In that case…"

Aldebaran: "SHUT UP!"

Yae: "…"

Moving a raised finger on her right hand, Yae caused a red line of blood to streak down Rachins's neck. Silencing her, Aldebaran glared directly at Rachins.

With his chin lifted, Rachins gazed at Aldebaran at an angle that seemed to be looking down on him.

And then—

Rachins: "Duuumb, ass…"

Cladding his right hand in a rock protector, Aldebaran struck Rachins firmly with a blow.

Receiving a blow inherently weightier than those that came before, Rachins's forehead split open, and his blood rapidly scattered. Likely, he had been prepared to kill Rachins with that strike, but—

Yae: "…Spectacularly done~."

Clapping her hands, Yae commended him whilst looking over Rachins's limp body.

Even more so than Aldebaran, Yae was sensitive to the life and death of others. To her eyes, it would be apparent that the matter had concluded with Rachins fainting, without losing his life.

Aldebaran: "…"

Neither that praise, nor the fact that Rachins had merely fainted, would serve as consolation for Aldebaran.

Only, more than he had initially thought, he must not underestimate this number of five hundred. —This was not merely a numerical figure, but five hundred people hardened with the utmost resolve; he must respond to it as such.

Heinkel: “O-oi, Aldebaran…”

Aldebaran: “Sorry, but shut up for a sec.”

Having just defeated Rachins, Aldebaran was met with Heinkel’s voice. But, he had exhausted himself mentally more than he had expected to, to a greater extent than that of merely expanding his Territory, and was unable to concern himself with Heinkel at the moment.

Regardless, he had succeeded in shattering the Conversation Mirror, and had eliminated the threat of the first vanguard.

All that remained—

???: “—What, dull as a pig, you are.”

Aldebaran: “…”

The arrival of the joke poking fun at their own tribe was well familiar to his ears; however, unlike before, this time it arrived without a fist to accompany it.

But, whether it was fine to thus deem that acceptable, and treat it as a sign that he had overcome a perilous spot, he did not know.

That was because—

???: “Thoughtlessly stopping in place there, your heads stuffed with pigfood or something?”

As the pig-face man declared so in a weighty voice, he was not alone; similar to how Rachins had been accompanied by a squadron, he did not charge in alone, but instead stood before Aldebaran’s party as the second battle formation.

Aldebaran: “—Expand Territory, Matrix redefinition.”

???: “Thoughtlessly stopping in place there, your heads stuffed with pigfood or something?”

Hearing the voice of the King Pig, Doltero Amule, across one of the Conversation Mirrors fitted to his gauntlets, Rom-jii understood that the helmet bastard had made contact with the second battle formation.

The first contact had been made by Rachins’s unit, so it was fortunate that the battle formation positioned in the nearest location included Doltero, who was the strongest warrior among the line-up they had gathered.

Rom: “…”

Only, before Doltero could arrive, the helmet bastard had clashed with Rachins, and the well-being of the unit under his command was unknown. Naturally, the same went for their commanding officer, Rachins.

Rather, considering the opponent’s cunning, it would be more apt to consider Rachins to be dead.

Rom: “—Perhaps not.”

Given that a battle had occurred, it was impossible that they had handled the situation without suffering harm.

The ruffians of the criminal underworld were a matter of course, but casualties would also emerge within the Camp. —It would be foolish to count on the single ray of hope that was present in the report Grassis had received from Flam.

Therefore, Rom-jii put a lid over his own feelings in between blinks, and concentrated on the situation before his eyes.

With Doltero, the helmet bastard and his allies would be killed in the span of a single breath. —They could not take such an optimistic viewpoint. In a sense, the helmet bastard had led the Sword Saint, Divine Dragon, and Witch of Envy around by their noses, but that feat alone served not as the reason.

Rom: "…He shattered the Conversation Mirror in the possession of the mirror-keeper without any hesitation."

Since that had left them incapable of grasping the movements around Rachins and his squadron, there was no doubt that the opposition had taken the best course of action in order to intercept the flow of information to this side.

However, no matter how one looked at it, the way that this best move was executed had been far too unnatural.

Even supposing they had already surmised the arrangements and configuration of this side's coordination, that they had been equipped with Conversation Mirrors, their actions that followed were—

Rom: "As long as they ain't seein' inside our heads, or perhaps something else entirely, it oughta be impossible."

It was all preposterous, a realm of jape that ought to have been ridiculed as impossible.

Nonetheless, having lived over a hundred years, Rom-jii was aware that powers transcending both his common sense and his wildest imagination did exist in this world, and that those who wielded such abilities would indeed come to play upon the same board.

Those who ceased all thought when faced with such beings, deeming it an impossibility, always met the same end.

He could not afford to ever allow such a wretched end to befall the ones he loved.

Rom: "—There's something I'd like to ascertain. All units, change of plans."

Speaking to all of the Conversation Mirrors simultaneously, Rom-jii narrowed his eyes, and formulated a stratagem.

The helmet bastard, he also ought to be aware.

—The fact that, for both their side and the helmet bastard's side, this battle was a race against time.

Chapter 21:
Valga Cromwell

1

Aldebaran: "—Expand Territory, matrix redefinition."

Dealing with alterations in the situation, second by second, moment by moment, instant by instant, he advanced the world.

For Aldebaran's Authority, incapable of turning the clock back on a grand scale, this was a gamble that reeled his victory in steadily, but simultaneously posed the risk of definitively relinquishing his victory.

Aldebaran: "—Expand Territory, matrix redefinition."

Step-by-step, move-by-move, action-by-action, he verified, defined, and moved the board towards a checkmate.

The way the highest caliber of warriors would unceasingly and continuously advance in this manner, piling up experience in a world of ceaseless bouts all decided by a single move, he really could not imagine it.

Aldebaran: "—Expand Territory, matrix redefinition."

And that was not limited to just warriors; the highest caliber of intellectuals were the same in the sense of their ability to think in a different dimension.

Rather, since they were not directly involved in practice, they would go without knowing the true fragrance of blood and the pain of wounds, merely constructing the progression of the world within their heads, so there was possibly more of a monstrous sense to them.

In any case—

Aldebaran: "—Expand Territory, matrix redefinition."

Trampling on the discipline of warriors and the deliberations of intellectuals alike, disregarding the law of reality that dictated an inability to ascertain the results of two different choices simultaneously, Aldebaran would merely snatch victory away even in battles that were to be decided by a single blow. The former had every right to curse, loathe, and scorn his way of being as contemptible.

Let those vilifications of theirs cut into him as much as they liked. In exchange—

Aldebaran: "—Expand Territory, matrix redefinition."

With this dirty method, he would absolutely seize victory.

× × ×

???: "…At this point, I bet you're hoping for as much amiability as a pig wanting to be fed."

Wringing out a low, groaning voice, the joke of the pig-faced man—the King Pig, Doltero Amule, when compared to his previous dignified, despair-inducing ones, came out a husky rasp.

That was only natural. His entire body was covered in lacerations from steel threads, and he was losing copious amounts of blood from his innumerable wounds. Rather, the fact that he was still conscious, and that his face wore no grievous expression, was far more strange.

Aldebaran: "Having come this far, I know you're not afraid of dying. But, even if you don't fear death, pain should still be painful, yeah?"

Doltero: "You don't understand even when saying it yourself? Both death and pain are ultimately things that make us afraid. Then, all we gotta do is swallow that fear."

Aldebaran: "…I can't understand you."

Doltero's point was that the fear induced by death and the fear induced by pain were one and the same. But, the way Aldebaran saw it, those were different things. The fear borne of death, and the fear borne of pain, were different.

To take it further, since pain was a stimulus to the body, it seemed rather distinct from fear.

Doltero: “—. No matter what you say, it’s the backbiting of a pig.”

Before Aldebaran, white froth emerged in the corners of Doltero’s mouth as he muttered thus.

Around the thick neck of the King Pig, a fine steel wire was wound around several tens of times, applying pressure to his trachea. Doltero had resisted that strangling by slipping two fingers in, but those fingers sunk into his neck and lost their function, and with blood no longer circulating to his brain, his large body finally fell to its knees.

Having fallen to his knees, Doltero was surrounded by the fifty-five collapsed subordinates who had accompanied him.

While taking on this King Pig, he had taken down the other men one-by-one, an effort that had literally broken his bones, cleaved off his flesh, and robbed him of his life numerous times. —In total, twenty-three thousand and eight times.

With this many attempts, this was among the top-class of Aldebaran’s veteran history of losing battles.

Of course, one contributing factor was that the organized attacks of the King Pig and his underlings of the Black Silver Coin had been exceedingly thorough, but the primary cause had been Aldebaran’s own lack of talent.

The steel thread entangled around Doltero’s neck was not one that extended out from Yae’s hand, but from the hand of Aldebaran, who had borrowed one of her rings.

Manipulating a steel thread with a single finger, he had closed in on Doltero’s fierce attack one move at a time and affixed a thread to his neck, tying it around to apply as much pressure as he could to that thick neck. —Amidst this harsh Territory, learning the Steel

Thread Technique from square one until it was viable for him had required the time of over twenty-thousand attempts.

Doltero: “…”

Boom, sounded the fist as it vigorously slammed into the ground, Doltero falling completely unconscious.

Even still, the body of the King Pig, who reigned over the criminal underworld, did not topple over sideways; rather, his large body was supported by his own fist pressed into the ground, a demonstration of his dignity. Unbowed, unbent, unbroken.

In spite of being his enemy, he could not help but commend that posture.

Yae: “Haah~, you’re outrageous, Al-sama. I was proud that no~body in the village except me had been able to learn it, but isn’t this now a disgrace~?”

And, beside Aldebaran as he stood out of breath before the silenced Doltero, Yae, having strung every last adversary aside from Doltero in the air, spoke so.

Her eyes, narrowed like a cat’s, observed Aldebaran’s Steel Thread Technique that had tied up Doltero. Be that as it may, it was impossible for him to easily accept that praise.

Aldebaran: “Don’t be ridiculous. With just a single finger, all the muscles from the top of my head to the tips of my toes are on the verge of cramping. Doing ten times that with ten fingers, are you actually super muscular despite looking so thin?”

Yae: “Eh~, are you taking an interest in what’s under my uniform, Al-sama~? I’ve given you so many chances to check for yourself, and yet you were always so mean as to turn me down.”

Aldebaran: “…The ring, let me borrow it for just a little longer.”

Responding to Yae as she mischievously poked fun at him, Aldebaran stroked the ring fitted on the ring finger of his right hand. He had tested it on each finger, but it felt the most intuitive on Aldebaran's ring finger.

In all honesty, he had been reluctant to put a ring on his ring finger, but he did not have a left hand to begin with. It was nonsensical to bring such emotional obstinancies of a little girl onto a battlefield.

In any case—

Aldebaran: "Old man, you aight? I didn't have much leeway to pay attention your way, my bad."

Heinkel: "N-no, that's fine. That's… alright."

As Aldebaran checked on his well-being, Heinkel choked on his words as he nodded.

During the battle with Doltero, Heinkel, to put it bluntly, had fallen into a useless state of malfunction, but after Yae had tied up the men, he had contributed by knocking them unconscious, and by breaking the Conversation Mirror of the mirror-bearer, so Aldebaran would acknowledge that he had done his job.

As expected, against a certain level of powerful individuals—Doltero was a given, but it would be difficult to count Heinkel among their fighting strength when it came time to clash with those in the same ballpark as Gaston. Aldebaran had no intention of reproaching Heinkel, who harbored such a mental fragility.

Everyone had an opponent whom their soul would absolutely refuse to face.

For Yae, that was Aldebaran, and for Aldebaran, that was—it mattered not.

Heinkel: "…Aldebaran, you, what's really the deal with you?"

Aldebaran: "Hm?"

Heinkel: "You, had absolutely no chance of defeating that pigman. He was someone who utterly exceeded you in both skill and power. And yet, you were the one who won in the end. And mostly unharmed at that, overwhelmingly so."

Aldebaran: "…"

With eyes as if he was beholding someone truly august, Heinkel spoke thus to Aldebaran.

Listening to Heinkel's words, Aldebaran revised his evaluation of him to that of a man who was quite observant.

Perhaps precisely because he had been watching as an onlooker, Aldebaran's irregularity had left more of an impression.

Neither was it that Aldebaran had grown strong, nor was it that he was a strong match against Doltero. If it must be said, it would have appeared as if he had won by piling up a hundred lucky shots.

Yae: "—He's a monster."

Hence, plainly declaring so, and not asking for anything more, Yae's attitude was rather pleasant.

Answering Heinkel in Aldebaran's stead, her face bore no semblance of fear or awe. After all, within Yae, her impression of Aldebaran had already been completed.

Yae: "Al-sama, is a monster. We're working alongside a monster, y'know?"

Heinkel: "…I know a lotta people who're like monsters. But, this guy's…"

Yae: "There's a difference between those who are like monsters and actual monsters. Please don't talk about such shams~."

Her speech was gentle, her expression a smile; however, her phrasing was neither a confirmation nor a denial.

Overpowered by the calm yet threatening demeanor Yae showed on the surface, Heinkel was at a loss for words.

Aldebaran: "Regardless of whether I'm a monster or not, we'll proceed from here just as planned. Yae will suppress the opponent's numbers, and I'll deal with the strong ones. Old man, I'm counting on you to follow my directions, and deal with the mirrors."

Heinkel: "Y-yeah, got it."

Yae: "Roger ro~ger. As you command, Al-sama~."

Next to Heinkel as he timidly nodded, Yae lifted her arms in a hurrah, and with a fine movement of her fingertips she controlled her steel threads. Guided by her fingers, the steel threads coiled around the fainted Doltero, binding the limbs of the King Pig that had demonstrated his obstinacy to not collapse, stringing him up in the air with the others.

Even if he understood that it was a safety measure in case Doltero woke up, it did not feel good. That went not only for Doltero, but for Rachins too, who had needed to be beaten to the point of fainting.

Aldebaran: "My head hurts…"

Frankly, he had underestimated Felt's faction.

Outside of Reinhard, he had thought them all to be non-combatants excluding Ezzo. Still, the old giant himself, Grassis and Gaston, and the main target of Felt were waiting for him—

Yae: "If you'd just remove that single shackle, Al-sama, I'd be way more effective, y'know?"

Aldebaran: "…"

Yae: "This goes without saying, but… rather than tying them up, I'm better at strangling people to death, this little ol' me."

Every so often, for various reasons Yae would speak words to tempt Aldebaran, but even more so than when those whispers tried to lure him to the bedroom, these struck Aldebaran's eardrums in a much more alluring manner.

Unlike Heinkel, who was unable to demonstrate his true strength for emotional reasons, the reason why Yae could not show her true worth was none other than because she was abiding by Aldebaran's ego.

Were he to lift that restriction, the forest abundant in cover would instantly become Yae's hunting ground. —Even if the opponent was five-hundred strong, it would not take much time before the green leaves were all stained with blood.

Only, it was not that Yae was muttering in discontent for being unable to do that.

After all, no matter how bereft of legitimacy those directions were, it was her nature to follow orders.

Hence, the reason she was whispering to Aldebaran like this was—

Aldebaran: "—Thank you. But it's none of your concern."

Yae: "Oh my."

Sticking her tongue out with a "Behhh", Yae was unsurprised that her proposal had been rejected.

From the start, it was a proposal she had no expectation of being accepted. Surprisingly—no, it was not surprising for she who wished for Aldebaran to accomplish his goal, but it seemed to have set him alight with motivation.

Thanks to that sweet, tempting complaint, Aldebaran regained his exhausted willpower.

Aldebaran: "We also have the option to continue through the forest and slip through the south, but that's a no-go when considering what's to follow. Unfortunately for them, we'll be having lil' miss Felt and her crew be defeated here."

Yae: "Understood. Then, proceed as planned?"

The atmosphere from the preceding conversation vanished, and Aldebaran nodded at Yae as she inclined her head.

Then, thinking of Felt and the old giant who were likely working out a plan to secure victory on the other side of the forest, he quietly muttered.

Aldebaran: “You guys are strong. It’s just—your stars were bad.”

2

—Witnessing that the third Conversation Mirror had been broken, Rom-jii became convinced.

Rom: “As I thought, you’re doin’ more than just seein’ through our plans.”

He removed and discarded one of the Conversation Mirrors fitted onto his gauntlets; having lost its counterpart, it no longer served any purpose. Rom-jii considered the helmet bastard’s optimal conduct—immediately identifying the mirror-bearer, ordained with a Conversation Mirror, an action whose essence was to disrupt the flow of information.

Rachins had fallen, and even Doltero, who had rushed to the scene, had been utterly defeated.

Although he had estimated it to be a possible outcome, Rom-jii could not hold back his surprise at the defeat of the King Pig, having known the latter for quite a long time.

Rom: “If he’d been born a mere ten years earlier, his name probably would’ve gone down in the history books tellin’ of the Demi-Human War.”

The person in question would have likely laughed at that statement and brushed it off as an exaggeration, but in Rom-jii’s mind, it was a fair assessment.

But, then again, the Demi-Human War had not been such a close affair that Doltero alone would have been able to make the difference between victory and defeat. Even if his name would have been recorded in the annals of history, he most likely would have been among the many who had lost their lives at the hands of the Sword Demon or that generation’s Sword Saint.

Either way, Doltero had been defeated. Did that mean the opponent was on the same level as the Sword Demon?

Rom: “Nah, that ain’t it.”

Shaking his thick head from side to side, Rom-jii discarded his pessimistic thoughts.

In truth, the existence of the Sword Demon was something of a trauma for Rom-jii. Against the lone Sword Demon, even if Rom-jii were to command a force numbering a thousand, he would glimpse no sign of victory whatsoever.

This was not to say that the Sword Demon was the strongest in the world, but rather that his renown made him appear that way.

There were indeed those proprietors of renown such that their opponents would be made to feel that victory would be unattainable, even if that was not truly the case.

Even for Felt, the prospect of competing head-to-head against the big shots of the criminal underworld was unlikely, both in terms of physical strength and intelligence. Nonetheless, they still looked up to her as their queen.

That, was the unshakeable quality known as “renown”. —Something in which the helmet bastard was lacking.

To put it simply, he did not inspire fear. However, it could be said that it contributed to the unknowns of his character.

Rom: “Well then, we just hafta eliminate those unknowns one-by-one. —Launch ‘em up!”

Following the orders called out by Rom-jii, the fighters who remained on hand, numbering around twenty, began to move.

Fire Magic Ore was ignited, and launched were the contents of the Magic Cannons—the latter were valuable items that could be carried by hand and used continuously if properly cooled; however, the Magic Stones which they had fired held even greater value.

They were—

Rom: “—Night Banishers.”

Immediately after, white lights sliced across the sky of the battlefield like bolts of lightning, instantly scattering the clouds. The glow of the blue sky peering out chased away the approaching dusk, rewriting time. —No, that was not the case. The effect of the Night Banisher was merely a reproduction of daytime.

If launched at night, it would overwrite the darkness, giving the appearance of a daytime sky. It was even possible to create an inexplicable phenomenon in which raindrops would fall from a clear sky if one were to be emulated on a rainy day.

Originally, the Night Banisher’s intended effect was to drive away the night that caused chaos on the battlefield, but this Magic Stone had another effect that most were unaware of.

To rewrite an overcast day into a sunny one, to turn night into day, was the effect of painting reality over with an illusion.

That was to say—

Rom: “—If he’s been watchin’ us from the sky, then he can’t rely on that view no more.”

As the battle dragged on, the Night Banishing Magic Stones that had been prepared for nightfall came into play.

Judging this to be a rare stroke of good fortune, Rom-jii took steps to seal off one of the possible explanations behind the helmet bastard’s actions—an eye in the heavens, which may have been surveilling them.

But then again—

???: “Unit Six reporting, we found the helmet bastard! We’re going to… WOAHHH?!”

Judging by the report of the mirror-bearer assigned to Unit Six, and the subsequent lost communication, the helmet bastard had broken a fourth Conversation Mirror, and as such Rom-jii was convinced that the possibility of an eye in the heavens had completely vanished.

However, he was not discouraged. In the first place, the likelihood of an eye in the heavens had been low.

In response to the optimal conduct of the helmet bastard, Rom-jii's first instructions were for the mirror-bearers of each unit to alternate at regular intervals, and to report the next movements in writing through the mirror.

However, the helmet bastard responded to this by eliminating the designated mirror-bearers right away twice in a row.

Even supposing he was able to observe their movements from the sky, he would not have been able to fully respond to every move.

In that case, what remained was—

Rom: "It might be a Great Spirit I know nothin' 'bout, or a powerful Divine Protection, or he might be seein' inside his opponents' minds; otherwise, perhaps it's not minds that he's seein', but—"

And so, he listed each possibility that came to mind, and made plans to eliminate them one-by-one.

It was hard to imagine that the helmet bastard had a Great Spirit with him, considering his actions. A Spirit's true talent was magic, but the helmet bastard showed no signs of using a Spirit's power to overcome this onslaught of challenges. Assistance from Spirits of the Yin and Yang attributes would not have been as noticeable as from Spirits of other attributes, but those Spirits were also of high rarity.

The possibility that one was accompanying him was not zero, but—

Rom: "It's of low priority. —Unit Seven, go east; Unit Nine, proceed southeast. Hurry ta where Unit Six's fightin'. Nevermind, there ain't a need ta support Unit Six. Instead, let's get yer two units workin' together. Use both Magic Stones and throwin' stones, we've gotta see if we can make him use two or more Divine Protections, no matter what."

By nature, only a single Divine Protection could dwell within an individual.

There had only been a handful of people in history who held multiple Divine Protections, and the number of people whose Divine Protections both proved useful could only be counted on one hand. —It was odd that among those individuals abnormally blessed by fortune, the likes of the Sword Saint and the Mad Prince both existed in this current day and age, but there was a possibility that the helmet bastard could be a third one to be added to those ranks.

Henceforth—

Rom: “You can ascertain someone’s Divine Protection by bundlin’ ‘n stackin’ up hardships, ‘n watchin’ how they handle them. —It ain’t for nothin’ that I’ve been called the one who’s killed the most Divine Protection holders in the world.”

3

From the sudden deployment of the Night Banisher onward, Aldebaran sensed that the situation had worsened dramatically.

With the movements of the opposition clearly being laced with contrived inaction, even merely identifying the mirror-bearer had become increasingly difficult, ramping up his number of attempts up by an order of magnitude.

Aldebaran: “Because they keep shuffling around the role of mirror-bearer, if the timing of initiating the confrontation’s even slightly off, a completely different guy’ll have the mirror…!”

Moreover, in place of straightforward attacks that aimed at simply suppressing, defeating, or killing Aldebaran and his allies, there was a marked increase in attacks that seemed to be aimed at testing their reactions. Setting aside those underlying intentions, Aldebaran was tormented by having to deal with such offensives that did not directly threaten his life.

Were they attacks of lethal nature, assured to rob him of his life, he could crush them without mercy, unhesitatingly taking measures to stifle them at their inception. However, since that intent was nebulous, and since its impact was minimal, comparable to that of clearing a pebble off the roadside, the conduct required of him was overwhelmingly extensive.

Aldebaran: “Taken to an extreme, even a single scratch means asking whether I should start over.”

Having said that, he still could not ignore attacks that, akin to a slow-acting poison, would force him into a softlock because he had merely been struck by them. As a result, once that uncertainty took root in him, Aldebaran had no choice but to deal with each and every attack, ramping up the number of attempts by yet another order of magnitude.

Aldebaran: “You’re getting on my nerves, shitty old geezer.”

4

As the number of mirrors being shattered continued to accumulate, Rom-jii grew increasingly wary of how the situation had been progressing.

Thanks to prior directives from the heads of their respective organizations, the ruffians of the criminal underworld followed Rom-jii’s instructions with surprising obedience. Given the situation, some of them likely fell without even understanding what their role had been, and yet fallen they had, with nary a word of complaint; such an attitude was indeed admirable.

Owing to that, the number of cards in his hand were dwindling at an alarming rate, but in return, the face of the card kept concealed by the opposition was slowly but surely being revealed.

Rom: “They’re a resolute bunch indeed. Felt might’ve built the relationship with Flanders, but the heavens still fervently keep watch over those who struggle.”

The effect of the Night Banisher obstructed any eyes in the heavens, and by stacking wave upon wave of Magic Stone attacks to alter the Mana concentration, the area was rendered intoxicating to Spirits, which thus confirmed the absence of any cooperating Spirits. Suspecting a highly versatile Divine Protection, through a combination of short and long-ranged attacks, both physical and magical, the Divine Protections of which he was aware—which were limited to the ones whose efficiency had been ascertained by using Reinhard as a test subject, had their characteristics targeted, and thus ninety percent of the potential candidates for the current scenario had been eliminated.

Rom: “This ain’t the Divine Protection of First Sight or the Divine Protection of the Second Coming. So if it’s neither the Divine Protection of Stormy Skies nor the Divine Protection of the Tiger’s Den, not many candidates remain.”

The remaining ten percent could possibly serve as one-trick ponies, depending on how they were used, but they lacked the versatility to deal with a situation as dire as this. With that, nearly all the candidates were dropped, relegated to the back of his mind.

From here on out, he would move on to the stage of suspecting something that was neither magic, nor Spirit, nor Divine Protection—an Authority.

Rom: “Bending the laws of reality itself, wouldn’t that be pride beyond the station of man, helmet bastard?”

5

When the tide of the wave attacks shifted, and the opposition’s movements took a turn, Aldebaran ground his teeth, sensing that the worst possibility that came to mind had been right on the mark.

In all likelihood, that old Giant—Valga Cromwell, had an inkling that Aldebaran was using an Authority, overcoming these imminent critical situations by stacking up countless matrices.

The succession of wave attacks, and the sequence of numerous attacks rich in variety that kept up for a while, had been meant to whittle down the possibilities of how Aldebaran was escaping from such an overwhelming disadvantage.

Near infinite trial and error by means of redefining a matrix and the existence of the Territory—it was likely impossible that they had grasped that to be the true nature of Aldebaran's Authority, but he had a keen feeling that it had been narrowed down to something quite close.

The chief possibilities of magic or a Divine Protection had already been eliminated through an exhaustive investigation, and he got a sense that they had entered the stage where a tremendous, absurd Authority was starting to be suspected. Similar to Ezzo Cadner back at the Pleiades Watchtower, there was a high possibility that clever individuals would see through Aldebaran's Authority.

But then again, it would be difficult to corner Aldebaran even if one had seen through it. Ezzo's judgement to flood the escape path with Water Magic had been optimal in a certain sense, but it would have been a herculean task to accomplish a similar feat in a space this expansive.

Even so, the nasty premonition that tinged his heart did not disappear, causing Aldebaran to hesitate about updating his matrix in such a short timespan; the difficulty of recovering from a single failure was steadily ramping up, little-by-little.

To begin with, why was the notorious Valga Cromwell from the Demi-Human War still alive, and serving Felt at that? Was Valga not the Great Strategist who harbored an immense hatred of humans, taking the lives of several thousands with his merciless stratagems in the Demi-Human War? His head was on the verge of seething as it blurted out complaints towards the incomprehensible combination. There's something wrong with this, seriously.

6

Having come this far, he had come to a point where there was no longer any room to doubt the worst possible premonition; as Rom-jii endured that bad feeling in his chest, he vigorously stroked his own bald head for no reason.

Likely, the helmet bastard was using an Authority—neither was it a Divine Protection nor was it magic, but an extraordinary power said to have once been used by the Witches, a power capable of bending the laws of the world; of this he was convinced. In the past, during the era of the Demi-Human War, when he had been acquainted with the successor to a Witch, Sphinx, she had stated herself to be a failed creation, unable to reproduce an Authority. However, though he had expressed his wish for Felt to gain achievements, with the enemy possessing an ability so desperately coveted by that Witch, this was far too troublesome an opponent.

And though he was loath to admit it, he had narrowed down the helmet bastard's Authority to one of either "Reading the Thoughts of an Opponent" or "Seeing into the Short-Term Future". However, at the current point, Rom-jii surmised that precognition had a higher probability than mindreading.

Since he had continued to evade this side's attacks to this much of an extent, even supposing he was reading the mind of another, Rom-jii thought it would undoubtedly be that of his own, and had thus deployed the measures to ascertain if that was the case.

He had given unique orders to two different units; the first unit he commanded to pass them by without attacking, and the second he ordered to launch an all-out offensive, but the helmet bastard had gone to deal with the unit it would have been fine to ignore, plunging himself into the predicament of a pincer attack in between the first and second units. If he had read Rom-jii's mind, or the mind of somebody in that first unit, then the helmet bastard would have just burdened himself with needless hardship.

At that moment, he ascertained that the helmet bastard's Authority was not that of mindreading. That was to say, the true nature of the helmet bastard's Authority was now mostly narrowed down to precognition.

Even if it had been narrowed down, he likely could not cheer out an "I did it!" with this conclusion. Sphinx had triumphantly spoken of them as powers that twisted the laws of reality, but something like "Precognition" was going too far.

Just how am I supposed to deal with something like that? There's something wrong with this, seriously.

???: “—Anyone who can’t use the Flow Method, fall back! But don’t stop moving!!”

His sonorous voice raised in a shout, Gaston leaped out ahead of the group, and swung at the helmet bastard.

Gaston had already obtained Rom-jii’s theory from the mirror-bearer. —Apparently, that bastard could see just a little ahead into the future, something like that.

Gaston: “Then all I gotta do is finish it the moment he sees ahead!”

Bellowing like thunder, Gaston abandoned the idea of landing a single, glorious blow. Instead, he switched to a relentless flurry of strikes, aiming to cut off the helmet bastard’s escape routes by giving priority to landing a punch.

However, in response to the barrage, the helmet bastard stomped the ground hard,

Helmet Bastard: “Smart thinking, Gaston. But this time, thinking was the wrong move.”

A swelling wall of earth shielded the helmet bastard, halting the powerful onslaught. He gritted his teeth; just like the bastard had stated, his plan had backfired, and immediately afterwards, his opponent turned the very same earth into gauntlets around his arm and smashed Gaston in the forehead, sending him reeling back.

And as it was, Gaston, still reeling back, sensed the helmet bastard was going for a follow-up.

Gaston: “ORAAA!!”

Gaston channeled his momentum into a backflip, unleashing a kick towards that sensation.

The nimble strike delivered while spinning through the air was a facsimile of an acrobatic technique of Felt’s used when attempting to slip away from Reinhard’s grasp, like a cat twisting out of a hold.

It was inconceivable that a brute like Gaston would pull off something so acrobatic, not even the old man who served as a gardener for House Astrea, who had been hit by it during training—

Helmet Bastard: “You got me. Four times, at that.”

Alongside those cryptic words, Gaston’s kick had sliced through empty air.

An attack Gaston had honed to the level of a finishing move had been rendered useless. But before he could even dwell on that frustration, a strange sensation seized his body.

He felt oppression as though the hand of a Giant had grabbed hold of him, yanking his right leg upward. —Upon closer inspection, he came to see that there was a near-invisible thread restraining him, extending from the helmet bastard’s right hand.

Was it not just the red-haired maid accompanying him, this helmet bastard could use it too?

Helmet Bastard: “Mine’s just a single strand, though. In truth, she’s a genius, that one.”

Hearing the helmet bastard’s lifeless tone as he spoke words of praise for his comrade, Gaston ground his teeth.

His right leg suspended by the thread, his foot was raised all the way to head height. His left foot, barely touching the ground, was forced onto its toes, his body being left utterly powerless. In this ridiculous, helpless position, Gaston had been completely neutralized.

And with that, the helmet bastard turned his back on Gaston,

Helmet Bastard: “Old man, I’m leaving him to you. I’m gonna go back up Yae.”

With those words, the helmet bastard strode away as if Gaston had already been dealt with.

Taking his place was a man Gaston had only heard about, Reinhard's father. Donning the same hair and eye tonalities as Reinhard he did, yet the ambience his body was enveloped in exuded an entirely different quality.

But more than anything, that expression, one that said he was only following the helmet bastard's orders because he had no other choice, reluctant and unwilling, pissed Gaston off.

Therefore—

Heinkel: "—Hk, you better not move awkwardly or… bweh!"

Gaston struck the hardened face of his opponent and immediately lunged at the helmeted bastard's turned back. But before his hand could reach the latter, his balance faltered, and his opponent easily evaded the charge with a lunge, letting Gaston crash hard onto the ground.

He had failed. —Having forcibly ripped himself free from the thread, his nearly torn ankle could not hold him up.

Helmet Bastard: "You, with that leg…"

Gaston: "What's one damn leg worth?! I'm putting my life on the line here! You think this is some game where I'd quit just 'cause it hurts a little?!"

Helmet Bastard: "…"

Gaston: "But what really pisses me off the most is that you guys are doing this reluctantly. Don't go picking fights with people if you can't even laugh in admiration of your own comrades' hard work!"

Gaston hurled his fury at the silent helmet bastard as he forced himself to his feet with every last ounce of his strength.

Even now copious amounts of blood yet poured from Gaston's right ankle, the torn flesh exposing glimpses of white bone beneath. And yet, the fact that he clenched his teeth and stood, was due to the importance of that which he carried upon his back.

Gaston, had a woman he had fallen for.

A woman who, perhaps feeling trepidation upon discovering that a villain with the Divine Dragon in tow was coming, had nonetheless held him and told him not to worry, before finally pushing him onwards to journey alongside Felt.

Gaston, had men he admired.

A friend whose mouth would run unceasingly with discontent, all while worrying about those he was surrounded by. A lifelong companion who, despite being a coward at heart, never would withdraw and retreat. A mentor who despite always providing him with tedious, troublesome lectures, was very caring, howling that all held the right to achieve greatness. A bad influence who, loving the girl who would puff her chest out and make manifest her braggadocio, was turning his past, a past akin to a curse, into strength.

Gaston, had a man and a woman he looked up to.

A strong man so strong, he could protect all things he wished to protect.

A strong woman so radiant, no matter where she was, forgetting her would be absolutely impossible.

—Gaston, had every reason to stand tall and fight.

Gaston: “People like you, who don’t even have that in ‘em, got no damn right stepping into a ring where others are giving it their all!!”

With a roar from the deepest depths of his soul, Gaston charged at the helmet bastard anew, deliberately stepping forward with his right foot.

Even if that step were to shatter his leg, tear it apart, leave him unable to walk ever again, it mattered not. Even then, Gaston would still find something he would be able to do. Even then, he knew his comrades would never abandon him. —Right now, all he wanted was to beat the helmet bastard.

Pushing off the ground, Gaston’s massive frame rose into the air as he drove his left knee upward in a crushing strike. Even if blocked by a wall of earth, this time he had his upraised arms ready to hammer down at any moment as a second-stage backup.

Whichever it was, he would smash the helmet that hid the bastard's face—

Helmet Bastard: "—Honestly, it landed."

As if he had anticipated Gaston's movements, the helmet bastard had already closed the distance in perfect rhythm with the takeoff.

Right after Gaston's throat let out a faint groan, a fist clad in a gauntlet of stone struck his face as he sprung up into the air, causing his head to jerk backwards.

Gaston: "You're fucking… kidding me…"

In the end, not a single one of Gaston's attacks had landed. If his opponent was indeed making a sarcastic joke or a bitter remark about them landing or something of the sort despite that, there was nothing to laugh about, even one bit.

With the blood loss from his leg contributing, Gaston's consciousness rapidly faded—

???: "—RAHHHHHH!!"

—At the end, concurrent with a familiar high-pitched voice, a burst of white light at the edge of his vision came into sight.

8

—The name of that Meteor, was the Star Staff.

The majority of the Meteors which existed in this world were said to be the handiwork of a single Witch, driven by curiosity and desire, simply for her own amusement; the Star Staff, however, was different.

With an aim in mind, the Witch had painstakingly forged a crystallization of her intellect to realize that goal—that aim, though perhaps something so petty as silencing a quippy Dragon, its power was genuine.

By siphoning Mana from its wielder, and by abridging the procedures, the power unleashed would become the starlight of Shario.

Of course, it was a light insignificant in comparison to Al Shario, which could slay even Dragons; however, its power, which any individual could acquire without study, could still be described as extraordinary.

Pursued by starlight that would ceaselessly track its target until striking true, Aldebaran took every defensive measure he could conjure, but none could withstand the assault while also avoiding injury.

An attack of this nature, which left no route for escape, was Aldebaran's nemesis. For that reason, in accordance with Aldebaran's own list of priorities, only one viable option remained.

Aldebaran: "Sorry about this, old man."

With that muttered apology, Aldebaran caused the ground beneath Heinkel, who had fallen on his bottom upon receiving a counterattack from Gaston, to rise up, thrusting him up as a shield in between Aldebaran and the starlight.

Naturally, realizing his intentions, Heinkel had begun to yell "Aldeba—", with anger evident upon his face; however, in the next instant, the burst of white light struck the red-haired swordsman, his entire body permeated by an impact that could silence even a Dragon.

Heinkel: "—Kah, oghh, gwoaAHHHhh!"

Aldebaran, who had experienced it firsthand, had suffered damage that seemed to scorch his brain and internal organs to a crisp. However, though Heinkel had fallen to his knees, passing out, he still possessed the leeway to writhe in agony on the spot.

Whether in Vollachia, or that instance with "Aldebaran", time and again, through brutal struggles was the extraordinary sturdiness which Heinkel possessed proven. —Having been saved by the resilience that seemed to bring Heinkel himself no gratification whatsoever, Aldebaran looked to where the light had originated.

Thereupon—

Aldebaran: "—So, you're Camberley?"

Leaning against the Star Staff that had unleashed a burst of light, blood dripping from his nose, was a man of the Dwarf race.

As of now, this battle had been done over twenty-nine thousand two-hundred and twenty-one times since its commencement. Consequently, Aldebaran understood the ruffians who had gathered here better than they did themselves.

Of the opponents he had encountered thus far, he knew every last one by name. In a way, it could be said that he had developed a sort of one-sided kinship with them. Sorry, that would be a lie. He was sick and tired of facing such formidable opponents.

Regardless—

Aldebaran: "…Even if you're aware of the activation method, that ain't a Meteor that any half-assed amateur can put to use. How on earth did you manage to activate it?"

Camberley: "How, do you think, I did it…? Hehe, keep guessin', for the rest, of your life."

Aldebaran: "—. Don't tell me, you used Hexcel?"

Blood dripping from his eyes and nose, along with bulging veins on his neck and forehead; this sight led Aldebaran to the conclusion that these were adverse effects resulting from the use of a certain illicit substance.

Commonly referred to as "Hexcel", it was an illicit drug produced using bokko fruit, which in its raw form had the property of revitalizing the Mana within the body, and the use of Hexcel was prohibited even in the Kingdom of Lugunica. —Although the drug had a narcotic effect, it would, in essence, generate excess Mana through the activation of the Gate.

Under the effect of that doping, even those unqualified could wield the Star Staff.

Aldebaran: “Even then, your insides’ll be ripped apart. Doing that sorta thing…”

Camberley: “You think, I’m the only one, who’ll back down? When Rachins, and Gaston, and everyone else, are risking it all… even Reinhard, y’know? Heh, I landed up, with an amazing bunch…”

With his complexion deathly pale, not even bothering to wipe away the bloody tears and nosebleed that appeared starkly vivid by contrast, Camberley was in a state that could certainly be described as hopeless.

However, spoken with the hint of a smile, his words lacked the typical recklessness of a desperate individual.

Aldebaran: “Every last one of them…”

Behind Heinkel, who was still writhing from being burnt by starlight, Gaston lay unconscious.

He was also one among those who, having clashed with Aldebaran head-on, had wounded him with his words more than his fists. Individuals of such a sort numbered many in this battle against the Felt Camp.

Only by defeating all of them, one-by-one, thoroughly and painstakingly, had Aldebaran been able to arrive at this juncture.

After twenty-nine thousand two-hundred and twenty-one times, stacking up attempt after attempt,

Camberley: “—Helmet bastard, you’ve never fought, with your life on the line, not even once, ain’t that right?”

Aldebaran: “…”

Camberley: “You see, I have. That’s what I’m doing now… To fight with my life on the line, I got both a reason, and the courage. That much, I’ve certainly, proved… Hk.”

Stating thus with his trembling voice, Camberley tightened his grip upon the Star Staff in his hands, and once more, he tried to invoke the light of a star.

However, that was an impossibility.

Camberley: “Gauhghh.”

The Mana to operate it was insufficient in him. —And, as if to punish a wielder in that state, the Star Staff backfired, burning Camberley’s Gate and causing white smoke to billow from the entirety of his small frame.

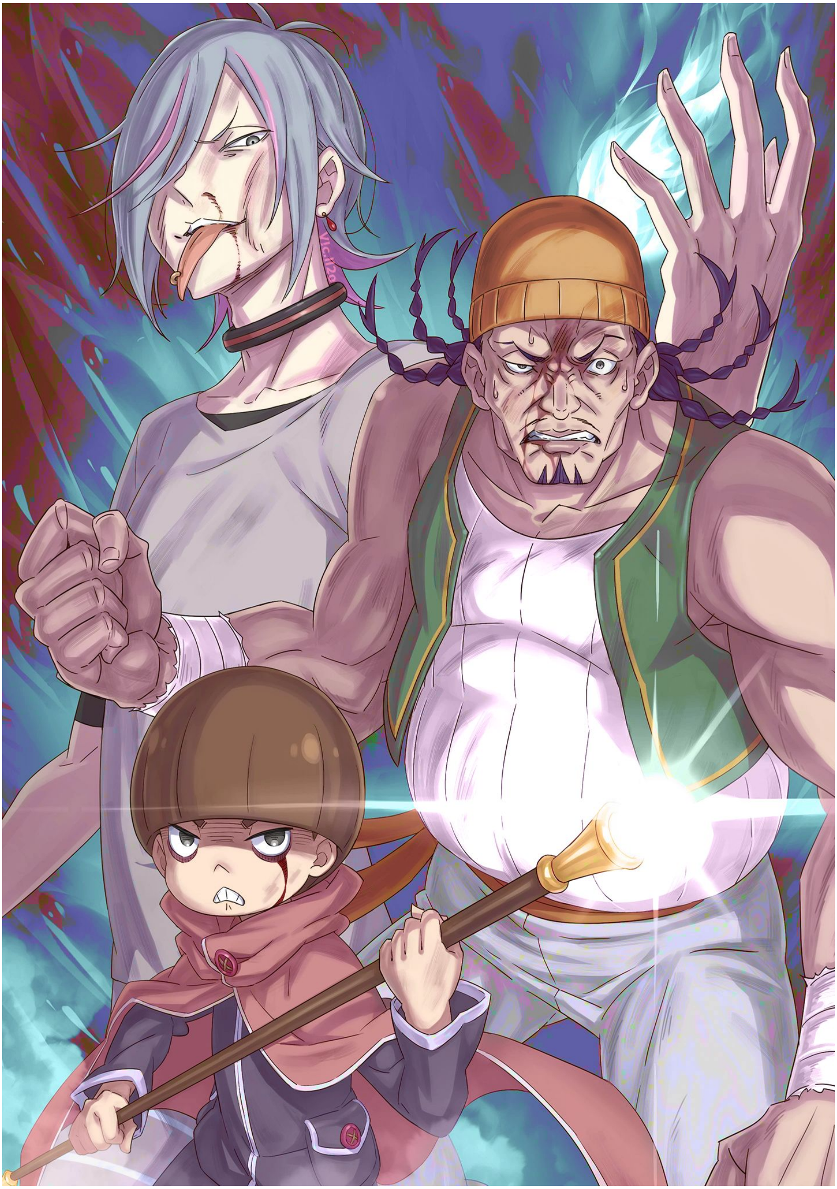
If an unqualified person were to execute the activation procedure, not only would it fail to be invoked, but there would also be a small penalty. Installed by the Witch who had created the Star Staff, it was a safety measure to prevent children from playing with it. The fact that the Witch believed that this would serve as a safety measure, showed that she really did not comprehend the human heart.

Anyway, the safety measure had performed its task, and Camberley fell backward, passing out—

???: “Car-kun!”

And, a woman rushed over and caught his small body before it collapsed onto the ground.

The woman, with dark skin and wearing a lascivious dress, was the girl boss of the Flower Prison Garden, judging from her features. Embracing the unconscious Camberley, she directed a stern glare at Aldebaran.



Vic.ll2o

Aldebaran: “…You don’t need to glare at me like that. I ain’t got the time or the interest to kick a dead body.”

Woman: “You are all…”

Aldebaran: “Seven days… no, now it’s just six days. I’m only gonna cause a stir in the world for the next six days, no longer. —Though none of you guys are willing to believe me.”

The boss of the Flower Prison Garden called Toto, was she?

The boss of the Black Silver Coin, Doltero, had also tormented him relentlessly, but the gaze of this woman, holding the man precious to her, was just as cuttingly sharp.

At her gaze, Aldebaran narrowed his eyes behind his helmet, probing Toto’s fighting spirit with a simple, “Shall we?”. Come to think of it, this marked the first time he had encountered a woman on this battlefield.

He had yet to see the faces of either Grassis, who had delivered that painful first blow, or Felt, their leader.

Ignoring Aldebaran’s sentiments, while tensing all her limbs, Toto jerked her chin at Aldebaran as if to say “Go”.

A wry smile eeking out due to her self-assured attitude, Aldebaran turned his back to her.

And then—

Toto: “—Kuh, ah!”

Behind Aldebaran, Toto had dropped the iron fan she had raised, struggling to tear away the steel thread wound around her neck. Unable to do so, the sound of her falling down reached his ears.

The doer of the deed, Yae, approached the collapsed Toto, retrieving the iron fan that had dropped to the ground, and spoke, Yae: “Wow, there’s poison in this. From the smell and color… jiramme, I’d say? It’s an instantly lethal poison, so it looks like you were rea~lly eager to go all out, weren’t you?”

Aldebaran: “Don’t get so angry.”

Yae: “Even though I’m this ado~rable, it’s rude to say I’m getting angry! First of all, it’s Al-sama’s fault, you know? Just because the opponent’s a woman, you turn your back with a grin. I guess, for Al-sama, it might not matter how many times you die, but…”

Aldebaran: “—Now’s the first time. It’s ‘cause you came to help.”

It was not flattery, the truth truly was that he had not been caught off guard even once by Toto.

Upon hearing Aldebaran’s response, Yae fell silent with a “Hmph” and wore a displeased expression. That had been Aldebaran’s way of showing gratitude, but despite her complaints about how he did not thank her enough, she would always react like this whenever he actually did communicate his thanks. There was no avail in saying it to her.

Aldebaran: “Anyway, we’ve finished suppressing this bunch too… And, the old man is…?”

Yae: “He’s burned, but he’s still alive and kicking. That guy, don’t you think he’s a little off?”

Aldebaran: “Of course he’s off. He’s from House Astrea.”

Yae: “Even someone like that is still an Astrea, huh?”

Be that as it may, even for a member of House Astrea, the blast from the Star Staff seemed to have taken its toll.

Heinkel, appearing to be in more pain than he had ever been before, was approached by Yae for a quick check on his condition. At the same time, she shot Aldebaran a look that clearly suggested that they should take this chance to leave him behind.

Ignoring Yae’s gaze with his usual indifference, Aldebaran turned his attention northwest.

Aldebaran: “…”

Since the start of the battle, they had been cornered, pursued by smoke, and forced further and further south through the forest.

While steadily whittling down the enemy force numbering five hundred people in their path, Aldebaran and his group had finally made it all the way back.

And upon making it all the way back—

???: “—Well now, strangely ‘nough, it don’t feel like this’s my first time seein’ ya, helmet bastard.”

Aldebaran: “Same goes for me. Maybe it’s ‘cause I’ve been thinking about you this whole time.”

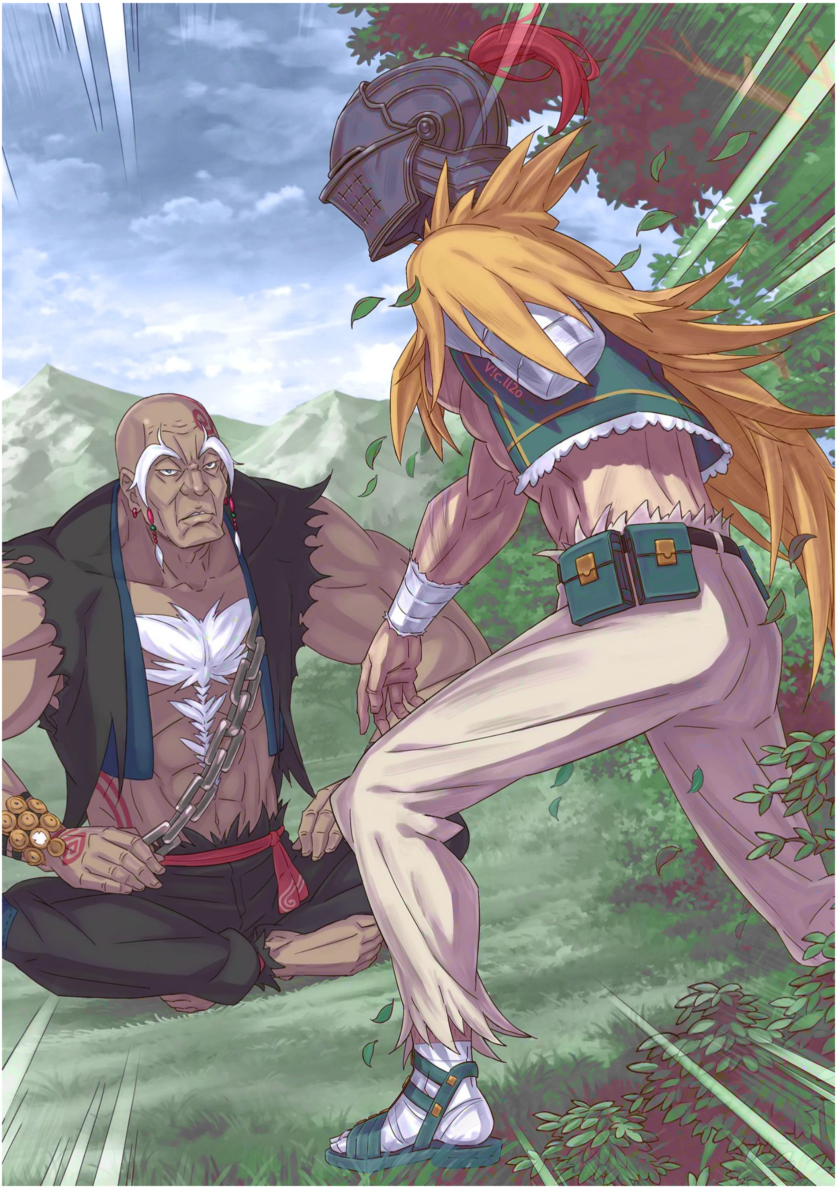
At last, in the very plains where the chase had begun, at the end of a trial and error that had lasted twenty-nine thousand, two-hundred and twenty-one attempts, Aldebaran had succeeded in coming face-to-face with his true enemy—with Valga Cromwell.

9

Sat cross-legged upon the needlessly spacious plain, Valga Cromwell rested his chin in his hands.

Looking at him once more, he was huge. Even though he was sitting, his head was still level with Aldebaran’s simply due to his body being so large, and perhaps because his legs were short.

Aldebaran: “Relatable. I’ve also got a complex about my legs being short.”



Vic.ll2o

Valga: “I’ll say this now, but I’ve never made a fuss ‘bout the length of my legs. Tho’ back in my heyday, I used ta wish I had a bigger body or longer arms.”

Aldebaran: “You seem young enough even now, gramps, how old are you?”

Valga: “Who knows. I stopped countin’ after a hundred.”

Valga gave a cold answer, but as expected, Giants had quite a long lifespan.

Excluding the elves who were said to live forever unless killed, the longest lived race in this world were probably the Giants. Considering that those Giants were now on the brink of extinction due to having angered a lone Witch, the people of yore must not have known any limits to their rage.

Aldebaran: “A swordsman who went on a killing spree ‘cause his favorite food was Dragon meat, a Witch who almost wiped out a whole tribe due to being angered by a single member, an elf who got caught in the splash of the Witch of Envy, the list goes on.”

Valga: “Ya seem awfully knowledgeable ’bout history for a young’un. Besides, weren’t ya all chummy with the Witch of Envy?”

Aldebaran: “Chummy? Well there’s an unfunny joke.”

In their tit-for-tat, Valga’s voice held a transparent intent to agitate him, however, Aldebaran could not go without refuting that statement.

Something like getting along with the Witch of Envy, even if that evaluation was sarcastic or in jest, he would not let it slide.

Aldebaran: “That one really does hate me to an extreme extent. Not once have our eyes ever met.”

Valga: “…Meeting eyes with the Witch of Envy, hm? That in itself’s gotta be an unfunny joke, eh?”

Aldebaran: “If y’ain’t laughing, neither am I. Every step along the way, you’ve taken the sorta measures I hate the most… where’s lil’ miss Felt?”

Valga: “Capturin’ that girl’d be the quickest way for ya ta end this, ain’t that so? Ya think I’d put her somewhere within yer reach?”

Aldebaran clicked his tongue at that response, and Valga snorted his nose as he gazed behind the former—to the forest wherein a fierce battle had been unfolding until now; he continued with “And so”.

Valga: “So ya really went ‘n done it, killin’ five hundred people, huh?”

Aldebaran: “Though, you might think it’s cute compared to your kill count during the civil war. Besides… ahh, nah, I’ll keep it to myself. It doesn’t matter.”

Valga: “…”

This too was a tit-for-tat, so he forced himself to swallow the words he had begun to utter. —In this battle, Aldebaran’s party had not robbed a single person of their life.

In order to weaken their fighting strength, he had gone as far as to give them grievous wounds that put them on the verge of death, but none of their lives would be in danger if they received the proper treatment.

But, mentioning that here would not have a positive influence on Valga’s impression.

It would only prompt skepticism regarding why he had taken such measures, such unnatural conduct.

Naturally, as Yae had proposed several times, rather than adhering to non-lethality, there had been several points at which taking their opponent’s lives would have made surmounting them easier. Even if the order of magnitude of his attempts thus increased, Aldebaran stubbornly abided by that restriction.

He had made up his mind. Aldebaran had.

From the world she had loved, not a single person more would be lost in the scope of his interference. Save for the one exception, that of Natsuki Subaru.

For that reason, Aldebaran would not take the lives of any—

Valga: "—You're no longer able ta bear the sight of anybody losin' their life before yer eyes, ain't that so?"

—.

——.

———.

————Ah?

Aldebaran: "—Ah?"

Valga: "I had my suspicions. 'Twas when I'd heard that Ezzo and Flam'd been done in at the Pleiades Watchtower, but their lives hadn't been taken."

Aldebaran: "Oi…"

Valga: "Flam used the Divine Protection of Mindspeak, and receivin' the news, the Sword Saint went ta intercept'cha at the Augria Sand Dunes where he's the weakest… that in itself's a stratagem I could understand, but it was no reason ta let Ezzo live. Once Flam used her Divine Protection, too, she'd have served her purpose, yeah?"

Aldebaran: "Oi, gramps… old geezer…"

Valga: "Any worries that might crop up in the future oughta be eradicated. Ya didn't take those natural measures. —If I recall, ya asked me where Felt's gone off ta. That girl, I had her follow yer escape path. Thus…"

Ignoring Aldebaran's trembling voice, Valga raised his arm—a gauntlet fitted with Conversation Mirrors, and tapped the single one that did not have its lid down.

Aldebaran's party had shattered a total of twelve mirrors now, and that fitted in his gauntlet was the thirteenth and final one. On the other side of that Conversation Mirror, Felt was present.

Valga: "Fact is, ya guys ain't takin' lives, n' there's no shortage of people who'll still be able ta move once their restraints are removed. Even if five hundred's impossible, do ya think ya still got enough strength ta take on more than a hundred again?"

Aldebaran: "You, old geezer…!!"

Valga flashed a smile as he spoke, and inside Aldebaran's helmet, a vein bulged on his forehead.

The fact that Valga had flipped his side's restriction on killing against them, having vigilantly progressed arrangements for returning those who had been neutralized to the frontlines, was a surprise.

However, it was not as though Aldebaran's party had been bereft of judgement either. Not only had they tied them up, but they had also broken their limbs, making it difficult for them to return to the battlefield—

Valga: "For when push comes ta shove, we've provided enough Hexcel for everyone. Next won't be a battle against those who don't fear pain, but a battle against those who can't feel pain."

Aldebaran: "—Hk, ahh, bring it on! Be it a hundred or two-hundred they're welcome to come at me. I'll just do it all over…"

Again; it was when he was about to shout out in the spur of the moment.

Watching Aldebaran as he raised his voice in anger, Valga abruptly narrowed his eyes. The gaze seemed as if it was looking right into his helmet, and Aldebaran's breath involuntarily caught.

Thereupon, Valga closed in with words.

Valga: "I see. —Seems like this conversation's a first for ya."

Aldebaran: "…"

For a moment, not understanding what that signified, Aldebaran tensed up.

But, it was for just a moment. A terrible chill immediately crawled up his back, and Aldebaran finally defined the being before his eyes to be a threat greater than the Sword Saint.

Aldebaran: "YAE—!!"

Instantly, Aldebaran used his voice to the fullest to command Yae, who he had kept on standby, to attack.

Through Yae's Steel Thread Technique, Valga Cromwell would be restrained; there was no choice but to shut his mouth, which had the potential to speak those thoughts of his. The quickest way to achieve that would be to take his life. However, that would not be done.

Decidedly, he was doing that with his own intentions, not for any reasons like the one Valga had described.

Aldebaran: "So that you don't wake up for six days, I'll put you to sleep."

He had yet to come up with a specific method, but doing that would be the best strategy.

In order to do that, he ordered Yae to move—

???: "—There you are."

As if from a stew in which a multitude of poisons simmered, a man's out-of-place voice hung in the air like a malicious fragrance.

The man had been hiding in the grass of the plain—with an unsightly appearance, consisting of tattoos of balance scales inked all over his body, he directed his gaze to a spot in the forest, and wriggled his bizarrely large right eye.

With a crookedness as if he had forced in an eyeball that did not belong to him, that gaze of his pierced Yae, who had jumped out in an effort to obey Aldebaran's command.

The covertness of a shinobi had been seen through by that man—likely Manfred of the Balance.

Then, Manfred placed his palm over his right hand, and capturing Yae in the gaze of his left eyeball that did not match in size,

Manfred: "Don't move."

Yae: "—Hk."

As soon as the command was given, a slight disturbance was born in Yae's movements.

Interfering with others through the weight of one's words was the effect of the Divine Protection of Coercion. However, if the Divine Protection of Farsight had been the one to pinpoint Yae's position, this made it two unique Divine Protections at the same time.

Aldebaran: "An Apostle of Typhon, are you…?!"

Aldebaran gnashed his teeth, however, Yae overcame the Divine Protection's power of compulsion in an instant.

With the step following the one disturbed she regained composure, and with a shinobi's mobility she attempted to extend a steel thread out towards Valga. —However, upon that one step which had been disturbed, those transcendent would intervene.

???: "—Vengeance for Flam."

Having hidden in the grass as Manfred had, Grassis leapt up, and drove a kick into Yae's torso. Yae promptly crossed an arm over to catch it, but the strike from the girl who had mastered the Flow Method at her young age was frighteningly weighty, sending Yae's slender body a great deal back.

Yae: "Though, I've got nothing to do with your big sis!"

Grassis: "Mostly all of you, are vengeance for Flam."

Receiving Grassis's loose retribution, Yae's hand was instantly broken.

Left in the forest by Yae, Heinkel had yet to get back up after getting hit by the Star Staff earlier, and even supposing he had indeed risen again, he could not be counted upon in this situation.

That was to say—

Aldebaran: "—Territory, re-expansion. Matrix redefinition."

From this point on, Aldebaran would shut the mouth of Valga Cromwell with naught more than his own strength.

For that purpose—

Valga: "—Ya lost yer cool. No matter the era, that's always the cause of defeat for the losin' side."

Exercising his Authority, the moment he bent the world to his own rules, Aldebaran realized that before his eyes, Valga was chewing something up in his mouth.

Since he also had a habit of gulping down the poison stored behind his molar, he could tell. —And in this situation, there was only one thing that Valga could be dosing on.

Aldebaran: "Hexcel."

In an instant, an enormous palm spread out in front of Aldebaran, and he immediately bent backwards.

He fell on his backside. In exchange, the physique of the risen Giant seemed to have enlarged even further from the effects of the contraband drug he had taken, and Aldebaran's breath caught.

Valga Cromwell's direct combat ability, was unknown to Aldebaran.

However, Valga's drive in this moment was no less than that of the numerous warriors he had come to face until this point, and in him dwelled a dreadfulness only found in those who staked their lives on the line.

It happened, at the moment in which that drive had overwhelmed him.

???: “—ALDEBARAN!!”

The shout of a man upon whom he had harbored no expectations of contributing whatsoever, was pointing to the sky.

Aldebaran had likewise caught a glimpse of him in the corner of his eye, but for Heinkel to point at the sky with a sense of urgency rather than terror or fear in these circumstances, there was but one reason.

The time limit that would bring denouement to this battle, from beyond the sky, it cometh.

Aldebaran: “With this—”

Valga: “—Time’s up.”

As Aldebaran’s words were convinced of the demise of this hectic situation, they overlapped with Valga’s voice. But, something was strange. In that voice, not a shred of resignation or irritation was present.

On the contrary, it seemed as if Valga had been looking forward to this moment.

—In the subsequent instant, it came to pass. The light that had illuminated the sky on Valga’s command, now flashed anew.

10

—At that moment, as Rom-jii crushed a Night Banishing Magic Stone within his hand, his body invigorated via his Hexcel-boosted Gate, he played his final move for the purpose of felling the helmet bastard.

Rom: “The helmet bastard’s behaviour, be it mind reading or precognition, doesn’t make a lick of sense.”

The possibility of his mind being read, and this stratagem thus being countered, was eliminated.

In that case, consideration then fell upon him predicting the future and evading accordingly; but that too would be a tad incoherent.

The future was something that existed only once innumerable choices were added up, naught more, naught less. Moreover, it was not just the choices made by any single person, but the countless choices performed by countless people; the future could not be said to be decided by anything else.

Infeasible it was, to peruse the future, to respond to it perfectly, it was all somewhat lacking in realism. To begin with, even supposing he could witness the future, the positioning of the mirror-bearers would be unknown to him.

But, if he had witnessed results even once, it was a different story.

If the helmet bastard's Authority was not one of looking forward into the future ahead, but rather one of observing outcomes that had come to pass in the future, then his conduct up till this point stood to reason.

He would inspect pockets in order to identify those designated to be mirror-bearers. He would validate its resulting outcome, and go on to the next. Supposing he had repeated this, the actions of the helmet bastard up till this point, and their results, stood to reason.

Rom: "What in tarnation's that s'posed to be??!!"

Because it made logical sense, Rom-jii had become incensed, thinking "That don't make a lick of gosh darn sense!".

Mind-reading and precognition were both illogical, but returning after witnessing results—what to call it eluded him, but whatever the case, it was a rule-breaking ability. Just how could it be thwarted?

Rom: "But, it's got holes."

In the first place, were he to possess the almighty ability to observe and respond appropriately to every possible circumstance, the helmet bastard would have been able to even avoid encountering them at this juncture.

This individual had prepared countermeasures for Reinhard, and had succeeded in entrapping him. But compared to meeting him head-on, it would have been much safer to evade him.

As to why he had not done so, was the reason of why he could not do so.

—To witness the outcomes and do things over, he did not have that much time.

And thus, were the usage of the Authority entirely up to the helmet bastard, supposing a lull between danger and safety arose, he would naturally wish to create an area of safety in that opening. —And therein would the trap be set.

From a position that the helmet bastard was made to believe was a safe zone, all he needed to do was fashion an inescapable crucible of traps.

Thereupon, the final aspect of the trap he had concocted was—

Rom: "—You've summoned yer ally back, the Divine Dragon."

Helmet Bastard: "…"

The moment its presence was sighted outwith the sky, the helmet bastard's faction and naturally the Felt Camp alike were convinced that it signified the battle's denouement.

At the end of day, the absence of anybody possessing overwhelming power was the primary factor in this battle coming into being.

Were the Divine Dragon to be returned, and were it to lay devastation upon the plains with a single one of its breaths, be there five-hundred or be there a thousand ruffians hardened in their resolve, they would not hold a candle to it.

And as to demonstrate this, the Divine Dragon would unleash a single attack that would cause all fighting spirit to be lost. —This, unmistakably, was a breath serving as a closing ceremony to the battle, one that would be let loose no matter what.

And that breath would be made to be fired in err, unto a situation in which it could not be evaded.

Rom: "—The Night Banisher's effect's ta fake night into lookin' like daytime. By extension, it's a deceptive veil that shrouds the true landscape."

Normally, aiming a Night Banishing Magic Stone in the desired direction would be a difficult affair without being a skilled magician, but Rom-jii, having strained his Gate via Hexcel, had been able to bring that about.

But for what reason had he done so? —Because this was originally one of the stratagems not carried out during the Demi-Human War.

—Targeting an entity that the Royal Army could not disregard, a great magic would be fired to wipe out all the enemies gathered around said being; a variant of a strategy performed in exchange for a life.

Rom: "Back then, the plan was ta target someone 'n aim magic at their location. But today's different."

The deception produced by the Night Banisher extended, with Rom-jii and the helmet bastard in it enveloped.

—Consequently, Volcanica the Divine Dragon, inborne from heavens faraway, the Dragon tasked with terminating this bout, would without doubt lay eyes upon a sprawling plain bereft of people.

Rom-jii and the helmet bastard's presence there would go unnoticed by the Dragon, thus causing it to attack erroneously.

Having the Dragon fire its breath at a place it thought no one was present in, was Rom-jii's—was Valga Cromwell's method of nullifying the helmet bastard's safe zone.

Helmet Bastard: "—Hk."

Instantly the helmet bastard attempted to escape, yet his leg was seized by Valga Cromwell's grip.

Realizing that escape was impossible, the helmeted man gulped, and gazed up at the heavens. The Divine Dragon's eyes were unable to see him. Its mouth came suffused with white light, a breath was released directed at the "desolated" plains.

Rom: "—Felt."

At that moment, within Valga Cromwell's—Nay, within Rom-jii's mind flashed the figure of his beloved grandchild.

Her time as an infant, her time as a toddler, the woman she now was, all went by in a single instant; wondering if this was the scenery he would get to behold just before his passing, an out of place smile arose upon Rom-jii's visage.

So much so in fact, that even though anger and loathing were supposed to have filled this pointlessly gargantuan body of his, the faces of Libre and Sphinx, who had skirted death alongside him, flickered not in his consciousness.

Bearing those powerful emotions at his terminus, Rom-jii and the helmet bastard both were engulfed by the Dragon's breath—

???: "—Cut it with the crap!!"

In that instant, starlight darted past, smashing through the side of the airborne Dragon's maw, and the breath that was to be sicced loose veered off towards a different direction, exploding upon a plain that was verily desolate.

Rom: "Wha…"

Jostled about by the humongous plume of smoke and the shockwave, Rom-jii was unable to hold firm, and tumbled over. Dragged by the former's fall, the helmet bastard likewise raised a cry of pain of "GWOAHH!".

Had it gone entirely as his own self had anticipated, the unthinkable might of the Dragon's breath would have, without a doubt, finally driven the helmet bastard into a situation with no escape, leaving him defeated.

And yet—

???: “I had a bad feeling and this is what I find. Being prepared to die and wanting to die right away are two totally different things, you know! Big stupid Rom-jii!!”

The one to roar thus, having smashed Valga Cromwell’s stratagem into smithereens, their red eyes reddened a degree further whilst bearing tears, Star Staff in hand, was his adorable grandchild.

—By his own adorable grandchild, Valga Cromwell had been defeated.

Chapter 22:
How to End a Battle

1

—When she had first heard Rom-jii's plans, she had some reservations.

Rom: "Got that, Felt? If ya fall into the enemy's hands, we're sure ta lose… 'course, our enemies are gonna try 'n take advantage of that, seein' how that's their easiest victory condition."

Felt: "I'm the one in charge over here. I'm not gonna make a fuss and argue that I don't understand your logic, but if you expect me to just sit in a corner and watch you all like a fool, I'm not just gonna go along with that, y'know?"

Rom: "In a large battle, it's commonplace for a general ta sit back all dignified-like and wait 'til the fightin's settled… hey, c'mon, don't groan at me like that!"

Having just proposed a position that caused an explosion of displeasure from the one who had been listening, Rom-jii patted his bald head as he made a face of defeat towards Felt, who had groaned in frustration.

Felt was used to seeing that troubled expression on Rom-jii's face, and she knew very well that when he made that expression, he was not actually as troubled as he appeared. —When Rom-jii patted his own head with a troubled look on his face, he did so in order to steer the conversation in the direction he desired.

What Rom-jii wanted to convey was—

Rom: "All right, all right, all right I said. Then I won't ask ya ta sit back and watch or huddle up on the sidelines. —I'll have ya follow that helmet bastard's footsteps one move at a time."

Felt: "…You're saying you want me to follow around that helmet bastard? What’s the point of that?”

Rom: “I wanna be able ta pinpoint the location of the helmet bastard in the forest as best I can, and after the squads that engage the enemy are broken through, I’m thinkin’ we can retrieve the survivors and ambush them from the rear.”

She understood that the strategy proposed by Rom-jii was one to corner the helmet bastard, blocking off his escape route and crushing him. To achieve this, their fighting force of five hundred would be divided into a number of squads, and there was a possibility that the first squad to attack may have to be sacrificed.

And Felt would be in a position where she knew of this and yet could not do anything about it.

Felt: “…”

Rom: “Felt, since this is a battle…”

Felt: “I know. I’m not like that damn Reinhard. I’m not so naive as to think no one will die no matter what. I just don’t like it. Acting on the assumption that you’re going to die, I mean.”

Although she often had been treated as a child due to her appearance, Felt did not believe that she actually embodied such childish dreams, to the extent that she was unfortunately scorned due to her looks.

Having grown up in the slums of the Royal Capital, where life was not considered to be of high value, one philosophy had been firmly rooted in her core.

Human life was fragile, that was why they said it. —Live strong.

Rom: “—That’s right. I also dislike squanderin’ lives in futility.”

Felt: “It’s already crazy how the criminal underworld can risk their lives like that and still have an aesthetic sense about it. Otherwise, I don’t think they could have gotten so many people together when they asked for help, so I’ve got mixed feelings.”

The reason behind the ruffians’ pledge to strictly adhere to Rom-jii’s plans lay in a philosophy that was embedded deeply into the criminal underworld, and one very different from the blood code of the slums at that.

The key to getting along well with them lay in respecting their differences rather than overly shying away from them.

However, since Felt was at the head of this group, it was necessary to have everyone follow Felt’s philosophy instead.

Therefore—

Felt: “—Let’s do this. I’m gonna go win this bout my own way.”

Even if her victory conditions differed from the ones anyone else had set, Felt had resolved herself so.

2

During those final moments, as Rom-jii closed the lid of the Conversation Mirror that connected them together, Felt’s unpleasant intuition was confirmed, and she began to quicken her pace.

???: “The old man said, there’s one more thing left to do…”

These were the words of Camberley, as blood poured forth from every orifice of his face.

There was something she wished to comment concerning his body’s battered state, but Felt snatched the Meteor from his hands, leaving him in the care of her comrades who had freed him from the restraints of the helmet bastard’s gang, and she ran.

And, after running the fastest she ever had in her entire life, the moment she emerged from the forest, she came across it.

—The scene of the Divine Dragon being made by Rom-jii to target himself along with the helmet bastard.

Felt: “—Cut it with the crap!!”

Without even realizing it, she raised the Meteor—the Star Staff, taking aim at the incoming Dragon.

She was quite knowledgeable about the Dragon's sturdiness, having witnessed its clash with Reinhard when Ezzo and the others had gone to the Pleiades Watchtower. —Of course, the reason for which she aimed the Star Staff at the Dragon, was concerned not with its robustness.

Even when interjecting to tell them to stop screwing around, Felt did not have the option to punch Rom-jii.

Divine Dragon: "—Ouch!!"

The blow that bore the light of a star struck the side of the Dragon's maw, yielding a cry of pain that utterly lacked the dignity befitting the Divine Dragon, redirecting its breath towards a different direction.

That breath forcefully leveled the empty, deserted plain, but that mattered not.

Perhaps, she had foiled Rom-jii's best-laid plans, but that was fine.

Felt: "I had a bad feeling and this is what I find. Being prepared to die and wanting to die right away are two totally different things, you know! Big stupid Rom-jii!!"

Roaring, overcome with a rising passion, Felt clenched her teeth.

For a moment, Rom-jii and the helmet bastard were difficult to make out, and the two of them, engaged in a battle of wits on a level that Felt could not even imagine, beheld her in astonishment.

Felt's composure did not falter, even though tears shamefully welled in her eyes.

Felt: "That idiot Reinhard, he's gonna worry about this for a long time."

So long as they were not particular as to how victory was attained, Felt and her comrades had the power to best anyone.

For that reason, even if it meant being criticized for this proud way of thinking, she would still choose how she would win. Otherwise, she would not be able to win in a worthwhile manner.

To that end, Felt clung to her convictions.

That was to say—

Felt: “Live strong, Rom-jii. If you can’t stick to that, then even if we win, it’s still a loss.”

3

???: “—Just now, I lost.”

Vocalizing a hard truth, Aldebaran was overwhelmed by a sense of defeat.

Valga Cromwell’s stratagem from a moment ago had hit the bullseye on the Authority-wielding Aldebaran, a flawless artifice that accounted for even the time limit of the Divine Dragon’s return.

“Aldebaran’s” breath, a show of intimidation to end the battle.

When that had been transformed into an inescapable trap, Aldebaran’s matrix would repeat forevermore, forcing him straight towards an unending Death, until his soul was finally worn down to naught.

Harrowing was the ingenious plot of Valga Cromwell, who had delivered the Demi-Human War into a hellish state of civil warfare—no, this checkmate had not been begotten by that origin alone.

Aldebaran: “Using five-hundred people, all my choices were whittled away.”

Unmistakably, therein laid Aldebaran’s cause of defeat.

The incessant onslaught of attacks in waves from five-hundred people, each and every one of them squeezing out every ounce of their lives in a desperate effort to challenge him, caused

Aldebaran's mental strength to be gradually chipped away, impairing his judgment. Upon many junctures, he had needed to redo due to a simple error in judgment, and he overcame them by forcing his way through with a great number of attempts—in the end, he had made a critical mistake as he closed in to secure victory.

Losing his temper due to his exchange with Valga, Aldebaran had misjudged the matrix update site.

Likely, even that had been part of the trap Valga had set. Falling right into it, nearly all possibilities were about to have been sealed off.

—No matter the trap, no matter the enemy, in the end he would conquer them, no matter what.

That arrogance of Aldebaran had been mercilessly prodded by the cunning Great Strategist.

He ought to have known. That even if his Authority was invincible, Aldebaran himself, who exercised it, was banal.

That since he had not emerged victorious from a scenario in which he truly had no other choice but to win, Aldebaran had betrayed the many who had held expectations of him, and had washed up here.

Aldebaran, had utterly wasted the treasure in his possession beyond his own station—

Aldebaran: "—Priscilla, I…"

Couldn't save her; it happened at the moment his husky sigh was about to vocalize the height of his self-punishment.

???: "Nobody move!!"

A shrill voice resounded, breaking through the stagnant atmosphere enveloping the plain of the battlefield.

With the Divine Dragon summoned, and the stratagem of the Great

Strategist who wielded his fury in the Demi-Human War failing, the central figures of this battle had gathered in this place, and taking initiative was the red-haired maid—Yae.

Hindered by Grassis's ambush, Yae had been delayed in providing Aldebaran cover, but now, with steel threads, she had bound Grassis at the entrance to the forest, as well as Manfred at a corner of the plain, turning both of them over.

Furthermore—

Felt: "—Hk, are these the threads that tied up Rachins and the rest?"

Felt, the Star Staff having dropped to her feet, clicked her tongue in loathing.

All of Felt's limbs bound by steel threads, the movements of her body had been completely sealed.

That was to say, the tables had been turned.

Yae: "For such remarkable rudeness towards your noble station, I humbly proffer my dearest apologies, Felt-sama."

Felt: "I ain't nothing like a noble… Why the hell are you following that helmet bastard?"

Yae: "Isn't yielding to the most terrifying opponent the most natural of things~?"

Flatly sticking out her tongue, Yae responded to the immobilized Felt with her usual demeanor.

Witnessing that exchange in the corner of his eye, Aldebaran took a step back to distance himself from Valga. But then again, with his stratagem having failed, Valga was down on his knees, unmoving.

His stratagem, upon which his life had been staked, was a swing and a miss. That exhaustion could be called natural, but below Aldebaran, present in the eyes of that exceedingly clever old Giant, was a hue more poignant than a simple sense of defeat.

Valga: “…I don’t care what happens ta me. Just don’t lay a hand on Felt.”

Aldebaran: “Those are the words I’d wanted to hear. Though, I hadn’t wanted to see that face.”

Faced with Valga’s expression as he wrung out his appeal with difficulty, Aldebaran answered with his true feelings.

Being the ones to have picked this fight, asking him to not lay a hand on her was far too convenient a request. But, if the table could thus be set to put an end to this battle, his sense of relief surpassed his irritation.

Naturally, with the revisions to the plan that had been thrown into disarray, Aldebaran’s seven days had become something far more difficult.

Even so, finishing a battle against the first opponent to ever defeat him aside from the Witch, his deep sentiments towards that fact currently exceeded everything else—

???: “—Yo, me, looks like that went pretty damn rough, didn’t it?”

With a beat of its wings as it perched down on the ground, “Aldebaran” called out to Aldebaran.

Frankly, he felt that it was far too lacking in guilt for having almost ruined everything with its erroneous shooting, but he had made it abandon its duty of drawing as much of the Kingdom’s attention away as it could in half a day, recalling it to him. So in regards to disappointment, he would close his eyes here and call it mutual.

“Aldebaran”: “So? Seems like you unexpectedly came to clash with lil’ miss Felt and her gang, but what on earth was that just now?”

Aldebaran: “A trap to make the other me accidentally shoot at me. It felt like I’d been completely checkmated on a Shatranj board… In truth, that was about to be the case.”

“Aldebaran”: “That sorta thing, it brings back unpleasant memories of being thoroughly beaten by Teacher.”

Sharing the same Memories from the Book of the Dead, “Aldebaran’s” words caused Aldebaran to remember being childishly obliterated on the Shatranj board by the Witch who had bestowed him with all sorts of knowledge, putting him in a foul mood.

Nonetheless, games atop a board were fundamentally different to the battlefield upon which Aldebaran commanded his Authority. Valga had been a truly dreadful enemy.

Aldebaran: “Nah, perhaps the real frightening thing’s the virtue of lil’ miss Felt, who you bow to.”

Valga: “…It ain’t as though we’re bowin’ down to Felt.”

Aldebaran: “—. I guess that’d be so.”

Whilst being fellow Royal Candidates, Felt and Priscilla each shone in their own ways.

If the dazzling nature of the sun one looked up to was different, the way in which it scorched their eyes would also vary. Therein laid not a matter of which was correct, but merely a difference of which light one chose to revere above their head.

And, those who had decided to revere Felt, were Valga and—

Aldebaran: “—So, that’s how it is for all of you?”

Within Aldebaran’s vision were the ruffians who had come crawling out from the forest—wounded from the battle, whilst lending their shoulders to one another, were five hundred people who had yet to lose their fighting spirit.

Aldebaran: “…”

As Valga had threatened, as long as their lives were not taken, they would force their wounded bodies up over and again, struggling onward to attempt to defeat Aldebaran.

Faced with their resolute expressions, Aldebaran was once again made keenly aware. —To go down a path that would no longer receive affirmation from anybody in the world, he was made keenly aware of the effects of having decided so.

Aldebaran: “But, the situation’s changed from earlier. You guys’ve no longer got any shot at victory. Same old story as the Sword Saint and the Witch of Envy. —The Divine Dragon completely breaks the game.”

The outrageousness of the Divine Dragon was something akin to ignoring one’s pieces and directly throwing a punch at the opponent during a match atop a Shatranj board. In this world, there were a fixed number of beings who existed outside that “framework”.

Of those beings, one he had sealed, one he had subdued, one he had utilized, and one he had enlisted as an ally. —Aldebaran would not hesitate to use every ounce of its advantages.

Hence—

Aldebaran: “Sorry, but I’m forcing a game-set here. We’ll be making it so you guys won’t be able to chase us from here on out—”

Yae: “—Felt-sama, could you stay still?”

Aldebaran: “—?”

Abruptly, Yae’s quiet voice interrupted Aldebaran’s counsel to yield.

When he glanced in her direction to see, Yae was standing on Felt’s back, the latter restrained by steel wires, and as Yae directed a sharp gaze towards her, she uttered a warning.

However, Felt prefaced “I ain’t gonna move” to Yae, and,

Felt: “—Look at me.”

Indeed, she quietly wove those words.

Aldebaran: “…”

Hearing Felt’s utterance, Aldebaran, Yae, and even Valga, all knit their eyebrows.

Her intent was unclear, Aldebaran suspected that there might have been some stratagem that activated when she came into vision, but Felt herself was apprehended by Yae, and she was literally incapable of doing a thing.

In that state, there was not a single thing she could do. —In the girl's red eyes dwelled a strength of will that betrayed any such notions.

And then—

"Aldebaran": "Ah, a bit of a problem's come up, me."

So said "Aldebaran", who had been rubbing the cheek that had basked in the Star Staff's blast with its forefoot.

The brunt of that puzzling voice was directed towards Aldebaran, who shared the same Memories and personality—but, "Aldebaran" did not look at him as it spoke.

It was not a matter of a poor attitude. The eyes of the Dragon were trained upon Felt.

—It was as if to say that taking its eyes off of Felt would be difficult, immensely so.

Before Aldebaran could investigate what that meant, rather than rubbing its cheek, "Aldebaran" was trying to fiddle with the metal fixtures of the helmet it was not wearing out of habit,

"Aldebaran": "Try as I might, I don't wanna refuse Farsale's… lil' miss Felt's request."

And so, the occurrence of a definite problem was thus disclosed.

4

???: "—Farsale, thy recklessness hath exhausted mineself, and everyone else akin."

When the Divine Dragon had spoken thus to her, Felt had traversed the Augria Sand Dunes, aiming for the Pleiades Watchtower with Meili Portroute in order to prove the latter's utility.

It seemed to have been intimidated by Reinhard's presence, so the Divine Dragon Volcanica, meant to be protecting the Tower, had hastily attacked Felt and her group.

The fierce battle seemed like it would scatter away half of all the sand dunes, and there was no doubt that it was the flashiest battle Felt had seen in all her life.

Ultimately, no conclusion was drawn in the battle between Reinhard and Volcanica. After all, Volcanica's combativeness had withdrawn upon seeing Felt, leaving it an unfinished battle.

The battle having thus ended in an incomprehensible manner, that was the first thing the Dragon had said.

Felt: "Who the hell're you calling Farsale, stop screwing around."

As the Divine Dragon impolitely mistook her for another, Felt had taken offense.

On the other hand, regarding the name "Farsale" that Volcanica had spoken, even Felt was not so ignorant as to not have a clue.

In this Kingdom of Lugunica, if the name Farsale came from the Divine Dragon Volcanica's mouth, that referred to the being known as the last Lion King, the one who had spearheaded the formation of the Covenant between the Kingdom and the Dragon—none other than Farsale Lugunica.

That was to say, Volcanica had mistaken Felt for the last Lion King.

Farsale Lugunica unmistakably ought to have been a male King, so to be mistaken for him really made her angry. In the year and a half since the Royal Selection had begun, perhaps thanks to her dramatic improvement in nourishment from her days in the slums, Felt's body had grown considerably.

Her figure ought to have become somewhat more visible from the malnourished state where it was unclear as to whether she was male or female.

Such confidence of hers was wounded, and thus her contact with the Divine Dragon, who most people in the Dragon Kingdom had never been able to meet, was no enjoyable affair for Felt.

Nonetheless, it did not end with just that experience of an unenjoyable meeting.

Perhaps because it had been extremely close with Farsale, Volcanica was incredibly friendly towards Felt—frankly, it was unreasonably attached to her.

Despite its head being as empty as a senile old man, it was still quick to obey Felt's words without hesitation.

Felt: "The promise between the Lugunican Royal Family, and Volcanica, huh…"

Since no material records existed, the relationship between the Lion King and Divine Dragon, what words they exchanged, and in what manner they made their promise, such minute details were unknown.

Only, Felt fully understood that there existed something between the two, something that was neither a one-sided employment, nor was it simply fellowship and a deep bond.

Moreover, mistaking Felt for Farsale, Volcanica was laudably trying to maintain their Covenant formed long ago; Felt was not so heartless as to not feel anything regarding that.

Not to mention, it did not seem that Volcanica was mixing her up with Farsale just because of her hair and eye color.

As for what exactly that signified, Felt had come up with somewhat of a conclusion within herself, but at the current point in time, without Reinhard by her side, she had no intention of putting it into words.

The important thing was that to Volcanica, Felt filled the place of Farsale.

That was to say—

Felt: “—Look at me.”

V1c.1120

As soon as she had pronounced so, the reactions of the helmet bastard and shinobi maid, who looked at her suspiciously, and Volcanica—no, the Divine Dragon, who had flicked its head to look at her, were evidently quite different.

Without a doubt, the Divine Dragon's reaction to Felt's words was compelled by a force that the others had not felt, evidence that it had experienced a sensation difficult to ignore.

And, to counter the time limit on this battle that Rom-jii had defined in advance—the wildcard of the helmet bastard summoning the Divine Dragon to the battlefield, this was the one and only measure.

The moment she became convinced of it having worked, Felt shouted.

Felt: "Everyone, lend a shoulder to the wounded and withdraw! This fight is over!"

Helmet Bastard: "Wha…"

Felt: "The Divine Dragon can't ignore me! This is our moment to quit!"

The helmet bastard was left speechless at the declaration that had flown right over his head. Feeling good about the helmet bastard's dumbfounded reaction, Felt looked past him over to Rom-jii.

His face stiffening, as Rom-jii's wrinkles grew even deeper,

Rom: "Felt… I'm…"

Felt: "I told you, Rom-jii. If the Divine Dragon returned, I would do this. You silently plotted on your own, Rom-jii. I properly consulted with you, and my action here makes logical sense."

Rom: "Nghh…!"

To Felt's direct words, Rom-jii fell silent with no reply.

Both Felt and Rom-jii had considered the case in which the Divine Dragon returned. Only, the countermeasures they intended for when that situation came differed between the two of them.

As she had said, Felt's properly consulted plan ought to have been of far more sound reasoning.

Helmet Bastard: "Oi, were you being serious just now?"

Beside the exchange between Felt and Rom-jii, the helmet bastard, who had stood back up from the impact, posed that question to the Divine Dragon high above himself.

In response, as the Divine Dragon gave a deep exhale from its nostrils,

Divine Dragon: "As super seriously serious as serious can be. Having come to this point, my level of self-restraint is such that I'd like you to praise me for not changing sides over to lil' miss Felt. If you weren't me, I'd have betrayed you without a second thought."

Helmet Bastard: "That joke's crossing a line, oi…"

Fidgeting with the metal fixtures on his helmet, the helmet bastard's shoulders drooped at the Divine Dragon's answer.

Hearing the two converse, Felt harbored a sense of unease—she was concerned about the evident discrepancy in the Divine Dragon's demeanor from before, but she did not have the time to point it out at that moment.

Here and now, Felt had to press on by using herself as fortunate countermeasure against the Divine Dragon, allowing the defeated Rom-jii and the others to evacuate to safety—

???: "—You don't know when to quit, Felt-sama."

Felt: "…"

Directly after that seemed to be whispered into her ear, a fine pressure tightened around her neck. With a closer look, digging into Felt's neck was a thread so thin that it would go unnoticed to the unstrained eye, causing blood to run down.

Of course, the perpetrator of that act was the shinobi maid who had tied Felt up with threads.

Helmet Bastard: “Yae, stop it! Follow my orders…”

Shinobi Maid: “I’m prepared to be punished as I counsel you this, Al-sama. We’d better finish off Felt-sama here. After all, even I could tell that your consultation with the Divine Dragon-sama just now didn’t progress in a desirable direction.”

Helmet Bastard: “That’s…”

Divine Dragon: “—That’s a no-go, Yae. I won’t excuse it if you do.”

In place of the faltering helmet bastard, the one to threaten the shinobi maid—Yae, was the Divine Dragon, having slightly lowered its head.

The Divine Dragon’s ire, the brunt of its overpowering glare was enough to make one feel pain as if their skin was charring. However, basking in that ire, Yae calmly glared back at the Dragon,

Yae: “Unfortunately, Al-sama is the one I’m afraid of, no~t the Divine Dragon-sama. There’s nothing scary whatsoever about your glare.”

Divine Dragon: “YAEEE…!”

Helmet Bastard: “Stop it, both of you! Don’t recklessly quarrel, they’ll take advantage of it!”

Butting into the confrontation between Yae and the Divine Dragon, the helmet bastard was cautious of Felt and Rom-jii.

In truth, Felt could not do anything in her bound state, but even now, Rom-jii’s eyes had not ceased in their attempt to find an opening to pull something off.

At that fact, both Yae and the Divine Dragon withdrew their confrontational atmosphere for the time being, vigilant of Rom-jii.

Yae: “But but, this problem isn’t resolved. It’s a fact that Felt-sama is dangerous.”

Helmet Bastard: “I know… Me, is there really nothing you can do?”

Divine Dragon: “Yeah, my bad. It ain’t a matter of being bound by a compelling force, constraints, or an Oath, or anything like that. Only, I’m seriously against it, no matter what. My sense of self feels like it’s gonna split apart.”

With Yae’s comment, the views of the helmet bastard and the Divine Dragon formed parallel lines.

The helmet bastard had a course he wished to progress, and Yae and the Divine Dragon were in the position of following that, but it seemed like their intentions were not completely unified at their roots.

As it currently stood, the circumstances had the potential to fall either way.

In that case—

Felt: “Let’s call it a draw here. You let my allies go, and in exchange, we’ll also let you guys go.”

Helmet Bastard: “…Ain’t that a little too convenient. It may have been the result of having an advantage of coincidence on our side, but we demolished all of your plans, lil’ miss Felt. And yet, why would we call it a tie?”

Felt: “Do you really need me to spell it out for you? Our little squabble here had a mutual time limit of the Divine Dragon returning. But, if the Divine Dragon won’t lend a hand to either side, that disappears. And if that disappears, you’ll just have to fight around five-hundred people all over again.”

Helmet Bastard: “…”

As she spoke, Felt carefully examined the helmet bastard, though his complexion remained hidden.

For what she could not see of his face, Felt gathered up all the information she could, such as what the helmet bastard was feeling within, his breathing, and minute gestures, and did her absolute best to see through him.

Within Felt's current argument, there was a decisive hole that she herself was aware of. —The entirety of the situation until now had materialized due to the helmet bastard making the unexpected decision to not kill anybody.

Were the helmet bastard to tear through that premise on a whim, it would all be over for Felt's faction.

Even if restricted by the Divine Dragon's movements, Yae's threads could wrap around the necks of Felt's five-hundred allies and strangle them to death, wiping them all out.

Of that, it was impossible that the helmet bastard himself was unaware. Hence, with all her might, all her body and spirit, to dissuade the helmet bastard from that idea, Felt would choose her words, refine them, and let them resound from her soul.

—She must convince him that continuing this battle would not be worth it.

Felt: "I'll say this now, but this ain't the sorta plan that my Rom-jii uses. If the battle continues, it'll just be another case of his malicious knowledge getting put out on display."

Helmet Bastard: "…That's frightening. But, that'd be just the same as letting you go here, yeah? Even if we call it a draw for the time being, you guys will challenge us again from square one and we'll go in circles forever."

Felt: "Right. That's why, let's do it this way. —I'll go with you as your hostage."

Helmet Bastard: "—Hk."

His breath slightly caught, and Felt could tell that the helmet bastard's eyes had widened through his gestures. Feeling his reaction, Felt gently, not greedily, reeled that shining ray of hope in towards herself.

Felt: “If I’m with you, my guys won’t be able to get in your way. This was the victory condition you’d originally aimed for in order to win this battle, yeah?”

Yae: “Nothing will come of this. To think we’d deliberately bring along a disrupting element. And such a proposal, there would be no sense in it if Felt-sama manages to escape—”

Felt: “In that case, you can just keep this thread attached to me. You too, Divine Dragon, if I break my promise and die trying to escape, that’d be my own responsibility. You don’t need to get angry.”

Divine Dragon: “Oi oi oi, there’s no chance of that, Farsale.”

Felt: “I ain’t Farsale.”

Yae, who had interjected, and the Divine Dragon, who had tried to deny her, both pondered Felt’s words.

All the while, Felt stared right at the helmet bastard, who like herself, had the right to decide things in this location, and then,

Felt: “What will you do? Whether this continues or not, is up to you.”

Helmet Bastard: “…I don’t wanna have to carry needless baggage.”

Felt: “…”

Helmet Bastard: “But, it’s also true that this is no time for me to be having a dispute with myself. It should be fine to go along with lil’ miss Felt’s hostage plan. However—”

In deep, quiet deliberation, the helmet bastard carefully weaved his words. At the end of those words, he paused the terminus of his words as if to put on airs—it happened then.

Rom: “RAHHHHHHH—!!”

As if to intrude on the tempo of the conversation, Rom-jii raised a battle cry and reached out his arms, seizing the helmet bastard from behind.

His brawny arms constricted the neck and waist of the helmet bastard, akin to how Yae had bound Felt, achieving a situation in which the leaders of both parties were mutually apprehended—

Helmet Bastard: "—Dona."

That instant, the helmet bastard's incantation manifested him a left arm of rock, striking Rom-jii's jaw with a heavy blow.

Borne of the stone prosthetic for his missing arm, the helmet bastard's unexpected blow violently jolted Rom-jii's brain, his large body producing an enormous sound as it collapsed onto the plain.

She was about to rush over to his side, but recalling the sensation on her neck, Felt refrained. Facing her, the helmet bastard took a deep breath after knocking out Rom-jii,

Helmet Bastard: "However, you'll need to look past just this one punch to your gramps."

With that, he appended the condition for ceasing hostilities after the fact, and thus accepted Felt's proposal.

5

—The unconscious Valga was shouldered by Grassis and Gaston, and was carried away.

As he watched this unbalance of physiques, Aldebaran diligently ascertained the withdrawal of the five hundred ruffians—no, of his formidable enemies, through to the very end.

Making sure that those formidable foes definitively passed beyond the horizon, and that nobody was attempting to pursue them covertly, "Aldebaran" also thoroughly verified.

"Aldebaran": "There aren't any risking it, everyone withdrew."

Aldebaran: “Is that true, I wonder? Can I really believe you? You won’t betray me, will you?”

“Aldebaran”: “It’s a cliched development in manga for someone to be betrayed by another version of themselves, but rest assured for now. Currently, my backing towards lil’ miss Felt and my backing towards me is balanced at a solid fifty-fifty.”

Aldebaran: “Sounds like I’m already treading in dangerous enough waters…”

Wondering to what extent that should be taken at its word, “Aldebaran’s” statement inspired a certain sense of dread.

It was something he had known from the start, but “Aldebaran” could only ever be “Aldebaran”; even if they shared Memories and a personality, it could never become Aldebaran himself.

It was an exceedingly reliable supporter for Aldebaran to fulfill his objective, but the truth was that it could never become more than just a supporter.

Yae: “—Al-sama~, I’ve finished inspecting Felt-sama’s belongings~.”

With that, Yae waved her hand as she returned to Aldebaran, the latter submerged in deep thought.

He had ordered her to conduct a thorough search of Felt’s person—to investigate the possibility that Valga Cromwell had put something in her possession.

But then again, judging from Yae’s demeanor, nothing seemed to have been found on Felt.

Aldebaran: “How’d it go?”

Yae: “Let’s see~, she had a Conversation Mirror, so I shattered it.”

Aldebaran: “So you had one on you?! Oi, lil’ miss Felt!”

Felt: “Shut the hell up, I told her voluntarily. It’s not like I was hiding it, so there shouldn't be a problem."

As Aldebaran raised his voice, Felt poked her head out from "Aldebaran's" shadow and talked back in dissatisfaction. There was no cover from trees in this sprawling plain, so Felt's pat-down was conducted behind the excessively large body of "Aldebaran".

In any case, upon hearing Felt's answer, he glared at Yae who then stuck out her tongue with a "Behhh",

Yae: "It was just Yae-chan's playful joke~."

Aldebaran: "You…"

Yae: "Please don't take it so seriously~, Al-sama. After all, it's not like you ever properly listen to what I have to say, now do you?"

Aldebaran: "—. My bad."

Yae: "I can't hear you, so you're not forgiven."

Aldebaran: "MY BAD!"

He apologized with a loud shout, to which Yae ostentatiously covered her ears.

Yae's attitude was childish and immature, but her taking on such an attitude was only natural. Aldebaran's ego was forcing an unreasonable restriction upon Yae that prevented her from displaying even half of her true capabilities.

Nevertheless, since he disciplined Yae through fear instead of granting her wishes, there was no room for any excuses regarding how much of a complete DV bastard he was.

Felt: "Geez, I get that you had to search me, but you don't normally strip someone completely naked out in the open."

Felt muttered her own complaints as she stepped out from "Aldebaran's" shadow. He glared at Yae upon hearing that remark, and with her hands still covering her ears, she was intent on evading any questioning about having conducted the harassment of needless stripping.

Aldebaran: “…Well, just take that as being a common affair for losers. Lil’ miss Felt, probably way more than you can imagine, I was really terrified by your gramps.”

Felt: “Heh, is that so now? Well, my Rom-jii’s just incredible… Though, I’ll absolutely never forgive him for trying to outmaneuver me.”

“Aldebaran”: “It seems like it was deep-rooted in him. In reality, things were quite close to a draw.”

Felt’s mood swung at her own expense as she praised Valga, to which “Aldebaran” gave a wry smile. Hearing “Aldebaran’s” words, she looked up at the face of the smiling Dragon,

Felt: “Reminds me, I’d wanted to ask, but you aren’t Volcanica, right?”

It was hard to say just how much of the circumstances she had grasped, but Felt’s suspicions regarding “Aldebaran” were only natural if she had known the Divine Dragon from before the Book of the Dead had installed memories within it. Ignoring that and kicking up a loud fuss would only increase the hardships along the way, but—

Felt: “The nii-chan from Emilia-neechan’s place, huh… helmet bastard, it’s similar to the way you speak.”

Aldebaran: “…Management decided that it wouldn’t sell like that, so the character is currently veering in a different direction. Also, quit calling me helmet bastard. It’s Aldebaran.”

Felt: “Aldebaran? Wasn’t it shorter?”

Aldebaran: “Since it felt too short for a belt and too long for a sleeve tie, management also decided that that one wouldn’t sell.”

With that perfunctory answer, Aldebaran put off giving Felt a detailed explanation.

In any case, if Felt was accompanying them from here on out, “Aldebaran” would end up telling her even if Aldebaran did not. About how the renowned Divine Dragon of history became a frivolous and unserious clown.

Aldebaran: “Anyway, for now, I gotta modify the plan. We’ve only got around five days left.”

With the battle against Felt’s faction cutting into his remaining time, there was no choice but to give his plan major revisions.

Be that as it may, the fact that they had reconvened with “Aldebaran” ahead of schedule, meant that it was possible for them to hold a constructive outlook of its usefulness in dramatically shortening the length of their journey.

Though, there was the concern that the Royal Army, which was originally supposed to assemble in the north, had not fallen for the diversion so well as the plan had intended, but—

Aldebaran: “By the way, we don’t have the option of tying lil’ miss Felt up and leaving her here, do we?”

“Aldebaran”: “If she hadn’t said “Look at me”, then you might’ve.”

Aldebaran: “I thought there’s no compelling force.”

“Aldebaran”: “There isn’t. I just feel like I wanna comply with whatever she requests.”

Met with a considerably deranged response, Aldebaran was completely at his wits’ end.

The Sword Saint, Reinhard; the Great Strategist, Valga Cromwell; and finally the Divine Dragon, Volcanica; for Felt to have made all of them her supporters, just how many stars of destiny shone above her?

Aldebaran: “Can you really stand losing to those stars, Aldebaran-san?”

Even if he could not deny the narrow victory, the stalemate, and the sensation of carrying an unexploded ordnance, it was true that Aldebaran had overcome the situations until now through a desperate struggle with death.

Without forgetting that truth, he would take it as a warning and a guiding light in order to proceed onto what followed from here.

Felt: “So? What are you guys planning on doing from here on out, and where?”

Aldebaran: “…”

Felt: “So you won’t even tell me that? If you refrain from feeding a fish that you caught too much, you might end up the one with a bad taste in your mouth, Aldebaran.”

Calling out Aldebaran’s name, Felt flashed her high canine in a smile.

Around her neck was steel wire tied by Yae, and she was in a hostage situation as she herself had proposed. Nevertheless, the glint in the girl’s eye showed no signs of her fighting spirit loosening, so after stifling his hesitation, Aldebaran spoke.

The answer to Felt’s question, that was to say, Aldebaran’s destination—

Aldebaran: “—We’re headed for the Grand Mogolade Geyser, right in the heart of Kararagi. There lies the one and only hole in this world that connects to a place nobody can reach. I’ve got something that I need to throw away there.”

Felt: “…For that purpose alone, you’re kicking up this much of a storm?”

Aldebaran: “Yeah, that’s right. It’s necessary. —So that I may be myself.”

Felt likely could not imagine the significance of that deed, and Aldebaran made it clear through the strength of his words that he had no intention of helping her imagination draw any closer.

Taking that in, Felt narrowed her red eyes, and gave up on what she was about to say. —Though, he knew that what she was about to say would have been regarding she who was no longer among them.

???: "—Hk! W-woh?! Wh-what the hell?! What happened?! Oi! Aldebaran! Maid! How the hell did this… shit! My back fucking hurts!"

That enigmatic atmosphere between Aldebaran and Felt was noisily and clumsily destroyed by Heinkel as he finally woke up, invoking a sense that the battle was now well and truly over.

Even so, there was no mistaking the awful sense of involuntary gratitude he thus felt towards Heinkel himself.

Chapter 23:
The Gang's All Here

1

—By the time Rom-jii had woken up, several hours had already passed since the retreat from the siege in the forest.

???: "In the end, they only took Felt with 'em and left the rest of us alone… This is what happens when we pick a fight. It's lame as hell."

So added Rachins, who had just finished reporting the damages to their camp to the recently awoken Rom-jii.

Rachins was unable to hide his feelings of embarrassment, and it was easy to imagine the sense of defeat stirring in his chest. Of course, the same sense of defeat was also present within Rom-jii's wide chest.

However, Rom-jii had experienced far more lost battles throughout his life than Rachins.

Rom: "The number of losses I've got under my belt is pathetic, nothin' ta be proud of."

If Rom-jii were to count the victories in his life on his fingers, would he even require both hands?

Even if he could achieve smaller victories, he always came out losing by the end of the war; that was the win-loss record of the old giant who had wasted his years. He could not decide whether or not to be proud of the fact that he always managed to escape from each losing battle with his life.

It could be said that surviving and enduring the shame that followed led Rom-jii to happen across something irreplaceable in his life. —However, he had now been deprived of that irreplaceable thing.

Rom: “What’s Felt’s situation? The best way ta find out is…”

Rachins: “About that, unfortunately they dealt with Manfred’s Divine Protection of Farsight. It ain’t just the helmet bastard, the maid that was with him seemed pretty sharp too. I guess he’s lucky he got away with only his eye gouged out.”

Rom: “As I thought, they didn’t leave that be. I suppose that was an unreasonable expectation.”

The aforementioned Divine Protection of Farsight was a highly practical Divine Protection in terms of possible tactics and strategies that allowed the user to locate and monitor a target’s location from afar.

It had been used by Manfred Madison, who served as the head of the Balance in the union of the Flanders criminal underworld that cooperated with Felt’s group—however, the Divine Protection of Farsight itself was not borne upon him, but rather, he had gained it as a result of stealing it from someone it had been gifted to.

The Black Silver Coin and the Flower Prison Garden were also organizations deeply rooted in Flanders, but the Balance was different; it was a notorious group with a long and shady history that existed outside of the city.

Most notably, the Balance possessed a technique to steal Divine Protections—Rom-jii speculated that they likely kept the original holder of the Divine Protection alive, having a proxy use the body part that served as the source of their Divine Protection.

In short, if a Divine Protection holder possessing the Divine Protection of Farsight, which affected the eyes, had their eyes removed and transplanted, the effects of that Divine Protection could be freely inherited. —Of course, one could not just remove their eyeballs and replace them to use a Divine Protection at will. Therein lay the secret technique possessed only by the Balance, a sacrament never to be revealed to outsiders.

Regardless of the technique, if the eyeballs that served as the source of the Divine Protection of Farsight were destroyed, then relying on Manfred to continue tracking Felt's movements was no longer an option.

Rom: "Still, with Manfred missin' an eye 'n the rest of us in such terrible condition… it's a miracle we're all still alive, ain't it."

Rachins: "A miracle, huh. I just can't accept it like that."

Rachins loudly clicked his tongue in a dissatisfied manner at the muttering of Rom-jii, who was rubbing his chin.

They had taken on this challenge with the determination to risk their lives, and they survived. As one would expect, Rachins would not say anything about regretting not being able to die as an imperial citizen would, but since he had lost to an opponent who had self-imposed unnecessary restrictions on himself, Rom could understand the feeling of being shown he was clearly outmatched in power.

But, if he was able to feel that frustration after giving it his all, then Rachins still had a future ahead of him. It was surely the same for Gaston and Camberley.

???: "—Rom-sama, are you awake?"

Rom: "Hm, that you, Grassis?"

And, just as the conversation came to a halt, Grassis suddenly appeared.

At the end of the battle, she had last been seen tied up by the thread user called Yae, but she seemed to be in much better condition than Rachins from the looks of it.

Despite their young appearances, she and her sister Flam were trained by the Astrea family from birth, ranking them in the upper echelon of the many combatants that Rom-jii had ever met. Her excellent control of the Flow Method greatly contributed to the recovery of her wounds and physical strength, so she already seemed to have fully recuperated.

Rom: "Don't go usin' that as an excuse ta be reckless, though…

How’s yer Divine Protection lookin’?”

Grassis: “It’s almost ready to be used again… If Flam is not dead.”

Rachins: “Don’t jinx it like that…! But, I can’t say for sure if she’s alive… Even if the helmet bastard didn’t lay a hand on her, Reinhard and the Witch are still at the dunes…”

Grassis: “Rachins-sama, cheer up, alright?”

Rachins: “Why am I the one being comforted?! You’re the one who should be upset!”

Grassis gave Rachins a light pat on his hunched back, only for Rachins to snap at her, sticking out his long tongue in frustration.

At his outburst, Grassis let out a casual “Wah” without looking the least bit startled. Instead, she swiftly slipped behind Rom-jii, peeking out from behind him with a dramatic sulky glare at the childish young man.

It was their usual playful banter. But Rom-jii simply placed a large hand, bigger than the girl’s head, on her and gently ruffled her hair,

Rom: “We’re all feelin’ the same concern for those at the tower. Once yer Divine Protection is ready, let us know immediately.”

Grassis: “…Roger that, chief.”

Rachins: “Who even talks like that?!”

Grassis gave a brief nod, accepting Rom-jii’s hand, while Rachins overreacted as usual.

It was precisely because Rachins responded so easily to their antics that the mischievous sisters always had a field day teasing him. But, perhaps acting like nothing was wrong was what Grassis needed right now.

And for Rachins, it kept him from spiraling into an endless cycle of defeat-induced frustration.

Rom: “The young ones should burn with a defiant spirit. Reflecting on this is my job.”

Despite gathering an army of five hundred men and carefully choosing the most advantageous battlefield possible, Rom-jii and the others had lost their fight against the helmet bastard and Felt had been taken hostage.

This was a devastating defeat, no doubt the worst since the Demi-Human War.

However, if there was one thing that set this loss apart from Rom-jii’s past failures, it was the fact that this time, it was neither entirely fruitless nor completely unforeseen.

—Though it was a method they had hoped to avoid, the possibility of the helmet bastard summoning the Divine Dragon in a moment of desperation had been a constant concern. Given that, Felt’s existence had always been considered a potential shackle to prevent such an outcome.

And they had known beforehand that the Divine Dragon Volcanica was the helmet bastard’s main force.

Thus, even if Felt’s group had been unable to defeat the helmet bastard in this battle, they had at least set a minimum goal of shackling his strongest asset. Of course, the ideal outcome would have been victory, but they had still met their lowest expectations, and on top of that, they now had a clearer understanding of the nature of his Authority.

If victory was the best possible result, then this was the second-best—no, with Felt taken hostage, it was more like the third-best outcome.

Rom: “That said, now that he’s experienced it firsthand, the same method won’t work ta break his Authority again. Felt’s in his hands now… We’ll need ta get creative with our approach.”

Naturally, Rom-jii had no intention of giving up here.

The helmet bastard had chosen not to take their lives for his own reasons. Because of that, most of their fighting force remained intact, giving them the room to come up with a plan and strike once more.

No one would dare call making full use of this opportunity cowardly or dishonorable.

Rom: “For whatever reason, that helmet bastard seemed unwilling ta waste even a moment standin’ still. At this rate, even if he takes short breaks, he won’t have the chance ta properly rest anywhere. Mental exhaustion will only expose the weaknesses in his Authority. If Felt is shacklin’ the Divine Dragon, then our openin’ is even bigger. Surprisingly, it seems like the helmet bastard ‘n his allies aren’t as united as they—”

Muttering to himself, Rom-jii carefully processed the information he had gathered from the battle with his larger-than-most head.

If one were to accuse him of being calculating right after their loss, he had no excuse, but in Rom-jii’s mind, their defeat was already over. His thoughts had shifted toward the next battle, and strategies were already taking shape.

There might be some who would curse that as cold-hearted. Felt, who was practically his granddaughter, had been abducted, and he could not even be sure of her safety. Despite that, rather than turning his thoughts to concern and anxiety, he instead focused on the next battle.

But—

Rachins: “—Shit. This is just making me feel even more pathetic.”

Looking at the profile of the cold-hearted old giant thinking, Rachins felt no hatred, only frustration that refused to fade.

Grassis: “Rachins-sama, do your best.”

Rachins: “Shut the hell up! Why are you acting like this doesn’t concern you?!”

Aldebaran: “—Expand Territory, matrix redefinition.”

A whisper spilling out from within his mouth, Aldebaran defined a new restart point.

Finally escaping a predicament that had taken twenty-nine thousand two-hundred and twenty-one attempts of trial and error to surmount, thinking that he had passed a checkpoint, he took a small breather.

Long and deep, exhaling until all the air left his lungs, Aldebaran adjusted the position of his helmet,

Aldebaran: “…Sorry, I’ve calmed down now.”

Yae: “No not at all~, please don’t worry in the slightest. Rather, are you really fine with that sort of a rest? If you’d like, Yae-chan’s thighs are available for loan?”

Aldebaran: “Nah, I’m fine without borrowing ‘em.”

Yae: “They’re super soft~ and spongy~, y’know?”

Aldebaran: “I’m fine.”

With a wave of his hand, Aldebaran bluntly refused Yae’s alluring consideration.

On the receiving end, Yae pouted her lips with a “Tsk~”, but she likely did not care as much as her reaction implied. Those invitations of hers were a habit, and Aldebaran also always refused her.

Even so, Yae’s presence, never leaving his side, was a huge help. In the sense that she shouldered the burden.

Aldebaran: “More or less, my headache’s subsided…”

Spilling those words, Aldebaran was relieved by the reduction of the headache induced by his mental state.

Including the fact that he had nearly been defeated, his battle against the Felt Armed Forces had exhausted him far too much mentally. The result of dismissing that whittled down state, was a near defeat that had just barely secured victory.

Aldebaran: “Naturally, I can’t do a mental reset in the middle of a fight…”

In this case, mental reset referred to how Aldebaran would use his Authority to spend as much time as possible in an absent-minded daze, then gulp down poison and restart his matrix. Doing that over and over was the drastic move that aimed to restore his dead-end of a mental state, heightened nerves and frayed mind.

As long as he had an environment to settle down in and the means to restart, it was a technique that allowed him to bring his heart to as much tranquility as he liked, but even if he settled his heart, there was a shortcoming in that the fatigue of his body and brain would not simply fade.

In reality, due to the extreme accumulation of lack of sleep and fatigue, Aldebaran was left with serious damage.

Aldebaran: “This is a joke, but if I borrowed Yae’s thighs, I’d fall in an instant.”

Yae: “Does that mean you’d fall deeply in love with Yae-chan?”

Aldebaran: “Nah, I mean I’d fall unconscious. When you talk flippantly like that to me, it helps to distract me.”

Slowly shaking his head, Aldebaran forced back the weight of his body as it leaned forward.

Currently, Aldebaran and his party were travelling west from the plain of the fierce battle, avoiding attention, and once he completed a thorough safety check, Aldebaran spent his time resting.

But then again, even if he was spending his own time, it was not a considerable amount of real time.

Aldebaran: “By the way, I’d like to consult you on this, but if I’m about to collapse, would doping on Dragon’s Blood be a possible option? Or no?”

And, fiddling with the metal fixtures on his helmet, Aldebaran raised an idea to “Aldebaran”.

Along with Yae, “Aldebaran” had been part of the personnel guarding the surroundings, and hearing Aldebaran’s question, it prefaced “Here’s the thing” as it skilfully scratched its snout with its front leg,

“Aldebaran”: “Ah, it’s difficult to draw a reliable comparison between this Dragon body and the exceedingly feeble original body of me, but if you take undiluted Dragon’s Blood I think you’d probably just go bang.”

Aldebaran: “Bang… a different outcome from the Duchess in Pristella, huh?”

“Aldebaran”: “I became aware when I got this body, but setting aside Natsuki Subaru, whose insides are a chaotic mess of curses, it’s a miracle that the Duchess could endure it in her condition. I suppose there’s the fact that she’s close to the Royal Family.”

Aldebaran: “…Even if you say to dilute it, I doubt it’d be fine to simply water it down. By the way, I kinda have it in my head that shinobi aren’t just well versed in poisons, but medicine too, so what about Dragon’s Blood?”

Yae: “It’s a rare opportunity so I’m intrigued, but Yae-chan’s heart would never last if Al-sama became an even more frightening monster, so I’m agai~nst it.”

While an issue regarding feelings was pushed into the forefront, in truth, as long as one was not an expert, there was little hope that a deed such as the dilution of Dragon’s Blood could be carried out.

They could not mass produce a final elixir so easily. The world was not so simple.

“Aldebaran”: “I’ll at least apply some healing magic on you. There, passerby heal.”

Aldebaran: “We’re in the same party, so it’s not a passerby heal, but a dutiful heal.”

At Aldebaran’s riposte, the Divine Dragon unleashed an overabundance of healing magic through its power.

Unfortunately, he bore few external wounds, and it naturally did not grow Aldebaran a new left arm, but he did gain the consolation that he would be healed even if he bore any serious injuries.

Well, if he bore a serious injury he would gulp down poison instead of waiting for healing, so it was quite literally just consolation.

Yae: “By the way, Vol-sama, may I ask something~?”

“Aldebaran”: “…Ah! Vol-sama refers to me? Took me a second since it didn’t click at all. What’s up?”

Yae: “Your feelings towards Felt-sama, have they calmed down a bit?”

Clad in a nonchalant air, Yae’s question was obvious in its intent through the slightly tensed atmosphere, so Aldebaran narrowed his eyes within his helmet.

And, having perceived the same thing, “Aldebaran” did the same.

“Aldebaran”: “If by calmed down you mean decreased, then it’s actually the opposite. It’s scary how much love is overflowing. The distance that keeps us apart only fosters stronger feelings.”

Aldebaran: “You’re not so far away to say there’s a distance keeping you apart, and I just can’t get behind that affection.”

“Aldebaran” was poking fun at Aldebaran with a choice of words styled after the latter, but since the emotions from when those words were initially uttered were shared between the two of them, a considerable portion of that was likely how it truly felt.

The intention of that also seemed to have been communicated to Yae, so she nodded with a “Is that so~”, and, Yae: “She really is a hindrance~, that Felt-sama. Can we not get rid of her successfully?”

“Aldebaran”: “Yae, I’ll say this now, but…”

Yae: “Ah~, you’re jumping to conclusions. I knew Vol-sama would have that sorta reaction, so I wanted to discuss a non-dangerous method~. —At worst, if Felt-sama happened to try to run away, me, Al-sama, and Vol-sama would all then be happy. Wouldn’t that make you happy, Vol-sama?”

Aldebaran: “Even I wouldn’t be particularly happy.”

Yae: “Even though a source of distress would vanish?”

Aldebaran: “—. You’ve also been a bit of a source of distress for me.”

Yae: “Oh dear, I’ve stirred the hornet’s nest.”

Facepalming her own forehead, Yae responded in a manner of jest.

The happy method she had hoped for was the condition brought up by Felt when she became their hostage—that it was fine to kill her if she tried to escape; it had become a habit for Yae to touch upon that. Felt and “Aldebaran” had made a promise that if that time came, there would be no hard feelings even if she died.

However, even if that was a logical promise between Felt and “Aldebaran”—no, the Divine Dragon, it was not an end that Aldebaran desired.

Things had ended up with this relationship and way of doing things, but Aldebaran wished to return Felt to the Royal Selection safe and sound, so that she could vie for the throne in high spirits until the very end.

Of course, judging by “Aldebaran’s” reactions, the suspicions regarding Felt, initially brought up at the Royal Castle Lugunica, were all but confirmed.

Aldebaran: “After all, this dragon’s way too madly in love from the bottom of its heart for it to just be brushed off as an accidental resemblance. In reality, how much of the original personality seems like it'll come to the surface?"

"Aldebaran": "The fact that this is a container, a dragonhusk, won't waver. You don't need to worry about the original personality popping out all of a sudden to say hi. The little amount of residual feelings just strongly assert themselves, and it's sorta an image of the strength of that assertion undulating."

Aldebaran: "…By the way, those residual feelings, how much do you remember?"

"Aldebaran": "I like Farsale. I dislike Reid. Everything else is fuzzy."

Aldebaran: "The first generation Sword Saint, huh? Don't bring up a legend so casually, it scares me."

The first generation Sword Saint was a being whose name he had heard often from the Witch, but the tales told by those who knew him directly would paint him in the worst light of reputation. Recently a new testimony from the Divine Dragon's residual feelings had been added, so it was likely true that he had been a good-for-nothing.

Aldebaran would be lying if he said that the rest being fuzzy did not bother him, but—

Aldebaran: "Oh, that reminds me, Yae and the Dragon me are both here with me now, but what about lil' miss Felt and the old man?"

Yae: "The two of them are on stand-by over there. Heinkel-sama is taking responsibility, keeping a keen eye on Felt-sama."

Aldebaran: "Pairing those two together, that's the worst thing you could've done!"

Yae: "—. Ah~, I messed u~p, Yae-chan was careless."

Aldebaran: "…"

Yae seemed to have done so on purpose, and hearing her response, Aldebaran took a deep breath, and stood up.

Due to the working conditions he was giving Yae, he had to be willing to accept this prickling harassment.

“Aldebaran”: “Oh, are you headed over to Farsale… I mean, lil’ miss Felt? I’ll come too…”

Aldebaran: “So long as you can’t remedy that verbal slip-up, it’s important that you don’t meet her, serves better for your favorability. Also, I wanna avoid tipping the scales any more in her favor.”

Explaining so, he had “Aldebaran” sit back down as it attempted to follow along, and left Yae to discipline it to sit and wait; ignoring her as she poked fun with an “It’s a group effort~”, Aldebaran began to walk towards where Felt and Heinkel were located.

Then, in a position where they could not hear the strategy meeting that took place in the tree’s shadow, Felt and Heinkel were waiting on the other side around the large tree—

Felt: “—Pops, I’ll say this now, but you don’t gotta make excuses to me.”

As soon as Aldebaran peered in, a rather harsh statement struck his eardrums.

At a glance, Felt was sitting with her back leaned against the large tree, and stood opposite whilst looking down on her, was Heinkel.

From a filmmaking perspective, Heinkel, looking down on the other party from a higher point, had a psychological advantage compared to Felt in this scene, however.

Heinkel: “—Hk, e-excuses, you say? Why in the world would I need to do anything of the sort? Don’t say such foolish things, you brat!”

Felt: “In that case, stop looking at me all nervously. Your gaze is noisy.”

Heinkel: “Who’s…!”

Indignation erupting from his throat, Heinkel stumbled over his next words, and so it seemed that the conclusion offered from a cinematic perspective would not be of any use.

The two differed in both height and age, but even without quantifying anything, it was clear which of these two actors was on top, so as Aldebaran happened to be present at the unpleasant scene, he pitied Heinkel.

He would have preferred to conceal his breath and get out of there quickly, but,

Felt: “Hm?”

Heinkel: “Aldebaran…”

And, the two of them noticed him at around the same time, so Aldebaran had no choice but to walk up to them.

Then, choosing his words with an “Ah”,

Aldebaran: “Old man, quit getting involved with lil’ miss Felt. You’re at a disadvantage no matter what you say.”

Heinkel: “Wha… so even you’re saying that this brat’s gonna talk me down?”

Aldebaran: “It’s not a matter of who’d win or lose in a verbal argument, I’m saying the premise is botched to begin with. Old man, you’ve allied yourself with me, so from lil’ miss Felt’s perspective you’re an indisputable turncloak… or rather, fundamentally from anybody’s perspective, you’re a great enemy of the Kingdom of Lugunica, you know?”

Heinkel: “—Hk, I… know. Even so, I’m…”

A bitter look strewn about his face, Heinkel cast his eyes down, muttering those words as he opened and closed his hands.

Wearing a tired expression and placed in a tiresome position, nonetheless Heinkel was well aware of what sort of spider’s web he had reached his hand into.

That this was a deed that would tarnish the honor of the House of the Sword Saint, renowned in the Kingdom, that it would create an irrevocable disgrace, he knew.

Still, even if it meant bearing notoriety that persisted unfading for the next several hundred years—

Felt: “You want the Dragon’s Blood. Pops, in order to wake your wife… Reinhard’s mother, you need that no matter what, right?”

Heinkel: “Brat, how do you…”

Felt: “Just where do you think your son kept me detained at first? I’m well aware of that idiot’s family situation. I also heard about it from Granny Carol and the others.”

Heinkel: “Then! You should understand! It’s necessary, I need the Dragon’s Blood! And, Aldebaran promised it to me! That’s why, I’m going along with this guy’s plan—”

Felt: “Like I said, don’t make excuses to me.”

His desperate pleas met with such a response, Heinkel’s words choked on a “Guh”.

Felt’s answer had left him utterly hopeless, tearing Heinkel’s meager conscience to shreds in a manner much more stinging than would have been accomplished via unskillfully harping on him.

Only, it did not seem like Felt had aimed to choose the method that would wound Heinkel the most. To evidence that, scratching her own head,

Felt: “Even I think it would be nice for Reinhard’s mom to wake up. I also get how you feel like you don’t got a choice in the means to accomplish that end. Hence, I won’t deny you, Pops.”

Heinkel: “…”

Felt: “It’s just a matter of your methods differing from ours. It’s neither good nor bad.”

As Felt spoke with a single eye closed, it was clear from a single glance that her words had beaten Heinkel down. The definite discrepancy in their calibers was revealed, and what was meant to be a follow up became a kick to a dead body.

If they were to converse any further, Heinkel's wounds would only expand. Feeling sorry that Yae's pestering seemed to have paid off, Aldebaran patted him on the shoulder saying "Old man, that's enough", and dismissed Heinkel from keeping watch over Felt.

Then, when Heinkel, his shoulder drooping, left the two of them,

Aldebaran: "You're merciless, lil' miss Felt. Though you don't look the part, are you perhaps angry?"

Felt: "Ain't that obvious, asshat? Even now, I'm exerting all my self-restraint on my desire to kick your guys' asses. It's 'cause I got this shit on my neck."

Saying that, Felt touched the fine steel thread wrapped around her neck—that which had also been brought up in the conversation with Yae and "Aldebaran", and curved her lips into a smile to flash her high canine.

Her impudence was to the MAX, but for the most part, she was aware that her life was in their clutches.

Of course, since they had not taken the life of even a single of her comrades, it was possible that she was making light of the level of effective threat that the steel thread posed, but—

Aldebaran: "—I'm not gonna fall in the same ditch twice."

Felt: "…"

It was not so much an announcement as it was an oath Aldebaran pledged to himself.

The girl before his eyes had been raised to be strong in the slums; she was not just a Royal Candidate suspected of being missing royalty, but a potential monster who had grown up being trained by Valga Cromwell.

There was a sufficient likelihood that she had already eclosed as a monster, becoming a being more dangerous than Aldebaran could imagine.

However, even were that to be the case, Aldebaran would no longer suffer defeat.

Aldebaran: “Even if this is my final part to play, there’s still meaning in my growth.”

The ability to handle “Aldebaran”, who was supposed to have been their primary strength, had gotten worse; Yae’s insolent and mischievous attitude was intolerable; Heinkel would get discouraged on his own regardless of Aldebaran’s intentions; he could not keep going without bringing along the uncooperative excess weight that was Felt; such was Aldebaran’s journey. —To put it bluntly, things had ended up quite different from his initial travel plan.

But, in exchange for his exhaustion mental and physical alike, the unforeseen battle and tangible loss had stripped Aldebaran of his conceit, delivering unto him a lesson firm.

Aldebaran: “From here on out, I’ll draw out my Territory until it reaches its utmost limit.”

By using short-term updates of a matrix to instantly respond to a pressing situation, he thought he could reduce the retroactive time rather than the number of attempts, and that in doing so he would see long-term benefits.

But, in a case like the most recent one in which he was up against many enemies, that extreme level of matrix updating would cause the probability of being checkmated to skyrocket. If he continued to use it as he always had, then even against someone who did not possess Valga’s ingenuity, it was completely possible for his path to be closed off by way of simple misfortune.

Aldebaran: “If I let the intervals get too long, it’ll be a chicken race between my brain overheating and my mind getting worn down… but even if my soul is completely destroyed, it’s far superior to failing.”

From the outset, Aldebaran had no prospects for beyond the completion of this plan.

The Kararagi City-States: after arriving at the Grand Mogolade Geyser in that land, and accomplishing his objective there, he would clean up the mess he had made in his endeavors, and then end it all.

He desired nothing more. In exchange, he would ensure that everything up to that point would be carried out to fruition.

Felt: “…”

As Aldebaran hardened his resolve anew, Felt silently watched him with narrowed eyes.

Aldebaran had deliberately ignored her gaze, but faced with the fact that Felt, who resembled her in no regard whatsoever, not personality nor facial features, nor physique nor anything else, did indeed share the same eye color with Priscilla and nothing more, he experienced an awfully awful sense of discomfort.

Aldebaran: “If possible, could you not look at me with those eyes?”

Felt: “Don’t be unreasonable. Sorry, but I’ve had these two eyeballs since I was born. I also don’t like ‘em since they stand out… nah, I used to not like them.”

Aldebaran: “…”

Felt: “Now, I surprisingly think they ain’t half bad. Why, I ain’t gonna close my eyes.”

Leaning against the great tree, Felt folded her arms and sat cross legged on the ground, and taken by her gaze and the strength of her will, he could understand the feelings of the many who revered her for her radiance.

Right now, that radiance was the same to Aldebaran as the poison tucked behind his molar. Only, that radiance would not take Aldebaran's life, it only served to torment him.

Felt: "So? I'm pretty damn hungry, got any food?"

Aldebaran: "You're being way too audacious… Sorry, but we don't have time for a meal break right now. Travelling takes priority."

Felt: "That's some poor treatment for your hostage. —We headed to that something-something hole in Kararagi you mentioned?"

Aldebaran: "The Grand Mogolade Geyser. No doubt, that's our final destination. Only, gotta make a bit of a detour."

At Aldebaran's comment, Felt knit her well-shaped eyebrows with a "Detour?".

In response, as Aldebaran drew in his chin with a "Yeah, a detour", he turned around to the scenery in the distance amidst which it could not yet be perceived, and imagining that place, he spoke.

That was—

Aldebaran: "—Now is when they oughta be spread the most thin. I'm going to pick up a necessity for the plan."

3

Fortunately, the detour on the way to their destination went smoothly.

Unfortunately, the security was too dense to say they were spread thin, but due to what was sealed on the other side, their protocols for crisis management being this thorough was almost reassuring.

But then again—

Aldebaran: "High security ain't enough to stop me."

If they were to truly stop Aldebaran, as Felt's group had previously done, then surrounding and crushing him with several hundreds of people would have been the best course of action. For such a feat to be accomplished, at least a single Order of Knights would need to be deployed, even if it was the Royal Capital, a strategic point of utmost importance.

Thus, to ensure that could not be done, Aldebaran had taken measures in advance.

Aldebaran: “I ended up needing to call it back right away, so it was fifty-fifty on whether I could place hope in the diversion being effective, but…”

Aldebaran, driven to madness, assisted by the Divine Dragon, Volcanica.

It was not difficult to imagine the depths of the panic felt by those in the know, once the information got out that Reinhard the Sword Saint, who had gone off to stop them, had instead become occupied facing the Witch of Envy, freeing Aldebaran and Volcanica to escape the Sand Dunes.

They would have thought it the greatest threat to the nation since the Witch of Envy’s rampage four-hundred years prior.

For that very reason, the Kingdom had had no choice but to put on a display of all its strength to oppose “Aldebaran”, which was flying at heights so as to easily attract attention.

Even if that meant leaving minimal armed forces in the Royal Capital.

Thus—

Aldebaran: “—Found it.”

—Four-hundred and seven times.

Via that trial and error, in the location he had sought to reach, Aldebaran had located what he was searching for. From the entrance door to the multilayered mechanisms in the room, it was sealed rigorously as to not permit the slightest bit of interference.

In reality, without any assistance, Aldebaran would have been unable to do anything regarding the mechanism before his eyes, regardless of having managed to reach this place, and thus would have ended up retreating in dejection.

However, the current Aldebaran had—

Aldebaran: "—The Divine Dragon's fang, I wonder how many holy gold coins it'd be worth."

An article so rare that the ensemble of merchants he knew would all have dollar signs in their eyes, estimating its value with an abacus inside their heads; using it as a catalyst, Aldebaran destroyed the sturdy mechanism through sheer force.

Like nothing he had ever heard before, an aberrant sound of destruction akin to an iron bar being torn off a wall through brute force arose; the invisible wall that had certainly been present vanished, and Aldebaran stepped forth into the space.

That space, not wide in the slightest, was even more cramped than the restroom in the Barielle Mansion.

With naught a window nor an opening barring the entrance door, the room was suffocating, akin to a solitary confinement cell—no, not akin, the place was most accurately described as a solitary confinement cell.

After all, sealed within was unmistakably a sinner, a criminal, an evil unpardonable.

Aldebaran: "By now, I've done enough to earn myself the death penalty a hundred times over, but…"

Yet, room there indeed remained to accrete sin upon sin.

As if to prove such, Aldebaran reached his hand out towards the blackness before his eyes. That was also the work of extraordinary principles, but this time the Divine Dragon's aid was needed not.

Albeit different in essence, what laid there was similar to the coalescence of the Witch's teachings, which Aldebaran had mastered at the end of rigorous training which had made it seem as if he would drown in his own bloody vomit—

Aldebaran: “…”

Passing his intent through the fingertips held aloft, the subsequent moment, cracks ran through the whole of it, shattering.

Into pieces akin to fragments of porcelain it fissured, however, no sound of its scattered shards rippled with the ground as the source. Instead, its composition unravelled, melting into the atmosphere.

Witnessing that run its course with his own eyes, before Aldebaran, in place of the vanished black mass, was a single human silhouette on the ground, down on all fours.

Aldebaran: “Obey, and follow me. —If you do that, I won’t kill you here.”

???: “Hah—”

As Aldebaran quietly pronounced so, the silhouette made sure to let out a breath as it smiled. —Nay, it sniggered.

Sniggering, sniggering, sniggering, licking the lips of the mouth from which sharp fangs protruded—

???: “—How nice, so nice, quite nice, perhaps it is nice, surely it is nice, so quite nice, certainly it is nice, because it is certainly nice, because our chest trembles at how nice it is-! Gluttonous drinking-! Gluttony-!”

Indeed, within the solitary cell colored in darkness, the existence liberated from its jet-black coffin—the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, Roy Alphard, amidst feelings of freedom and hunger, jubilated.

vic.ll20

4

—It was as if the world had come to an end, where heaven and earth were no longer separated, where there was no longer any distinction between Bright Time and Dark Time, where the lines between life and death blurred, and where the differences between the self and the “other” became unnecessary.

???: “Young Master! Young Master!”

And, desperately raising her voice like so was Flam, who one would never have imagined capable of such an emotional outburst, whose gaze was fixed on the other side of the sandstorm—beyond the Pleiades Watchtower, where a great wave of black shadows was surging from the distance towards the red-haired hero, the Sword Saint Reinhard van Astrea, who was struggling to fight it off all alone, to stop it, resist it, and to repel it.

Flam: “Young Master—!”

While she had more faith in his strength than anyone else, the girl who also knew him well outside of his heroic appearance cried out, her voice betraying her, in an attempt to deny the absurd reality that had suddenly befallen him.

Flam’s voice, as if screaming, surely reached Reinhard, who was challenging that dark demise. There was no way he could have failed to hear it. That was because Reinhard van Astrea himself had decided that he had to be that kind of existence.

Despite that, Flam’s anguished voice went unanswered, as the strongest of the Sword Saints to ever have existed was being exposed to such a fierce threat that even a momentary lapse in concentration could be fatal.

???: “…”

Countless black arms surged forward like literal waves, spreading out to fill everything in sight, continuously trying to crush their target with unstoppable destruction.

Reinhard wielded the Dragon Sword with both of his nearly torn-off arms, and swung the legendary sword that could not be unsheathed in place of his arms, breaking through the cage of black shadows that seemingly was inescapable in all directions, smashing it to pieces.

He repeated this over and over again, ten or twenty times a second, until the sweat that had formed and the blood that had flowed left his body as steam. Reinhard was completely absorbed in his task.

—That, was the decisive contest between these two legendary beings, the Sword Saint and the Witch of Envy.

???: “Ge~ez! This is unbe~lievable!”

Seizing the reins as she jumped into the driver’s seat, Meili, with her disheveled braids and clenched teeth, desperately tried to perform an unfamiliar role.

Patrasche, who was at the other end of the reins, was intelligent, with Meili’s handling of the reins being nothing more than for show. Nevertheless, Meili continued to stay there to show her determination.

With Garfiel and Ezzo unconscious, Flam, whose attention could not be peeled off from Reinhard’s figure, and Petra, who had not yet returned from reading the Book of the Dead, the only one who was able to act normally here was Meili.

Reinhard’s battle was a given, but it was no exaggeration to say that the lives of the entire party depended on Meili’s slender arms.

Meili: “That’s a bit of an exaggeration. Or rather, that’s a bit too mu~ch…”

Many times in the past, Meili had been involved in a situation where someone’s life was at stake.

However, in many of those instances, Meili was on the side that took lives, and she had been in a position where she held the power to decide whether to give or take a life in the majority of them.

The only time she had ever used her abilities to protect someone's life rather than take it was during the Trial the previous time she had been at the Watchtower, and apart from that, Meili's capabilities were probably only slightly more powerful than those of an ordinary person.

With such little experience, the Witch of Envy would not have been a good opponent to clash with.

Meili: "Please, Patrasche-chan… unlike with the Witchbeast-chans, I can't understand what you're saying, bu~t… everyone's in dan~ger…!"

Patrasche: "—DODOGYUUUN."

Meili's appeal was conveyed through the reins, and Patrasche bravely replied.

The jet-black ground dragon strode furiously, not heeding the adverse conditions of the sandy footing, pulling the dragon carriage with everyone on board, running, running running running, running toward the end—.

Meili: "If this keeps up—"

It was then that she thought they could make it through the Sand Sea in one sweep.

Meili: "—Ah."

For an instant, the earth seemed to bend and stretch as an incredible impact caused Patrasche's feet to flounder off the ground, and the dragon carriage rose into the air along with all its passengers.

Meili: "…"

This was bad, and the word that came to Meili's mind was "pinch".

They were in a pinch, a real pinch. When Subaru was in a dangerous situation, he often used the word "pinch". It was easy to say, and once one got used to saying it, this word would keep popping into their head. But even if one were to keep chanting "pinch, pinch", the solution would still not come to them.

The only sure thing was that once Patrasche slid into the sand, they would lose the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion that would allow them to leave the sand dunes safely.

Once that was gone, escaping alive from this place, where the boundaries between heaven and earth would become unrecognizable, would become utterly impossible for Meili and the others.

—What should I do now? Everyone, please, Onii-san, help me.

Meili: "Everyone needs he~lp…!"

Yes, it was when that completely useless and tearful voice was put together, as her vision was almost upside down.

???: "—Leave everything to me, Meili."

Right after she heard that cute and reassuring voice, Meili saw someone leap from the overturned coach, using the driver's seat as a foothold, and proceeded to jump onto Patrasche, who was losing her balance in mid-air.

It was a girl with a large bow and light brown hair that caught the eye—

Meili: "Petra-cha~n!"

As Meili cried out, Petra, who had leapt out of the carriage, clung to Patrasche's neck in mid-air before forcefully sitting on the ground dragon's saddle, clinging on tightly as if she were biting her.

She hugged with all her might, using her entire petite body, and made her appeal.

Petra: "Patrasche! Calm down, and listen to my voice!"

Patrasche: "—DODOGYUUUN."

Petra: “Yes, good girl… Now!”

Responding to Petra’s voice, Patrasche swung her long tail vigorously, forcibly controlling her position in the air; with significant momentum, she landed on the sand with her toes thrusting forward into the ground, gracefully controlling the momentum of the dragon carriage, allowing it to land on the ground without interrupting the safety of the Divine Protection.

She had managed to overcome that critical moment beautifully.

It had all been thanks to Patrasche’s incredible responsiveness and the girl’s skill in bringing that out.

Petra: “Meili! Chan! Are you safe and sound?!”

Meili: “I, I’m fi~ne! Petra-chan, that Book you read—”

Petra: “—I’m alright. More importantly…”

Cutting off her words, Petra narrowed her round eyes and glared behind her.

Before her gaze was a battle where Reinhard, defending the Pleiades Watchtower as the line that must continue to be defended at all costs, was holding back the Witch of Envy, who tried to cross that line.

The mere thought of the Witch of Envy was enough to cause shudders to surge up from the depths of her heart, and even Meili could not shake the fear that this reality had brought.

However, Petra, still mounted on Patrasche’s back, said to Meili,

Petra: “It’ll be fine; leave everything to me.”

Meili: “Petra-chan…?”

Petra: “Leave it for now; we need to get out of the Augria Sand Dunes. Let’s go!”

To the loud declaration of Petra, as she rode the ground dragon speeding across the Sand Sea, Meili responded by repeatedly nodding her head in agreement, feeling a sense of mysterious reliability.

With a smile at Meili's reaction, Petra turned back to face forward and stiffened her cheeks.

Holding on tightly to Patrasche's neck and leaving the manifestation of the end that loomed behind them to Reinhard, they ran, ran, and ran straight out of the Sand Sea.

And, while enjoying the illusion of being bathed in a cool breeze, Petra whispered to herself.

Petra: "We have some work to do. —Right, Subaru?"

Subaru: "—Yeah, let's do this. With everything we've got!"

Feeling the voice and presence of the one she loved so dearly, whom she was unable to touch, near to her, Petra Leyte raced as hard as she could, her heart burning with passion.

—To bring forth that wish, which must be delivered outside this sea of sand, she must give it her all.

Bonus Short Stories

The Land of Nascent Wolves: Undead Busters II

1

???: “And so! What a surprise we have here! Spica-san splendidly succeeded in dragging Anya out of the house! Hip-Hip hooray for this spectacular accomplishment!”

???: “Uu~!”

Clapping his hands, Cecilus applauded in true amusement. Encouraged by that springy voice of his, Spica also ended up reflexively puffing out her chest.

In truth, Spica did harbor a bit of a sense of accomplishment within her heart there.

In exchange for that bit of courage she displayed, her body was hurled into the midst of a battle that seemed akin to the end of the world.

Be that as it may—

Spica: “Aaiya?”

Arakiya: “—. Don’t touch me.”

As Spica tilted her head up so that she could glance at her face, Arakiya quickly averted her gaze, demonstrating a cold attitude. Spica was glad that they had finally exchanged greetings at such a close proximity, but that might not have been deemed acceptable from Arakiya’s side.

After all, just a short while earlier, she had been brought down by that hand of Spica’s. —Her dark skin made it difficult to tell, but it seemed like her complexion was not its best at the moment.

Spica: “Uu~, uu~…”

The “teleportation” that Spica masterfully wielded was an element of the Authority of Gluttony; as per Subaru, a remnant from before she had become her current self—of the wrongdoings perpetrated by Louis Arneb. Outside of this “teleportation” as well, there were a few sporadic hidden techniques that she held confidence in wielding.

Spica: “Au…”

As much as was possible, Spica told herself that she wished to refrain from using those.

In order to protect this vow, she would work to purify the Empire with Star Eating, just as she had promised to Subaru and Rem—she believed it to be just as important as resolving the problem of the dead people.

Then, as Spica renewed those feelings, the sound of stacks of paper being folded resonated in her eardrums.

The genesis of that sound laid before Spica and the two lined up next to her; wordlessly listening to their report, the Emperor was busy signing and stamping documents.

Amidst the many mountains of documents, after Vincent Vollachia breathed a brief sigh after finishing one of them up,

Vincent: “—Arakiya.”

Cecilus: “Oya oya, instead of touching on my labors or Spica-san’s efforts you decide to first and foremost focus on Anya? I don’t mind that at all but please don’t give her too severe a punishment. There are things that Anya should be and ought to be doing. My sunny side up breakfast fried eggs, for instance.”

Vincent: “Silence, utter fool.”
Arakiya: “Cecilus, die.”

Incurring displeasure from two directions in an instant, Cecilus curved his lips with a “Tsk” and squatted down in withdrawal. That fresh sensation of a childish response from his adult self perplexed Spica, and beside her, Vincent once again called out “Arakiya”.

Arakiya: "—. What?"

Vincent: "Firstly, I shall hear your explanation for having ignored mine summons several times. Such repeated disrespect in our current postwar period, large scars carved into our nation by the claws of the Great Disaster, regardless of your status as a General First-Class of the Empire, do not think that actions that spread chaos among mine subjects shall go overlooked."

Arakiya: "…Cecilus was-"

Vincent: "That utter fool? For him to needlessly open his mouth, needlessly ramble on phrases, and needlessly get on your nerves with nonsense, is by no means any new affair."

Arakiya: "…I'm sorry."

Met with Vincent's stern addition, Arakiya, whose gaze had been wandering, searching for the words to say, gave up on such actions. The dry silence from Arakiya's emotionless response was painful to hear, so despite barely knowing her, Spica began to want to stand in front of her with her arms spread out.

She wished to protect her from Vincent's sharp, painful gaze.

However—

Vincent: "An apology is uttered from that mouth of yours. Merged with the Great Spirit known for its reticence, I had thought you might become taciturn, but contrary to those expectations, that does not seem to be the case."

Quicker than Spica could stand in front of Arakiya, Vincent relaxed his gaze.

It seemed that not only was Spica surprised by Vincent's reaction, but Arakiya, too, slightly widened her red eye, wearing a puzzled look on her face.

Vincent: "So, what has changed other than your attitude? Your body is currently in an unprecedented state. Given that there is a concern that your life is directly tied to the safety of the Empire's lands, even the finer details shall be of note. Compile those details and report them to me. Or else…”

Arakiya: “…You’ll do something to me?”

Vincent: “No, or else—Priscilla’s death will have been for naught.”

Arakiya: “—Hk.”

In the following moment, a heat wave spread throughout the Emperor’s office, and Spica reflexively held her head.

That was a reaction borne out of instinctual fear, vigilance, and various other things. Emanating from Arakiya’s body was an impulsive fury that could not be identified as hostility or murderous intent; volatile in nature, it seeped out as a torrent of vast, aimless Mana.

But, just as how a Dragon’s breath was a wave of pure Mana aimed in a single direction, even if it was Mana that had not been shaped by the likes of magic, if it was vast enough in quantity, then it would easily give rise to peril.

The same applied to the current predicament, so Spica had no idea why Vincent had said such a careless thing, and it caused her to feel angry, a sensation as if her blood was flowing the wrong way.

The coiling eddy of Mana whirled around the office, and things were about to get bad—

Cecilus: “—Anya, Anya, you can’t be turning into Her Indignancy like that just because of a statement from His Excellency.”

That foolish, unfunny joke was whispered amidst the torrent of Mana that was also, in fact, no joke.

The fact that it came from Cecilus’s lips went without saying, and going against this vortex of Mana, he stood right behind Arakiya, embracing her body from behind, trying to pacify her.

Spica: “—Wau.”

Fully aware of the stupendous energy Arakiya possessed, that action left Spica speechless.

A mere hour earlier, Spica had also clung to Arakiya's back just as Cecilus was currently doing, earnestly attempting to persuade her to stop. In the end, it was the tremendous effectiveness of "teleportation" that had gotten Arakiya to stop, but aside from that, Spica had been completely tossed around.

Due to those recollections, she keenly understood the extraordinary recklessness of Cecilus's deed. At the same time, she comprehended the true intent of Vincent's careless utterance.

Because Cecilus was there with them, there was no doubt that Vincent judged it safe to purposely speak in a way to provoke Arakiya.

That was the immense level of trust that the Emperor of the Vollachian Empire placed in the Blue Lightning—

Arakiya: "Die."

Cecilus: "Hu~h~?!"

Immediately after, Cecilus, revolving with tremendous vigor, passed over Vincent's head, and smashing through the window past him, he was hurled outside the palace along with shining shards of broken glass.

As Cecilus faded from view, the only thing Spica could do was blink her eyes, thinking that this was not how it was supposed to go. Bearing witness to the same sight as her, Vincent crossed his arms, closed a single eye, and,

Vincent: "Thereby, it shall be you. Do it, girl."

Spica: "Au?!"

Vincent: "You harbor a trump card that brought Arakiya out, is that not so? Deploy it unsparingly. Elsewise, the sacrifices of all those who allowed mineself to survive through the battle against the Great Disaster shall return to naught."

After Spica widened her eyes at the overly excessive speech, she turned back to face Arakiya, whose entire body had begun to surround itself with floating belts of light, and gulped.

Once again, she decided on challenging Arakiya by utilizing “teleportation”. —Within her heart, just like how Subaru had always spoken, she crammed many complaints towards Vincent.

2

Vincent: “First of all, we have ascertained a means to keep Arakiya in check, as well as the fact that fusion with the Stone had not borne any major negative influence. It is a great service.”

Spica: “Au, au, auu~.”

Cecilus: “Eh? Ah yes yes Spica-san did you know? His Excellency has got a good head on him but fundamentally he’s reckless with his orders and so it’s really tough for everyone as they’re being swept around all over the place. Well His Excellency’s eyes often grasp someone’s capabilities more accurately than said person themselves so it does happen that since most people think their own limit is a bit in front of their real limit there is a bit of discrepancy with His Excellency’s ideal. Ahahaha, it must be hard for everyone other than me!”

Placing his hand to his chin, Vincent deliberated with a single eye closed.

Spica felt as if she had heard something unbelievable in his utterance; Cecilus, who had for some reason returned unharmed from outside the palace, supplemented so with boisterous laughter.

Still, after being agitated by Vincent’s comment, Arakiya’s ear canals had been perturbed once again when she was jostled by Spica’s “teleportation”, now leaning against the wall languidly with her legs spread out.

Of course, having gone all out, Spica was also out of breath, and her whole body was groggy.

Vincent: “With Cecilus and this girl with her, Arakiya can be restrained even were she to rampage. In that case, in accordance with Medium's words, I shan't be stingy in bestowing this duty upon the lot of you."

Cecilus: "Hahah, I see I see so it was advice from the Most Honorable Empress Consort. And here I was worried that His Excellency would be unable to properly take on a consort but it turned out to be a needless fear!"

Vincent: "Shut that superfluous mouth of yours. With Chisha gone, do not make me allocate my concern in futility."

Cecilus: "Woah now that's something I can't obey. After all, Chisha told me that he was entrusting His Excellency to me. Please rest assured since I will have my hands full moderating things so that His Excellency doesn't get fully sucked into his work surrounded by nothing but yes-men!"

Vincent: "—Fool."

Vincent's response was curt, and Cecilus shrugged with his hands in the sleeves of his kimono.

Off to the side of those two as they reached some sort of an understanding, Spica went up to the languid Arakiya, and stroked her head with an "Uu?" to ascertain how she was feeling.

Arakiya: "Don't, touch me… uugh…"

With those words of rejection, Arakiya's outburst had settled for the time being. As if having ascertained that through Spica, Vincent nodded with a "Very well", and,

Vincent: "Once again, the three of you are charged with the task of subjugating the dead who have survived the Great Disaster—though that is quite a comical way of describing them. In accordance with this edict, it would do you well to fulfill your respective duties."

Cecilus: "Aye aye aye! To begin with I was brimming with motivation so I'm completely fine with these orders but will it really be okay for me and Anya to leave the Imperial Capital? Chisha's gone and Groovy seems like half a dead man himself and I've heard that Moguro is in the middle of relearning humanity, so?”

Vincent: “In the first place, how much could I realistically expect the two of you to contribute at your stations? Besides, the Great Disaster may have devastated the nation, but it is not as though there was nothing to be gained. At the very least, amidst the Generals of various locations, some standouts have begun to emerge. Starting with Zikr.”

Spica: “Iirr.”

Hearing Zikr’s name, Spica suddenly lifted her head up.

Zikr Osman, with his fluffy face, was a gentleman who, among the people Spica had been acquainted with in Vollachia, had treated her with the greatest respect, so Spica quite liked him. For Zikr to thus receive such an evaluation was something that made Spica proud.

Spica: “Eius, Iirr.”

Vincent: “What? Do not tell me, you wish to exchange this one out for Zikr? Unfortunately, unlike this one, who is only useful during emergencies, there are many duties entrusted to Zikr. Give it up.”

Spica: “Uu~.”

Cecilus: “Huh-Huh-huh~? It seems like you said it knowing it wouldn’t be possible from the start but when comparing myself with Zikr-san and then being disappointed that I’m the one who’s picked is something that I just can’t accept in the slightest y’know?! I would never say that Zikr-san lacks charm but I’m the leading actor of this world!”

Spica: “Uu!”

When Cecilus interjected with his squawking, Spica slapped him.

She knew that Cecilus was strong, and understood that he was a reliable ally. Also that he was an even more troubled adult. Only, she wanted to object to his assertions of being at the center of the world. As for Spica’s thoughts on the matter, the one who shone just as radiantly as Cecilus was—

Cecilus: "—Boss would be along the right track. No doubt that he's neither a minor role nor is he a fodder character. Only when it's a matter of heading to the center of a stage that's slated to be a tempestuous storm of earth-shattering nature he just won't be able to compete with me. That's gotta put me at least a little ahead of Boss right?"

Spica: "Ica."

Cecilus: "You're saying that's what you're for? Haha, what a masterpiece. Boss certainly does have that sort of appeal. So is that reflected most in where you are on the stage when you shine the brightest… certainly a difficult question that is directly connected to myself given how I'm constantly aware of how I'm acting to captivate a theatre."

With an unchanged demeanor—no, just a little bit more gleefully than before, Cecilus gave his answer, to which Spica pursed her lips.

Then, leaning against the wall behind them, Arakiya made a sound as she slowly stood back up. Her complexion was still poor due to the aftereffects of the "teleportation", but,

Arakiya: "…Do as you please. I'm fine being a tool."

Vincent: "—. In that case, it would do you well to fulfill a duty befitting one. All of the dead were manifested using the Stone's Mana as an intermediary. For you, it ought to be possible to pursue those connections."

Arakiya: "Connections…"

Faintly muttering, Arakiya directed her eyes of mismatched color to outside the shattered window. With her red right eye, and the left eye of golden hue housing a strange light, she looked at that which was not there.

Eventually, Arakiya drew back her slender chin, and nodded with an "Mm", Arakiya: “Understood… But, there’s many.”

Vincent: “It may be ironic, but there is enough testimony of those who did not obey the guidance of the Great Disaster to substantiate that there were some who could resist the compelling force of the Witch. Proportionately, the seeds of calamity have been left to fester. This may have been a part of their designs.”

Arakiya: “—Once, everything is finished…”

Vincent: “…”

Arakiya: “…Nevermind.”

Retracting the words she began to speak, Arakiya lethargically cast her eyes down. Seeing her in that state, Vincent narrowed his eyes, but said not a word.

In place of Vincent, Arakiya’s hand was held by Spica. Holding hands, as her eyes began to slowly descend upon her, Spica was at a loss at what expression to make.

She was at a loss, however, Spica ended up smiling. —Imitating Rem.

When she had not understood a thing, and had no easy place to turn to, Spica—when she had still yet to be called Spica, Rem would often smile for her whenever Subaru was cruel.

And so, for the girl who seemed forlorn, with nobody to rely on, Spica wanted to smile.

Arakiya: “—. Don’t touch me.”

Cecilus: “Whenever it comes to Anya she always says this sorta thing. But you can rest assured, Spica-san. After all the evidence that Anya isn’t being honest is right there in the fact that she hasn’t let go of Spica-san’s hand, right?”

Arakiya: “Die.”

Once again, the window of the office was blown apart due to Cecilus's needless comment.

—In such a manner, the prospect for the departure of Spica and company was finally put in order.

3

—Ironically enough, Vincent Vollachia's conjecture was correct.

As the bearer of the Great Disaster, the Witch, Sphinx had plotted to destroy the Vollachian Empire; her schemes involved resurrecting many of the deceased lying dormant in the vast lands of the Empire, making them complicit in her plans.

Even outside of those who originally bore strong enmity against Vollachia, the minds of the dead were made to obey the intentions of the Witch that had utilized a sacrament to resurrect them.

However, among the dead were those who disregarded the Witch's force of compulsion, acting in accordance with their own ego. And, each and every one of the deceased who retained their own will, were those who could be counted among the mighty.

Thus, this creature, coated in fur the darkest shade of night, was no exception.

???: "—Iris."

His will retained, he forwent participation in the ruin of the Empire prepared by the Witch, however, neither did he fade away like those among the dead who had ceased to desire aught further, this being—the jet-black wolfman, vocalized that name.

As if tearing his very heart asunder, the utterance permeated throughout its entirety with sorrow, terribly so.

To Be Continued

Kararagi Reaper Incident II

1

—Compared to the Kingdom of Lugunica or the Vollachian Empire, the Kararagi City-States were a nation of lands that could not be described as being blessed with favorable climate.

Of course, it was not as severe as the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko, encased in permafrost as it was; with changes of season that comprised excessive variation in temperature, abnormal weather that seemed to befall them every year, and the likes of plots that proprietized inscrutable characteristics, it had to be said that these lands were rather harsh in their discipline towards those who lived within then.

Thus, for anyone to live in Kararagi, there was need for them to become accustomed to days of hard struggle. That was the polar opposite of a lifestyle that resigned itself to living in a reactionary way, a truly resolute and proactive lifestyle.

That boldness of the people of Kararagi to keep getting back up no matter how much they got trampled and trampled upon; while it might seem that he was biased towards his own people, that was something which Ricardo respected, and loved.

Indeed, the people of Kararagi were strong. They could get back on their feet no matter the adversity.

That was why—

Ricardo: “…I’d end up bein’ unable ta sleep peacefully at night.”

Spilling those words, Ricardo staggered to raise his body, using his great cleaver as a cane.

—Engulfed in the updraft of a tremendous gale, the townscape of Banan, distinguished among even the major cities of Kararagi, had been demolished; buildings were flushed away as if by a great flood, and it had been reduced to a state unbearable to cast eyes upon.

Collapsed in the epicenter of this unprecedented cataclysm of wind, Ricardo's body was stained with blood; in the sense of how painful it looked, it could have been said that his state rivaled the disastrous sight of the city.

Blades of wind birthed by magic would mercilessly tear through the bestial fur and thick skin of any beastperson. Normally, wind slashes would make many clean slices, painfully sharp but quick to heal. But, these wind cuts in particular differed; the wounds were serrated as if they had been dug into by a rasp, making the pain run proportionately sharper and deeper, dishonorable in the way it made blood pour out without cease.

And, the one who had inflicted such wind slashes upon Ricardo was —

???: "What~? You're still going at it, you whelp? You do have guts, I'll commend you for that. I'm not commending you, though."

Ricardo: "…It's embarrassin' ta be gettin' so much praise. Thank ya, lassie."

???: "I said I'm not commending you! Damned thief!"

Rage filling her shrill shouts, the sharp-eyed woman stomped her feet violently.

With white hair, white clothing, and golden eyes, at a glance she was nothing more than a beautiful woman—she was as cute as his own Anastasia was charming, but the fact that she was not as weak a being as she appeared, was evidenced by the wind slashes all over Ricardo's body, and the fact that she was present in the very center of the cataclysmic tempest devastating Banan.

Ricardo: "Tho', ever since I been with the Miss, I've been plunged into so many scenes of carnage that I even ended up losin' my right hand."

Looking down at his right arm, replaced with a hook from the elbow forward, Ricardo took a deep breath.

This lone wolf, known as Ricardo, had been caught by Anastasia, picked up Mimi and the others, and had gone on so far as to even command a group known as the Iron Fang. Since then, he had plunged into many scenes of carnage, both great and small, and even ending up clashing with the White Whale and Sin Archbishops, but—

Ricardo: "—Lassie, you're a head above all my opponents up 'til now."

In terms of an enigmatic, ominous feeling, he had felt the same thing concerning the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony.

However, compared to Gluttony, of whom one had been killed and one had been captured at the Pleiades Watchtower, the woman before his eyes was fundamentally different in the overwhelming presence she exuded. —This awe was rooted in instinct.

As if the woman before his eyes appeared as a colossal beast several dozens of times larger than her actual appearance; that was the sort of awe it was.

And, encouraging his awe and vigilance towards that woman—

???: "—Captain!"

Then, mixed with the howling winds, what struck Ricardo's eardrums was a familiar voice—Mimi.

Just as Ricardo, the members of the Iron Fang had hastened to this place as a countermeasure against the cataclysm of wind, and among them was of course Mimi, the vice captain, as well as Hetaro and Tivey. However, right now, their figures were nowhere to be found in Ricardo's vision. To be more precise, he could not tell if they were anywhere in the scope of his vision.

After all, Mimi and the others were currently engulfed by the tremendously violent tempest kicked up by the woman, and together with Banan's residents and destroyed cityscape, they were whirled up into the wind vortex swirling in the sky.

Ricardo: “Geez, this ain’t no joke…!”

Swallowed by the eddy of wind, and being hurled up into the sky, were over several hundreds of people.

Fortunately, unlike Ricardo who currently stood directly in the woman’s way, it seemed like the ferocity of the gales was not wounding Mimi and the rest, but supposing the woman were to carelessly undo the maelstrom, it would be impossible to prevent many of those people from falling to their deaths.

The current situation was tantamount to several hundred hostages being taken against Ricardo.

Ricardo: “Even without doin’ this sorta thing, you’re plenty strong, lassie! Quit doin’ things like that!”

Woman: “Hah? By shelving your own weakness, you mean to blame me for being strong? Even though I’m only doing this because you guys are so fragile. I mean, don’t order me around!”

Ricardo: “So yer rage wells up at the end, huh?!”

Her sharp eyes growing ever sharper at Ricardo’s appeal, the woman replied with a shout and an angered expression.

Either way, the woman gave off the impression that she was unable to find a balance between the scale of her power and her use of humanity. That aspect made him recall the poor impression he had gotten when facing off against Sin Archbishops, but there were definitively parts to her that differed from that lot.

This woman was absurd, but she did not seem to be unreasonable.

Ricardo: “Regardless, I tend to falter when it comes to this sorta thing. Startin’ off, negotiations are the Miss’s job, my job’s just ta stand in the back ‘n stare the other party down. “Don’t ask for bread from the appa seller”, ya know?”

Everyone had a job that best suited them, that was the meaning of this Hoshin proverb, but the current situation Ricardo found himself in was unmistakably that of an appa seller who had been requested to bake bread.

Neither negotiating for the release of hostages, nor ignoring the hostages and instead suppressing her by force, were aligned with Ricardo's principles.

Then, at least he might be able to do a little more if he were to understand the woman's desires, but—

Ricardo: "Light Sphere, was it?"

Woman: "—! Yes, that! Give it back! If you would just give that back…!"

Ricardo: "Here's the thing, I'd also love to do so. 'N so, if you could just be a lil' more specific 'bout what that is…"

Woman: "—How shameless! Don't make me ask again! If you're protecting a thief, that makes all of you thieves as well!"

Ricardo: "There's somethin' seriously wrong with you! This ain't my fault!"

Correction: he had thought that the woman was not unreasonable a moment ago, but this was indeed a response most unreasonable.

Was he to blame the hot-tempered woman, or the unknown person who had stolen her "Light Sphere", or perhaps he ought to curse himself, unproficient with words as he was.

After thoroughly troubling over it, Ricardo scratched his head with his hook as he exclaimed "Ah!",

Ricardo: "I give up, it's a contest of endurance."

Saying that, Ricardo plunked his behind back down on the ground after having just stood back up, and sat with his legs crossed.

At Ricardo's unthinkable decision, the woman was astonished, letting out a "Hah?". However, perhaps taking it as an insult, her expression immediately returned to a strict one, Woman: “What is the meaning of this? Are you looking down on me?”

Ricardo: “Might look that way, but I ain’t fool enough to look down on an opponent who can do such grand things. Nonetheless, neither swingin’ at’cha nor havin’ a talk with ya ended up bein’ of any avail, so this’s the only thing I can do.”

Woman: “So your answer to that is to just sit down? Wouldn’t it be better to tuck tail and run away, whelp… no, not a whelp, but a wolf cub? Doesn’t quite roll off the tongue very nicely. Whelp should do fine.”

Ricardo: “Run away? Even when my family’s flyin’ ‘round up there? Ain’t gonna happen, even if it kills me… Also, the fact that I ain’t a whelp is sorta a secret. Don’t go talkin’ ’bout it too loudly, will ya?”

Right after communicating his request, a sudden breeze swept directly past Ricardo’s side, scraping at the right half of his body.

Ricardo: “…”

From the right side of his cranium, down to his right shoulder and arm, it scraped at him greatly, and the wounds that had been inflicted began to spray with blood.

Even so, Ricardo flinched not, and remained seated in his position. Faced with the obstinance of the bloodstained Ricardo, the stern and beautiful face of the woman emerged with its greatest indignation up to this point.

Woman: “Fine. If you say that is your intention, I’ll teach you this lesson. Even if you come crying about it later, I won’t listen.”

As she spoke, the woman raised up her palm as if to present it to him, and thereupon began to form a tiny tornado.

Its size was nothing compared to the maelstrom that held Mimi and the others afloat overhead, but the fact that it housed the same scale of power within, he understood.

That was to say, the palm had enough power concentrated within it to level a city, and it was now being pointed directly at Ricardo—

Woman: “Repent the fact that you ever picked a fight with me.”

2

???: “—Are you worried about Ricardo and the rest?”

When a voice spoke to her side profile, Anastasia, who had been gazing out the window, turned to face it. Then, as Julius sat next to her with anguish in his yellow eyes, he looked at her.

Surprisingly, the way his inner feelings ended up showing on his face was the cute aspect of Anastasia’s one and only Knight. Be that as it may, in order to tell him that he was needlessly worried, Anastasia forced a smile,

Anastasia: “Did I make ya uneasy? If that’s so, I’ve still got a long way to go in temperin’ my heart.”

Julius: “No, it is only natural for one’s heart to ache over their family. Even for you, Anastasia-sama, you have no need to avert your eyes from there.”

Anastasia: “Mm~, the way ya phrase “even for you”, does that mean ya think I’m impudent?”

Julius: “—Anastasia-sama.”

Anastasia: “Aye aye, sorry, sorry. It’s a bad habit of mine to always be snappin’ back with a retort.”

At Julius’s quiet call of her name, Anastasia apologized as she slightly shrugged her shoulders.

When her vulnerabilities were struck, she, not wanting her superiority to crumble, would end up taking this sort of attitude. That was undoubtedly evidence that the way of living in the slums of Kararagi was deeply ingrained into her. Those who displayed weakness in that place would end up as prey, and in some cases would even be stripped of their lives.

Always maintaining a composed expression, one ought to make a face that suggested they had an ace up their sleeve. —That had been a core teaching of Anastasia's life, as well as the management philosophy that had fostered the Hoshin Company into a major trading juggernaut.

???: "If you keep up that attitude even in front of your family and Knight, who permit your feelings, you will end up unable to smile with your true face in front of anyone, Ana."

Anastasia: "Oh my, since ya seem to never miss the opportunity for a lecture, ya ain't a very nice girl, ya know."

???: "I myself am aware of that, and even somewhat lament it. Thanks to that, I get the feeling that that part of me has also transferred over to you, Ana."

Anastasia: "…Really now, ya've always got somethin' to snap back with."

With a faint mutter, Anastasia patted the head of Echidna, wrapped around her neck as a scarf.

Then, once again, she pondered what words to use in order to provide an answer to the earnest Julius.

Currently, Anastasia's group was riding in a dragon carriage, hastening to Kararagi's Second City, Banan, which was said to be undergoing a cataclysm of wind. Having completed her mission as emissary to the Empire, the plan had originally been for Anastasia to return to Lugunica as soon as possible after finishing her report at the Third City, Ivada.

But, when she found out that a certain land had been subjected to an unprecedented great cataclysm, and that thereupon, the valuable Iron Fang—Ricardo, Mimi, and the rest had been dispatched, she could not abandon them. Julius's question, too, concerned how they could not establish communication with Ricardo and the others, who were in the disaster zone.

Of course, she harbored great feelings of concern for Ricardo and everyone else in the area of disaster. But—

Anastasia: “It was when I was still just a wee thing, before even livin’ together with Mimi ‘n the others.”

Julius: “…”

Anastasia: “I was picked up by Ricardo, and we were livin’ together. That said, Ricardo was always out workin’ as a mercenary, so he didn’t come home much, ‘n I was also busy helpin’ out at the shop, so I had a similar feelin’ of distance to the place I’d come home to.”

Anastasia suddenly began to speak; however, Julius listened without interrupting. Thankful to his Knightly demeanor, Anastasia continued.

Anastasia: “Each time he’d go out to work, it was a given that we’d be unable to have contact for a few days. But, one time, Ricardo sent me a letter back from where he’d been workin’. Just to say somethin’ like “I’m gonna be out for a bit longer this time~”.”

Julius: “That would mean he was thinking of you, Anastasia-sama.”

Anastasia: “Mm, that’s right… but that time, Ricardo had blundered at his job ‘n sustained a grave wound, ‘n he was on the brink of life ‘n death over at the town he’d been workin’ at.”

Julius: “Of life and death…”

Anastasia: “In such a situation, he’d sent a needless letter so that I wouldn’t worry. Nevertheless, even when I was small, I was a clever one. I immediately thought it was strange, ‘n went rushin’ over to where Ricardo was. Then I searched for the healers ‘n medicine necessary to heal him, ‘n he was saved. Back then, we made a promise.”

Anastasia could clearly remember that time, when her teary-eyed self thrust her finger towards Ricardo, who, sitting up in the bed, had overcome the adversity; she clearly remembered what Ricardo had answered back then.

Anastasia had an outstanding memory. Important promises, her own past failures, she remembered all of it. The past would absolutely never be erased. —That was not a Hoshin proverb, but an Anastasia proverb.

Anastasia: “Since ya’d only ever use letters ‘n the like to deceive me, don’t write ‘em no more. After all, uncle’s… Ricardo’s safety is somethin’ I’ll always believe in, even without any contact.”

Julius: “—. So then, even now?”

Anastasia: “Yep. Not bein’ able to get in contact is normally rise for concern, but for me ‘n Ricardo, it’s the complete reverse. If he were truly in danger, Mimi ‘n the others would come sayin’ somethin’. For that reason, I’m calm.”

Loosening her lips, Anastasia smiled at her concerned one and only Knight.

There was a deep understanding that this was neither a logical rationale, nor a believable basis, but a tenet founded in emotion.

However, though she was apologetic to her one and only Knight, Julius, within Anastasia, Ricardo was the sole existence she could believe in like that, even without any certain basis or logical rationale.

He was somebody who harbored a bond different to that of the faith Anastasia placed in Julius.

Henceforth—

Anastasia: “I wouldn’t worry ‘bout Ricardo. If there’s no contact, he ain’t doin’ anythin’ that would sadden me, it’s simply a matter of believin’ in that.”

3

???: “—How irritating.”

Thus, the palm of whirling wind was gripped right before his face, Ricardo released the tension from his body, and sighed.

The small scale storm, which would have been enough to thoroughly blow Ricardo away, delicately vanished in the woman's clenched fist—no, that was not all that had happened to the vanished storm.

Ricardo: "I'm beggin' ya, let 'em down slowly. If ya mess it up, I wouldn't be able ta bear the sight."

Woman: "How noisy. If you're going to complain about my handling of the wind, you're four hundred years too early. I mean, don't order me around. Don't make me say it again. It's irritating."

Becoming annoyed in such a tone, the woman spun her upraised hand around in the air. When she did so, as if responding to her movements, the vigor of the great wind surrounding Banan slowly began to dissipate.

The wreckage of the destroyed buildings, the screaming civilians, and Mimi, whose voice could be heard enjoying herself through the wind, quietly descended back to the ground.

Even so, the wind was still quite speedy, but after talking all that big talk, this was probably her method of neatly letting all these people land.

Having hoped for that, Ricardo stretched his back out, and,

Ricardo: "Ah, even so, that still hurt a lot! Even tho' I just exchanged my right hand for a hook, I was frettin' that ya might take away the whole arm from the shoulder down this time!"

Woman: "Don't speak so loudly! It's because you were trying to endure in vain. It would have been better if you hadn't clung to the ground, and instead went flying in the sky with the rest of the bunch. If you had done that, then these meaningless wounds…"

Ricardo: "Ah? What's that? You're sorry for woundin' me?"

Woman: "Like I'd say that! Serves you right! I wouldn't go so far as to say that it serves you right, though!"

Stomping on the ground, the woman howled in anger as she wielded her troublesome disposition. However, the sense of oppressiveness that had struck Ricardo with awe up until a moment ago, had completely vanished.

Judging by her personality, it seemed like she had overdone things quite a bit in trying to pressure him.

Ricardo: “To that extent, the Light Sphere that was stolen from ya seems like it was quite important.”

Woman: “Like I said! That’s what I’ve been saying this entire time! Hurry up and give it back!”

Ricardo: “‘N like I’ve been sayin’, I’ve got absolutely no clue what that is. —Name’s Ricardo.”

Appending his name onto the end of his words, Ricardo trained his gaze on the woman’s face. For a moment, she looked puzzled at what had just been told to her, but,

Woman: “I’m… ah, it’s Tia. Let’s go with that name for the time being.”

Ricardo: “Really now, that’s a wonderful name, young lassie Tia. In that case—”

???: “—Captain!! Incredible, that was insane! Are you alive?! Did you die?!”

Thus, the woman who gave her name—it was a matter of deciding to go with Tia, but she was interrupted by an energetic voice.

At a glance, Mimi, who had descended somewhere quite far away, was furiously sprinting towards them. Behind her could be seen the figures of Hetaro and Tivey as well, and Ricardo laughed a hearty “Har!”.

After a good chuckle, he wiped the blood from his face, and turning back to Tia,

Ricardo: “In that case, shall we have a lil’ chat? Even without tryna scare us with that wind, a simple smile woulda carried the convo further along. —Tho’ that ain’t a Hoshin proverb, but one of the Miss’s proverbs, ya see.”

END

No Stella No Life II

1

—Ten-thousand and zero.

Having a taste of “death by cutting” for precisely the ten thousandth time, Aldebaran raised his hands, as they had agreed.

Receiving that signal, that which had seemed to be infinite—no, that was just how it felt to the one on the receiving end, and since he had properly counted it up there was no doubt about it being ten thousand times, but regardless, the torture that had gone on to that extent came to a close.

That had been his expectation.

???: “—Fula.”

Aldebaran: “Wai…”

Hearing an incantation that should have been impossible, his voice that had begun to form the word “wait” could not continue.

The unleashed wind blade mercilessly sliced through Aldebaran’s throat, chest, and waist; falling victim to the circular slash, his body spurted with blood and collapsed upon the meadow of verdant grass.

???: “…”

In the moment before his decapitated head fell to the ground, he glared at the perpetrator of that act as if he was seeing something utterly unbelievable, and unable to do anything about it, Death came to fruition.

That other party watched over Aldebaran, even bearing a faint smile—

× × ×

—Ten-thousand and one.

Aldebaran: “This isn’t what we had discussed!!”

The instant he returned, Aldebaran abandoned their agreement and raised his voice so.

Seeing Aldebaran’s fury, the person who had been holding her hands up in front of him the beautiful Witch, composed of just the two colors of white and black, ceased movement.

Then, tilting her head in a cunning manner like she had completed all calculations,

Witch: “Judging by your reaction, this would mean that you have finished your ten-thousand and first attempt?”

Aldebaran: “And judging by your phrasing, from the outset, you were never gonna end it on the ten-thousandth time, oi?”

Witch: “Yes, I admit to your conjecture. But then again, from my perspective, I still have yet to enact murder on you even once… as expected, how deeply intriguing.”

Aldebaran: “What is? Your own horrid personality being verified after ending in just the attempt?”

Witch: “There is malice in your phrasing, but that is more or less correct.”

Closing a single eye, the Witch lifted a finger to her lips as she responded. Breathing a long, deep sigh at her attitude that showed no diffidence, Aldebaran somewhat soothed the beast within himself that was clamoring with ire.

The Witch had disregarded their prior agreement, and furthermore, it seemed like she had intended on doing so from the start.

But, as for what the objective of that betrayal had been, he could fathom a guess.

Witch: “By way of my Wind Magic, you have accreted the experience of “death by cutting” ten-thousand times. No matter the phenomenon, if you experience it ten-thousand times, in most cases, it will lose its flavor. Only, if those experiences went too far and you were simply just quelling your own heart, it would be troubling. Hence—”

Aldebaran: “You sliced me up one more time than the agreed upon ten-thousand. By doing that, you would be able to tell whether or not I was able to truly get accustomed to “death by cutting”.”

Witch: “Precisely. Thus, you proved my theory. Congratulations. This completes your hands-on education course on “death by cutting”. —Although, there is still a long road ahead of us.”

When he realized that she was clapping her hands before her chest, his gaze traced upwards and found her bewitching smile as she spoke.

Regarding whether the Witch felt like she had brought about a sense of accomplishment or not, given that she knew not how to show consideration for the hearts of others, it would have been difficult for regular people to gauge her heart. Thus, it was impossible for Aldebaran.

Witch: “Oya, how fainthearted. Even while spending such a long time with me in this space, you still think of yourself as a regular human?”

Aldebaran: “Rather than fainthearted, it’s a matter of natural distinction, yeah? I don’t have the sorta mentality to thrust someone who’s just escaping a journey of ten-thousand deaths down to the hell of a ten-thousand and first time.”

Witch: “You have a retort for everything. How wretched.”

Aldebaran: “Which one is it?!”

As the Witch shrugged her shoulders in a manner akin to saying “Good grief”, Aldebaran stuck out his tongue.

But, being able to behave in such a manner directly after tasting “death by cutting” ten-thousand and one times, vexingly, was proof of the Witch’s proposition that hands-on learning with death would bear dramatic results.

For these ten-thousand instances of “death by cutting”, too, during the double digits it continued without him being able to do a thing; during the triple digits he was thinking of nothing but things to quell his own heart; enough of a faint respite was yielded when he reached the quadruple digits such that he could finally direct his focus to a method of maintaining his mind’s balance.

And now that he had reached ten-thousand times, immediately after he had been decapitated, he maintained composure to the extent that he could clash words with the very person who decapitated him like this.

Likely, there was a fear that this was not stability of the mind, but more accurately, the destruction of the mind, but—

Witch: “Even supposing that were to be the case, is there a problem?”

Aldebaran: “…”

Suddenly, the Witch’s words, which seemed like they had seen through his inner thoughts despite the fact that she did not understand the hearts of others, struck him.

The Witch narrowed her black eyes, bordered by her long eyelashes, and while staring fixedly at Aldebaran,

Witch: “Even supposing the equilibrium of your mind were to crumble, your ability to think and your willingness to adapt, that is to say, as long as you do not lose your sense of objective, then there is no doubt that you will complete the purpose of your existence. That is how I judge it, do you possess a differing view?”

Aldebaran: “—. No, it’s as you say… Teacher.”

Witch: “Hm.”

Aldebaran: “I was killed ten thousand times. For me to protect my heart like it’s a shiny, freshly washed, and polished jar would be impossible from the outset. In that case, even if I have to fill the cracks up with glue, it’s fine as long as it’s kept in a state that can hold water until the end.”

Part way through, disregarding the Witch’s displeased reaction at the way she had been referred to, Aldebaran looked down and clasped his palm shut tight, affirming the other party’s words.

Then, opening his clenched hand, he faced back towards the Witch’s face, and,

Aldebaran: “What’s after “death by cutting”? “Death by beating”? Something like “death by crushing”?”

Witch: “Indeed. —I was thinking of going with “death by burning”, how about it?”

Aldebaran: “…Just in case, could I hear your reasoning?”

Witch: “Amidst numerous Deaths, burning to death seems like it would be particularly grueling. “Death by cutting” has proven to us that this first hand learning is effective. Thus, if we begin with the causes of death that are most fervently painful and work our way down, then that will make it so everything after is no longer scary, correct?”

Speaking in a detached manner, the Witch answered as if it was a good idea, and on the tip of her lifted finger, a flame alighted.

The flickering flame might have appeared cute, but Aldebaran was aware that it would yield a result far greater, and from here on, he would be made to experience it firsthand.

Certainly, since they were looking to the future, preparing for all kinds of causes of death in advance, “death by burning” was an assignment he would inevitably have to go through. But, to propose they start off with the highest ranking, most painful manners of death, was it perhaps revenge for their exchange from just earlier?

Witch: “Do not tell me, you think I am a woman who bears such grudges?”

Aldebaran: “Even if that were the case, it wouldn’t be surprising or anything of the sort!”

Witch: “What a way to put it. That wounded me.”

Even when she said that with a smile, it was not persuasive in the slightest.

Scratching his head as the Witch spoke, Aldebaran began to stretch where he stood. Focused thoughts, clear mind; radio calisthenics did well to calm a wavering heart.

And then—

Aldebaran: “Same signal as before. Don’t betray me this time.”

Witch: “I shall keep it as a goal to endeavor towards.”

Aldebaran: “Now that’s a statement I can’t ignore… —Expand Territory, matrix redefinition.”

After his dejection, Aldebaran accessed his Authority—his own cognition enclosed around the world, intoxicating him with a sense of omnipotence as he bent the laws of reality to his will.

In this moment, the world was divided into a multiplex hierarchy of layers within Aldebaran’s hand—

Witch: “—Goa.”

For the first time, he comprehended that the scorching flames engulfing his life would even burn away his death throes.

2

Witch: “—Goa.”

During his hands-on learning with all sorts of Death, Aldebaran pondered.

The Witch had by no means proposed such a hellish intensive training menu out of resentment towards Aldebaran. Deep down, this proposal must have truly been the Witch's way of caring for Aldebaran.

Witch: "—Huma."

Having mastered all forms of magic in this world, the Witch was nonetheless discontented, producing new forbidden arts, continuing to heighten her own self-studies and understanding of the research of others, and now quite literally executing tens of thousands of deaths.

The utility of the Witch, capable of actualizing the majority of the manners of Death published in the dictionary, could be described as most optimal for realizing this penanceno, this training that transcended the ordinary.

Witch: "—Dona."

Of course, amidst the unbearable pain and torment, many a time had he detested the Witch.

It was a shallow interpersonal relationship. In terms of Aldebaran's life, it was not as though he had made contact with very many people, but as for one towards whom he harbored this much of a variety of emotions, there existed none other save the Witch.

Rage and sorrow, hatred and resentment, fear and disgust, repulsion and fixation, even affection, all such were present.

Witch: "—Jiwald."

It was a process that would repeat without end, an unsightly one, akin to that of fierce emotions, neither faint nor small on their own, being left to stew jumbled together with many other things in a boiling pot.

To allow that to continue for so long, Aldebaran's sense of duty alone was by no means the only reason.

To begin with, something like a sense of duty was not even that great of a motive within Aldebaran himself. The sense of objective he had been bequeathed, no matter how far he went, would always be nothing but a borrowed oar.

Witch: “—Minya.”

It was a fool’s errand to venture out into the rapids with an unreliable boat and oar.

Understanding that, for him to keep struggling onwards, though there was a possibility for Aldebaran to force his way past that unreasonableness, neither his borrowed sense of duty nor those worn-out possibilities were definite motives.

He did not wish to recognize it. But, just as surely, he did wish to be recognized.

—By the Witch, who since his birth, Aldebaran had spent the longest, most pronounced time with.

3

Aldebaran: “Teacher, don’t you ever get fed up?”

Witch: “—? Do I get fed up? With what, exactly?”

Aldebaran: “With what… I mean like, all sorts of things, all sorts. Or you could even say with everything.”

Witch: “Again, that is quite the broad question.”

Languidly sprawled out upon the verdant meadow, above Aldebaran, the Witch laughed.

His limbs spread out without putting any tension in them, Aldebaran had learned first-hand what it meant for one’s body and mind to be expended. Even though it was his own body, there were nothing but unknowns—no, that was slightly different from the correct expression.

Even though he did know, there were nothing but unknowns. This was a more accurate way to put it.

Witch: “…Ah. Was your question just now perhaps venting your own feelings?”

The Witch, having sat herself down in a chair used for tea parties, suddenly peered at him as if having realized something.

Unusual as it was, the Witch seemed to be working through a circuit of consideration or comprehension of others.

Aldebaran: “But, that’s only half-right, half-wrong.”

Witch: “Fifty points, hm. However, there is nothing marked in red, so it is a matter of the points I am missing. An explanation?”

Aldebaran: “The half you got right is that those are my feelings, but the full correct answer involves a notion of “why am I doing this sorta thing”? So, I wanted to ask how it is for you, Teacher.”

Witch: “I see. So rather than getting fed up, it is more about feeling a lack of willpower.”

As she spoke, the Witch crossed her legs, wrapped in a black skirt, and pondered. Watching over that strangely alluring gesture as he laid down, Aldebaran vocalized his impulse.

Aldebaran: “If you just let me have a single lap pillow, my willingness might return.”

Witch: “What a terrifying request to make, you. You ought to be aware just how frail in constitution I am, correct? I shall say this now, but even if you attempt to place your head in my lap, I am confident that I will not be able to stand up for an entire day, let alone several hours.”

Aldebaran: “Don’t wear such a smug grin as you say that sorta thing… I was just asking.”

First of all, his exhaustion was nothing so trivial that doing that would revive his willingness.

To begin with, as far as he understood it, this Witch had told Aldebaran that if she could support him through physical touch, she would help out no matter what it was.

And unfortunately, Aldebaran desired no such things from the Witch.

Ergo—

Aldebaran: "…"

Unexpectedly getting out of her chair, the Witch crouched down beside Aldebaran, and caressed his head. Speechless at the sudden occurrence, Aldebaran looked up at the Witch with his eyes widened. The Witch, upside down in his vision, tilted her head at his astonished gaze, and,

Witch: "Oya, did I get it wrong? You do not desire me as a woman. However, if you still request something such as a lap pillow from me, then I had imagined that it would either be consolation or gratitude that you desired, but… "

Aldebaran: "…Don't try to understand people's emotions through logic, you Witch."

Witch: "Regrettably, since I was born as a Witch, it does not seem like I will become anything other than a Witch. So, does your lack of denial mean that I successfully understood your emotions through logic?"

As the Witch questioned him with a slightly odious look on her face, Aldebaran's lips contorted as he fell silent.

It was aggravating that no matter what he said, even silence itself would serve as an answer, but at the very least, he did not wish to affirm it with his own words due to the feeling of defeat it would cause him.

Witch: "How obstinate you are."

Without getting exasperated, the Witch left a mutter that failed to comprehend his emotions, but her hand ceased not. It was unclear whether its motion was intended to be consolation or gratitude.

Only, what Aldebaran desired was neither of those things, and even if the Witch who was giving it to him did not know that, it was fine as long as the recipient, Aldebaran, knew.

Witch: “I don’t ever get fed up with things.”

Aldebaran: “—. Ah?”

Witch: “Your question from earlier. You asked me if I ever get fed up, correct?”

The Witch’s answer, lagging two steps behind, caused Aldebaran to blink his eyes.

Ultimately, it had just been pillow talk, not something he particularly wanted to discuss in depth. That which would have been fine to forget in the exchange up to this point, he pondered the significance of the Witch answering it here.

Aldebaran: “So then, I shouldn’t give up either?”

Witch: “Albeit, you are free to interpret it as you will. As a matter of fact, from my perception, you lifted your head just before I could lower my hand, the reality is that I did not place my hand upon you. Correct?”

Aldebaran: “…”

Witch: “Thus, there is no concern of me being troubled. Does that relieve you?”

The question voiced alongside a smile, Aldebaran found himself at a loss for words again.

He did not want to think that he was no match for her. So let it be left as him being no match for her yet. After all, one day, Aldebaran would need to battle against something far greater, and he would need to win.

Indeed, it happened when he became aware of the silent discomfort deep within his chest.

Witch: “—There.”

Suddenly, his head was lifted from where it lay, and underneath it slipped a soft sensation. The Witch had visibly kneeled down on the verdant plain, placing Aldebaran’s head upon her own lap.

The lap pillow that had been rejected a moment prior because it would lead to something bad. Why, had that suddenly—

Witch: “I was exaggerating. I am a nasty Witch, you know?”

As the Witch triumphed with a single eye closed, Aldebaran sighed and relaxed his shoulders. He would at least put his body weight into his head, and attempt to inflict the greatest extent of damage as he could to the Witch’s legs.

By the Witch who had killed him the most in this world, that amount of revenge ought to be forgiven.

To Be Continued

Comic Alive Collection 12

First Mission
(CA)
(LQ AI Translation)

1

Girl: “—Watch out!”

???: “—Hk”

Following that sharp, high cry, he scooped up her slender waist on impulse and slipped through the storm of bare blades.

In that split second, the keen edge of those sword strikes nearly grazed his nape and shoulder. The sensation made the down on his still-unseasoned body bristle, and as they tumbled across the floor of an empty room they had leapt into, he was made to feel that he had scraped by with his life.

Had his reaction been a heartbeat slower, one of his limbs—or perhaps his head—would have gone flying.

Assailant: “…Good judgment. It does not look like it was by chance, does it?”

While the two of them were in dread, the one who had unleashed those bare blades only grew more wary.

From the feel of it, he seemed certain his sword had not struck true. On top of that, he was clearly gauging their fighting strength as something that could not be taken lightly.

Girl: “We knew it, but he is a tough opponent.”

As though reading what was in his chest, the one who had rolled into the empty room with him—a girl marked by flame-like red hair and beautiful blue eyes—said so.

There was no tremor in her voice. Yet it was not as though she had leeway to spare; that much could be gleaned from the earnestness of her profile. He could not overlook that—why?

Because it was the duty of a knight to protect the common folk, to protect the weak who were trampled by the strong.

???: “You saved me just now. I am in your debt.”

Girl: “…What do you intend to do?”

???: “Naturally, I would have liked to face him head-on and aboveboard… or so I wish I could say.”

Lying prone on the floor, a bold answer to the girl’s quiet question would have lacked persuasiveness.

In truth, even if he wished to realize it, he was lacking in strength as he was now. No matter how lofty it was, without the ability to see it done, entrusting one’s wish to the starry sky was no different.

Therefore—

???: “Let us contrive and challenge him. Once more, I apologize for imposing inconvenience on you.”

Girl: “I do not mind that at all. It seems you and I are in the same boat. Ah, just one thing.”

???: “—? What is it?”

Loosening the arm that held her close, the two of them traded glances while lying on the grimy floor. The girl’s beautiful face was right beside him; it curved into a slightly mischievous smile,

Girl: “I think that way of speaking suits you far better.”

???: “—. That is, in truth, an honor.”

For an instant, he was taken off guard, but a reply from the heart, not mere courtesy, spilled out.

If this manner of speech was called fitting for him, then perhaps even this disgraceful state he had fallen into was not entirely without worth. Thinking so, he reached for the hilt of the sword at his own waist.

He shut his eyes, steadied his breathing, and in the scant time he had, looked back upon the road he had walked thus far, upon what he had built up—then, with his eyes opening, he rose.

???: "—Let us go, my buds."

Answering that call, he felt a pale six-hued radiance lend him strength, and, moving to shield the red-haired girl, he stepped forth to face his first battle to the death.

—It was the climax of an unforgettable fight from the days when Julius Juukulius, who would one day be called the Finest, was still unseasoned.

2

—The Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica is a nation of knights.

Though it was a somewhat exaggerated expression, Julius Juukulius understood that it was not far off the mark.

Of course, at the summit of the Kingdom of Lugunica stood the king, and there were the members of the royal family connected to him. As objects of reverence, there was also the existence of the Dragon, which had long forged bonds of friendship with the kingdom.

Then, setting aside such noble beings, why could one presume to call it a nation of knights?

Because unlike those noble existences who were special from birth, a knight was something that, though not special, one could arrive at by training oneself, honing one's skills, and holding fast to one's aspirations. —Because he believed that what people look to as something they wish to become is, in truth, what is truly admired.

Therefore—

???: “—Julius Juukulius, is it.”

Called by name by that heavy, severe voice, Julius consciously straightened his back.

His attire was the honored Royal Knights’ uniform of the Kingdom of Lugunica, predominantly white, and he wore a blue mantle. Even when he checked his whole figure in the full-length mirror every morning, he could not yet relinquish the self-assessment that the clothes were still wearing him.

Even so, he felt that the joy of being able to don this uniform would not fade, even if someday the figure reflected in the mirror were to become familiar to him.

That was the definite sentiment of Julius, who had become a member of the Royal Knights at the tender age of sixteen.

???: “You have only just joined, but I hear you are a promising prospect. They say you are quite driven.”

Directly before Julius, the large man, cramped in his chair, flipped through the papers spread across his work desk and fixed him with an intimidating gaze.

Though still in the midst of his growth, Julius stood around the average height for a man, yet this man’s body was more than a size larger, his whole frame clad in a burly armor of thick, sturdy muscle. Simply by being there, he radiated a fierce aura—small wonder, to be sure.

For the man before him was—

Julius: “I am obliged by your excessive appraisal. —Captain Marcos.”

Saying so, Julius bowed deeply to the giant before him—Marcos Gildark, who served as the head of the Royal Guard of the Kingdom of Lugunica.

As far as Julius was concerned, he had meant to infuse that bow with a faint tension and a certain respect. However, at the newcomer knight's words, Marcos himself carved a deep furrow between his brows.

Marcos: "…I see. Just as I was told—you carry it off well."

Julius: "Captain?"

Marcos: "Pay it no mind; it is my own thought. More importantly, being called "Captain" is… ah, no, this is no time to be saying that. Good grief, this too is something I shall struggle to grow accustomed to."

At Julius, who had arched a brow, Marcos rubbed the furrow in his brow with his fingers as if to ease it.

There was no room to infer anything about the first half, which he had muttered to himself and cut short, but the intent of the latter half's grumbling Julius could more or less grasp. —It was a gripe about being elevated to the rank of Captain.

Marcos, known for his high prowess and many achievements, had been appointed to the captaincy of the illustrious Royal Guard at roughly the same time Julius's admission into the knights had been approved—about one month ago.

So to speak, just as Julius was a rookie as a knight, Marcos was likewise a rookie in his position as Captain of the Guard.

For that reason, even the atmosphere of the captain's office in the knights' station had not yet been fully dyed in Marcos's colors or scent.

Julius: "Even so, if I may be permitted to say something presumptuous from my youthful station, I would submit that you already have ample gravitas befitting the head of the knights, Captain Marcos."

Marcos: "So in other words, you want to say I have an old face?"

Julius: "N-No, I would never intend such a thing…"

Marcos: "Let it pass—it is a jest. That said, it is not so easy to let the words of a superior pass so simply, is it."

Julius: "I am grateful for your understanding."

Marcos: "For my part—no, I too had a time when I was a newcomer, just like you and the other knights. There was a time when I quailed before a terrifyingly capable superior."

He shrugged shoulders as big as a child's head as he spoke, and Julius closed his mouth.

From the flow of the conversation, the last thing he had said likely had not been a joke, yet it still sounded like something that could only be taken as a joke.

Despite appearances, Julius prided himself on knowing more than most about the Royal Knights.

Naturally, he had known of Marcos even before the latter had taken on the captaincy; he had known of his exploits from around ten years prior, when he began to make his mark as a knight. Every rumor of his feats was as outlandish and vivid as if drawn from a picture tale of an age long past, and he was without doubt one of the knightly figures Julius yearned after.

That such a man had had a superior he feared was quite the astonishing tidbit indeed. Of course, it was likely a quip meant to ease Julius's tension—

Julius: "Forgive me, but would that superior be Sir Wilhelm van Astrea, the "Sword Demon"?"

Marcos: "—. I am surprised. How did you know?"

Julius: "It was not a certainty. Only, during the time you have served among the knights, if there were any spoken of on a par with you, Captain, the candidates naturally narrowed."

Before Marcos, who had slightly raised his brows, Julius replied thus, and inwardly nodded, thinking, As I thought.

—The "Sword Demon" Wilhelm van Astrea was a master swordsman whose name shone brilliantly in the history of the Kingdom of Lugunica, and he had served as Captain of the knights two captains before Marcos. Though he had long since left the order, he remained a great man whose feats would not weather from memory.

Wilhelm, too, was one of the knights who set Julius's heart ablaze.

Julius: "Presumptuous as it is, to be granted an opportunity to exchange words with you, Captain, and on top of that to be able to speak of Sir Wilhelm, one of the former captains—it is an honor."

Marcos: "For my part, I find it alarming that a newcomer who has only just entered knows the order far too well. The Juukulius family has long been a house of knights, but did you hear all this from your father, Lord Jonas?"

Julius: "No, in matters like these my younger brother is very well informed. He rejoiced at my entry into the order more than I myself did—it is a younger brother I can rely upon."

Marcos: "I see. In that case, I shall look forward to your younger brother's entry as well."

To Marcos's words, Julius responded with a faint smile that lowered the ends of his brows.

He felt apologetic for rousing expectations where none were ill meant, but as for Julius's younger brother—Joshua—whether he could enter the order was uncertain. His brother had been frail from birth, and though his condition was far more stable now than before, there were times he would still come down with a fever and have to lie abed.

Precisely because of that, Julius admonished himself that he must strive as a knight for his brother's portion as well.

If he were to obey that self-admonition—

Marcos: "We have strayed a little too far from the main topic."

No sooner had Julius thought so than Marcos's tone changed.

Once more, Julius recovered the initial tension with which he had been summoned and tightened his expression.

As stated above, Julius was still a fresh recruit who had joined the order only one month before.

The blue mantle that indicated his affiliation was of the Second Army; though he and Marcos belonged to the same knights, Marcos was the Captain of the Royal Guard—the most elite—and thus someone with whom Julius had little occasion to cross paths.

Julius had been summoned despite that. There had to be a reason.

And that—

Marcos: "According to the record, you are not the biological son of Lord Jonas Juukulius, but his adopted child… until you were taken in by your present house, you were raised as a commoner. Is that correct?"

Julius: "—. Yes. If you have seen the records, then there is no mistake."

Marcos: "Hm."

Julius: "However, though I am adopted, my father… Jonas Juukulius, gave me all the education I required. I can say with pride that I am a man of House Juukulius."

Marcos: "Wait—do not jump to conclusions. I have no wish to make a scapegoat of your birth and question whether you are fit for the order. I told you, did I not—you are a promising prospect."

Checked by Marcos's upraised palm, Julius, who realized his own impatience, felt ashamed of himself.

A surplus of words was a sign of a guilty conscience or of lack of self-confidence. He had to recognize that such a thing, not only for himself but toward the father and brother who had welcomed him and toward House Juukulius, was an act that brought them shame.

As Julius reflected thus, Marcos gave a small snort and said, Marcos: “A strong will not to lose is a fine thing. Only, if you have your own thoughts about your birth, I would have you make full use of them.”

Julius: “…My birth, you say? I apologize, but I do not follow.”

Marcos: “Indeed. Let us at last proceed with the matter. —Enter.”

After responding to Julius, who had furrowed his brows, Marcos struck the desk with some force. At that sound as a signal, the door at the room’s entrance behind Julius opened. Stepping slowly into the office was an elderly man clad in a knight’s uniform.

Welcoming the man, Marcos jerked his chin toward Julius before the desk and said,

Marcos: “Sir Bikram, my apologies for the wait. The man you requested—Julius Juukulius.”

Bikram: “Hm…”

Introduced by Marcos, the elderly knight ran a glare up and down Julius. For a time, the old knight scrutinized Julius closely, then said,

Bikram: “Captain, is he not a bit too refined? Will this young whelp do?”

Marcos: “To be frank, it is an unknown. But the one who best matches the conditions raised is this man. Julius, as for this gentleman…”

Julius: “You are Sir Bikram Edditz, are you not?”

Leaning forward, Julius asked so, and both Marcos and the old knight widened their eyes. Before the reaction of the two, Julius laid a hand to his chest and said,

Julius: “Speaking of Sir Bikram Edditz—head of House Edditz, which has produced knights for generations, and the “Silver Knight” who boasts the longest tenure currently in the Royal Knights. You commanded the subjugation of the Dawn Brigade, which had widely made the Castour Plains its base, and at the hunt hosted by His Highness the First Prince, Zabinel, on the Hyclara Plateau, I believe you hold the record for the largest quarry…"

Bikram: "Hey… hey, Marcos! This young whelp, what is he—what is he?!"

Marcos: "He is that sort, apparently. And for the record, do treat me as "Captain.""

At Julius, who had spoken with unintentional warmth, the old knight—Bikram Edditz—grimaced. In response, Marcos heaved an exaggerated sigh and looked at Julius.

Marcos: "It seems introductions are unnecessary, but as you surmised, this is Sir Bikram. This time, you will be placed under his command."

Julius: "Under Sir Bikram's command, is it? That is an honor."

Bikram: "What a disconcerting whelp…"

Turning to the mustached Bikram, whose white hair mixed into his lip whiskers, Julius straightened his posture.

To be able to face the same mission alongside a venerable senior who had served the kingdom as a Royal Knight for many years—there were few opportunities as blessed as this.

Whatever the mission might be—thinking so, Julius held his chest high with rising spirit.

Julius: "Then, what kind of mission shall it be?"

Bikram: "—A crackdown on Hexel."

Having let that enthusiasm into his voice, Julius drew in a breath at Bikram's reply.

In Bikram's bitter tone, there was a manifest loathing and hostility toward it. Little wonder. The “Hexel” he named was—

Bikram: “A banned drug that is circulating mainly through the lower strata of the Royal Capital. I want its distribution wiped out to the roots.”

If left unchecked, it would spread through the whole of the Kingdom of Lugunica, a drug harm that could ruin the nation.

Its prevention was the grave mission given to Julius Juukulius, who was no more than a new recruit.

3

—“Hexel” is a banned drug whose name has lately come to be heard in the Royal Capital.

It is made from a nut called the bokko fruit. Normally, when you bite into it, it has the effect of activating the Mana within the body, but when its components are extracted and concentrated, it becomes this drug.

Upon ingestion, the user’s Gate—the pathway through which Mana flows—becomes violently excited, and a quantity of Mana incomparable to normal circulates throughout the entire body. That state is said to bring the user a strong sense of release and omnipotence, and to produce an effect that wells up a life force that does not run dry for several days, even without food or drink.

It is, indeed, a set of effects that calls to mind the panaceas told of in picture tales, but—

Bikram: “Unfortunately, there’s no such convenient thing. That “vitality” is an advance borrowed against your will to live, and that so-called sense of release or omnipotence is just a plain misunderstanding.”

Without letting his resentful expression slip, Bikram spoke thus of “Hexel.”

In practice, it seems to be a banned drug whose sales channels have continued to expand with the impoverished as the main customer base.

Its spread threatens to send the Royal Capital, and by extension the entire kingdom, into dysfunction and even to disturb the nation’s peace.

Therefore—

Bikram: “No matter what it takes, we’re going to eradicate all the “Hexel” in circulation. That’s our mission.”

Julius: “Yes, I agree. The spread of a banned drug must be stopped without fail. However…”

Bikram: “What is it?”

Julius confided his honest feelings to Bikram, whose wrinkled face had taken on a severe look.

He had been ordered by Marcos to serve under Bikram’s command on the task of cracking down on “Hexel.” That was fine. However, taken along by Bikram, Julius had now left the knights’ station and was seated at a table in a common eatery in the Commoner District of the Royal Capital.

He had taken it for granted that they would meet up with other comrades here, but there was no sign of that.

Julius: “More than anything, it is perplexing that we were told to gather after removing our knights’ uniforms. By rights, this is a problem that ought to be pacified even if it means mobilizing the entire order. Wearing our knightly uniforms and, as a unit, conducting the inquiry should be the proper course. And yet—”

Bikram: “We aren’t doing that. So you think there’s something behind it? Well, broadly speaking, you’re right.”

Julius: “…Then, as I feared, are there no personnel besides you and me, Sir Bikram?”

Despite the fact that it was his own guess, Julius widened his eyes in disbelief when it was affirmed.

He had taken off the honored uniform and was in a plain, collared, light outfit devoid of ornament. Facing him across the table, Bikram, too, wore commoner's clothes of a sort that would blend into the streetscape.

Even from that fact, he had guessed there were circumstances preventing a knights-like inquiry—but merely the two of them—what's more, while Bikram was a veteran knight with a wealth of experience, his partner was Julius, genuinely an all-too-unseasoned knight; that was going too far, no matter what.

At Julius's astonishment, Bikram declared, "Don't get the wrong idea," and said,

Bikram: "I've brought out a greenhorn like you. I wouldn't say "we're rich in manpower" even if my mouth were pried open, but there's no way it's just the two of us, you and me."

Julius: "That was… my apologies. So there is other support."

Bikram: "Yeah, there is… one person."

As Bikram averted his gaze and tacked that on, Julius ended up blinking.

Even with reinforcements, they numbered three; it was hardly a reassuring headcount.

The harm caused by the spread of "Hexel" was not hard to imagine even for Julius, who had yet to hear the particulars. In spite of that, were the order and the kingdom's upper echelons taking the situation lightly?

Julius: "No, that can't be the case."

Denying the thought as it rose, Julius slowly shook his head.

Though Julius was merely a knight—and a brand-new one at that—beyond the reach of his eyes, those with standing, the personnel in key posts, were of course capable. Anything that would occur to Julius after only a brief time hearing about it would long since have been thoroughly considered.

In other words, there was a reason, after correctly treating the situation with due caution, for this number of personnel.

That was—

???: "—If you recklessly deploy personnel, you risk only widening the holes in the concerns. That seems to be what the upper echelons are thinking."

At that voice, cast on him unawares, Julius involuntarily held his breath.

It was a tucked-away table in a common eatery. Resting a hand on the back of the empty chair at Julius and Bikram's table, the speaker directed a gentle smile at the surprised pair.

She was a woman. Not particularly tall, with a slender, willowy frame clad in men's streetwear. Her dark-toned green hair—so deep in color it looked black depending on the light—was gathered at the back of her head, and with long bangs covering one eye, she had an air whose impression was in some way indistinct.

At the woman's sudden arrival, Julius was taken aback for a heartbeat, but quickly regained his composure.

Julius: "Might you be the third ally Sir Bikram told me about?"

???: "Yes, that is correct. You were less perturbed than I expected. That is, that is quite a welcome surprise for us as well."

Bikram: "…You're late, Gatness. Don't keep us waiting so long."

???: "My, my, we are right on time. One must use one's time precisely and carefully. That is the teaching of the one who is the head of us."

Meeting Bikram's sidelong glare with a placid smile, the woman—addressed as Gatness—asked, "May I sit?" The old knight touched his mustache and nodded. Obeying, she sat in the seat beside Bikram, then, turning anew to Julius, said,

Helaine: "Forgive me for the late introduction. We are called Helaine Gatness. As you surmised, I am Sir Bikram's collaborator."

Julius: "Lady Helaine, is it. How courteous of you. I am…"

Helaine: "—Julius Juukulius. The eldest son of House Juukulius, only just assigned to the Second Army of the order a month ago. Said to excel in swordsmanship and to be outstanding in intellect as well, by all accounts."

Julius: "…Every bit of that is an overestimation. I am still immature, both as a knight and as a person."

Told that he was known even before he could give his name, Julius closed one eye.

He had no intention of sizing up the other party—Helaine—but it seemed the other party had already finished doing so for him. And on top of that, that he had not been rejected at the outset meant—

Julius: "May I take it, for the time being, that you will let me hear what you have to say?"

Helaine: "How modest. Not a bad impression, however. Sir Bikram?"

Bikram: "I told him it's about "Hexel," and that it's just us."

Helaine: "Then it seems the essential part has not been told."

Casting a glance at Bikram's sour face, Helaine gave a small sigh. Just then, the server brought drinks, and the milk Helaine had ordered was placed on the table. She put it to her lips, moistening lips and tongue, and said,

Helaine: "The reason this matter has summoned you, who are few in number and a newcomer, is very simple and clear. —It is a countermeasure born of concern over information leaking from the order."

Julius: "—Hk, what do you—"

At the unexpected preface, Julius's yellow eyes flew wide.

Helaine: “We had sensed the movements of “Hexel” from before. Naturally, we requested the order to respond, and had them act several times to crack down on the banned drug, but—”

Bikram: “…We whiffed every time. As if the raid had been known in advance.”

Julius: “Known in advance… Then, you suspect that information leaked from the order? If so, isn’t that a bit hasty?”

Helaine: “Hasty conclusions and snap judgments—such foolish mistakes happen often. Perhaps for that reason, we are taught not to cling to baseless inferences.”

When Julius interjected, thinking it concerned the honor of the order, Helaine narrowed her long, slitted eyes. Caught by that gaze, Julius clamped down on his careless tongue.

Helaine’s age was hard to pin down, but she had likely trod far more boards than Julius had.

Acknowledging that, Julius inclined his head, and Helaine went on, “Accordingly,”

Helaine: “We do have grounds. According to the information we have traced, those handling “Hexel” are an underground organization of washed-up thugs, but the one leading them is Reiner Wahrheit.”

Julius: “Reiner Wahrheit…”

Bikram: “Listen up, Juukulius. That Wahrheit guy is—”

Julius: “If my memory serves, some years ago that man was expelled from the order—dishonorably discharged, was he not?”

Bikram: “You even know about the ones who got expelled?! What in the blazes are you?!”

Apparently thinking Julius would not know, Bikram, who had been about to explain the man in question, turned on him a look as if he were seeing something unbelievable.

Bikram: “Don’t tell me you know not just me and Marcos, but every knight in the kingdom.”

Julius: “That would be overestimating me. I cannot know those I have no way of knowing. Still, “dishonorably discharged” does leave an impression.”

Bikram: “…Even so, it can’t be something that happens once in ten years. You’re abnormal, all right.”

With a shrug at Julius’s reply, Bikram touched his mustache with his fingers as if by habit. Beside him, Helaine laced her fingers together before her face and said,

Helaine: “If you know, then we can be quick. That former knight, Reiner Wahrheit, who was dishonorably discharged from the order, is the tricky one. By all accounts, he was known for bad conduct in the order to begin with, could not fit into any unit, and drifted from corps to corps, and so he is well connected.”

Bikram: “If you start naming the folks who’ve had dealings with Wahrheit, there’s no end to it. That’s why digging out who’s serving as his source of information takes time.”

Julius: “—. I understand. That is why I was called upon.”

From the flow of the conversation, Julius lifted his face, having grasped the role required of him.

Receiving the gazes of both Bikram and Helaine, Julius laid a hand to his chest.

Julius: “Reiner Wahrheit is involved in the distribution of “Hexel.” However, the man in question is a former knight and was also well acquainted with the faces in the order. Therefore, as someone only just entered into the order and whose face is unknown to the enemy, I was a suitable choice.”

Helaine: “To add to that, being capable was also a condition. Even if one’s face is unknown, it is not a role that can be entrusted to someone lacking both skill and wit.”

Bikram: “One more thing—you know at least a little of how commoners live. —From here on, you’ll need to make contact with Wahrheit’s organization and work your way into their inner circle.”

Helaine: “Naturally, the members of the organization are all washed-up thugs… To have someone who knows nothing of that world start acting from scratch would be quite a task. Which is why it must be you.”

Julius: “…”

With his eyes closed, Julius turned his thoughts to the weight of the charge laid upon him.

At the outset, when Marcos had summoned him and touched upon his origins, he had, in an unexpected fluster, offered needless excuses—but never did he imagine there would come an occasion for that to be of use.

Bikram: “Juukulius, can you do it?”

Julius: “—My apologies. I did not keep silent out of fear. It’s only that I never imagined there would be such a turn of the wheel—and I am grateful.”

Bikram: “Grateful for what, you oddball. …Fine. If you say you’ll do it, see it through. I might be a worn-out old man on the verge of retirement, but I can at least watch a rookie’s back.”

Julius: “Yes, sir!”

It was a single line from an all-too-reliable veteran. Buoyed by that cheer, Julius reflexively brought his hand before his chest and gave Sir Bikram his deepest salute.

Immediately after doing so, he remembered that this was a common eatery, and that they had gone to the trouble of taking off their uniforms in order to blend into this place.

Helaine: “A truly enviable rookie, Sir Bikram—most dependable, through and through.”

Bikram: “…Spare me the sarcasm.”

Caught in that blunder by Helaine and Bikram both, Julius reflected on himself at great length.

4

Julius: “May I ask what position you hold, Lady Helaine?”

Helaine: “At the very least, we are not of a birth fine enough to be addressed as “Lady Helaine” by you.”

Julius: “One’s birth does not determine the whole of one’s worth.”

Helaine: “From commoner to knight—coming from such a background yourself, your words carry persuasiveness.”

They left the common eatery and walked through the crowds of the Royal Capital as they spoke. Following behind Helaine, who led the way, Julius gave a wry smile at her answer and touched his bangs.

Whether it was simply her nature not to let others in, or something in Julius’s conduct had rubbed her the wrong way, he could not tell, but she did not seem to think highly of him. Unfortunately, the one man who might have mediated between them—Bikram—had split off to act elsewhere back at the eatery.

From this point onward, Bikram—whose face was highly likely to be known to the other side—could not be involved.

Julius: “Given there are no women among the knights, you likely do not belong to the order, yet you are far too seasoned to be called a townswoman in cooperation with us… Am I talking too much?”

Helaine: “If you have realized it yourself, that is fine. We shall not scold you. It is only natural for anyone to be nervous on a first assignment.”

Julius: “Your thoughtfulness is appreciated.”

Helaine: “—It is forbidden for us to voice our affiliation aloud. So we will only say that your thinking is not wide of the mark, Sir

Julius.”

She flicked her gaze his way as she added that, and Julius inclined his head.

She did not belong to the order, but neither was she unrelated to it. —Naturally, his understanding of the knights had become worlds apart from when he had admired them, now that he had actually joined. Before joining, there had been plausible-sounding rumors of knightly corps beyond the First through Fourth and the Royal Guard; but once he became a member of the order, he quickly realized there was no room for such rumors.

On the other hand, when he considered the room for a figure like Helaine to be involved, it was also true that the rumored existence of “shadow” knights stirred a half-doubting, half-believing feeling within him.

Helaine: “Do not harbor careless curiosity. We would like to remain on good terms with you, Sir Julius.”

Julius: “…If that is not a honeyed pleasantry but your true feeling, I am glad.”

Helaine: “Probing that is precisely what we would call careless curiosity. Take care. —Know that our eyes and hands are everywhere, and they reach anywhere.”

Feeling the weight of those words, Julius widened his eyes, then nodded and gave up on pressing further. That had been a warning to Julius, given out of Helaine’s own kind of sincerity.

Whatever Helaine’s affiliation was, it was certain she stood in a position of wearing herself down for the kingdom’s sake, and that she was in cooperation with Julius and Bikram, who were members of the order.

For now, knowing that much, there was nothing else he needed.

And then—

Helaine: “—Here.”

After they had walked along the streets of the Royal Capital for a time, Helaine stopped and said so.

They had left the Commoner District where the eatery was and reached the circular capital's outer rim—a quarter chiefly inhabited by low-income laborers and even those so poor that living day to day was in doubt—a place called the slums. It was a district with a reputation that even the knights' patrols deliberately turned a blind eye to. Led to a wooden building that looked like nothing so much as a hovel, Julius held his breath.

From here on was the heart of the role entrusted to him—

No sooner had he steeled himself than a man called out from the hovel.

Blau: "Yo, Helena."

The one who raised a hand and called to them was a gaunt man with a rough air. The man, who had a scar on his cheek, called Helaine—there with Julius—"Helena." To that hail, Helaine raised her own hand with an "Ah," and said,

Helaine: "Well now, they've got you stuck on the door today, Blau? Plenty of younger lads around, and they're still working you to the bone."

With her first words, her brash tone and voice rang out, and Helaine's aura changed in an instant. Between the setting and her clothing, she blended instantly into the neighborhood. Julius restrained the urge to clap at the transformation and kept his expression steady.

After all, Julius was already within the man's line of sight. The battle had already begun. He could not stand on the battlefield unguarded and unarmed.

Paying no heed to Julius's tension, the man called Blau laughed at Helaine's greeting with a "You said it," then slanted a glare Julius's way.

Blau: "So, that the guy? The one?"

Helaine: “Yeah. Came by way of my cousin’s introduction. Got himself wanted back home, so he fled to the Royal Capital—a marked man. Go on, tell him your name.”

‘Julius’ was slapped on the back by Helaine and shoved toward Blau.

Along the way here, Julius had already been given his role—the standing he was to play in infiltrating the other side’s organization. All that remained was to play it through.

He drew a breath—making sure it would not rouse Blau’s suspicion—and then—

Julius: “—Name’s Julius. I’ve heard about you lot from Helena. Not that I care for that story about me sneaking off with my tail between my legs—don’t go believing that.”

Blau: “Oh yeah? Then what are we supposed to believe?”

Julius: “The reason I had to leave my hometown… the fact I cut down about five of the lord’s high-and-mighty soldiers.”

Stepping forward slowly, Julius said this as he closed the distance with Blau. Stared down at point-blank range, Blau was struck dumb.

At first, he had been the one sizing Julius up; now his eyes were swallowed by Julius’s bearing.

By the hardened demeanor of the ill-mannered ruffian persona Julius had crafted—“Julius.”

Blau: “…From the looks of it, he’s got guts. And skill too. That thing at his waist ain’t cheap either, is it?”

Julius: “Yeah, that’s right. The guy I cut down can’t use it anymore.”

Helaine pressed a hand to Julius’s shoulder from behind; shaking it off, he answered.

The soiled streetwear and rough manner, paired with the knight’s sword at his waist that did not match them, marked ‘Julius’ as having taken his weapon off an enemy—truly the sign of a dangerous man.

Blau: “Y-Yeah, you’ve got guts, I’ll give you that. Fine, I’ll take you inside. If the Boss approves, you’re officially one of us.”

Julius: “The Boss, huh. He got a proper head on his shoulders? I don’t keep company with mere idiots.”

Blau: “Watch your mouth. Tuck that damn bravado away in front of the Boss. He doesn’t show mercy. And he’s sharp. He was a knight, after all.”

Julius: “—A knight.”

At how readily Blau had revealed that their head was a former knight, Julius narrowed his eyes. Blau seemed to take Julius’s silence for surprise at the title. Relaxing his slightly stiff cheeks and smirking, he jerked his chin at Helaine.

Blau: “Helena, the rest’s our business. If this pretty boy suits the Boss’s eye, we’ll pay you.”

Helaine: “Hah? I don’t get paid now? That’s not what I heard.”

Blau: “Shut it. Wanna haggle with the Boss yourself? Pin your hopes on the pretty boy.”

Helaine: “Tch… Julius! You botch this and I won’t forgive you! My livelihood’s riding on you too—pay me back proper!”

Her face twisted with all the baseness in the world, Helena spat her lines—her acting was on a par with a stage performer’s. Beneath the rough words, she slipped in encouragement: “Do not botch the mission for the kingdom.” Then she departed.

Watching her back as she went, Julius was left alone in the enemy camp. Even so, he felt no unease.

The persona ‘Julius’ was not the sort of man to lose his nerve here, and above all, he had Helaine’s reassuring words: “Our eyes and hands are always everywhere.”

Therefore—

Julius: “Well then, let’s get an audience with this Boss of yours. I’m looking forward to meeting him.”

Wearing the kind of belligerent grin befitting ‘Julius,’ Julius strode boldly into the enemy stronghold.

5

—As stated above, Reiner Wahrheit was a man dishonorably discharged from the order.

There were, broadly speaking, two kinds of people who became knights: those by birth and those by achievement. In the latter case, many, to pass through that narrow gate, strove to act knightly—indeed, to act more knightly than those who had become knights by virtue of their birth.

Conversely, among those who had inevitably obtained a knight’s station by birth, there were those who never established their own knightliness, receiving only the rank, and who, as a result, would often clash with knights who were not like that.

To gather together such people of differing backgrounds, there existed strict regulations; through daily duties and training as knights, and by following those regulations amid grueling work, the knights drew nearer in body and spirit to the image of the guardians the kingdom sought.

If only everyone could become knightly alike—but reality did not bend so neatly.

Some could not keep up with such regulations and hardships, broke ranks, stained their hands with crime, and by their own actions sullied the honor of knighthood.

Reiner Wahrheit was one of those who strayed from the knight’s path and was expelled—guilty of cutting down and killing a noble’s servant who had interjected into an escort plan.

Ordinarily, it should have been an inescapable capital crime that would see him chained in prison as a felon; yet by the intercession of the noble in question, he escaped severe punishment and was merely stripped of his knighthood.

After that, since he had joined an underground organization and involved himself in the trade of drugs, all one could say was that he had trampled the noble's clemency underfoot, but—

Reiner: "—You're the one who wants to join us, the new guy?"

Saying so, the man with an eyepatch over his left eye—Reiner Wahrheit—turned a blunt, one-eyed stare on Julius.

He had the fierce face of a man in his thirties and gave the impression of a bird of prey. His good posture and bearing called to mind how well he must have worn the uniform in his knightly days. Yet, in his current state, fallen among roughnecks, the coarse getup that heightened his air of menace also suited him well.

From that aura alone, it was more than plain: this was no ordinary man.

Julius: "…"

Within the range of that single eye, Julius quietly took stock of the room.

It was a wide chamber in the hovel; they had knocked down the partition walls to force out a big open space. Blau stood at his side, and Reiner stood before him. Besides the two, there were perhaps ten other members of the underground outfit who had come to get a look at the newcomer's face.

One by one, he stole glances at them, checking whether any of those faces matched any in his memory. He did not want to imagine there was anyone besides Reiner connected to the order.

—And then, just as he thought that.

Julius: "…"

Catching sight of the figure leaning against the wall at the edge of the men clustered to one side of the room, Julius drew a sharp breath.

It was not a known face. It was someone he had never seen. Nor did the other party have any special reaction to Julius. —Even so, the blazing red hair, the pair of blue eyes that had swallowed the azure of the sky, and a face so well-formed that those vivid features did not lose their luster—she was a girl who drew the eye in an uncanny way.

Those overly conspicuous outward features clawed at Julius's chest for a reason other than beauty.

While Julius's heart simmered thus, the girl herself stood quietly at the fringe among dangerous men, comporting herself as if trying to become a wallflower—a thing impossible even if she wished—and —

Reiner: "Going by what I hear, you caused quite a stir back where you're from. Where are you out of?"

Julius: "—. Down south, a backwoods mountain town called Guineb. It's a run-down place with nothing but exhausted mines. The lord of those parts is a greedy swine gone soft with fat. His men were trash, too."

Reiner: "So you cut down the lord's soldiers and got yourself wanted, huh. Can't say I don't get the sentiment."

Though his mind had been tugged toward the girl, Julius reacted without missing a beat when Reiner continued. Without showing the inner agitation on his face, he delivered the prepared backstory for 'Julius'—a feat he allowed himself to take pride in.

The backstory Bikram and Helaine had set up for 'Julius' overlapped in points with the reason for Reiner's expulsion. The idea had been that it would not leave a bad impression.

In practice, Reiner nodded, seemingly satisfied, with an "I see, I see," and said, Reiner: “In that case, there ought to be a wanted poster or two out there, right? Gineb and the surrounding region… Can’t imagine a more uncomfortable place to be.”

In an instant, he presented the best possible move to verify ‘Julius’s’ background.

The incident ‘Julius’ had “caused” was large. It was only natural for Reiner to think that way. Such a move had been within their prior expectations. But to have it brought to bear this quickly set Julius’s blood running cold.

It was a pity that such prudence and judgment had not been put to proper use as a knight.

Reiner: “What’s wrong? Cat got your tongue?”

Julius: “No—if it bothers you, go ahead and look. I’m curious myself what kind of wanted poster they’ve put out on me. I’m sure they’ve drawn me an ugly bastard. —That aside,”

Reiner: “What?”

Julius: “From what I heard, “former knight” isn’t just for show. I was worried a gang’s head might be a simpleton, but it seems that was needless.”

With a shrug, Julius shaped a measuring smile and answered Reiner.

Setting aside how he used that intellect, praising its sharpness was his honest feeling.

He could tell the others in the room were nodding, as if of course, at ‘Julius’s’ remark. Only the red-haired girl who had caught his eye earlier remained unmoved, but—

Reiner: “—Who told you that?”

At the sudden chill in Reiner’s voice, gooseflesh raced over Julius’s skin.

He looked and found Reiner's single eye narrowed, a baleful anger seeping into his gaze as he glared at Julius. Bewildered as to the cause of that emotion, Julius jerked his chin and said,

Julius: "Him. At the door, he was laying it on thick about how you were some big-shot head…"

Reiner: "At the door! Hey now, Blau. You been out there blabbing my history loud enough for the street to hear? Or are you whispering it into the ear of every last person who sets foot in this building?"

Blau: "N-No, I didn't mean it like that, Boss, I—"

Reiner: "Quiet."

He cut off the trembling Blau with that word, then slowly shook his head and lifted a hand to point at Julius.

Reiner: "You came here to sell your skill, didn't you. An opportunity's come around for you to show what you can actually do."

Julius: "—You don't mean."

Reiner: "A brainless chatterbox only disrupts our circle."

Blau: "W-Wait, what?!"

At Reiner's merciless words, Julius narrowed his eyes, and Blau let out a voice like a scream.

Sensing his boss's intention, the surrounding men slowly formed a ring in the hall. They locked down the doorway tight, blocking the path to prevent any escape.

And in the center of that ring stood two men: Julius and Blau.

Blau: "Boss! Give me a break! It's only 'cause this guy shot his mouth off—!"

Reiner: "Tch. Don't make me deal with more trouble when we're short on hands, you idiot.”

Blau: “U, gh…!”

Blau’s desperate excuses no longer reached Reiner’s ears. Drained of voice, Blau turned to Julius with a pallid face glazed with cold sweat and a pained expression. A large knife was clenched in his hand; his intent could not have been clearer.

Julius: “Don’t. You won’t beat me.”

Blau: “Shut up! You heard him! It’s not a matter of “do it” or “don’t”! You—you’re a damned jinx! You piece of shit!”

Julius: “…”

At the bloodshot-eyed Blau’s curse, Julius was ashamed of his own shortsightedness.

In this situation, it was Blau, not Julius, who saw reality for what it was. No matter what ‘Julius’ might claim, he could not change Reiner’s mind. Then should he reveal himself here and now and subdue everyone in the room at once?—No. If he could do that, the order would never have bothered with such a roundabout undercover operation.

That was not the way. It would not get them to Hexel’s source, its distribution channel, or a full sweep.

Therefore—

Julius: “—No matter what, I have to hold my ground here.”

Drawing the sword that, by his setup, ‘Julius’ had taken from a man he had killed, Julius leveled his gaze squarely at Blau.

Blau: “U, a, aaaa—!!”

In the next instant, Blau, desperate, raised his knife and charged.

No doubt anger and panic had robbed him of his calm. Even discounting that, it was an awkward, unrefined attack far removed from sophistication. —To it, Julius calmly met the blade with his drawn point and—

Julius: “I will not ask forgiveness.”

With a single strike, he beat aside the knife, and with a second, a thrust, he pierced Blau through the chest.

It was a merciless blow, as if to run through the man’s heart at the center of his gaunt body. Struck by the blow, Blau’s eyes flew wide; he glanced down at his chest with an “ah,” and collapsed.

Julius pulled the blade free from the forward-falling body and quietly returned it to the scabbard.

Then he turned—

Julius: “As requested, I believe I’ve proven my skill. Any complaints?”

Reiner: “—Hmph.”

At the question, Reiner snorted. —Beside his face, a knife was buried in the wall.

It was the one Julius had knocked from Blau’s hand. Reiner seized it, yanked it free, and handed it to a subordinate standing nearby.

Reiner: “For the time being, I’ll concede that you can handle yourself. —Your first job. Dispose of the body.”

Julius: “Working me hard, aren’t you.”

Reiner: “Show me you’re useful. You’re someone who wants cover too, aren’t you, Julius.”

At Reiner’s testing tone, Julius exhaled and hefted Blau’s fallen body onto his shoulder. Perhaps thanks to Reiner’s last remark, no one around moved to help him.

Julius shot them an exaggerated look of disgust and headed for the hall’s entrance. He shouldered aside those blocking the door with a “You’re in my way,” and, as instructed, went to dispose of Blau.

—All without letting the relief show on his face at the fact that no one had offered to help.

6

Julius: “Listen. Stay put and rest until you can move. If they find out you’re alive, both your life and mine will be in danger. You don’t want that, do you?”

Blau: “Th-That’s… but why—”

Julius: “I don’t bear you any grudge. I’m not some lunatic who wants to cut down anyone and everyone.”

Saying that, Julius turned his back on Blau—who ought to have been dead—and left the ruin.

In the slums, where development had been abandoned and the houseless had made their homes, there were many such derelict buildings that still kept the shape of a house. Those ruins often became the scene of wrongdoing, and when the knights raided them, they would be completed as true ruins that no one would go near.

For the Royal Capital’s administration, they were a source of headaches; but in situations like this, a ruin no one would come to was convenient—such as when you wanted to hide, from prying eyes, someone you were supposed to have killed.

Julius: “…”

He did not kill Blau—he treated his wounds and ordered him to rest.

When Reiner had ordered him to “take care of” the man, Julius’s heart had gone ice-cold, and he had braced himself for an early failure on his first assignment. But he had somehow gotten through with skill and ingenuity.

Julius: “Ia, Kua, my thanks.”

As Julius murmured that, two faint lights softly rose into being around him.

A pale red and a pale blue glow. Living lights with no corporeal form—they were the dependable spirits who had made a Contract with Julius and had remained by his side.

Borrowing the power of the two Quasi Spirits of fire and water, Julius had staged the conclusion of the scene and put on a performance of having killed Blau.

Fortunately, it seemed Reiner had not realized that Julius was a Spiritual Arts User, and the trick by which Blau had been kept alive had gone unnoticed.

Even so, the unbroken tension, mental and physical alike, left him suddenly exhausted.

Julius: “With this—”

???: “You managed to slip into the organization safely… right?”

Julius: “—Hk.”

Before he could finish giving voice to that relief, a voice whispered by his ear like an ambush. Julius sprang away, body tensed to the utmost. Before he even touched down, he had drawn his sword and set the two Quasi Spirits he had already manifested—Ia and Kua—on alert as well.

What in the world—who—and with what intent—

???: “That’s far enough!”

Julius: “—…”

???: “Sorry to startle you. But please wait. I have no hostile intent toward you.”

Skidding his heel against the ground and readying himself, Julius widened his eyes at the other, who held both hands up.

Standing there was the red-haired girl he had seen in the underground outfit's hovel. Which meant Julius's deed had been exposed to one of Reiner's people.

Naturally, that meant that whatever it took, Julius now had to silence the girl.

However—

Julius: "…"

???: "Will you hear me out?"

The girl asked that, hesitantly, to Julius, who could not quite bring himself to subdue her on the spot. Julius did not relax his guard, but he did nod.

Julius: "First, let me ask. Were you told by the Boss… by Reiner to tail me?"

???: "No, that's not it. Unfortunately, the Boss doesn't trust me that much either. I'm as new as you are, really."

Julius: "A newcomer…"

She shook her head to his question. From her slender build and a face that still held traces of youth, Julius guessed she was two or three years younger than him—about the same age as his brother Joshua. That someone of that age would decide to enter Reiner's outfit made him feel anew his own powerlessness.

But when he had thought that far, Julius reconsidered with a quiet "No."

Julius: "You're new, and you weren't ordered by the Boss. In that position, you went out of your way to call out to me—what for? If you didn't say a word and just reported what you saw to the Boss as-is, that would be more than enough to earn you credit."

???: "That's true. If I felt loyalty to the Boss or the organization, your argument would be spot-on."

Julius: “You’re being roundabout. Then where does your loyalty lie?”

???: “Where it ought to. —With the kingdom, and with my family.”

Lowering her tone a little, the girl put a hand to her chest. Hearing that answer, Julius became certain that the premonition that had flashed through his mind—the thing that had made him think again—had been right.

This girl was a member of Reiner’s organization, but she was not one of his comrades.

If anything—

Julius: “You must have heard, but I’m Julius. And you are?”

???: “—Adelheid.”

Asked her name, the girl—Adelheid—answered readily.

Being able to hear it, Julius now knew when to put his drawn sword away. He also called out to Ia and Kua, his precious Quasi Spirits, “It’s all right,” and released their manifestation.

That should make it plain he had disarmed himself both as a swordsman and as a Spiritual Arts User.

Adelheid: “About that fight earlier—it was truly splendid. Even though you stabbed the center of Blau’s chest, you neatly avoided the heart… was it your spirits who closed the wound?”

She glanced toward the ruin where Blau was and asked that. Julius nodded. “That’s right.”

Julius: “I had the fire spirit freeze the wound to stop the bleeding. After that, the water spirit performed healing arts and kept him alive.”

Adelheid: “Impressive. At first, I didn’t understand what had happened.”

Julius: ""At first," is it—sounds like a quip or a dig. —Do you think the Boss noticed?"

Adelheid: "I don't think he could have. That's how in sync you and your spirits were. Hiding the knightly style of your swordplay and making it look self-taught was perfect, too."

Julius: "You saw through that much…"

Adelheid said it as if impressed, but for Julius, having every bit of the ingenuity he had contrived on the spot seen through left him with nowhere to put himself.

That said, given Adelheid's true identity—her affiliation—it was only natural.

Julius: ""Our eyes and hands are everywhere, and they reach anywhere," was it."

It was just as Helaine had warned Julius.

—Adelheid was someone who shared an affiliation with Helaine, what you might call a member of a shadow order of knights. Or perhaps, given Helaine and then Adelheid, it was an order of knights composed only of women.

Julius: "Now that we're here, there's no room for debate… Adelheid, your objective is—"

Adelheid: "Probably the same as yours. —"Hexel.""

Julius: "The banned drug, and the dismantling of the organization distributing it. For that, we secure Reiner Wahrheit, who leads them, without fail, and uncover those behind him."

When Julius continued thus, Adelheid's blue eyes opened slightly wide. At that reaction, Julius reflected that it certainly hadn't been the sort of summation "Julius" would make.

Even so, for that to be reason enough to switch back his manner of speaking was not wise at this stage.

Julius: “Sorry. I don’t know whose eyes might be on us, so I can’t break this tone.”

Adelheid: “I’m sorry. That’s for the best. I’ll have to be careful not to slip, too.”

Julius: “Do you have any experience with this kind of undercover work?”

Adelheid: “…To tell the truth, this is my first time.”

Julius: “—I see.”

Adelheid’s timid, honest reply drew a nod from Julius. He could have lied about his own experience to reassure her here, but if she was connected to Helaine, it would be a lie that would be exposed at once—and more than that, Julius was already deceiving Reiner and the others about his standing.

He did not want to heap further falsehoods onto an ally.

Julius: “I can’t tell you to rest easy… but this kind of assignment is my first time too.”

Adelheid: “Is that so. In that case…”

Julius: “Yeah. We’ll need to cooperate closely and thoroughly. I’m counting on you.”

When Julius said that and held out his hand, Adelheid fell silent.

For an instant, Julius wondered at her reaction. It seemed the first hesitation and confusion she had shown—an age-appropriate reaction for a girl like Adelheid.

Julius: “Was it rude of me to ask for a handshake, perhaps?”

Adelheid: “—No. That’s not it. It’s not that—it’s my problem. Thank you.”

Shaking her head slowly, Adelheid finally took Julius’s hand. They exchanged a firm handshake. Julius considered what had made her hesitate, but, taking to heart her willingness to accept what he had asked, refrained from pressing further.

Whatever the case, having a comrade who shared his objective was heartening.

Julius: “By the way, how did you get into the organization?”

Adelheid: “I showed off my stealing. In short order, I “borrowed” wallets and bags from about a hundred people on the streets.”

Julius: “That’s…”

Adelheid: “Ah… for the record, I return them properly afterward, all right? I keep track of every single person.”

It was quite a large-scale story, and the matter of making amends was on an even larger scale. In any case, if Adelheid had not taken the same test as “Julius,” then it had been for the best for her.

In any case—

Julius: “It doesn’t look like an easy assignment for either of us… Once again, I’m counting on you, Adelheid.”

Adelheid: “Likewise. I’m glad you’re here, Julius.”

To Julius’s unfeigned words, Adelheid answered with a smile.

Being addressed as “Julius” by that smile, he suddenly wondered if her “Adelheid,” like Helaine’s “Helena,” was also part of a false name.

And with that thought, Julius made up his mind. —In that case, when this assignment ended and the two of them returned safely, he would make it his goal to learn her true name.

7

—The bust of the organization that had been spreading the banned drug “Hexel” throughout the Royal Capital, quietly expanding its threat to the kingdom.

For Julius, who had only just entered the Royal Guard, this first major assignment's greatest obstacle was the existence of the man leading the organization in question—Reiner Wahrheit, a former knight.

Julius: "Originally, the man was not from a knightly family. He was a fellow who made his living as a mercenary on the strength of his sword. His attitude aside, his skill was real, and because of that he was favored by a certain noble… Count Easley Oruon. It seems the Count bestowed a knight's rank upon him and even recommended him to the Royal Guard."

From the circumstances of Reiner's birth, that treatment had been extraordinary, and surely it had also been an event that had changed the course of his life. In fact, Julius had heard that Reiner subsequently entered the Royal Guard, and even among knights his solid swordsmanship had been highly valued.

However—

Julius: "Reiner could not adapt to the Royal Guard's ways. For misconduct he drifted from the First Company to the Fourth, and in the end, during an escort mission—what was more, a mission to escort his benefactor Count Oruon—he got into a quarrel with one of the Count's servants and cut the man down."

Naturally, that deed became a grave problem, and Reiner was expelled from the Royal Guard. Yet by the intercession of none other than the Count himself, he alone was spared being seized as a criminal.

Julius: "No doubt the Count hoped that would make him mend his ways… but judging from what he is doing now, it seems that feeling was trampled underfoot."

How Reiner had come to occupy his present station after leaving the Royal Guard was unknown, but only a few years had passed since his expulsion. It was difficult to imagine that he had a period in which he felt grateful for Count Oruon's kindness and worked to put his life back in order.

Thinking of the Count, who had lost a servant and still continued to believe in Reiner's reform, Julius's chest tightened.

And as Julius was thus seized by that sense of futility—

Julius: "—? What is it, Adelheid, making such a puzzled face?"

Suddenly, he found himself concerned with the condition of the one to whom he had been speaking about Reiner—the girl Adelheid, who had infiltrated the organization with the same objective as Julius.

Leaning her back against a dirty wall in the alley, Adelheid had been silent until now. To Julius's question, she shook her head with a "No," then said,

Adelheid: "Sorry. I was just surprised by how much you know. About the Boss… Reiner Wahrheit—you know him well, huh."

Julius: "It is an infiltration mission. At least this much, it stands to reason I would be informed."

Truth be told, in Julius's case he had known information about Reiner even before being told, but it would be too much to say that everyone ought to have prior knowledge of an expelled knight.

Even so, he believed that, prior to an infiltration mission, a minimum of information ought to be provided; however, the unsettled look on Adelheid's face denied that preconception.

Julius: "…What policy do the people on your side have? I can understand wanting to avoid telling more than necessary in case the infiltration is exposed, but however one looks at it, this is necessary information."

Adelheid: "—. Unfortunately, I can't speak in depth about my circumstances. But the fault is entirely mine. I'm truly grateful that you covered for my lack of prior knowledge."

From Adelheid's contention, Julius sensed less gratitude at having gained information about Reiner, and more fear of having the existence behind herself spoken ill of.

Most likely, Helaine—who had probably stood in the same position as Adelheid—had also conspicuously avoided any mention of her affiliation or superiors. —Such absoluteness was something to be respected if they were to cooperate.

Julius: “Understood. I will not pry into your circumstances. Is that acceptable?”

Adelheid: “Yeah, that helps. …I really am sorry.”

Julius perceived in Adelheid’s rebuttal not contrition but a wish to keep her backer from being slandered, and he did not doubt that.

Julius: “I do not doubt you there. More importantly, what we ought to discuss is “Hexel.” You infiltrated earlier than I did. Is there anything you can tell me?”

Adelheid: “Earlier or not, it’s only been about a week. Right now I’m in the position of a drug peddler, given a small amount and made to stand on the street. They’re cautious about how they conduct their business.”

Julius: “Which means you are in possession of the real thing?”

To Julius, who leaned forward at the unexpected result, Adelheid answered “Of course,” and from her bosom she pinched between her fingertips a paper wrapping—a packet of drugs to show him.

Even the tiniest amount of it could alter a human being’s very state of being, the dreadful banned drug, “Hexel”.

Adelheid: “The organization’s division of roles is thorough. Those who have a way with the sword handle guarding the workplaces, the bases, and the transports. Those with a way with words sell product to customers on the streets or in shops. You’re the former, I’m the latter.”

Julius: “A peddler, then. That is, I suppose, a case of the right person in the right place.”

Frankly, with Adelheid’s looks, she would have no trouble finding customers as a “Hexel” peddler. Whether in a shop or out on the street, she would be able to quickly pick out a suitable mark.

Julius: “That said, even to allay suspicion, you cannot actually go through with selling it. And Reiner is surely not kind to subordinates who produce no results. How are you handling it?”

Adelheid: “Naturally, I make it look like I’ve sold it, and I cover the price myself. I’m neutralizing the actual “Hexel” so it doesn’t end up in anyone’s hands, then disposing of it. Does that put you at ease?”

Julius: “It does. If you can truly neutralize it, that is the best.”

Relieved by Adelheid’s answer, he nonetheless tilted his head at the method of disposal.

If they burned it, even the smoke would be dangerous, and if they buried it, there would be a fear of contaminating the soil. If Adelheid’s or Helaine’s affiliation had found a means of “neutralization,” that would be optimal.

Be that as it may—

Adelheid: “It’s truly a drop in the bucket, but at least this way we’re reducing, even a little, the banned drug that’s circulating among the townsfolk. Only, we can’t pretend the budget for that is infinite. Honestly, it isn’t a method that can last.”

Julius: “Indeed. There is no doubt it is a “better than nothing” measure. In any case, I do not think I will be able to remain “Julius” for long. I would like to settle this in as short a time as possible.”

Adelheid: “I agree with that, but why?”

Julius: “Reiner Wahrheit is dangerous. As you saw, when he tried to have me dispose of the subordinate who leaked his own information to me, he has no hesitation about eliminating nuisances. Next time, it will not go so well.”

That Blau had come away with his life in that place had been the coincidental result of many kinds of fortune piling up.

The trial of the green recruit “Julius,” and a measure of his readiness to include even the disposal of a corpse—Had Reiner purged Blau with his own hand, then even had Julius borrowed the power of the Quasi Spirits, he would not have been able to save him. Julius was not so optimistic as to think that kind of luck would come twice or thrice.

Julius: “I intend to conduct myself so as to arouse as little suspicion as possible, but if an order comes down for an assassination or for an internal purge, I cannot accept it.”

And even if such orders were kept at a distance, he suspected they could not be fully avoided.

Perhaps, for the sake of the mission, he ought to adopt a merciless frame of mind—

Adelheid: “—I agree with you. Even if casualties arise as an unavoidable necessity, up to the very limit a knight should resist that.”

At Adelheid’s show of agreement, Julius drew in a faint breath and nodded.

He ought to be grateful that he had obtained a good partner. This was an infiltration mission he had gone into with his heart prepared to be worn down; the existence of someone with whom he could share that burden saved him, he thought.

Julius: “For the moment, we have our policy. I will see if I can appeal to my superiors to push for a short, decisive campaign. As for you…”

Adelheid: “I’ll keep digging. I’m probably the one who can get close to the drug itself more deftly.”

Julius: “Understood. Only—this is something I need to be careful about as well—but take all possible care that your identity is not exposed. You have heard, I think: they have evaded the Royal Guard’s raids multiple times. I hate to think it, but we must move on the premise there is a mole on the inside.”

Thus did Julius warn Adelheid, his feelings anything but simple.

That a former knight like Reiner was involved was burden enough to his heart; on top of that, there was the fear that a current member of the Royal Guard might be leaking information. Frankly, he did not even wish to consider that possibility.

Adelheid: “A mole… Has the Royal Guard narrowed down who is suspicious?”

Julius: “Whatever the Royal Guard has done, I intend to look upon everyone impartially. If I cannot believe in someone unconditionally simply because they have the title of knight, then the titles of the Captain of the Royal Guard or “the Silver Knight” are no guarantees, either.”

Before he knew it, his bitter true feelings had slipped into his voice, and Julius sternly reflected on his lack of self-control. However, Adelheid did not react to Julius’s immaturity.

Instead, what her lips spun was—

Adelheid: “To look impartially. —Even Heinkel Astrea?”

Julius: “—. What?”

Suddenly presented with an unexpected name, Julius could not help but widen his eyes.

Facing him, Adelheid looked at him quietly, her strikingly well-ordered features filled with a powerful seriousness.

—The name she had given, Heinkel Astrea, belonged to a man of a house known to every citizen of the kingdom, a knight who stood in a special position even within the Royal Guard. Leaving aside the weight of that house name, he was also a person well known for reasons that were not very good.

Why Adelheid would concern herself with such a person—

Julius: “—I see.”

Suddenly arriving at an understanding—too late though it was—Julius found that Adelheid’s demeanor made sense.

Her hair, red as flame, and her blue twin eyes that seemed to have trapped the azure of the sky—the features that impressed Adelheid’s beauty upon the mind were the same that marked those of the Astrea Family.

As far as Julius knew, the Astrea main family’s direct line consisted only of Heinkel and his eldest son, so it might be that Adelheid was connected by the branch line.

If so, he could also guess what it was she feared when she had spoken Heinkel’s name.

Julius: “I have no direct acquaintance with him, and this is only to the extent of rumor… but to be frank, I do not hold him in good regard. Nor, regrettably, do I think he fulfills the role befitting his station.”

Adelheid: “…That…”

Julius: “However, I do not wish to take a jaundiced view based on that preconception. Nor should I. —That is what I think.”

At Julius’s continuation, Adelheid’s eyes opened wide.

She had been told something she had not expected; she tasted the same kind of surprise Julius himself had felt earlier. While toying with his forelock, Julius allowed himself a tiny bit of reprisal,

Julius: “My purpose is to bring the facts to light. Even if those facts are inconvenient for you, I will not look the other way. Conversely, even if they are in your favor, I will not twist them. That is how I see it.”

Adelheid: “—. Got it, Julius.”

Nodding, Adelheid touched a hand to her own chest and faintly smiled. Then, in a small voice, she said “Thank you,” but Julius only shrugged.

Adelheid: “Thank you.”

He had not said anything he did not mean for the sake of comforting Adelheid.

Only, seeing in her a slight relief, as if she had been able to share a burden she had been carrying with someone else, he felt no small sense of accomplishment—an undeniable fact.

8

Bikram: “—I see. Sounds like it was quite a whirlwind of a first day.”

So murmured Bikram, tracing the wrinkles of his cheek with a fingertip as he listened to the report from the newly rejoined Julius.

The place was a corner of the commoners’ quarter, not the same shop used to rendezvous with Helaine but a different tavern called “The Silver Shield,” run by a retired former knight. It was famous as a Royal Guard hangout, and the fact they’d been shown to the private room at the back put Julius firmly on his mettle.

Without interrupting Julius’s report, the old knight listened through to the end; then, with a thoughtful gaze at Julius, he said,

Bikram: “Rough start for a green recruit fresh in the door, but how’s your condition? If you feel like throwing in the towel, say so early. Even arranging a stand-in takes paperwork…”

Julius: “There will be no problem with me. Thank you for your concern. It is true there were a few nerve-wracking developments… More importantly, may I ask for a healer to be dispatched from the infirmary?”

Bikram: “What, did you get yourself hurt?”

Julius: “No, not me—Mr. Blau, the man I reported on. I have some proficiency with healing magic, but I believe it best he be seen by a professional.”

Bikram: "…Sorry, but this affair is being handled with the bare minimum of personnel. Unless that Blau fellow's life is on the line, that request is denied."

His overreaching plea refused, Julius backed down with a simple, "Understood."

There was no urgency to Blau's condition while he hid in the vacant house. If he remained at rest, his wounds would soon mend. There was no reason to rush treatment at the expense of the mission.

While Julius was accepting that, Bikram said "Even so," and his tone sharpened. Turning that sharpness into a look, the old knight glared at the other person in the room—the one called Helaine.

Snorting softly at the woman who had likewise not cut into Julius's report, Bikram said,

Bikram: "What's the meaning of sneaking in not just our own youngster, but one of your people ahead of us? On top of that, not even bothering to report it—your story doesn't add up."

Helaine: "Does it not? To begin with, it was we who advanced the internal probe ahead of everyone in this affair. The Medical Corps made light of Hexel's danger and only belatedly started moving… We have no intention of picking a turf war, but aren't you overreaching yourselves a bit?"

Bikram: "Tch, sounds real high-minded. Hey, Juukulius, you tell her too."

At the click of his tongue, Bikram tossed the ball to Julius—but Julius was slow to react, prompting an incredulous, "Juukulius?" from Bikram.

Julius: "My apologies. You just called me one of your own, Sir Bikram, and I was struck by the realization I'm working as a subordinate of the "Silver Knight." It made my chest burn."

Bikram: "Gatness…"

Helaine: "Don't look at me. As you say, he's your rookie."

Answering Bikram’s pained grimace thus, Helaine rolled her shoulders with a weary little shrug.

Helaine: “I apologize for failing to give prior notice. However, our presence is only an insurance policy—the linchpin is Sir Julius’s work. Pray do not forget that. In fact, we are the ones left perplexed. Who could have imagined she would go and contact Sir Julius on her own initiative?”

Without a shade of sarcasm or subtext, Helaine answered as if genuinely at a loss.

What Julius had reported covered everything that had happened after parting from Helaine in front of the enemy’s base—namely, the contact with Adelheid and the establishment of a cooperative relationship. Ideally, he would have had her sit in on this meeting as well so they could work out the internal moves in detail, but—

Julius: “I’m a new face in the organization, and she has a striking appearance. Slipping out together carries a high risk of arousing suspicion. From the incident with Mr. Blau, Reiner Wahrheit clearly doesn’t balk at internal purges. He rules the organization by strength and fear.”

Bikram: “Agreed. Avoiding careless contact is the wise course. Sounds like that young lady is more cooperative than her colleagues. So? Gatness—where’s your so-called cooperative result?”

Helaine: “Unfortunately, it’s been give-and-take. The person we were using to probe the inner workings was killed by Lord Julius.”

Trading barbs with Bikram as they went, Helaine placed a folded paper packet—Hexel’s wrapping—on the table.

Helaine: “I made the rounds of the streets and shops rumored to see trade, and the spread is indeed severe. It was not difficult to obtain.”

Bikram: “…They work fast. No—the truth is, we were slow to get moving.”

Helaine: “We are probing the source on our side, but Reiner Wahrheit seems quite the tough customer. That said, even if the slums are his home ground, I doubt he can openly refine Hexel here in the Royal Capital. Perfectly deceiving our eyes would not be realistic.”

Bikram: “In that case, we should assume Wahrheit isn’t the mastermind but someone’s stooge.”

Running a finger down his cheek, Bikram’s musing voice took on a note of disgust.

What Bikram and Helaine were now hypothesizing was that Hexel was being manufactured outside the Royal Capital and brought into it. In that case, for a stripped knight like Reiner to prepare the equipment needed to produce Hexel, and the land to do it in secret, would be difficult.

Which is to say, the likelihood was high that someone behind him was doing all that in Reiner’s stead.

Julius: “In other words, that makes our work all the more important.”

Bikram: “…Does your sense of duty know nothing of being cowed?”

Julius: “Had I been alone, perhaps I would have lost my nerve. But now I believe a venerable predecessor will watch my back.”

Bikram: “Tch, impudent whelp.”

Bikram clicked his tongue yet again, but contrary to his words, the old knight’s face no longer wore a scowl carved in vexation.

Tapping the Hexel packet on the tabletop with a fingertip, Bikram said,

Bikram: “Pinning down the drug’s source and the like—that’s Gatness’s bailiwick. If they’re producing results, then we’ll do our work in our own domain.”

Helaine: “I’m honored that you understand our scope of duty, but what do you intend to do?”

Bikram: “Nothing complicated. Juukulius—you wanted a short, decisive battle, didn’t you? I agree. We’ll stamp out both the contraband and the traitor in the Guard as fast as humanly possible.”

At Bikram’s distorted cheek and belligerent grin, Julius involuntarily caught his breath.

They called him the “Silver Knight,” a man honed to the oldest age among active members of the Royal Guard; his executive ability was the real thing, proven by exploits Julius himself knew had served the kingdom.

To think he would get to be present for it in person, as a subordinate.

Julius: “What should I do? Give any order, and I will fulfill it, even at the cost of this body.”

Bikram: “The heat you’ve got in you is more frightening than it is reassuring… Fine. This time, I’ll ride that enthusiasm. —Gatness, their line of business can’t be only contraband. You’ve got information on the gambling dens they run, don’t you?”

Helaine: “I do, but what are you… Ah. So that’s your aim.”

At the question, Helaine wore a look of realization, and Bikram gave a magnanimous nod in response. Then, with a hand placed on the table, Bikram explained the operation—and—

Julius: “—Sir Bikram, before we break up, there is something I would ask.”

Once the debrief wrapped and Helaine departed early for her work, Julius addressed Bikram, who remained in the private room.

Bikram: “What is it? Was there something in the plan you didn’t understand?”

Saying so, he tilted the wooden cup filled with milk and drew his brows together.

It was not that he was a teetotaler. Bikram was a veteran of many campaigns. He simply did not drink during a mission for fear it might interfere with duty. It was a habit long kept.

Taking note of that, Julius shook his head.

Julius: “No questions about the plan. I am somewhat tense about whether I can deliver results worthy of everyone’s work, but…”

Bikram: “Don’t make it too heavy a burden. I’ll pick people who know how to hold back. So? If it isn’t nerves, what is it?”

Julius: “Thank you. —It’s about the mole in the Royal Guard.”

At the unsettling topic, Bikram’s expression did not change, but the air in the private room dried by a hair.

Naturally, for two men belonging to the same Royal Guard, the existence of a mole was more intimate and intolerable even than Hexel for Julius and Bikram.

Julius: “Do you have a suspect in mind, Sir Bikram?”

Bikram: “…At the very least, it isn’t me, it isn’t you, and it isn’t Marcos.”

Julius: “I’m honored. But that’s deflection. To me—”

Bikram: “—You can’t understand it, can you?”

Julius: “…No.”

Anticipated and cut off, Julius dropped his shoulders and hung his head.

As Bikram said, Julius could not understand the feelings of one who chose to betray knighthood. To aspire to be a knight, to have one’s qualifications recognized, to belong to the proud Royal Guard—and yet.

Bikram: "I won't defend a mole, but you've got too rosy a view of knights. Loyal, noble, proud—an ideal knight… but no one can keep that up twenty-four seven. The crooked sorts slip in during the gaps when a man isn't that way."

Julius: "You cannot be a knight every hour of the day… And yet, you are filling your cup with milk right now. That proves you are always trying to be a knight."

Bikram: "I just like milk."

Julius: "No. I am aware the "Silver Knight" is a heavy drinker as well!"

Bikram: "You're downright scary!"

As Julius leaned forward with his hands on the table, Bikram returned the favor with an affronted evaluation.

At any rate, Bikram raked his own short hair roughly.

Bikram: "…As I said beforehand, Wahrheit drifted among different companies and has a wide circle of acquaintances. If we can't narrow the mole down from his connections, then to some extent we have no choice but to rely on the person's character and reputation. In that sense, there are a few I've got my eye on."

Julius: "—Heinkel Astrea is among them?"

Bikram: "You toss out the Guard's taboo like it's nothing…"

Startled, Bikram balked at answering Julius's question.

From that reaction, Julius understood even without it being said. —Sure enough, Heinkel Astrea was counted among those the Royal Guard feared might be the mole.

No wonder Adelheid was tackling the mission for more than a mere sense of duty.

Bikram: "Don't overthink the business of the mole… I say that, but it's something that ties directly to your safety while you're undercover. It won’t be easy to put it out of your mind.”

Julius: “No—I don’t think my identity will be exposed by any mole. On that point, I place my trust in you and in Commander Marcos. —I will simply steel myself again.”

He would not say there was no doubt. Nor would he say the doubt was gone.

However, Julius would place the trust that should be placed, and do only what must be done.

Julius: “Then, Sir Bikram, I will return to being Julius.”

Bikram: “…Yeah, do that. It goes without saying, but—”

Julius: “I’ll go out the back, circle wide around the streets, and return. I know the drill.”

And as he walked, he switched himself over from “Julius” to “Julius.” Getting caught going in and out of “The Silver Shield” would be fatal—and avoiding that was part of the point.

With that exchange his last, Julius left the private room and went back to the slums—no, to the mission.

Once the receding back was hidden by the door and vanished from sight, Bikram, left alone in the private room, tilted his cup of milk and wetted his tongue.

And—

Bikram: “It’s true Heinkel is a colossal fool, but he isn’t that much of a fool. …You know it as well as I do, Marcos.”

So muttered Bikram in a voice so hoarse it seemed ready to fade away.

—The elevation of “Julius’s” importance within the organization.

At present, with a short, decisive end to the mission in mind, that was the policy that had become urgent.

Though “Julius,” who had undergone what could be called an initial baptism by way of a trial of skill, had earned a measure of respect from those present at the scene, he would need to accrue far greater trust to be entrusted with more important work.

And the plan Sir Bikram had prepared at the debrief was precisely for that purpose.

???: “Even so, that guy was insanely dangerous, Knight-Captain.”

???: “Yeah—one swing of his arm and Rob and Haunt went flying like it was nothing… Those two, big as barrels, you know? They were like scraps of paper—bam.”

With exaggerated gestures, the roughly dressed men spoke fast, still excited. There was anger and vexation in their tone, but there was just as much awe.

And that despite the content being that they’d been beaten down. Why was that?

Because—

???: “It was honestly a real close call. —If Julius hadn’t been there.”

Saying so, the man whose voice had risen clapped a shoulder—that of Julius, who was part of the circle. Feeling the sudden concentration of gazes, Julius gave a shrug with an insolent look.

Julius: “Cut it out. In the end I couldn’t cut the bastard down. That means I lost.”

???: “Don’t be stupid! If you weren’t there, everyone in that gambling den would’ve been nabbed. If anything, with this many getting away, it’s the Royal Guard that ought to be losing face.”

???: “Nah, the other side’s captain still had plenty left in the tank.

Say what you will, the den itself got shut down. They were a cut above… We oughtta own the loss fair and square."

???: "Uh, o-okay… I dunno why you're so keen on losing, though…"

At Julius's answer, delivered with a shake of the head, the men looked at one another in confusion. At that reaction, Julius reflected that he'd behaved far too modestly—for "Julius."

Still, it was difficult. Even as an act, he couldn't bring himself to boast that he'd gotten the better of Marcos.

—At present, around ten men, "Julius" included, had returned to the base and were explaining to those around them what had happened at the gambling den they'd just been in.

The organization led by Reiner took its greatest source of income, of course, from the buying and selling of Hexel, but apparently they also managed gambling dens and engaged in illegal moneylending; the reason "Julius," whose swordsmanship had been recognized, had been assigned there was that it was a scene where that kind of muscle would be called for.

And on this day when "Julius" stood guard, the Royal Guard conducted a raid on the den—led by none other than Knight-Captain Marcos Gildark, a fatal kind of raid.

In the Kingdom of Lugunica, there was no one who didn't know "the Rock," Marcos. By virtue of his tremendous power, the den had been driven neatly into a half-ruined state. Naturally, that had been arranged beforehand, but so as not to have the act seen through, the swordplay between "Julius" and Marcos had been carried out with a fair degree of seriousness. —The disparity in strength had been obvious, of course.

???: "And Julius held him off. Thanks to that, we all got away."

Julius: "Don't say I held him off. I was just lucky."

???: "Why are you like that all the time, huh?! You could stand to carry yourself a little prouder!"

Julius's self-critique wasn't taking, but the way the men were hyped was off as well.

In fact, though they'd escaped annihilation, not everyone had gotten away, and they'd lost the den besides. For them to be like this—

Julius: "What do you lot have to be so giddy about…?"

Reiner: "—Julius is right. This ain't a time to be squealing."

Just as he, in "Julius" fashion, was about to chastise the men's slackened awareness, a voice overlapping his words instantly straightened everyone's posture there. The floor creaked under slow steps—coming in was a one-eyed man: Reiner.

Summoned by a report, Reiner had apparently come flying; with his right eye, the one not covered by the eyepatch, he glowered around at the men in the room.

Reiner: "After those damn knights tore up our feeding ground, you've got the gall to look so merry. I can't begin to understand how your thick heads are put together."

???: "B-Boss… We were just—"

Reiner: "Shut it."

One man started to make excuses—Reiner caught his jaw with an outstretched hand and forced him to be silent. While making the man's jawbones creak with his grip, Reiner looked at Julius.

Fixing him with a muddy gray stare, he opened his mouth to the Julius who waited for his words.

Reiner: "You crossed blades with that Marcos? How was he?"

Julius: ""The hive bees of Tilg know nothing of great winds"… To be frank, he was so skilled it made your legs go weak."

Reiner: "Ha! That so, that so. The guy's a monster. The kind it's ridiculous to compare yourself to."

Laughing at Julius's answer, Reiner released the jaw he'd been holding. While the man hastily backed away, Reiner looked over the assembled faces.

Reiner: "Where's Belmont?"

Belmont: "—Here, Boss. I'm safe thanks to Julius."

At Reiner's call, a young man raised a hand and answered thus.

He wore a large hat and had a lanky impression, with catlike eyes as a distinguishing feature. He too had managed to flee from the den where Marcos had run wild, and as Reiner had checked on his safety by name, he was a person in an important position within the organization—a man who could be called an executive or close aide.

Belmont: "It was sudden, so we didn't get much out, but we recovered some of the takings. Check it later."

Reiner: "A sharp one. Worlds apart from the lot whose eyes get snagged by flash. Right?"

At Belmont's report, Reiner mocked the other men that way.

They couldn't talk back, and a nasty air was about to settle over the room. Just then—

Adelheid: "Still, it's a shame that den's going to be unusable. Folks who got big-headed off their winnings were handy for luring to our side."

Fearlessly cutting in was Adelheid, standing by the wall again today.

Even from that position her presence was too strong, but it seemed to have become her usual spot, and no one tried to point it out. However, conceding there was sense in her remark, Reiner let out a small "Tch" of profanity.

Reiner: "Marcos—you're a thorn in my eye to the bitter end."

Belmont: “What’ll we do, Reiner? The ones who didn’t get away don’t know anything big, but even so, they might spill everything they do know. If that happens…”

Reiner: “…The den won’t function anymore. We’ll need more Hexel.”

Hearing Reiner murmur, hand to chin and thoughtful, Julius drew a faint breath and flicked his gaze to Adelheid by the wall.

Reiner’s train of thought was exactly what Julius and the others had intended—if one stream of income was cut off, they’d have no choice but to expand another.

The organization’s big money-maker—namely, Hexel.

Reiner: “Belmont, make arrangements for transport. I’ll hurry the manufacturing of the drug.”

Belmont: “That’s fine, but where do we sell? With the den gone, big dealings are gonna be tough.”

Reiner: “No need to worry about that. I was just thinking of moving on to the next stage. For that—Adelheid.”

At the sudden address, it was Julius—the uninvolved party—who had the harder time hiding his startlement.

Adelheid, for her part, mixed no fear or surprise into her beauty, and met Reiner’s single eye.

Adelheid: “What is it?”

Tilting her head with aplomb, she waited. Walking up to her, Reiner reached out and lightly combed with his fingers through her red hair down to the shoulder.

Reiner: “You’re coming as my companion to a party. Time to make full use of how good you look.”

Adelheid: “…May I ask what kind of party? Depending on that, the dress I pick and the quality of the makeup will change.”

Reiner: “Listen to this cheek. A soirée hosted by people from a respectable merchant house. I had their servants get a whiff of the drug to nudge them into taking an interest in our product.”

Adelheid: “I see.”

Reiner: “And now it’s finally borne fruit. Honestly, if it weren’t for the business with the den, I’d be in the mood to celebrate a lot louder.”

As Reiner revealed a scheme he had apparently been pushing in secret, Julius felt a chill.

Reiner, a former knight whose certain sword skill had been counted as a threat—on top of that, to be astonished now by his planning, his execution, his knack as the head of an organization.

At this point, even if they could completely eradicate the organization and Hexel, they must not let Reiner Wahrheit slip away—so Julius was convinced.

The bud named Reiner was an evil cause that absolutely had to be plucked here.

Belmont: “If the path is set, good. Then we’ll just do our job on our end. On top of that—lend me Julius as a subordinate.”

Julius: “M-Me?”

For a moment, his reaction lagged at being called by name by Belmont, and he almost answered as Julius—but he managed to reply in the persona of “Julius” on the spot.

His tiny slip went unremarked; Belmont nodded with a “Right,” and continued,

Belmont: “If we’re moving more product, I want the guard that much thicker. Ordinarily I’d use Rob and the others, but they all got nabbed. And…”

Reiner: “And?”

Belmont: “He’s a powerhouse who didn’t give an inch even against the Knight-Captain. Leaving him to watch the street on collections would be a waste, wouldn’t it, Boss?”

Reiner: “…True enough.”

Prompted by the shrugging Belmont, Reiner turned back to Julius. For a moment he glared steadily at Julius with his single eye, then let out a small breath.

In that instant, Julius felt his skin prickle with gooseflesh—and reflexively, he had torn his knight’s sword free.

A reflex that could have ruined the undercover op—but—

Reiner: “Ha. Eager, aren’t you.”

There was a shattering sound like ice breaking, and an impact that rebounded along the knight’s sword. What his reflexively raised blade had received was something inexplicable that could only be called an invisible slash.

In fact, Reiner had not drawn the sword at his hip. Without even moving his arm, a cut had come.

Julius: “That just now was…”

Reiner: “Don’t be mad—it’s a true test of skill. My nerves’ve been on edge lately. If you could really tangle with that monster, you’ve gotta be able to block at least this much or there’s no talking.”

Julius: “If I hadn’t stopped it, were you trying to kill me?”

Reiner: “C’mon, I’m not that cruel. At worst, just a slice off the thin skin of your neck.”

Reiner thus denied murderous intent, but having felt how keen that sword strike had been, Julius doubted how far to believe him. Without a doubt, had he not stopped it, his neck would have been lopped off. How he had unleashed that invisible slash was worrisome as well.

Reiner: “Glad you’ve got sense. Belmont’s irreplaceable. Guard him well.”

Julius: “If you’ll acknowledge I’m on the irreplaceable side too.”

Shooting that back, Julius deliberately slid his sword into the sheath with a loud sound. Reiner’s eyes widened a touch at that resheathing, then he laughed like a beast with a sharp “Ha.”

And turning to his comrades—no, subordinates—he spread both hands.

Reiner: “All right, it’s gonna get busy. There’s no grub for dawdlers who can’t move. Every last one of you, work hard. —If the Royal Guard catches up, I’ll carve your backsides.”

So he fired them up with words that didn’t sound like a mere threat.

10

Adelheid: “For the time being, it looks like we’ve both managed to make our presence felt to the Boss. That said, having the gambling den raided by the Royal Guard—that method really did surprise me.”

Julius: “I admit it was a forceful measure. But we’re aiming for a short, decisive campaign.”

Adelheid: “Yeah, I think it was a good plan—I could feel how serious you all are. I doubt the Boss is as at ease as he acts.”

Seeing Adelheid give a little shrug of her thin shoulders, Julius winked one eye and let out a breath at how much the preceding back-and-forth had been a tightrope walk.

Crack down on the gambling den and rattle the organization—that was Bikram’s plan, and in practice they had succeeded in dealing the organization a shock equal to or greater than expected.

However, being made to walk a tightrope twice in one day had taken a considerable toll on Julius.

Adelheid: “Commander Marcos held back for you, didn’t he?”

Julius: “Yeah. If the Commander hadn’t pulled his punches, I’d be six feet under by now.”

Adelheid: “I don’t think you need to run yourself down that far… Though it’s true he’s someone you can’t beat.”

She said it with a wry smile, but that was only a comfort born of not having seen the actual fight.

The pressure Marcos had exuded there in the den, and the unbelievable sword skill even with him holding back—both were things far beyond Julius, and just recalling them made him shiver. At the same time, though, he genuinely felt joy at the height and strength of the summit he ought to aim for.

All the more, his disappointment at the second tightrope—Reiner Wahrheit—was greater.

Adelheid: “As for the Boss’s technique, you blocked it well.”

Julius: “It wasn’t my achievement alone. I had the spirits with me keep watch on the surroundings. Thanks to that, I managed to get my guard up in time. …Do you know how that attack works?”

Adelheid: “No. …He didn’t draw his sword. I’m sure it’s some kind of magic.”

Julius: “Right. It’s a long shot, but I’ll ask the higher-ups just in case.”

In truth, it was unlikely Bikram or Marcos knew the true nature of Reiner’s sword technique.

Even among allies, people almost never shared all their techniques and trump cards. All the more so when it came to Reiner’s invisible sword—its mechanism seemed to hinge on secrecy. It was hard to imagine that cautious man would go out of his way to reveal his own strength to those around him.

Which meant they would have to deduce the secret of Reiner’s technique from limited clues.

Adelheid: “Do you intend to fight the Boss, Julius?”

Julius: “…Even if I don’t pick the fight, if he swings at me like that, there may be times I’ll have to stand and take it. I need to be prepared, right?”

Adelheid: “Prepared, huh. True. —I only wish I could be there at the time.”

As Adelheid murmured that with a fingertip to her lips, Julius couldn’t help but give a wry smile.

If his guess was right and she was connected to House Astrea, then it was more than possible that a portion of the power said to belong to the “Sword Saint’s” lineage resided in her as well. Even so—knowing it was a bit green—if Julius was to cross blades with Reiner, he wanted, if possible, to fight one-on-one.

He believed that only by defeating the man on that basis could he prove a knight’s integrity.

Julius: “Maybe that’s a way of thinking that lacks flexibility. Whether I can borrow your strength then will depend on the situation. Looks like I’ll be involved in transporting Hexel—what about you? Are you all right?”

Adelheid: “I’ve ended up invited to a soirée. As for the dress… I plan to borrow my mother’s. As I am now, I think I could wear it just about right.”

Julius: “Your mother’s… In that case, I’d like to avoid any situation that would stain it.”

Adelheid: “—Yes. You’re right.”

For an instant, Julius thought the light in Adelheid’s eyes dimmed, and he hesitated to speak.

As for the suspicion hanging over Heinkel Astrea, Bikram’s answer had not been encouraging. It wasn’t that the suspicion was particularly strong, but neither was his innocence taken on faith. With no new information, it would be wrong to offer either a ray of hope or a cause for concern.

Julius: “Even so, you said the Boss didn’t trust you, but if he’s taking you along for an important scene, maybe it isn’t as bad as you thought? I can see why he’d judge that things would go smoother with you there, of course.”

Hardly the sort to think in such simple terms that he would bring Adelheid along just because of her looks—Julius didn’t believe Reiner was that kind of man.

At Julius’s conjecture, Adelheid raised one finger.

Adelheid: “I figured I couldn’t fall behind you and the others, so I took measures to earn the Boss’s trust.”

Julius: “Measures? What did you do?”

Adelheid: “Yeah—I tried taking Hexel right in front of him.”

Julius: “…Huh?”

Because Adelheid said it so matter-of-factly and offhandedly, he didn’t grasp it at once.

Blinking her yellow eyes, Julius stared at her, wondering if he’d misheard. Under that gaze, Adelheid tilted her head.

Adelheid: “So, I tried using Hexel in front of the Boss. As far as he’s concerned now, I’m a user of the banned drug cooperating with the organization for the sake of the drug—a Hexel addict.”

Julius: “D-Doing something like that… Are you okay?!”

At Adelheid’s unruffled demeanor, Julius bitterly regretted his own shortsightedness.

He had gathered that Adelheid was in a painful position owing to the suspicions aimed at Heinkel. To have failed to consider that, driven into a corner, she might take such an action—that was Julius's negligence.

Use Hexel, and the activation of the Gate would bring a temporary elation and sense of omnipotence. But what followed was a hunger for the next dose, and symptoms of addiction—

Julius: "Whether you're okay isn't the point. Adelheid, you need to leave here at once. We'll take care of the rest—"

Adelheid: "C-Calm down, Julius. Sorry to mislead you—I'm fine."

Julius: "No—no matter how much you insist you're fine, willpower won't solve this."

Adelheid: "That's why it isn't willpower. It's a Divine Protection. I've been granted the Divine Protection of Detoxification."

As Julius unconsciously grabbed both her shoulders and tried to persuade her in earnest, Adelheid hastily answered thus.

Hearing "Divine Protection," Julius blinked again. As he digested what it meant, Adelheid added, "It's a Divine Protection," and continued,

Adelheid: "Thanks to the Divine Protection of Detoxification, I don't fall ill or face life-threatening danger due to external causes. Not just Hexel—any poison, even alcohol, it's the same."

Julius: "The Divine Protection of Detoxification… I see. That's why you were chosen for the infiltration mission. That makes sense."

Adelheid: "Not exactly… but that's fine. And—can you let go now?"

Julius: "…Sorry."

Prompted with a wry smile, Julius released Adelheid, whose shoulders he was still holding. At the same time, he recovered the tone of "Julius" he had been on the verge of forgetting.

This apology was not only for grabbing her shoulders; it also encompassed the way his attitude had all but branded Adelheid someone who would act recklessly without thinking.

However, at Julius's apology, Adelheid gave a little laugh.

Adelheid: "I'm not angry. It's a fresh feeling to have someone worry about me—and it makes me happy."

Julius: "Being worried over makes you happy, huh. It makes me feel rather apologetic instead."

Adelheid: "That's not entirely wrong, but… no, let's stop. I have a hunch my sensibilities aren't reliable at times like this."

Julius felt a snag at how Adelheid, slowly shaking her head, seemed eager to end the discussion.

But, unable to find the best response to that snag, he missed his chance to press further about her attitude.

Adelheid: "At any rate, Hexel doesn't work on me. On top of that, since I'm acting like an addict, the Boss assumes I can't betray the organization. It's not trust in me, but trust in the banned drug he handles. That should be easy for the Boss to believe, right?"

Julius: "—I understand how resolved you are. I'll leave that side to you."

Nodding at Adelheid's words, Julius once more fixed in mind their respective roles.

"Julius" would help transport Hexel into the Royal Capital together with Belmont, an executive in the organization; Adelheid would go with Reiner to the soirée to cultivate new buyers for the drug.

Both would be entrusted with positions where they would handle important information for tracing the distribution routes of Hexel and the organization's connections, buyers included.

If the needed information could be assembled, the Royal Guard would be able to move at once to dismantle the organization.

Therefore—

Julius: "The next few days will decide it. Don't slip up."

Adelheid: “Understood. You be careful too.”

Trusting in each other’s good fight, Julius sent Adelheid off to the soirée.

11

Belmont: “The main things we watch out for are rival outfits and bandits who don’t even know what the cargo is. After that, you’ve got witchbeasts drawn in by Hexel’s scent.”

Julius: “The first two I get, but even witchbeasts get drawn to it?”

Belmont: “Who knows what goes on in their heads. Maybe they want to do Hexel too and open up every pore on their bodies.”

Unsure whether he ought to laugh at the joking tone, Julius—dragged into guarding the transport of Hexel—studied the man in charge of the job, Belmont, in silence.

Belmont looked still young, around a little past twenty; among the hot-blooded roughnecks he seemed slight, and he somehow gave the impression of being far removed from violence. His manner and responses were moderately gentle, and for an executive in the organization he had no overbearing air at all.

If he let his attention wander even a little, it felt as if Belmont might melt out of sight and be swallowed by the scenery around him—a plainness that, paradoxically, made him seem out of place. That was the sort of atmosphere he carried.

Even so, Belmont seemed to be held in regard within the organization, and even Reiner had emphasized that he was a man with no replacement. He briskly took charge of the unexpectedly large transport of Hexel and accepted the goods without a hitch.

They went some distance east from the Royal Capital, traveling with the Great Tree of Flugel in view far off, and conducted the handoff at a warehouse built quietly deep within the woods; there had been no room for Julius to interject in that exchange, and it would be hard to pin down the precise location.

Belmont: “The mana density’s thick around here. The sharper a guy’s senses, the more the mana drunk messes with them. If you gawk around too much, you’ll wind up dizzy too.”

So Belmont advised Julius, who had been diligently scanning the surroundings.

Fortunately, Belmont seemed to take Julius’s scrutiny as job-appropriate vigilance, but just as he said, the Quasi Spirits Julius had brought along were not in good shape; he had to admit that securing clues here would be difficult.

In any case—

Julius: “At the very least, we have to grasp where Hexel is being kept.”

If he stayed with them to the end of the transport, at least that goal ought to be achievable.

If he rushed results and failed to meet even the minimum objective, the whole thing would be turned on its head. Restraining his impatience, Julius focused on the work before him while praying for Adelheid’s safety at the soirée.

Belmont: “Come to think of it, I never properly thanked you.”

He addressed Julius from the driver’s seat of the dragon carriage, hands on the reins as they hauled the cargo.

Julius, knight’s sword in hand and intending to keep as stern a face as possible, raised one eyebrow at Belmont’s unexpected remark.

Julius: “Thanks?”

Belmont: “Yeah, thanks. Back at the den, you bought us time to escape, didn’t you? Against the Knight-Captain himself, no less. That’s something.”

Julius: “Ah, that. I appreciate the sentiment, but personally it isn’t an achievement I can be proud of.”

Belmont: “I don’t see it that way… but keep that attitude in front of the Boss. He hates the Knight-Captain’s guts—big time.”

Julius: “Big time? Is that because the Boss used to be a knight?”

From how Reiner had talked back at the base, Julius had gathered there was some bad blood between him and Marcos. But within the range of what Julius knew, he had never heard tell of any such entanglement between the two.

After all, what Julius knew in detail about the Royal Guard had only ever been what drifted to those outside it.

With that interest of Julius’s, Belmont prefaced his answer with, “This is between us,” then said:

Belmont: “The Boss quit being a knight because he cut down a noble’s servant during a mission—but when he tried to blow off the court-martial as-is, the one who caught him, beat him down, and dragged him back was the Knight-Captain, Marcos.”

Julius: “That’s what happened…”

Belmont: “In the end, thanks to the noble’s leniency, the Boss wasn’t punished for his crime—but depending on how it went, there might not have been any avoiding the death penalty. That’s another reason the Boss glares daggers at the Captain.”

Julius: “—Don’t tell me the Boss is deliberately flooding Hexel through the Royal Capital…”

Belmont: “The scary thing about grudges is you can’t say “no way” even to that.”

Julius decided to keep the story in mind, though he didn’t know how seriously to take it.

On the other hand, there wasn’t much sense of loyalty to Reiner in the way Belmont spoke. But neither did he seem to be following out of fear like the others.

Naturally, the organization’s people besides Reiner also fully met the conditions for being detained on suspicion of involvement in the Hexel trade. But unlike Reiner—whose original temperament, his path out of the Guard, and his evident grudge against Marcos all stood out—why was Belmont in the organization?

It seemed far more shameful not to try to learn than simply not to know.

Julius: “Belmont—why do you work for the organization?”

Belmont: “Whoa there, in the mood for life stories? Sorry to disappoint, but I’m not in some colorful situation like slashing a noble’s servant or cutting down a lord’s soldiers. It just… happened.”

Julius: ““Just happened,” and you ended up a subordinate of Reiner Wahrheit?”

Belmont: “If you want the reason I joined, it was plain and simple: it looked like better money. “Just happened” was for how I turned into who I am now.”

Julius: “Who you are now…”

Tossed back a more solid answer than he’d expected, Julius urged him on with his gaze. Under that look, Belmont adjusted the tilt of the hat on his head and murmured, “You’ve got me.”

Belmont: “There isn’t any deep meaning to it. I’m just a commoner—my lot in life wasn’t too good or too bad. While I was hot under the collar about hating that halfway state, I fell into a gigantic hole I couldn’t undo. And while I was tumbling around in that hole, I wound up here.”

Julius: “That in itself doesn’t strike me as the most common pattern.”

Belmont: “Maybe not common, but not special either. For example, I think the root’s different from yours—you, who are putting on an act like you grew up rough on purpose.”

Julius: “…”

At the abrupt observation, Julius's cheek stiffened a touch. He furrowed his brow into the appropriate perplexed expression and met Belmont's gaze with it.

But Belmont winked at that look on Julius.

Belmont: "It's well done, but you haven't hidden what's underneath. If I had to guess…"

Julius: "—If you had to guess?"

Belmont: "They say you cut down a lord's soldiers and ran—but really, aren't you the lord's son?"

Julius: "…"

Belmont: "That's why no one from your hometown is chasing you to the Capital. There might be wanted notices going around, but I bet the charges on them are softened. If you're not lying, that's about how I size it up. How'd I do?"

Julius let out a breath at Belmont's winking presentation of his deduction.

For a moment he thought his act had been seen through entirely, but though Belmont had come close, he didn't make the leap to "Julius" being a wholesale fabrication. Even his misunderstanding worked out neatly to Julius's advantage.

Rather than denying everything here, it would feel more natural to ride along with it.

Therefore, Julius was about to do just that when—

???: "—Please stop, Mr. Belmont."

As they traveled the road at night and had nearly come within sight of the Royal Capital, Belmont worked the reins and brought the dragon carriage to a halt. What forced him to do so were the men blocking the road—men all of whom Julius had seen at the base, members of the organization.

A heavy air hung about them all, and Julius's whole body tensed.

What they were holding inside was a clear anger and hostility that could not be concealed.

Belmont: "What is it? What's going on?"

???: "Anyway, get down. You too, Julius."

They ordered not only Belmont but Julius to dismount, and the others assisting with the transport were made to shuffle down into the road as well.

While everyone looked at each other, not knowing what was happening, Julius quietly swept his eyes over the encirclement and began to sketch out in his head the flow if he had to break through.

The cause was unknown, but the men waiting in ambush were clearly ready to act.

—If so, he would make no clumsy excuses; he would pull out immediately, link up with Adelheid, and return to the Royal Guard.

To that end—

Belmont: "The soirée shouldn't be over yet. With the Boss not back, what are you so on edge about?"

???: "We'll talk to the Boss later. We've just got urgent business here. Namely, the rat that's been crawling around among us."

Hearing the definitive word rat, Julius became certain—this was the worst.

However, it did not proceed to an immediate pullout, as he had envisioned.

He could not do so because an inexplicable sight unfolded before Julius's eyes.

They had learned the rat had slipped in, and had gathered here. And yet the one they ringed to block the way was not Julius. —It was Belmont.

For some reason they had surrounded Belmont, and the eyes full of obvious hostility were all turned on him.

Which was to say—

???: “You won’t be running. …No—you ain’t running anywhere, Belmont. You’re the one who had ties to “the Rock” in the Royal Guard, yeah? Old buddies from the “Fellowship” Marcos set up.”

It was a pursuit of Belmont’s unforgettable past—the one he had called happenstance and a giant hole.

12

A single underground room filled with cold, damp air. In the center sat a lone chair, and on it a man whose wrists were bound behind his back, his swollen face hanging low.

The man had once had a catlike, charming face, but his eyes and cheeks were puffed up so badly there was nothing left of it to see.

???: “Don’t you go nodding off on us from just that much, Mr. Belmont.”

With that malice-drenched voice, a bucketful of water was flung over the bound man. Doused in foul water hauled from a filthy river nearby, the man—Belmont—coughed again and again.

Coughing, he slowly lifted his bruise-blotched face.

Belmont: “When the Boss gets back… you lot won’t… get off easy…”

???: “Brings a tear to my eye, you worrying about us like that. But if it’s what happens after the Boss gets back, you’re the one who ought to be worried, yeah!”

The emphatic end of the sentence came paired with a merciless fist. Struck, Belmont let out a groan of “Guh,” blood dripping from his mouth to stain the cellar floor.

For several hours now, the violence against Belmont had continued. For a man in an executive position within the organization led by Reiner Wahrheit, it was treatment beneath his station—but the reason they had arrived at this situation was—

???: “But is it really true? That Mr. Belmont betrayed us?”

???: “Yeah, no mistake. We checked it out. He was thick with the Commander of the Royal Guard… Marcos Gildark, from way back. And then you remember that raid on the gambling den the other day?”

???: “The gambling den… don’t tell me.”

Tattooed Man: “That’s right. Our very own Mr. Belmont slipped the knights a hand and brought ’em in. We got burned.”

So said a man with a sword tattoo at his neck—like Belmont, one of the old hands in the organization. It was he who had accused Belmont of treachery and was leading this interrogation in the cellar; the grounds he cited hit the mark.

Only, the mistake lay in the target at which he had directed those suspicions—namely, Belmont.

Therefore—

Julius: “…Honestly, that alone is not enough for me to believe it.”

When the tattooed man grabbed Belmont’s hair to jerk his head up, Julius—who was “Julius”—lightly pressed down on that arm from above and interjected thus.

Tattooed Man: “Huh? What’s this, Julius, what are you spouting off?”

Julius: “I am saying your grounds are weak. Belmont has long-standing ties with that knight Commander? And what of it? Whatever the past, they are not on good terms now, therefore he would not be thick with him.”

Tattooed Man: “I’m telling you that’s the front. They make it look like they ain't close now, while behind the scenes they're in up to their necks—that's how those types work. I'll squeeze the truth out of him quick. Move."

Julius: "…"

Tattooed Man: "I said move!"

At the tattooed man's raised voice, Julius wavered greatly over whether he ought to withdraw his hand.

The suspicion hanging over Belmont was not wide of the mark, but the person it targeted was. It was "Julius" who had guided the Royal Guard in and carried out the operation to shake the organization.

Which meant that, properly speaking, the violence being done to Belmont ought to have been inflicted upon "Julius."

Belmont: "…It's all right, Julius, step aside."

Julius, who had planted himself before the tattooed man so Belmont would not be struck further by the fallout of their own scheme—was stayed by Belmont himself.

Turning, Julius found Belmont's eyes wavering behind swollen lids.

Belmont: "I've got nothing to feel guilty about. When the Boss comes… he'll understand right away…"

Julius: "But if you are beaten until then—"

Belmont: "—I'll endure."

Weak and raspy though it was, that last word held a little strength.

Pressed by that resolve, Julius fell silent for a time, then took a single step back.

Tattooed Man: "Heh, got some nerve."

Though the words lauded Belmont's spirit, the feeling behind them that the tattooed man and Julius directed toward Belmont were, no doubt, of entirely different kinds.

In any event—

Julius: “Before Reiner Wahrheit returns.”

—They had to get Belmont, who was being brutalized for no just cause, out of there.

13

Helaine: “—We cannot agree.”

Gathered in a private room at the Silver Shield, Helaine said that plainly to Julius after he had explained the situation, without letting her usual calm expression slip.

Julius: “Why is that…!”

Shaking the fist he had set on the table, Julius spoke thus.

Julius: “As a result of our operation, he is being subjected to violence for groundless reasons. The accuser is hostile toward Mr. Belmont… at this rate, his life is in danger.”

Helaine: “Then it would be fine to leave it in danger, would it not? You would hazard unnecessary risks and imperil your own life? For the sake of that mere ruffian?”

Julius: “—. True, he is a man of Reiner Wahrheit’s organization. However, even if he has committed misdeeds, the value of his life must not be needlessly debased.”

Helaine: “We cannot understand. A stand-in has arisen to take the blow should your infiltration be exposed. Would it not, rather, suit everyone’s designs better to make deft use of that?”

Julius: “Miss Helaine!”

Stung by the piling on of heartless opinions, Julius could not help but sharpen his voice. Yet Helaine, seated opposite him, did not so much as flinch at his intensity.

Thus their views remained parallel, the two of them glowering at one another as the standoff dragged on—and then,

Bikram: “Juukulius, you are getting too heated. Gatness, do not goad him.”

As Bikram thrust a hand in between the two across the table, Julius unclenched his tightened fist and forced out, “My apologies.”

He had no retort to Bikram’s rebuke. As he was now, Julius had let the heat rise to his head too much in his desire to save Belmont, who had been captured in his stead.

Helaine: “You speak of discussion, Sir Bikram, but we question whether there is room for it.”

Bikram: “I said not to provoke him. With that said… when is Wahrheit scheduled to return?”

Julius: “…According to the plan, tomorrow night. It has not yet reached Reiner Wahrheit’s ears, but he is the sort to punish what he finds suspicious.”

Bikram: “No argument there. Before that, there is also the chance they kill him in a vigilante-style interrogation.”

Bikram touched his beard and fell into thought. Julius fixed his gaze on him with added force.

At all costs, Belmont must be saved. Even if it was true that he had abetted wrongdoing, to overlook the loss of his life was—

Julius: “—Contrary to chivalry. Is it not so, Sir Bikram?”

Bikram: “Chivalry, you say?”

At that low voice, like the growl of a ferocious beast, Julius’s throat forgot how to breathe for an instant.

Holding his breath, eyes widening, Julius met Bikram’s yellow twin eyes as they looked back at him quietly. Pressed by the seasoned intensity dwelling in that gaze, he shrank before Bikram Edditz.

Bikram: “Do not get carried away just because a fresh-minted knight happened to be appointed to a big job. You are free to cherish ideals and admiration for knighthood, but do you mean to endanger the Kingdom with that idealism?”

Julius: “—! I would never do such a thing!”

Bikram: “Is that so? Then think it through. If, for argument’s sake, we prioritize rescuing this Belmont here and your infiltration goes belly-up, obviously they’ll go to ground. Then they’ll busy themselves with the trade of “Hexel” in some other form. And having learned from this affair, they’ll act with greater caution and greater boldness. When that happens, how many more people do you think will suffer?”

Julius: “…”

Bikram: “As you say, we are knights as well. And knights must protect the Kingdom—its people. Its good, law-abiding people. In numbers or in good and ill, there is no gain in saving Belmont.”

So stated, plain and clear, Julius could only lower his head before Bikram.

What Bikram had declared—what Helaine had just conveyed a moment before—were sharpened blades of words meant to drive the point in more forcefully and leave no room for compromise. A rationale that acknowledged choosing which lives to take up and which to set down, a rationale that admitted the insufficiency of a knight’s power—neither were blades Bikram would ever have wished to wield.

It was Julius who had forced Bikram to say them.

Julius: “…”

Superior in on-site experience, more logical, and without holes, Bikram and the others’ arguments were not something Julius, a novice knight advancing emotion and ideal, could overturn.

Thus, with nothing to say back, Julius—

???: “Your mother and father were admirable people, Brother. In that case, to be worthy of such parents, surely the way is for you to become a hero.”

Just as he was about to yield to resignation and shut his eyes, a voice resounded in Julius’s mind.

It was a child’s, earnest and sincere in its effort to reach the person before him—words spoken to a weeping, younger Julius by his little brother; words that had shaped him into who he was to this day.

It was a memory of the day Julius Juukulius had been given the impetus to truly set his sights on becoming a knight.

“I swore that day.”

He swore he would pursue his longing and his ideal with a heart that would never waver—swore it, with none other than his precious younger brother, Joshua Juukulius, as his witness.

Julius: “—Sir Bikram, may I speak?”

Raising the face that had been about to dip, Julius said that, and Bikram’s wrinkled cheeks hardened. Without a word, only with his gaze, the superior urged him to continue; Julius bowed with his eyes and then,

Julius: “I still advise that we should extract Mr. Belmont.”

Thus, head-on, he thrust out anew the proposal that had just been rejected.

At that, for an instant, the air in the tavern’s private room tightened. The source of the menacing air was not Bikram, who had been refuted to his face, but Helaine, who remained silent; narrowed, her eyes held undisguised disappointment and dismay toward the uncomprehending Julius.

If he persisted as before in a posture that pressed idealism and emotion, there would be no overturning that gaze.

Therefore, while the foundation remained idealism and emotion, Julius stacked other things atop it.

Julius: “Mr. Belmont has become the victim of our plan, but regarding the effect that a move to save him would have on the organization, Sir Bikram, I must point out there is an error in your supposition.”

Bikram: “Oh? You say there is an error. Let us hear it.”

Julius: “If we stand by and watch, there will be no life left in Belmont. Whether by a lynching at the hands of his comrades or by Reiner Wahrheit’s purge is another matter. And how will they act concerning the suspicion that Belmont betrayed them? —Exactly as you just said, Sir Bikram.”

Bikram: “—They’ll vanish and go underground…”

Julius: “Yes. That must be regarded as a foregone conclusion. The enemy’s vanishing is a matter of time… Reiner Wahrheit will surely do so. I am certain of it.”

This was no desperate rebuttal; this appraisal was, without a doubt, Julius’s true belief.

Given Reiner’s caution, the mere suspicion that the hand of investigation had reached toward him was reason enough to move. With this unforeseen suspicion toward Belmont, the organization’s disappearance had already become a matter of time.

Julius: “Sir Bikram, this matter has already become a race against time. Tomorrow night, when Reiner Wahrheit returns, they will disappear.”

Bikram: “…If they’re going to disappear either way, you want to save Belmont so he does not die for nothing?”

Julius: “No. There is a possibility that Mr. Belmont possesses the information we desire. We should rescue him, bargain with him, and draw out the inner workings of the organization.”

Helaine: “Pray wait. Are you not stacking conjecture upon conjecture? The Blau you saved before, Sir Julius, possessed no useful information. Will not Belmont be the same?”

She raised her hand lightly and interjected thus.

The “Blau” she had brought up was the man who, when Julius infiltrated Reiner’s organization, had been made an example of and a test of skill—the man whose life Julius had managed, just barely, to save.

Grievously wounded, he was still being hidden in an abandoned house in the slums; it seemed that, while Julius had been absent, Helaine had contacted him and attempted to obtain information.

Helaine: “If Reiner Wahrheit is cautious, the conditions will be the same. Even if matters are as you say, it does not provide a reason to risk danger.”

Julius: “No. Mr. Belmont is an executive of the organization. Reiner Wahrheit trusted in his ability. He must, without fail, have his hands on information about an opponent they would otherwise have to let slip away.”

Helaine: “You should not speak lightly of “without fail,” Julius Juukulius.”

For an instant, the air creaked with the strongest force yet, and tension filled the private room. The words Julius had chosen had sorely rubbed Helaine’s feelings the wrong way.

It was undeniable that it had been a careless statement toward those like her, who risked their lives day after day to raise the certainty of uncertain information. Yet an apology here could not be permitted either.

And so for a time, as Julius and Helaine’s staring match resumed,

Bikram: “—There is some sense to Juukulius’s words.”

Helaine: “Sir Bikram Edditz!”

Bikram: “Only some sense. You can admit as much as well, Gatness.

…Juukulius, if you continue your undercover work as is, there remains a chance you can keep up with their vanishing. Are you saying that, even if it means crushing that possibility, the information Belmont holds will be of use?"

At that final-check-like question from Bikram, Julius caught his breath.

As Helaine had pointed out, he did not possess proof sufficient to call it certain so lightly. It was simply the result of seeking a course other than an appeal to emotion.

Even so, just as Julius clenched his molars, feeling he had to say it —

Bikram: "Greenhorn. That is where you answer at once that it will be of use. Even without certainty."

Letting out the faintest breath, Bikram said it, and Julius widened his eyes—"Sir Bikram?"—but Bikram did not respond to him; instead, he glanced toward Helaine.

Bikram: "Juukulius will extract the imprisoned Belmont. As for bargaining chips to draw out what he knows, consult with your superior."

Helaine: "Are you serious? Keeping him undercover and letting him move with the organization is more certain."

Bikram: "It takes too long. You saw his obstinacy, did you not? Either way, before long he will clash with the organization's lot and have his identity exposed. Am I wrong?"

Julius: "—. Yes, as you say. The trust placed in me exists only in this very moment."

Bikram: "Show some remorse!"

At Julius's chest-puffed reply, Bikram raised his voice.

As Julius made a solemn face under his superior's scolding—

Helaine: “Allow me to confirm… You judge Mr. Belmont to be more beneficial to us than Blau, is that your thinking?”

Quietly asked by Helaine, Julius was at a loss for words for an instant.

He had overborne the other side’s view and pushed through his own. But deciding that an apology was not appropriate here either, Julius dipped his chin and said, “Yes.”

Helaine: “Understood. Then we shall proceed with that in mind.”

Julius: “…Is that acceptable?”

Helaine: “If we are to do this, ensure certainty. We shall also lend a hand with the disruption.”

Bikram: “You got awfully cooperative.”

Helaine: “If we are to do it.”

Slowly shaking her head side to side, Helaine answered in a composed face and voice.

Grateful for her attitude and her offer, Julius steeled his resolve.

—Tonight would be the last day he acted as “Julius.”

Bikram: “We will provide cover. If you are going to do it, make it succeed, Juukulius.”

Julius: “Sir! It is an honor, “Silver Knight” Sir Bikram Edditz!”

With a salute, Julius answered thus, and Bikram heaved a deep sigh. Yet in that sigh, it seemed to Julius there was, somehow, an emotion different from before.

14

—The fact that he had been unable to coordinate with Adelheid regarding the execution of the Belmont rescue operation was Julius’s greatest concern.

At present, Adelheid was accompanying Reiner and attending a party held by a merchant house to pitch “Hexel.”

As a bearer of the Blessing of Detoxification—who boasted that she would not succumb not only to contraband drugs but not even to alcohol—there was no fear she would be caught off guard by those. Yet the unforeseen could occur at any time. What was more, this time around Julius and his group’s very actions might themselves become the unforeseen for her.

At the very least, until tomorrow night, when the events in the royal capital would be relayed to Reiner, there ought to be nothing to worry about; but Julius wanted to get Adelheid out before it reached his ears.

To dispel that concern as well—

Julius: “—We must hasten the extraction of Belmont.”

So fired up, Julius had already reached the door of the underground room in the organization’s hideout—the room where Belmont was confined and receiving a violent interrogation.

Julius’s conduct as “Julius” had thoroughly permeated the place, and whatever he did inside the hideout, no one would call him out. For that reason, he had made it this far without the slightest interference.

—However, the problem lay ahead.

Julius: “There are two guards… ordered to let no one through.”

Two burly guards had been posted before the room in question.

The one who had given the order was doubtless the tattooed man who had taken the lead in interrogating Belmont. Having set things in motion, he too was desperate to make Belmont talk. Unfortunately, no matter how much they beat him, they would not hear what they wanted from Belmont—but they had no way of knowing that.

To prevent a life from being taken in such a fruitless struggle, it was time to act.

Guard A: “—Huh? What the hell is that?”

Suddenly, one of the guards before the door noticed something and blurted that out. Drawn by him, the other guard looked the same way, the brows of both men knitting in confusion.

In their field of view floated a faint six-hued light, swaying irregularly through the dim corridor. Captivated by that eerily beautiful, dancing glow, the men were at a loss for words on the spot—and that was all the opening Julius, now standing behind them, needed to reap their awareness.

Julius: “Well done, my buds.”

Stowing the two unconscious guards in another room, Julius thanked the lights that had aided his diversion—his contracted quasi-spirits. Smiling at the buds, in high spirits to have been of use to him, Julius carefully opened the door to his destination.

Belmont: “…Julius?”

Just as he stepped into the room, a surprisingly clear voice called out to Julius.

Fortunately, there were no guards inside; only Belmont, bound to a chair, sat there all alone. Julius put a finger to his lips, telling him to keep quiet, and then—

Julius: “I’m going to cut the ropes and get you out. Can you keep up?”

Belmont: “…No, my leg’s been broken. Moving under my own power will be difficult.”

Julius: “Your leg…”

At Belmont’s hoarse reply, Julius crouched and examined his darkened, bruised leg. As expected, there was nothing for it but to carry him out; if they were seen in that state, there would be no excuse. In the worst case, they would make enemies of everyone in the hideout and have to fight a grand melee.

With Bikram’s support promised, defeat seemed unlikely.

But in that case, before they could trace the leads toward eradicating “Hexel,” as had been their plan from the start, the organization would go to ground.

Julius: “…”

While Julius was thinking this through, Belmont watched him quietly, without making a fuss.

That calm bearing was a help. Even at the outset, when Julius had come to his aid, Belmont must have had much he wanted to ask, yet he had simply answered the questions he was asked with the pertinent information.

He might even have been a little too understanding—

Julius: “—Tch. Something happened.”

At Julius’s sudden murmur, Belmont caught his breath, just barely audibly.

The disturbance inside the building that he had not sensed was a report Julius received from the quasi-spirits he had set to keep watch on the surroundings. From Ia, the fire quasi-spirit he had posted to watch the hideout’s entrance, came a reaction that something had occurred there—an ally’s support, Julius intuited.

To assist Julius’s infiltration, Helaine had said she would arrange a disturbance. Assuming that was now underway, Julius decided he must not let this chance slip by.

Julius: “It will be a bit rough, but I’ll lend you my shoulder. Let’s go.”

As Julius cut the ropes and offered his shoulder, Belmont answered shortly, “Got it,” and stood.

From the look of him, not only his leg but several teeth and fingers had been broken, but there seemed to be no injuries that put his life in immediate danger. He would be forced a bit, but Julius would get him out.

They left the cellar and carefully headed up to the floor above. Fortunately, the commotion that must have been Helaine's doing still seemed to be raging at the entrance, and Julius felt no sign of anyone coming their way. Using that opening, they made for the back side of the building, from where they would let Belmont escape.

The concrete method was—

Julius: "There's a skiff moored on the river behind the building. A colleague of mine is there, and he should take charge of you."

Belmont: "Hey now… I'm not a cat or a child. I'm a full-grown man, you know."

Julius: "Just for now, do your best to act like a cat."

Having reached the target spot beneath a window that faced the river, Julius told him that, and Belmont's battered face went a bit flat. But he immediately sighed shortly and—

Belmont: "You… the face you show here and your real face are awfully different. The gap is shocking."

Julius: "There are circumstances. I'll apologize properly another time… For now, focus on getting out in one piece. I advise you to comply obediently with my colleague's requests."

Belmont: "…Understood. Thank you."

Receiving his sighing thanks, Julius picked Belmont up and pushed him out through the open window. Belmont vanished beyond the sill, and the lack of any splash was likely thanks to Bikram, waiting in the skiff, catching him deftly.

The plan was to drift downriver under cover of night and carry Belmont to safety.

With this, the extraction of Belmont had succeeded. From here, if "Julius's" actions had not been exposed, he could openly join the fray at the entrance—but that proved impossible.

Julius: "…Miss Helaine."

Slipping quietly away from the rear, Julius peered toward the hideout's front entrance and, seeing the nature of the diversion Helaine had prepared, ground his teeth.

Thug A: "Damn it! Hey, somebody stop him! Kill him!"

Thug B: "No way, no way! He's high on "Hexel" and going berserk! Goddamn it!"

Men who had formed a cordon shouted with bellows and screams. At the center of it, a man was rampaging, swinging a blade in his hand. Letting out a voice that was somewhere between a growl and a war cry, he was rampaging at random; Julius recognized him—Blau.

The Blau they had secured over the course of the investigation was raising hell against the men at the hideout.

With bloodshot eyes and a beastlike face, drool hanging from his mouth, he looked like a different person entirely, but Julius did not mistake him. As the men had judged, he had been dosed with "Hexel," his mental balance shattered—a pitiable Blau.

Helaine: "Allow me to confirm… You judge Mr. Belmont to be more beneficial to us than Blau, is that your thinking?"

Julius: "So that's what this is…"

Realizing at once that this was Helaine's doing, Julius recalled his exchange with her before the operation and belatedly understood that that "confirmation" had been for this stratagem.

Julius did not consider it a childish act of petty spite. Given their limited hand, one could say they were making effective use of a card they had been letting sit idle.

It was only that neither people, nor their lives, could ever be cards or game pieces.

Blau: “Aaaah! Aaaaah, aaaaAAAAH!”

Blau, brandishing a blade with a deranged visage, was even then taking counterattacks from the men, bleeding from everywhere and in tatters. Thanks to the drug’s effects, he seemed to feel no pain or fatigue, but the bleeding and injuries were without a doubt shaving away his life.

It looked to the point that even treatment might no longer be possible.

Julius: “Even so, if I stop him now, there’s a chance—”

He was just about to rush in, as “Julius,” to stop the rampaging man and preserve that chance when—

Reiner: “—What is this commotion?”

A voice he must not have heard, accompanied by a high, cracking ring like shattering ice.

In the instant after that chill, piercing note—kin—their ears caught it, Blau’s body was cleaved on the diagonal. Cut from right shoulder to left flank, Blau, unable even to fully perceive what had happened to him or the reality before his eyes, poured blood across the floor and died.

It was a strike at once too cruel and too refined. And the one who had unleashed it had not even drawn the sword at his hip—a one-eyed man—

Reiner: “Can’t you lot take down even a single “Hexel” junkie without me? There’s a limit to looking tough and being nothing. If appearances are all you’ve got anyway, then all of you might as well carve some monster-ish tattoos into your mugs and be done with it. Like those so-called “Scales.”“

Shrugging as he spoke, Reiner Wahrheit cowed the surroundings; and Julius, who had been lying low, reached the utmost limits of vigilance and tension at the sight.

It was an impossible appearance. By the plan, Reiner's return was to be tomorrow night. For him to have come back to the hideout a day early like this—

Julius: "—We have to pull out."

Offering a silent prayer for the fallen Blau, Julius decided to withdraw.

The invisible slash that cut Blau—the true nature of Reiner's fearsome swordsmanship—was unknown; and if "Julius" stepped out now, he would likely be blamed for failing to subdue the rampaging Blau and punished all the same.

They had succeeded in seizing Belmont's person. The only course left was to quit the field here and hope the information from his mouth would lead to dismantling the organization.

Swallowing that bitter regret, Julius turned on his heel at once and, guided by the scouting quasi-spirits, slipped out a corridor window, escaped the hideout, and melted into the night.

As planned, he was to rendezvous with Bikram downriver—but just as he was leaving the hideout behind, Julius glanced back and was dumbstruck at the sight that met his eyes.

What had shocked Julius was the figure on the unobserved side of the building—someone in a dress, a red-haired girl, skillfully climbing the wall to slip into the second floor—

Julius: "—Adelheid?"

15

Tattooed Man: "So that's the situation—we've got Belmont shut up in the cellar. He keeps saying he'll only talk to the Boss. What'll it be?"

Reiner: "—Right."

At the report from the underling with the neck tattoo, Reiner stroked his chin with a finger and fell into thought.

As Reiner stood in silence, his feet awash in blood, the eyes of his men filled with fear fixed on him. Binding people with fear was easy, but it had the drawback of mass-producing underlings who could do nothing but read his mood.

Reiner: "In that regard, Belmont was one of the ones who could use his own head."

It was an open secret that Marcos Gildark, the Commander of the Royal Guard, had in his youth led a hoodlum band called the "Brotherhood." Those who had belonged to the "Brotherhood" then had scattered and, so it was said, lived hiding their past affiliation. Reiner had not known Belmont was one of them.

That alone was not enough to be certain of collusion between Belmont and the Royal Guard; and it had been Reiner himself who had upheld "punish what is suspicious," so blaming the tattooed men's actions would be off the mark.

Reiner: "In any case, we'll hear the man beg for his life. The cellar, yes?"

Tattooed Man: "Yes. …Uh, by the way, you're back early, aren't you? Weren't you due tomorrow night?"

Reiner: "That was a lie. Same as yours."

Tattooed Man: "H-Huh?"

Reiner: "I've had a prickling bad feeling myself lately. Rather than leave that feeling alone, it's easier to prod the other side into moving. So I deliberately left the capital."

He had not expected the one to bite to be Belmont, but if it was someone sniffing around Reiner's organization, they would have to be at least that formidable for it to make sense. It was a distasteful way for things to click, but in this contest of wits, the results had come out cleanly.

Snorting at the tattooed man, who said “I see!” with the air of currying favor, Reiner set off toward the cellar where Belmont was imprisoned.

Just then, men acting on the tattooed man’s orders started to carry a corpse past him, and—

Reiner: “—Hold it.”

Catching the corpse at the edge of his vision, Reiner stayed his men’s hands and looked at it.

When he had cut the man down, the corpse had been turned away, and its deranged expression had been unfit for a second glance, so he had not noticed; but looking closely now, that corpse was—

Reiner: “…Blau?”

With a startled “Eh?!” the men checked the dead man’s face and choked up.

Their reaction confirmed Reiner’s eyes had been right—but it was strange.

—Blau should have been cut down and finished off the other day as a test of skill for Julius, who wanted into the organization.

For that Blau to be alive, dosed to the gills with contraband, and rampaging here…

Reiner: “—Tch.”

Whirling around, Reiner hastened across the hall and pounded down the stairs to the cellar. He peered into the room where Belmont ought to have been and confirmed no one was there.

Blau’s drug-mad rampage, and Belmont gone. If he considered that together with the fact that Blau had been alive to begin with, there was only one answer.

And there was only one course for Reiner Wahrheit to take.

Reiner: “…Damn it, you’ve gone and made trouble, Julius.”

Tattooed Man: “B-Boss?”

From behind Reiner, who stood in the empty cellar, the tattooed man who had followed him down spoke in a timid voice. At that fearful voice, Reiner turned and lightly raised an empty hand.

And then—

Reiner: “—Sorry, but it’s cleanup time for all of you.”

16

Adelheid: “—Julius?”

The instant he slipped into the room with silent steps, his name was called, and Julius’s cheek tightened.

He had not thought he would be noticed so quickly—best not to do what one is unaccustomed to. With a sigh that held a touch of admiration, he conceded that, in things like this, he could not match a professional.

Julius: “Yes, it’s me. From outside, I saw you slip onto the second floor and hurried after you.”

Adelheid: “That must have startled you—sorry. The Boss’s eyes were off me, and there was a commotion at the entrance. I figured it had to be now.”

Even as she apologized, Adelheid’s hands, turned away from him, did not stop.

She was rifling through the room—Reiner’s private chamber—rapidly searching for something. Guessing it was mission-related, Julius nevertheless said, “That’s far enough,” and—

Julius: “I had no chance to contact you, but the situation has changed. Continuing the infiltration will be difficult. Right now, come with me and leave this—”

Adelheid: “I don’t intend to stay long either. I just want to find the Boss’s safe. There’s a lead in there on the partner he’s working with to sell “Hexel.”“

Julius: “What?”

Adelheid: “A letter. Supposedly kept as a trump card to threaten the other party. I lifted the key. Now we just—”

Julius: “Understood. —My buds.”

Cutting across Adelheid’s words, Julius summoned his contracted quasi-spirits on the spot. Then, to the buds who appeared, he swiftly ordered a search for the “something” hidden in the room.

While Julius and the others had been engaged in rescuing Belmont, Adelheid had been carrying out a dangerous game with Reiner in order to fulfill her own mission.

In that case, he would do everything he could to help Adelheid complete hers.

Iku: “—Found it. One brick in the wall is rigged to come out.”

Receiving the report from Iku, the earth quasi-spirit, Julius went to the section of wall in question and, using the tip of his sword still sheathed, drew the brick toward himself. Beyond it, concealed in the wall, was a black-iron safe—

Adelheid: “There it is. This letter.”

Given the space, Adelheid used the key to open the safe, her voice brightening. Inside the safe was only a single letter, which spoke to Reiner’s character.

In any case, the objective was achieved. All that remained was to slip out through the window once more.

Julius: “All right, let’s go. If we leave right now—”

They could still get away before their designs were exposed.

Just then, as Julius pulled Adelheid by the arm to leave the spot—

Adelheid: "—Watch out!"

Julius: "—Hk!"

—An invisible slash marked the opening of the unavoidable battle between Julius Juukulius and Reiner Wahrheit.

17

—And thus, the story circles back to the beginning.

Julius held his breath on the second floor of the hideout, probing for the presence of Reiner, who could not be seen.

The enemy's invisible sword strikes were not merely unseen; a moment ago they had targeted him regardless of distance or cover. From that, one might infer the true nature of the swordplay to be wind magic.

Julius: "If the answer is a wind blade, then it makes sense the strikes are invisible."

Adelheid: "I see the line of thought. But that probably isn't it. It almost reached me, too."

Julius: "—Do you have grounds for that assertion?"

Adelheid: "Of course."

At Julius's side, Adelheid, likewise feeling out the presence, answered; Julius frowned.

He was not doubting Adelheid's confidence—on the premise that he believed her, he was chafing at the way the true nature of the enemy's swordplay had slipped away from him once again.

If it was not wind magic, then an unseen blade brought to mind refraction of light by yang magic. In fact, Julius himself, by similar means, could manage small tricks like concealing his swordplay.

But the fact it had come from range, from an invisible position, interfered with that line of reasoning.

Just then—

Reiner: “Come out, Julius! It’s you, isn’t it?”

Called by name from downstairs, Julius understood that his true identity had already been exposed.

Even so, there was no need to give the other side more. If he gave away his position and the roughs swarmed there, he would be unable to evade Reiner’s sword strikes amid the melee.

However—

Reiner: “Don’t be so cautious. Even if you’re worried, you’re the only one left here.”

Julius: “—What did you say?”

Reiner: “I don’t know whose agent you are. Odds-on is the Royal Guard, with the outside bet being some other outfit… whatever the case, you’re quite the actor. You fooled me.”

With that smiling praise, Julius intuited that most of his undercover work had been laid bare. Therefore, Reiner had begun proactively eliminating nuisances—eliminating them other than “Julius,” too.

Adelheid: “…Julius, it’s far too quiet downstairs.”

Julius: “Yeah, I agree. …Most likely, aside from you and me, no one survived.”

There should have been more than twenty men in the hideout, yet there was no sign of them at all. That was probably the result of Reiner, having sensed the hand of an investigation upon his organization, personally silencing them.

That he would go to such extremes was beyond what either Julius or Bikram had foreseen—

Reiner: “That’s exactly it. That’s where you’re a step or two behind me.”

Julius: “—!”

As if to goad the Julius who was gnashing his teeth over this grievous misstep, Reiner’s mockery came with slashes.

The sounds of walls and floors being carved up came in succession, the staircase being remade before their eyes into a pitiful ruin. That, more and more, pared down Julius’s options for making a move—yet—

Julius: “—Strange.”

Keeping wary of the slashes from below, Julius murmured at a faint sense of wrongness.

Reiner was a cautious, thorough man. His opening attack—aimed at their throats—would have been fatal without Adelheid’s intuition, but his suppressing fire since then was not. It was an act to make them overly wary. And if that, too, was part of Reiner’s gambit—

Julius: “—Adelheid!”

On instinct he shouted, and pulled Adelheid to him.

—An instant later, an invisible slashing radiance, as if to hew the entire building to pieces, went madly dancing through the night over the slums.

Reiner: “Got them.”

Looking up at the hideout collapsing before his eyes, Reiner smirked at the sure feedback.

That last good-for-nothing left upstairs—Julius, who was probably some outfit’s plant—was a swordsman whose forte was levelheaded maneuvering. Swordsmen with that disposition, always reacting after their opponent, were nothing but convenient prey for Reiner the “placed blade” user.

—The true nature of Reiner Wahrheit's invisible edge was neither wind magic nor yang magic. If one had to categorize it, it might be a kind of yin magic, but even that was uncertain.

What was known was that Reiner could postpone the effect of a sword strike he unleashed. And that he could freely trigger that delayed slash afterward by his own will.

Which was to say, he could spread fatal traps that no one could see, that absolutely no one would notice, wherever he pleased, to be sprung at his own command.

Therefore, Reiner had "placed" slashes throughout the hideout.

He had "placed" them with particular care around his room and on the second floor, so the raging sword-wind should have reduced the enemy to splinters.

To that end he had deliberately prompted caution from below, fixing Julius's feet on the second floor.

Reiner: "You avoid even one-in-a-million chances. That's what smart maneuvering is."

Julius's swordsmanship was still developing, immature for his age, but compared to the other roughs it was night and day. If they crossed blades head-on, there was no guarantee there would not be a freak outcome. He would not cross such unnecessary, dangerous bridges. —That was Reiner's way of getting by.

Even Reiner, right after he had been taken into the Royal Guard, had believed in and been hopeful for his prowess with the sword.

But such illusions shattered when he beheld the kind of monster that existed in his era—the "Boulder." Faced with that, he understood it had been a dream with no substance. That was all there was to it.

Reiner: "You're the same. In the end, you're just one of the rabble —"

Julius: "—Al Clauseria."

In a heartbeat, a voice that could not have been heard came from the rubble of the collapsed hideout, and rainbow aurora seared Reiner's vision. With a sharp "—!" he leapt aside just in time, narrowly skirting the thing that had burned the night, then held his breath and glared straight ahead.

There, Julius stood amid the wreckage, Adelheid cradled in one arm, the knight's sword in his other hand trained on Reiner.

Reiner: "How did you—"

Julius: "We broke the floor and dropped to the level below. It was by a hair's breadth, but we made it."

As he said it, Julius was half-dead, his whole body torn up with lacerations, in tatters. He had escaped with his life, but he looked nothing like someone who could say they had made it in time—no, that was wrong.

Julius was in tatters. But Adelheid was not. She was unscathed.

Indeed, Julius had made it in time.

Adelheid: "Julius, what are you doing? Even without this, I—"

Julius: "—Julius."

Held in his arms and protected, Adelheid faltered with an "Eh."

Setting her on the ground, Julius stepped forward and, bloodied, brought his sword to guard.

Then, loud enough for the Adelheid behind him and the Reiner before him to hear, he continued.

Julius: "—Royal Guard, Julius Juukulius."

It was a warrior's opening—the rite a fighter must perform when stepping onto the field, to declare his title and name, and engrave himself upon the foe with whom he would trade lives.

The foolish vow of one who believed in the fantasy Reiner scorned:

fighting fair and square.

However—

Reiner: “—Disgraced Knight, Reiner Wahrheit.”

Answering with his own name, Reiner drew his sword.

In the next instant, the half-dead Julius—no, Julius Juukulius—stepped in, leaping forward wreathed in rainbow light. Reiner raised his blade to meet him, feeling vexed by the terribly sluggish tip, and in his heart, he felt a twinge of chagrin——at how long it had been since he had swung any proper sword that was not a “placed blade.”

18

Healer: “Aaagh, seriously! What is it with tonight, nya! Injured folks keep coming one after another…!”

In the Royal Sanatorium at night, as he handled the stream of casualties being brought in one after another, a dainty healer with flaxen cat ears pricked up dashed briskly about.

Though not an official healer of the Sanatorium, this healer’s skill surpassed that of anyone there, and from a short while ago voices calling for his help had been reaching him without pause.

From what he’d heard, it seemed there’d been a major roundup in the slums involving the Royal Knights. Even so, there were far too many injured, and none of them, to the eye, seemed related to the Royal Knights.

Whatever the incident was, all a healer could do was treat them one after another—

Healer: “Prioritize the ones with a chance to be saved! If you think they’re beyond you, pass them to me! We’re going to snatch as many lives as we can, even if it’s just one more! That’s what Dr. Garitch—”

Girl: “—Sorry, can I ask that you prioritize him?”

Healer: “NyaaAAAH?!”

Amid the bustling Sanatorium, the cat-eared healer giving orders jumped at the voice from behind. He whirled around, and there stood a red-haired girl about her own age, and a purple-haired young man covered in wounds—

Healer: “Kyaah, he’s in tatters! Hurry, hurry, get him onto a bed!”

Girl: “Can you save him? He’s an important benefactor.”

Ferris: “No one but Ferris could handle this, nya! And for the record, Ferris just happened to be here by chance, so be grateful, okay—thank your own good luck and Lady Crusch, nya!”

With that declaration, the healer began swift treatment of the gravely wounded young man.

His body was laced with cuts, and though the blood loss was severe, he had somehow avoided fatal wounds. Sequelae could be dealt with later.

His life could be preserved—thanks solely to this being one of the days the cat-eared healer was in the royal capital.

Girl: “Please, take care of him. —I have something I have to do.”

Ferris: “Huh? Hey, if he’s important, at least hold his hand—wait, what?!”

No sooner had she said her piece than, when the healer turned, the red-haired girl had vanished from her sight. She looked around in search of that figure, but the girl was nowhere to be seen.

Shaking with anger, ears quivering, at such selfishness, the healer looked down at the young man under treatment.

Ferris: “Geez, geez, geez! Think harder about the company you keep, nya! Can you say your name?!”

Julius: “…li, us. juli, us.”

Ferris: “Julius? Julius, got it! I won’t let you die, so you’d better be grateful, nya!”

—At the same time that desperate treatment was underway at the Royal Sanatorium.

Nobleman: “Hurry, hurry, the Royal Knights will be here any moment. Before that—before that!”

With a pale face, a noble urged his coachman on, and a dragon carriage set off in a frantic dash through the nighted royal capital.

The route led from a secondary residence in the royal capital to his main manor in his domain. Ordinarily, departures waited for morning, but despite the hour growing later, the nobleman hastened the departure.

He had cause enough to do so—the worst kind of news had arrived. The business partner with whom the noble had joined hands had become the target of a Royal Knights roundup.

There had been no time to confer on a response, and he had lost contact with the other party. In that case, it was only a matter of time before the hand of investigation reached him as well. Before that happened, he had to move his assets.

For that purpose, the nobleman urged the dragon carriage on as much as possible—

Adelheid: “—That’s far enough.”

In the next instant, the coupling of the dragon carriage was destroyed, and, no longer within the ground dragon’s Wind Evasion, the carriage went violently rolling; the nobleman—Count Easley Orlon—saw heaven and earth turn upside down.

The red-haired figure who had forced the issue—Adelheid—confirmed Count Orlon, eyes spinning, inside the passenger coach now lying on its side, and let out a long breath.

In the bosom of the dress she wore was the letter retrieved from Reiner's hideout.

The contents of that letter were proof that Count Orlon had been the organization's backer and had been involved in the trade of "Hexel." Known for good deeds and good governance, Count Orlon had secretly joined hands with a knight dishonorably discharged and thrown himself into wrongdoing—that seemed to be the story.

His person had been safely secured, and the letter was in hand. If testimony could be obtained from the captured Reiner Wahrheit, he would have no room to wriggle out of it.

Adelheid: "Thanks to Julius… no, to Julius Juukulius."

She exhaled, thinking of the young man who had become her partner in this infiltration.

Because of her own hesitation, she had made him take needless wounds. She prayed no injuries or aftereffects would remain; and she felt bewildered, too, at the first experience in her life of being protected by someone else.

And in the gap when her thoughts were thus preoccupied—

Adelheid: "—Oh no."

A high, ringing sound spread out, and next, coins went clattering across the stone-paved street in all directions—the box of gold coins Count Orlon had tried to take out had opened inside the toppled coach, and the coins had tumbled out through the shattered windows and broken roof.

In a hurry, Adelheid began gathering the scattered coins. Hearing the commotion, city guards and rubberneckers would soon gather. She didn't want to cause any extra fuss.

Thus, as she swiftly gathered up the coins, one piece, then another —

Adelheid: "—Ah."

Her eyes met those of a girl who had picked up a coin that had slipped into the gap of an alley.

A child of about ten, with blonde hair and red eyes. Apparently she had happened upon the scene; clenching the small gold coin in her hand, the girl stared fixedly at Adelheid.

From her shabby clothes, she was likely a resident of the slums. Hoping to get her to leave without a fuss, Adelheid opened her mouth—and—

Girl: "…Don't wear such confusing getup. I thought you were a girl."

Adelheid: "…"

With only that, the girl turned her back on the lightly wide-eyed Adelheid and, before she could be stopped, dashed into the darkness deeper in the alley.

For a moment Adelheid watched in a daze, then blinked, and laughed.

Laughing, she slowly shook her head and murmured,

Adelheid: "I'm beaten. I thought I was passing pretty well."

19

Bikram: "Reiner Wahrheit and Count Easley Orlon—the two, ringleader and mastermind behind the illicit sales of "Hexel"—have both been taken into custody. Well done, Juukulius."

Julius: "No, I merely carried out my duty. I'm the one who's grateful for being moved to a private room. More than a ward, that place was… uncomfortable to be in."

Bikram: "Naturally it was. Even if we couldn't reveal the undercover mission, when I heard you'd been thrown into the same room as the roughs who'd made it out because of you, my blood ran cold."

d

With that, Bikram, visiting Julius at the Sanatorium, shrugged, then arranged the peeled appa on a plate and handed it to the Julius on the bed.

Raising his upper body, Julius accepted the plate and gratefully strung the slices together.

Julius: “…Sweet, with a mellow bouquet. Especially a appa peeled by the “Silver Knight’s” own hand.”

Bikram: “As if that would change the taste. Don’t get all creepily sentimental.”

Julius: “My apologies. …About the appa—may I have them all?”

Bikram: “Do as you like… no, finish them during this visit. You seem the sort to try and save some.”

Bikram’s reaction stung, but Julius could not exactly call it wrong either, so he silently bit into a second slice of appa.

—A few days had passed since that night of the big roundup, and Julius was safely on the mend.

Judging from the reactions of the quasi-spirits worried for the awakened Julius, his injuries had been quite close to the edge; he had been saved by an ace healer he had encountered by the flow of events. It seemed the healer in question had already left the Sanatorium, and Julius had not even thanked him directly.

Julius: “I must, without fail, make the time one day to repay the debt to the savior of my life…”

So he vowed, firmly, in his heart.

Then, speaking of saviors of his life, Julius glanced toward Bikram.

Julius: “Might I have the chance to exchange a few words with Miss Helaine?”

Bikram: "…Unlikely. From their side, once a mission is wrapped, every attachment up to that point is over. Then it's on to the next mission… You wanted to air at least a complaint?"

Julius: "…I have an anger over the use of Blau that I cannot gloss over. At the same time, I also understand that without such a disturbance, saving Mr. Belmont, and resolving the incident, would have been difficult."

Bikram: "—They were grateful you saved Belmont. Told me to pass that along."

At Bikram's words—he sounded as though he'd debated whether to say it—Julius thought of Helaine's stance of not giving thanks directly and smiled wryly.

Even so, there was something else, which, told to him later, had truly shocked him.

Julius: "To think Mr. Belmont was really a spy—Miss Helaine's colleague."

Bikram: "For my part, what surprised me more was that the rumor about the Royal Guard and Belmont being connected was a ploy by Belmont himself to shake the organization. If you hadn't started spouting green idealism, he might well have ended up dead as he was… Truly, those "Six Tongues" types…"

Julius: "Sir Bikram, that—"

Bikram: "Sorry, my tongue slipped. Forget it. If it's necessary, that word will cross your ears again someday."

As Bikram made a face like "a blunder of a lifetime," Julius had to work very hard to restrain his curiosity that wanted to press on, and somehow managed to hold back.

At that wholehearted effort from Julius, Bikram heaved a deep sigh and then—

Bikram: "As for the captured Reiner, he's been cooperative in the questioning. It's like a possessing spirit fell off his face… That said, what he did is what he did. He'll likely face the extreme penalty."

Julius: "That is… regrettable. If it's the conclusion reached after careful deliberation, it cannot be helped."

As the one who had taken him alive, there was some regret. At the same time, it was also true that Reiner had committed unforgivable crimes; the crime of trading in "Hexel" was grave.

It would also serve as a showpiece of a sentence—Julius's expression clouded at that, yet—

Bikram: "I've said a lot, but on the whole, you did well, Juukulius. We likely could not have carried out this mission if you hadn't been my subordinate. I'm an old wreck, but as a knight, I thank you."

Julius: "…"

At Bikram's earnest tone, Julius caught his breath and savored the feeling.

To have even the "Silver Knight" Bikram Edditz say as much—there was nothing to feel but pride. However, that was not the only reason for the emotion that washed over Julius.

The rumors that reached him even in the Sanatorium were no mistake.

Bikram: "Wyatt Edditz—that was Reiner's inside man… my unworthy son."

Julius: "Sir Bikram…"

Bikram: "The incident that became the trigger for Wahrheit's expulsion—the slaying of Count Orlon's envoy—the real culprit was my boy, and Wahrheit took the blame. …Given that he already worked with the Count and considering his secret sword, it may have been a trap even so; but my son leaked information from the Royal Guard to them again and again. However it began, a crime is a crime."

At Bikram's matter-of-fact explanation, Julius felt a wrenching helplessness.

Though a member of the Edditz family, which for generations had produced knights, Wyatt Edditz had abetted Reiner's misdeeds. Yet, considering Bikram's feelings, to berate him for foolishness—when there was the suspicion he had been ensnared—would be heartless.

As a result, with Julius unable to offer either comfort or a sop—

Bikram: "I am retiring from knighthood. What my son did is what he did. I must take responsibility."

Julius: "…"

Bikram: "Don't make such a sour face. Even so, I'm grateful to you, Juukulius."

Julius: "Grateful? Sir Bikram, to me?"

When the regretful Julius widened his eyes, Bikram nodded. "That's right."

Bikram: "On the boat, when we recovered Belmont, and his name came up as a suspected insider, I'd be lying if I said I didn't waver. I could have protected my idiot son and strayed from the path. But —"

There he cut the words off, fixing his eyes straight on Julius.

At the sharpness of that gaze, and at the gentle feeling that ran contrary to it, Julius felt bewildered.

Smiling faintly at Julius's reaction, Bikram went on.

Bikram: "You reminded me of what chivalry is. Thanks to you, though I may be a failure as a father, I didn't have to throw away being a knight. That's a good outcome, isn't it?"

Julius: "That… is."

Bikram: "Hey, greenhorn. You're quite something. Honestly, I can't say you don't have a temperament that could see your legs swept right out from under you… but stay that way.”

Julius: “…”

Bikram: “Keep being a knight as a knight should be. —An old knight’s last request.”

Spoken gently, from a face with the edge gone, the words left Julius at a loss.

For Bikram Edditz, who had long served for the Kingdom of Lugunica under the name of the “Silver Knight,” this retirement was not of the sort he had wished; it would be one to draw pointed fingers.

The Edditz name would be disgraced as the foolish act of a son, and a father with holes for eyes who had not seen through him—but Julius Juukulius knew.

He knew how great and how gallant a knight Bikram Edditz, the “Silver Knight,” truly was.

Julius: “I will strive to live up to your expectations as far as I possibly can. They are the words of the “Silver Knight” Bikram Edditz, who vied in battle honors with the “Shield Knight,” Grimm Fauzen.”

Bikram: “How do you even know that. You are truly scary, you know.”

20

—After such a bittersweet parting, the first mission of Julius Juukulius as a knight reached its final scene.

Julius: “If you like, would you have some appa as well? I can’t finish them alone.”

Adelheid: “—I think I will. I like appa. My nanny often made pies with it.”

As she visited the hospital room, Adelheid popped a slice of appa from the plate; at her softly curving lips as she murmured, “Sweet,” Julius’s brows eased in relief.

To all appearances, Adelheid bore no injuries. Because his final battle with Reiner had been a state of no-mind, his certainty that he had protected her was hazy.

Adelheid: “Don’t worry, all went smoothly. We stopped the illicit sales of “Hexel,” and cleared the suspicions. It pains me that you were gravely wounded, but…”

Julius: “Far better than you being hurt. Call it a wound of honor.”

Adelheid: “When you put it that way, just saying “sorry” would be boorish, I suppose.”

At her troubled, wry smile, Julius felt it should be he who offered thanks.

After the duel with Reiner, he’d heard that the one who had brought the near-dead Julius to the Sanatorium had been a red-haired girl. Obviously, that could only have been Adelheid.

But just as much as he wanted to thank her, Julius also had something he wished to ask.

That was—

Julius: “In the end, I hear you were not a member of Miss Helaine’s… the ‘Shadow Knights.’”

Adelheid: “…The Shadow… Knights?”

Julius: “I have strict orders from my superior—former superior—not to dig deeper until the time comes. We can set that aside. More importantly, about you.”

Julius’s probing gaze pressed Adelheid for her true affiliation.

Helaine had concealed her affiliation; a colleague of hers had infiltrated the organization, but it had already come to light that the one in question had been Belmont.

It seemed even Helaine had not been told that the infiltrator was Belmont, and her organization had not sent two operatives either.

If so, for what reason had Adelheid infiltrated the organization?

Adelheid: “That is…”

Julius: “If it’s hard to say, answer my question instead.”

Adelheid: “—All right.”

With a tense look, Adelheid dipped her chin. She likely answered so because her honest nature would not allow her to brush Julius off.

The question Julius put to that straightforward young woman was—

Julius: “—I hear the suspicion over Sir Heinkel Astrea has been lifted; is that the desired outcome?”

Adelheid: “…”

Blinking several times in surprise at the question, Adelheid stared; Julius tilted his head and added, “How is it?”

Taking that in, Adelheid fell silent for a time, then softly smiled.

Adelheid: “Ah, yes, it is the desired result. Thanks to your cooperation. Thank you, Julius.”

Julius: “Then I’m glad. For my part, I owe you my life. My thanks, Adelheid.”

Exchanging smiles and words of gratitude, the tension between Julius and Adelheid dissolved.

She did not belong to the Royal Guard, and perhaps not to the “Shadow Knights” either, but Adelheid’s aim was not a mistaken one, and she was his benefactor. It might even be that, as one tied to the lineage of the “Sword Saint,” she was more skilled with the blade than Julius.

Even so, she had let Julius carry through with a knight’s pride. She was a woman of rare spirit.

Adelheid: “I should get going. It wouldn’t be good to be a burden.”

Julius: “Those who visit are only my brother and my family. I can’t tell them about the mission, so I would welcome it if you came.”

Adelheid: “I’m happy to hear it, but another time. —Goodbye, Julius.”

Waving over her shoulder, Adelheid headed for the wardroom door. At her slender back, Julius—for some reason—felt this would be the last chance.

Despite her having said “another time,” he felt that he would not see her again.

It would not be right to stop that retreating back. Nor did he wish to call her back. Only, if he intuited that this was a farewell in this life, there was something he ought to say.

Julius: “Adelheid, though our methods differ, you strove earnestly to fulfill your wish and did not turn your back on the path of humanity. I respect you. Please, stay that way.”

Adelheid: “—Stay well.”

Without turning in response to Julius’s words, Adelheid left that behind and departed the room.

Only after he watched that back be hidden by the door did Julius realize that what he had said had been, for the most part, a hand-me-down of words he had received from Bikram.

Because they were words he had been happy to receive, he had passed them along just as they were, no doubt.

With his tumultuous first mission over and a brief lull at hand, Julius felt keenly—

Julius: “So my ideals and my chivalry are still only borrowed from someone dazzling I admired. Untalented as I am, I hope that someday I may find my own words and my own way of walking.”

As Julius murmured that, six lights suddenly rose around him, as if to chide him.

The quasi-spirits circled round his head, as though berating the fainthearted Julius. With a little chuckle of “haha” at their rebuke, Julius strung another slice of appa from the plate.

He thought that the sweet-and-tart honeyed taste might be Bikram’s final lesson—to chew both sour and sweet.

He felt as if Bikram were scolding him: “Don’t take everything so positively!”

—Thereafter, just as Julius had sensed, he never once had the opportunity to meet Adelheid again.

Only, years later, when he became friends with the son whose safety Adelheid had worried over—Heinkel Astrea’s son, the “Sword Saint,” Reinhard van Astrea—Julius tried bringing up Adelheid in a roundabout way.

In response, Reinhard, unusually, made a troubled face and smiled wryly as he said, at a rather rapid clip,

Reinhard: “Adelheid is doing well even now. Julius, she thinks of you as a very dear friend. That’s certain. I guarantee it.”

At his oddly hasty explanation, Julius could not press further.

Beyond that curious way the topic flowed, Julius kept praying for the safety of that other friend connected to House Astrea. —That was the resolution of Julius’s first mission.

END

Once Upon a Time in Lugunica II
(CA)
(Translation Pending)

Guardians of the Crimson Flame (CA)

1

???: “—Al-sama, can you hear my voice loud and clear~?”

Al: “Woah, I really can hear you.”

Hearing the voice of the girl through the glass, Al, who had been skeptical, involuntarily muttered those words.

He understood the principle, and he had also been able to imagine the result. But, that was just that; getting a bourgeois sense of surprise upon actually seeing it implemented, he was unable to put on any appearances whatsoever.

Girl: “If it’s a matter of appearances, your current clothing suits you extremely well~, have some confidence. Ah~, but, but, the pose of putting the glass up to your ear might be a bit lame, don’t you think?”

Al: “Stop reading people’s minds. Also, it’s not like I’m doing this because I want to.”

Girl: “You’re driven by necessity, isn’t that right~. I totally understa~nd.”

Sighing at her mischievous reply, Al took an objective look at himself following the girl’s comment.

Normally, Al’s bandit style was assured to garner comments saying that he did not know how to dress for different occasions, but today he had paired a formal tuxedo outfit with his boorish steel helmet, a look straight out of this spring’s brand new Lugunica Collection—accented by an empty glass that he had placed to the side of his helmet, he was in the middle of a conversation with an unseen partner on an unpopulated balcony.

Al: “Rather than lame, it’s simply suspicious.”

Girl: “Isn’t it too late to be worrying about that?”

Al: “Shut the hell up.”

Thoroughly picking up on his complaints, the other party said such needless things through the glass, so he cursed at her. Then, Al directed his gaze towards the venue bustling with people, and enquired “So?”.

Girl: “The inner part on the right-hand side of the venue, the dandy gentleman with gray hair and a beard.”

Al: “Gray, beard, and dandy, roger that.”

Receiving that, Al hid the glass in a corner by the balcony’s hand railing, straightened himself up, and then returned to the banquet hall. Then, as he searched for the person who matched the description, he had some trouble. There was no helping it. After all, this was a party in which the attendees concealed the majority of their faces.

Locating the target regardless, he introduced himself and led them into the hallway.

Then—

Al: “—Your stars were bad.”

After leading them to an isolated area, Al unveiled his true objective.

Immediately after, his opponent, removing the mask of a gentleman in a double entendre, targeted his neck; twisting his body to avoid the attack, Al drew a knife and stabbed it into his opponent’s side, the poison coating the blade taking his life.

Holding up the body that had fallen limp, he hid the corpse behind the mansion, and reached a point where he could take a small breather.

Al: “Shit, six times… fucking strong, this guy.”

It had been a considerable hardship to deal with just one of them, and thinking about what had just happened was giving him a headache.

Enduring the headache, Al picked up the glass that he had hidden there in advance, and placed it against the side of his helmet.

Girl: “As expected, Al-sama performed brilliantly~. But, there’s still a long way to go, y’know?”

Al: “…”

Girl: “Huh? Is something wrong? Can you hear me? The thread is stretched taut, so you should be able to hear me, right~?”

Hearing the voice of the same girl he had heard while on the balcony, Al, having perfectly guessed the cause of his headache, deferred his response for a bit, and did not answer the “Hello~?” he received.

Without answering, he suddenly thought back on the reason why, at this masked ball—this Masquerade Night being held at the Barielle Mansion, he was being driven to do this bloody work behind the scenes.

2

—That, was ten days prior to Al participating in the dinner party, in a formal outfit he was not accustomed to wearing.

Schult: “Priscilla-sama has very much ordered that she wants to hold a “Maskaraid Naight”!”

Al: “A masquerade night…”

“Very much indeed!”; answering Al’s absentminded mumble with a sparkle in his eyes, was the shota butler who admirably worked at the Barielle Mansion, Priscilla’s favourite, Schult.

As those red eyes, brimming with eagerness and curiosity, looked up at him, Al fiddled with the metal fixtures of his helmet, shrugging his shoulders at his master's idea.

Al: "Well, it's basically a masked dinner party, but what sorta influence… I mean, as soon as she said it in a foreign-import language, I guess it goes without saying that the origin was me."

Schult: "Ah, but, I am very much the one who said that I would like to try it. I heard from Priscilla-sama that there was a type of party where you hide your face, and I so just happened to… very much indeed."

Al: "I see. It's not like the Princess's favoritism of Schult-chan is starting just now, and it also aligns with the interpretation that the Princess herself seems like she would like a masked ball, so I get it."

Rather, Priscilla's nature was such that it would not feel out of place for her to hold one once a week. Though if Al were to say such a thing, he knew that he would receive a scolding, so he would not say it aloud.

Anyhow, Al had been able to reach an understanding through Schult's explanation.

Al: "So then, Schult-chan and the other girls are all super busy with the preparations."

Looking around, aside from Schult, who had stopped before Al, the other servants who worked at the mansion could be seen busily bustling about. Unfortunately, Al could not imagine just how much work it took to hold a masquerade ball, but there was no way that it would be easy to make preparations for such a sudden party.

Only, proportionate to how pressed they were with the sudden work, there was no discontent or dissatisfaction to be found on their faces.

Al: "Seriously, to be so popular despite all that is such a strange aspect about the Princess."

Schult: "Priscilla-sama is kind and beautiful, so everybody loves her very much!"

Giving a sincere reply to Al's idle grumbling, Schult's small body restlessly sprang up to converge with his associates in making preparations for the party.

Schult was still young, and unreliable as a servant, but the mere presence of his naivety held a strange ability to encourage those around him.

Al: "A technique that uses Schult-chan's charm, huh? Since Schult-chan tends to be doted on, I'm excited to see just how devilishly he'll tempt the onee-sans once his limbs grow to full length."

Then, it happened at the moment that Al vocalized that useless, impure forecast of the future.

???: "Wah~, Al-sama has such a mental image of the pure Schult-chan, how dirty~."

Al: "…"

Heeding the sudden voice, Al narrowed his eyes within his helmet, and turned around.

Within the garden where he had been speaking with Schult, no figure other than Al could be discerned. But, since there was no possibility for that malice-filled voice to have been a hallucination, Al walked up towards the flower bed, blooming with bright red flowers, and plunked himself down against the brick wall.

Then, calling out to the other side of the wall with an "Oi",

Al: "Don't turn up here so carelessly. Priscilla Barielle's mansion will start having rumors that the Hollow of the maid who was beheaded for disloyalty is prowling around, night after night."

???: "It's noon right now, Yae-chan has legs, and to begin with, I don't have any memory of getting beheaded for disloyalty~? — Though, I did go through something far more terrifying than that."

Indeed, this person appended a sentiment of slightly differing tone at the end of her retort. That snide remark could not be construed as a grudge, and it caused Al's lips to contort greatly.

Concealed behind the brick wall, the person conducting herself so that the people of the mansion would not discover her—she who did not show herself from across the wall, was a girl with red hair, mischievous cat-like eyes, and a supple build. She had formerly been employed at this mansion, but for personal reasons, she had since resigned.

However, the reason why she must not be found, was not because she was a person who had retired from the mansion.

After all, she was an assassin who had been ordered to take out the master of the mansion, Priscilla Barielle, a traitor whose schemes had been uncovered and hindered by none other than Al.

—Yae Tenzen, that was the identity of the girl loitering behind the wall, conversing with Al.

Yae: "Ever since that night, I have been Al-sama's loyal servant… At your command and behest, Al-sama, I am content with acting as a spy, working as a killer, and serving as your harlot…"

Al: "Stop making me out to be an atrocious villain who actually makes you do all of that. As of right now, only the spy part is true."

Yae: "And when you say as of right now, that would mean~…"

Al: "You're never getting the chance to do that third thing. Don't make me say it again."

Yae: "Even though there's a second thing, the third one is all you can think about; Al-sama really is a boy at heart~."

He thought he had preempted it, but crushed by such an invincible theory, Al was at a loss for words. Since prolonging this topic would only put him at a disadvantage, Al began to shift the course of the conversation.

Yae also ought to have been aware of how risky it was to show her face at the mansion. So, to nonetheless overcome that risk and plan to make contact with Al meant—

Yae: "By the way, the mansion is quite lively right now, isn't it~?

Earlier as well, Schult-chan was restless… as always, he's so adorable that I just wanna hug him tight!"

Al: "I feel the same way, but the reason you're here isn't just because of Schult-chan withdrawal symptoms, yeah? So what's…"

Yae: "—It seems like the next plot to assassinate the Madam is in the works."

Going on? Interrupted as he was about to continue so, Al narrowed his eyes at the sharpness, chilliness, and cutting contents of those words, and silently allowed the information to sink into his brain.

A plot to assassinate Priscilla Barielle: it had a truly unsettling timbre to it, but the matter in itself was not surprising.

Currently, she was one of five candidates for the Royal Selection that would influence the future of the Kingdom of Lugunica, and even if not for that, the severity of her personality made it easy for her to forge enemies. It would not be strange for there to be those who considered Priscilla a hindrance, what with her clever eyes that seemed to see through everything, and thus wished for her to disappear.

But, that easily understandable enmity was a different matter entirely when it came to something relayed by Yae.

Al: "The Vollachian Empire's preparing its next plot, huh? How did you find out?"

Yae: "There were signs of people coming and going at the base that I previously used. It seems like Yae-chan's successor came to retrieve supplies~."

Al: "Oi oi, even though they're the cornerstone of the Empire's intelligence operations, this shinobi's been acting carelessly."

Yae: "I wouldn't call it an error on their side. Al-sama probably can't imagine it, but it's a super-duper high level of difficulty for people of the Empire to secretly maneuver within the Kingdom~."

Yae pouted her lips with nuance at Al's thoughtless evaluation, and thereupon she added “Besides~”,

Yae: “—There is no possibility whatsoever that they could imagine that Yae-chan is still alive, and much less that she betrayed the Empire, so it’s a natural course of action for them.”

She said so quietly, her words clad in a cutting edge so sharp that they alone had the potential to kill.

Al: “…”

Feeling an illusion as if that cutting edge had been fastened to the back of his neck, Al closed a single eye.

In truth, Yae’s words held no falsehoods. —She was an unparalleled genius of a ninja produced by the Vollachian Empire’s shinobi village, granted a mission of utmost importance, an existence promised to carry it through to fruition. In the one in ten thousand possibility that she were to fail, it was engraved into her soul to commit suicide without leaking any bit of the Empire’s information whatsoever.

Indeed, her soul. The programming that had been engraved into her soul, had been forcibly overwritten by Al.

Such a thing ought to have been impossible, and so this failure on Vollachia’s part, by all rights, could not be condemned.

Yae: “To think that Yae-chan, who overcame all sorts of the village’s penances whilst humming a tune, would have her body and mind forced into surrender by a middle-aged man of the Kingdom, betraying her own motherland.”

Al: “Stop with these false charges that I know nothing about. It’s no laughing matter.”

Yae: “—. That mi~ght be true. So then, so then, about this next assassination~.”

Al: “It sounds like you’re deciding on plans for a day off…”

Yae: “There’s nearly no doubt that it’s going to be enacted at the next soirée held by the Madam. I believe you called it a "Masquerade Night"?"

Hearing the forecast of the enemy's assassination plot presented by Yae, Al unconsciously held his head, troubled.

Naturally, a banquet in which many invitees would be entering and exiting the mansion would be the ideal opportunity for an assassination. Furthermore, it would be a masked ball in which it was recommended that the participants conceal their faces—for the Empire, wishing to recover from Yae Tenzen's failure, it was a combination that seemingly blessed them with a second chance.

He wanted to hold his head at this happenstance too, but there did not lie Al's greatest lament.

Al: "Even if I were to suggest cancelling it because it's dangerous, all that comes to mind is the Princess absolutely not listening to me…"

Yae: "Once the Madam has decided to do something, she will firmly refuse to bend~."

Al: "That's right, I'm beat, truly."

Fiddling with the fixture on his helmet, Al slumped his shoulders at the conceivable reality that he would end up displeasing Priscilla, and receive corporal punishment. If it was something like getting kicked by Priscilla's foot, it would be a reward; but, if he roused her true ire, causing her to draw the Yang Sword, he would be unable to do anything.

Anyhow—

Al: "—I guess there's also the idea that it'd be better to have foreknowledge of when exactly the elusive shinobi will be turning up."

Yae: "…"

Al: "Yae, I'll do my best to persuade the Princess, but don't count on it. Neither will I. More importantly, on the day of the event, we'll allocate our strength to repelling the assassins. I'll be putting you to work as well."

Swapping away from his wretched thoughts, Al attempted to deal with it constructively. Then, without receiving a reply from Yae, Al called out her name, "Yae?", once again,

Al: "What's wrong? Don't tell me that you're reluctant to quarrel with your old pals…"

Yae: "—. No, no, nothing of the sort. Only, I was just thinking about how Al-sama really is scary~."

Al: "…Ahh? What the hell's that?"

Thinking that she would start rambling again, Al cut her short and stopped associating with her. Then, behind Al as he began to systematically allocate the elements necessary for the day in question—

Yae: "Truly, Al-sama is a scary person."

That final appended comment never reached the ears of Al, deep in rumination.

3

—Thus, returning to the time of the Masquerade Night in question, when Al had finished dealing with one of the assassins who had infiltrated the event, and regained contact with Yae.

Surely enough, Priscilla did not lend an ear to Al's suggestion, and proceeded to hold a "Masquerade Night".

Corollarily, Al was clad in a tuxedo, a getup quite unfamiliar to him, and unusually, he was not acting as Priscilla's jester, but was rather performing the duties of a "Knight" by the perception of his surroundings. —Truly, it was the worst feeling.

Not his current task, but the present situation of needing to perform the duties of a "Knight", was the worst.

Yae: “Hellooo~? Al-sama~?”

Al: “Ah, my bad. Put you on hold for a bit.”

The empty glass pressed against the side of his helmet, Al responded to Yae’s voice brought about by its vibrations.

Attached to the base of the glass in Al’s hand, was a superfine thread that was difficult to see even with strained eyes, and it connected to the one in Yae’s hands as she concealed herself in the shadows of the mansion. It was a means of maintaining medium-range communication, using the principle of what was known as the “string phone”. —The epic tool he had once thought only existed in fiction, made possible by the skill of the Thread User, Yae Tenzen.

During the preparations in the leadup to the day of the party, Al had set up Yae’s “string phones” in several places around the mansion, laying the groundwork for them to communicate like this without needing to come face to face.

Al: “Though in truth, if we had one set of Conversation Mirrors, I wouldn’t’ve had to go through all that trouble.”

Yae: “Please don’t say that so lightly~. While it’s true that there is a greater supply of them in circulation than other Meteors, that still doesn’t make them easy to get one’s hands on. Not to mention, I’m currently jobless, a himo-woman completely reliant on Al-sama.”

Al: “Be careful there, himo is typically only used for men.”

Yae: “Eh~, why is that exactly?”

Al: “Who knows? It’s a strange part of the Japanese language.”

He got the impression that there was a gendered nuance at the time when the term was coined, but Al had a personal inkling that investigating it any further in this world would not yield any more conclusions, so he neglected doing so.

More importantly—

Al: “They were quite formidable, but how are we looking? Are we finished?”

Yae: “Hmm~, Yae-chan would like to give Al-sama a reward for doing his best~, but glancing back at it, it would seem like there are still about eight people remaining~.”

Al: “EIGHT…?! Even though back then, you went in solo? Maybe you were just a sacrificial pawn?”

Yae: “Please at least say that I’m nine-times as outstanding as the shinobi who are now coming~. That they felt so assured and secure in sending me in solo, that’s just how cute and reliable Yae Tenzen is!”

Al had fallen speechless at the length of the road ahead, being considerably longer than what he had imagined, and Yae’s jestful words rang hollow to his ears.

Be that as it may, Yae’s lighthearted comments, to which he had no intention of clapping back, were likely the truth. —The several shinobi who had infiltrated the party, aiming to assassinate Priscilla, would be absolutely oblivious to the fact that their identities were being leaked like this.

Moreover, it was not even a matter of being exposed by a source who had obtained their information in advance.

Yae: “Habits in disguise and masquerade show up more frequently in the tips of the hair and in the corners of the eyes than they do in gestures or behavior. I’m quite proficient at detecting that. Stuff like disguises that are unusually good at making one look way younger.”

Al: “That last thing isn’t related to the shinobi, but that’s a huge help.”

Since it simply ruined all the training they had acquired through their senses as shinobi, it must have been quite intolerable for the assassins. It was painful when considering all the time and efforts they had assiduously devoted, but it was a different story when the result of that effort would be Priscilla’s life.

Even if he needed to cheat by using Yae, Al would purge all threats to Priscilla's life.

Al: "Even saying that, I don't get the impression that dealing with the remaining eight will be a breeze. Lend me a hand."

Yae: "Wah~, hard labor~. Though, I am under orders not to show myself?"

Al: "And make sure you do that well. Or else, what's the point of this masked ball… of this Masquerade Night?"

Yae: "At the very least, it's not for an assassina~tion."

Affirming her sentiment internally, Al slowly turned his head, and prepared for what was next. Eight were left; he did intend to have Yae help out for some of them, but he would need to take charge for the majority.

At least, if he was going to reluctantly play the "Knight", that would be the proper courtesy.

Yae: "Even so~."

Al: "Huh?"

Yae: "Even though I was hoping to see Al-sama appear with a different mask than normal at this rare masquerade ball, in the end you just went with the same style as usual~, how unfortunate."

Receiving Yae's grumble from across the glass, Al responded by silently setting the glass down.

Clothed in formal attire that he was unaccustomed to wearing, he did not think to go any further to change out his helmet. To begin with, if today's theme was a masked ball—

Al: "—Something like the mask of somebody else, I've been wearing one ever since I was born."

4

Afterwards, the masquerade ball held at the Barielle Mansion proceeded peacefully “on the surface”.

Within the mansion where multitudes of people invited by Priscilla Barielle, the one extolled as the Sun Princess, were coming and going, her faithful servants were busily running about, entertaining the banquet’s invitees.

Witnessing their orderly movements and courteous manner of working, the guests of befitting social stature were all astonished, praising Priscilla’s way of being with sentiments greater than that of flattery, as it had been able to garner such loyalty from her servants.

It was a matter of course, but by hosting a banquet, it fell onto the inviting side to take responsibility for controlling the party, while at the same time allowing them to assert their right to display their power.

If a meager banquet and blunders from the servants accreted, they would be ridiculed as inadequate by their surroundings, causing the family’s honor to decline, and making it quite possible for gaps, which could be taken advantage of, to appear. Having said that, focusing on such negative aspects of a banquet and avoiding hosting an event would be negligent in displaying one’s power, thus incurring disdain from the surroundings.

At any rate, those involved with aristocratic society must never forget that it was a competition of ostentations, and that it was these dazzling battles that saved them from bloodshed.

Schult: “So, I am also very much relieved that the “Maskaraid Naight” is going well.”

And, while gazing over his colleagues as they worked, weaving their ways through the gaps in between the coming and going invitees, Schult, patting his chest in relief, participated in the party with his masked visage.

Currently, Schult wore a rabbit mask, what seemed to be the finest article suited for Schult, selected by Priscilla from an assortment of possible candidates. Not only did it conceal the area around his eyes, but the top of his head was decorated with cute, fluffy white ears, though it was a bit embarrassing.

Schult: “But, Priscilla-sama said that it suits me very much.”

There was no doubting the things which Priscilla said; such was the law of reality in the small Schult’s world.

As a matter of fact, Schult believed that the beautiful and wise Priscilla was always correct. This “Maskaraid Naight” that she had brought up as a suggestion, too, had been exceedingly difficult to prepare; but, now that they had finally gotten to holding it, it had resulted in many people speaking highly of Priscilla.

It was unfortunate that he could not see much of the invitees’ faces due to the masks, but it seemed that they were pleased with the event.

Schult: “Very much expected of Priscilla-sama. Ahem, indeed.”

While thinking it might be a bit presumptuous of himself to feel proud here, Schult still could not help but welcome the feelings of wanting to puff out his chest. In Schult’s small world, a large portion of what he could be proud of was occupied by Priscilla, so there truly was no helping it.

Schult: “Come to think of it, I am very much unable to find Al-sama.”

Al was one of the few elements other than Priscilla which were among the things Schult could take pride in, so being unable to spot him in this venue, Schult restlessly surveyed his surroundings.

Al ought to have been attending the party donned with his usual helmet, along with a formal attire that differed from his usual. Having hoped to see him with a mask that differed from his usual one given the occasion, Schult found it a bit disappointing, but since it seemed like that was his favorite, it must have been something important.

Regardless, since Al would usually tenderly watch over Priscilla from outside the enclosure of the many people who would always surround her, not being able to spot him here today was a bit strange.

???: “You, do you have a moment?”

Schult: “Ah! Very much indeed. What may be very much the matter, dear guest?”

His worry concerning Al, however, was interrupted by a voice from one of the invitees.

The man, wearing a mask decorated with black feathers, enquired about the location of the lavatory, and Schult enthusiastically guided him, saying, “It is very much this way!”

In a party with this many people coming and going, Schult could not perform the duties of a server with his short stature, so it was important for him to take on the role of these various jobs.

Schult: “Yes! Dear guest, the lavatory is very much over he… huh?”

Gesturing to the entrance of the lavatory with his hand, Schult spun around, but then inclined his head. The man, whom he ought to have guided, was nowhere to be found in the corridor.

Schult: “Very huh indeed… dear guest, where might you very much be? Hah, perhaps, was it that I hurried and ended up very much leaving him behind?!”

Feeling extremely tense with a feeling of wanting to accomplish his task no matter what, Schult was aware that he had begun walking quicker, and went pale at the realization of the outrageous thing he had done.

As it stood, they would receive criticism that Priscilla’s servant had been unable to guide an invitee to the lavatory, which would cause trouble for Priscilla, of course, but also for the other servants, who were his colleagues.

Schult: “Also, also, the dear guest might very much end up wetting himself! I have to hurry and search for—”

???: “Ah~, sweet little butler-san, you don’t need to be so worried~.”

Schult: “Au, very much.”

As Schult quickly attempted to break into a run, an outstretched hand from behind suddenly embraced him. His legs began to float from that embrace, and with his eyes opened wide, Schult glanced behind him.

Upon doing so, he saw a woman in a dress wearing a cat mask smiling at him,

???: “About the gentleman you were attempting to guide just before, his urge to urinate suddenly settled down, so he said he no longer needed to be guided. He found a friend of his and wanted to give his regards to you.”

Schult: “I-Is that very much so? That is very much good to hear. Onee-san… no, dear guest, thank you very much for passing on the message!”

???: “Not at all~, something like this is no big deal~.”

Schult: “You are very much a kind personage! I am very much deeply moved…! So then, um?”

Thanking the kind woman who had passed the message onto him, Schult was left at a bit of a loss. The woman had embraced him from behind, but for some reason she had yet to let him go.

She continued to hug Schult tightly, firmly, but with the perfect amount of force so as not to hurt him,

Yae: “Hahh, unfortunately, I guess any longer and I’ll end up embarrassing you so I have to restrain myself~.”

And so, after a little while, she returned Schult back to the floor.

Schult: “Umm, th-thank you very much…?”

???: “Ahaha, your sincerity is commendable! Now then, you must have work to do back at the event, right? The Madam as well, if she can't catch sight of you, she might get worried, y'know?"

Schult: "Even if I am not present, Priscilla-sama is always very much brimming with confidence! She is very much wonderful!"

???: "Even so, y'know~."

The woman reached out her hand and gently adjusted Schult's butler uniform, then spun him around to face the opposite direction. Pushing upon his back, Schult began to walk with a surprised "Wah".

When he looked back around, the woman was tenderly waving her hand and seeing him off. Waving back at her, Schult felt a tad embarrassed that it might have seemed childish, and then he rounded a corner in the corridor.

As he rounded it, a thought suddenly came to him.

Schult: "That person just now, I very much get the feeling that she resembled Yae-sama a bit…"

Just like him, Yae had worked at this Barielle Mansion, but had ended up resigning due to her familial circumstances. He had been unable to say farewell to her, but she too was one of the people belonging to Schult's meager pride.

After meeting a woman who possessed a similar aura, Schult slightly recalled those lonely feelings, and then hurried to return to the party.

—He was not at all aware that outside the window of the corridor, the man, who had dropped his mask of black feathers to the ground, was hanging, suffocated by a thread wrapped around his neck.

5

Yae: "And so, on my end, I went and saved Schult-chan from a precarious spot. Since I was able to enjoy his fluffy hair to the fullest for the first time in a long while, Yae-chan is completely satisfied.”

Being told about her tastes amidst her report of events, Al felt a bit worn out.

It was a meritorious act to take precautions against the assassin who was targeting Priscilla’s favorite Schult, likely plotting something, but this woman was a killer.

Ultimately, that had hindered Al’s goal of carrying the majority of the efforts, as they had each ended up taking down four of the total eight on their own, and she had also been able to satiate her tastes.

A morally bankrupt individual who toyed with and took the lives of others for fun—he would not label her as such. For her, who had been raised as a shinobi, killing was simply an extension of the ordinary.

Regardless—

Al: “It was tough, but we dealt with all the shinobi you located. Does this mark the end for sure now?”

Yae: “Mmm~, about that~.”

Al: “What is it, stop beating around the bush.”

Yae: “No? Of course, the only shinobi who rivals Yae-chan is the elderly village chief, so it’s absolutely undeniable that they’d go for quantity over quality, but…”

Al: “Undeniable, but?”

Yae: “Since it’s the second attempt after Yae-chan’s failure, if they don’t at least bundle in a Yae-chan grade plan, wouldn’t they just be squandering their lives?”

At Yae’s query, accompanied by a question mark, Al’s breath caught, and he plunged into rumination.

As Yae played her self-evaluation off as a joke, the estimation of her being the magnum opus of the village was a fact that had been experienced directly by none other than Al himself. —Within the personal experiences of Al, who possessed a cheat ability that interfered with the rules of the world, she was among the top three most powerful individuals who had cornered him.

As a corollary of that, he had ended up making Yae taste a hell that he had never intended on making her experience—

Al: "Nonetheless, your opinion is rational. The Empire doesn't consider people's lives as lives, so unless they perform an act like throwing ice little by little into a pot over a flame in order to cool it…"

Yae: "The value of a life in the Empire is that of a single life. I've had an audience with His Excellency the Emperor just once, but he said that people ought to die in an efficient manner."

Al: "I don't think I could ever get along with him…"

Anyhow, regardless of the Emperor whom he would likely never get the chance to meet, Al earnestly continued with his rumination.

As Yae had said, dispatching an operation with a lower chance of success than hers on a mission which she had failed would only result in more deaths. If the Empire's principles sought results worthy of the lives lost, then there was a possibility that what Al and Yae had just finished dealing with, was nothing more than an obvious diversion.

That was to say, there ought to have been another plan, one calculated to be even more effective than Yae's, currently in progress.

Al: "Anything coming to mind?"

Yae: "Between the Kingdom and the Empire, there was that anti-war pact signed before the start of the Royal Selection. In order for them to say that they didn't infringe upon it, the executors of the plan should be obligated to commit suicide when the act is complete. In that case, our frugal old man would be uneager to send in the young and promising ones, so skill wouldn't be the reason for selection. H~m, there are a bit too many possibilities so I can't quite narrow them down~."

Purring like a cat at Al's question, Yae refused to present a suitable opinion.

Only for the shinobi, utility players who could adapt to any situation, was the number of possibilities for plans which could utilize their techniques and abilities a value that rivaled the number of stars in the night sky. For example, the poison coating the short sword Al had been using to dispose of the assassins behind closed doors, was something that had been concocted by Yae.

Yae: "A super lethal poison which can kill even the shinobi who are trained to resist poison, Yae-chan's special Jiranme mixture."

Al: "I dotted just a bit of it on the tip of my finger to test it, and I saw hell."

Yae: "Ahaha, Al-sama you goof, you're joking around too much for someone who doesn't die~."

It was difficult to tell whether Yae's response was in earnest or in jest, but from Al's point of view, it was a weapon he would entrust his life to, so for him to be curious concerning its effectiveness was exceedingly natural. In fact, just a light touch of it had fragmented his consciousness and life in an instant; it was a dreadfully lethal poison.

And, it seemed like he was about to become indebted to the effectiveness of that short sword once more.

Al: "Yae, are you really unaware of the true objective of the enemy's stratagem?"

Yae: "Yes. —What will you do?"

Al: "Ain't that obvious?"

At Yae's soft question, Al answered whilst racking his brain over the developments which would follow from this point onward.

With the cheat technique that belonged to Al alone, if he was going to attempt to reveal the enemy's enigmatic aims—

Al: "—I'll brute-force search every damn possibility."

Saying that, in order to spread damage as far as his sight would permit, Al lumbered towards the party venue packed full with invitees of obscured faces.

Thereupon—

Al: "—El Dona."

—A divergent rampage, unretractable for anybody other than Al, commenced.

6

—The mission to which Hamayal Wesmi, a shinobi of the Vollachian Empire, had been appointed, was the assassination of a Royal Candidate of the Kingdom of Lugunica, Priscilla Barielle.

Hamayal knew not of the aim or the objective of this assassination, but he did not think to question it.

Having received such an upbringing, Hamayal, now surpassing forty years of age, had been perfected as a puppet devoid of any free will, bearing no superfluous questions in regards to this duty.

Only, there were many points in the information shared with him which heeded caution, such as the potent capabilities of his target, Priscilla Barielle, as well as the information regarding Yae Tenzen, who had failed in this duty prior—especially the latter, given that she was likewise a shinobi, was something he could not remain indifferent concerning.

Hamayal: "Sir Olbart's prized pupil…"

As one of the renowned Nine Divine Generals of the Empire, Olbart Dunkelkenn fully lived up to his title of the Vicious Old Man. And, with her talents recognized by Olbart, the very pinnacle of the Vollachian shinobi, the girl known as Yae Tenzen was the heaven-sent child of the shinobi, extolled as a genius.

That was the predecessor of this mission, and with her having failed, her successors were Hamayal, and the nine shinobi who had been deployed on the same mission—a shinobi suicide squad, for whom failure was impermissable.

As they were acting in a foreign nation, it was not an environment in which support and allies would be in abundance, but with the evening party being held at the target's mansion—moreover, a masquerade ball which gathered guests with concealed faces at that, it was a golden opportunity granted by time itself allying with Hamayal and his team.

With the failure of their predecessor in mind, they would proceed with maximum preparations in the limited time they had, the opened possibility—the hidden passage to the basement of the Barielle Mansion, the stratagem to sneak him in from there.

The late husband of Priscilla Barielle, Leip Barielle, was sly and cautious, and seemed to be a person who pathologically distrusted others; hence, there were hidden passages in the mansion that none, save for himself, were aware of. Leip had silenced the designers and builders to produce a situation in which he was the only person in the know, and in his death, those subterranean tunnels would have remained closed for eternity, but Hamayal and the other shinobi had procured the plans left behind by the erased designer, granting these tunnels once last chance to see the light of day.

The guardian of Priscilla Barielle, who had turned the tables on Yae Tenzen: his focus would be occupied via the diversion of the nine shinobi other than himself, allowing Hamayal to be fired as the decisive arrow.

By all means, it was an infallible stratagem. —No, it was supposed to have been.

???: "—Your stars were bad."

With those words, in the subterranean tunnel where no footsteps other than his should have been possible, Hamayal bore witness as a man of eccentric appearance emerged.

His head was covered by a jet-black steel helmet, and the left sleeve of the one-armed man’s dress suit, fitting for the evening party, was tied up. If one were to gather intelligence regarding Priscilla Barielle, this was a person who would naturally come up—considered to be Priscilla’s one and only Knight, the unidentifiable man known as Al.

Hamayal: “How…”

Al: “Did your strategy get exposed or something? You don’t gotta worry, it’s not like any of your comrades told me. Anyhow, I systematically destroyed, injured… well, after trying out a ton of things, I narrowed it down to the possibility that you were intruding from somewhere, so I just traced that to here.”

Hamayal: “…”

Al: “You don’t get what I’m saying, yeah? Sorry, it’s just that sorta bug.”

Rather than being unwilling to give an honest answer, Hamayal reasoned that Al simply possessed a differing common sense that he was unable to comprehend. If so, then his eccentric appearance might not have been the product of a poor joke, but rather something that was coherent and rational within Al.

But, in any case—

Hamayal: “If you’re going to stand in my way, mercy shall be none.”

Either way, Hamayal had no path of retreat.

The nine other shinobi had lost their lives. In that case, Hamayal required a death to harmonize with theirs.

Al: “I’ll say this now, but I ain’t gonna be showing mercy either—”

Stepping out before Hamayal as he readied himself, Al began to say something—but, quicker than he could finish it, a shadow leaped out from the darkness of the tunnel, biting at him.

Al’s throat quivered out a “Wha” in shock and fear, but even that outcry was engulfed by the pitch black darkness.

Quite literally, Hamayal’s shadow itself had broken away from him, becoming a jet-black beast that launched an onslaught—this was the technique that Hamayal commanded, allowing him to control a beast of shadows, known as a Phantom Wolf.

In his childhood, Hamayal had fed his shadow to a beast that devoured shadows, and together they were raised.

Without eyes, a nose, or any of the parts that would give a creature a sense of charm, the Phantom Wolf had rapidly gotten larger alongside Hamayal’s growth, and it eventually took on the form of an enormous quadruped. Truly, its appearance was best described as the silhouette of a wolf, thus making it the Phantom Wolf.

Normally, the Phantom Wolf would fold itself into Hamayal’s shadow, as well as sneak into all sorts of crevices, bringing Hamayal outstanding results as a shinobi charged with the duty of assassination. All that hard work would culminate in this assassination of Priscilla Barielle, their final mission.

For Hamayal, past the age of forty, no longer would an important duty greater than this come about. Ergo, the very end of the footsteps he had tread, living as a shinobi, was something Hamayal would adorn alongside his other half.

And for that—

Hamayal: “A deviant like you could never obstruct this duty.”

Ferociously shaking its tail, its hindquarters, the Phantom Wolf pinned Al to the ground of the tunnel, and trampled upon his life.

Hamayal’s fundamental tactic was to cooperate with his violent Phantom Wolf in order to execute his enemies in a manner which permitted not even the slightest bit of resistance, a formula for unshakable victory that needed no adaptation.

Phantom Wolf: "—ZRRAARZK."

The Phantom Wolf growled, lusting for its opponent's limbs, tired of waiting for the moment that its prey would lose all resistance. In order to bring that moment closer, Hamayal's role was not that of the Phantom Wolf's owner, but rather one of coexistence.

However, at the current moment, Hamayal was unable to move to assist the Phantom Wolf.

That was because—

Hayamal: "—A steel thread, is it?"

Blood trickling down his outstretched left arm, Hamayal leaped backwards and gritted his teeth.

His bleeding left arm had been the price for immediately guarding his neck; he had received numerous cuts from slicing off the tips of his fingers, to lacerating down to his elbow. Eliminating that sense of loss from his consciousness, he tightened his muscles to stop the bleeding; having reflexively mastered the shinobi techniques to that extent, Hamayal's heart seethed with anger.

The reason was obvious: the steel thread that had sliced up Hamayal's arm, was one of the secrets among shinobi arts—in the modern day, it was a technique that had only been mastered by a single person, the one known as the Crimson Sakura, Yae Tenzen.

Hayamal: "CRIMSON SAKURAAAAA—!!"

Yae: "Ah~, geez, you don't need to use such a loud voice."

As Hamayal's angered bellow reverberated through the tunnel, abruptly emerging within his dark vision was a girl of red hair.

Slender and flexible, possessing limbs tempered to be akin to steel threads, she was a woman crammed full with the refined techniques of the shinobi, Yae Tenzen.

She, who had been deployed to the Kingdom, and had reportedly failed her mission and lost her life, was present there. She was clad in a dress, concealing her face with a cat mask, but there was no doubt. There was no mistaking her.

She had survived, and was hiding in the Kingdom with nary a care. At that fact, Hamayal was enraged.

Hamayal: “How is it that a shinobi who has failed their mission still has blood flowing through their veins?”

Yae: “Let’s stop with tha~t sorta thing. A face you knew is still alive, so shouldn’t it be fine for both of us to clap our hands together with smiles on our faces while saying “long time no see~”? Though, I guess I did tear your left hand apart, Hamayal-san.”

Hamayal: “CRIMSON SAKURAAA…!”

Yae: “So it’s really no use, huh? It seems like you’ve hated me since forever.”

As her steel threads danced around her, Yae pouted her lips in a sullen manner. At that gesture, that attitude, that demeanor, Hamayal could not help but feel his nerves being rubbed the wrong way.

As she had said, Hamayal had known Yae since she was under training at the village. He was around twice her age. Yae had been a young child when she began her training, so Hamayal had already been engaging in his work as a shinobi, but there was no shortage of talk regarding her in the village.

While her age was still in the single digits, she had mastered the Flow Method, a technique which allowed her to manipulate her body’s Mana, and in less than a single year, she had acquired ten-odd techniques which would each take most shinobi several years to learn. And, her greatest renown was the fact that she had even mastered the Steel Thread Technique, which nobody had attained in centuries.

Beyond a shadow of a doubt, a shinobi among shinobi, fully living up to the evaluations of child prodigy and genius—that was Yae

Tenzen, having been granted talent beyond imagination.

And yet—

Hamayal: “Despite overflowing with so much talent as a shinobi, you lack a shinobi’s resolve. Flippantly laughing, never facing anything directly, without a serious bone in your body…”

Yae: “I get that Hamayal-san and everyone else at the village has an idealized image of shinobi, y’know? But, I just never fit that image, and it was troubling for people to expect that I would. For the most part, I just do what I can, so isn’t it the people who can’t do that who are worse?”

Hamayal: “Is surrendering to the enemy because you cling to your own life your justification for that way of being?!”

Yae’s protest, which sounded like nothing if not putting on airs, fanned the flames of Hamayal’s anger, the firewood of which kept on surging forth rather than being consumed.

Why, how; his lamentations were unending. For what reason, had the heavens chosen Yae? —A woman like Yae Tenzen, bereft of any shinobi-like characteristics, why had she been granted the essence of a shinobi?

As Hamayal erupted with emotions that could be classified as neither envy nor frustration, Yae toyed with all ten of her fingers which controlled her steel threads, and purred “Mmrrr~” like a cat.

She purred, and then,

Yae: “I really did surrender, so while I think it’s a bit difficult~ to make any excuses for that, I don’t want you to get any mistaken ideas so please allow me to correct it.”

Hamayal: “At this stage, what are you…”

Yae: “—I didn’t surrender because I was clinging to my life. I wasn’t even allowed to abandon my life. Hamayal-san, it wasn’t Death I yielded to; it was “terror”.”

Those freezing cold words of Yae's sealed Hamayal's anger from progressing any further.

Even if she was of an unserious disposition, Yae had received the shinobi training of suppressing emotions, having acquired a spirit that would never reveal anything, no matter the level of torture; thus, her statement was bloodcurdling, and by no means could it be taken as a falsehood.

That was something that had pierced directly into Hamayal's heart—

Yae: "—See, he's getting up now. The harbinger of my "terror"."

Indeed, it happened right after Yae's theatrical declaration.

Hamayal: "…"

Suddenly, the sound that had been causing the cold atmosphere of the tunnel to quiver ceaselessly, vanished. That, had been the ravenous respiration of the Phantom Wolf devouring its prey's life with all its might.

At some point, that had ceased. But, by all rights, once the Phantom Wolf had killed its prey, it would return to Hamayal's shadow; yet no such thing had occurred.

The reason being—

???: "Good grief… looks like it's finally listening to what I say."

While speaking, the man, who had been lying collapsed, stood up straight amidst the shadows. Beside the man kneeled the Phantom Wolf, assimilated into the darkness of the tunnel, obediently bowing its head.

As if to display its submission to the man—to Al, it was the beast's admission of defeat.

Hamayal: "How…"

Yae: "Who knows? That's just what Al-sama does."

At a loss for words, Hamayal's query was not answered by the man in question, but rather by Yae. Perceiving an unconcealable joy in Yae's voice, new coals of anger burned at the bottom of Hamayal's stomach. Looking back at Yae, he attempted to raise his voice—

Hamayal: "…"

Silently, at the heat of Yae's gaze, looking at the man amidst the darkness, Hamayal understood.

Yae Tenzen, had been broken. Hamayal had evaluated her attitude as being the same unserious one she had possessed back at the village, but that had been an error.

As she herself had admitted, Yae had submitted to "terror"; her mind, her way of being, had been shattered.

Thus, the source of that was—

Al: "Yae, don't interfere. There's something I wanna have him do."

Yae: "—As you wish."

With a polite bow, Yae withdrew her web of steel threads, and took a step backwards. Just as Al had commanded her, it seemed she had no intention of interfering with this battle.

This was his chance to clinch victory. With his Phantom Wolf having been subdued through some means, and having lost his left arm, Hamayal had no chance of defeating Yae; but, it was a different story if she had been ordered to withdraw.

It ought to have been a different story. It was different. Yes, it had been different. Different, and yet. A different.

Hamayal: "O, RAHHHHHHHH!!"

Within his mind, dominated by anxiety to the point of erasing his sense of duty, Hamayal howled.

Howling, he concentrated all the techniques he possessed as a shinobi, and leaped at Al. Standing opposite Hamayal, as he loosened the collar of his dress suit, Al spoke.

Al: “—Your stars were bad.”

7

—The Sacred Vollachian Empire, the Imperial Capital of Lupugana, the Crystal Palace.

Serving as the castle of the Vollachian Emperor, ‘twas a beautiful palace that symbolized the prosperity and might of the Empire. Those provisioned with rooms on the uppermost floor of that palace were confined to only the most important of positions within the Empire, this room being no exception.

As one of the Empire’s Nine Divine Generals, this was the office of Chisha Gold, residing in the seat of the Fourth.

???: “Even so this workload is as per usual so much that it’s quite possible you might die of overworking! How’s it possible that you’ve been going at this staring contest with those documents without getting tired for how many hours and days and years, Chisha?”

Chisha: “Unfortunately, I do not believe that I am being overwhelmed by such an inhuman workload, hmm. To begin with, my work is not limited to paperwork alone.”

???: “So by that you mean that your workload isn’t even just on this scale, right Chisha? I think that there’s no doubt that both His Excellency and Chisha will die from the cause of overworking!”

Speaking in a loud voice without hesitation, making a statement that would have him charged with lèse-majesté, was a young man wearing a kimono.

Deliberately sitting on the edge of the office desk rather than in the reception chair, the young man tried to pester him to cease all the work he was pressed with, to which Chisha faintly massaged the skin around his eyes.

While he certainly felt tired, taking a rest here would just be going along with the young man's intentions, but not taking a break and dying from overworking would also end up just going along with what the young man had said. Neither of these were progressions that Chisha favored.

Chisha: "Then, I suppose I would choose to not halt my work, hmm."

Thus, if his efforts would come to a halt either way, he would endeavor to complete just a bit more work; it was then, right when Chisha had caused the young man's cheeks to puff up with discontent.

???: "Chisha-sama, a sealed letter has arrived."

Indeed, given that a soldier had delivered a letter, his work ended up being interrupted anyway. Placing the letter on his desk, he urged the soldier to leave the room; then, as Chisha looked at the seal on the letter, he narrowed his eyes.

The plan he had been progressing in secret, this sealed letter would reveal its outcome.

Young Man: "You're not looking so well, Chisha."

The young man had fired a bit of a disreputable statement, and ignoring what he had pointed out, Chisha broke the letter's seal, and seeking to ascertain its contents, he unfolded the paper within. —It was at that moment.

???: "—ZRRAARZK."

Alongside the sudden roar, the shadowy beast that had been bound within the letter—the Phantom Wolf, made its assault on Chisha.

Those jet-black fangs ferociously snapped at Chisha's contrasting throat of pure white—

Young Man: "Unfortunately I did just predict that Chisha would die from overworking and all."

The worthless joke overlapped with the sound of a blade, unleashed at lightning speed, being returned to its sheath.

Evidently, the sword that had flashed as if it were lightning had cleaved the Phantom Wolf, which would have otherwise torn Chisha limb from limb, cleanly in twain, subduing the monster spoken to be a malevolent beast in the blink of an eye.

Chisha: "…"

Living up to its name, the Phantom Wolf had dispersed akin to a phantasm. Ascertaining its form scattering apart like black soot, Chisha stroked his neck, into which the fangs had nearly sunk.

Young Man: "Looks like someone's got a grudge against you. Well it's only natural for someone who works like you to be resented so I guess stuff like this happens on the daily."

Chisha: "To be hearing that from you, even I feel compelled to lament."

The young man had rescued Chisha in the instantaneous combat; however, without expecting anything in return, he simply brought a cup of tea to his lips as if nothing had happened.

His needless comment, which as always, bit right to the core, caused Chisha to force a smile.

The Phantom Wolf that had vanished a moment ago, was the unique weapon of the assassin Chisha had ordered to infiltrate the Kingdom—the reason why it had been turned towards Chisha was obvious: it was a demonstration from the opponent.

The act of turning the shinobi, who ought to have been perfectly loyal to their orders, sacrificing themselves for their duty, into traitors, and attempting to deliver those fangs back to Chisha, the mastermind, was not an act of retaliation, but rather a silent threat.

A certain way of advising surrender, such that going any further would result in both sides perishing.

Chisha: "The tide seems to have turned… any further than this, and keeping this hidden from His Excellency shall not be possible. As expected of the younger sister… or rather, perhaps it was the actions of the younger sister's guardians, hmmm."

As a weakness of the Emperor, Vincent Vollachia, a being who could easily become a problem for the Seventy-Seventh Emperor, and a factor of apprehension in regards to the Great Disaster due to arrive in the not so distant future, based on all such possible viewpoints, he had wished to remove Priscilla Barielle from the board.

But, Chisha had somewhat expected the infeasibility of such an act.

In that case, what remained was to do what little he could to the best of his abilities, and what little he could to ensure the best outcome.

Chisha: "—All to ensure that the Sword Wolf of the Sacred Vollachian Empire, shan't ever be killed."

8

???: "The "Maskaraid Naight" was very much well received! Priscilla-sama was also greatly pleased, and I too am very much proud!"

With that, while busy with cleaning up the venue, Schult's adorable face gleamed brightly with a sense of accomplishment, along with the joy from having received the appreciation of Priscilla, whom he loved and respected to such an extent.

And, having taken part in the bloodshed that had unfolded behind the scenes, Al could not look the dazzling Schult in the eye.

Nonetheless, it was for the very best that Priscilla had been pleased. Unfortunately, since he was busy working behind the scenes, Al did not have much of a chance to participate in the party, but he could not be blamed for that.

Schult: "Also, Priscilla-sama very much told me to pass this message on to you if I found you, Al-sama! The clown is not to get carried away making merry backstage. Such distractions would prevent him from fully enjoying these rare festivities… it was very much something like that!”

Al: “Ah, yeah, got it. Good impression, Schult-chan.”

Schult: “I am very much embarrassed! But I still have very much of a long way to go! I will very much be diligent!”

Perhaps because his imitation of Priscilla was his trump card, Schult got flustered upon being praised for it; ruffling his hair, Al sent the cute butler boy back off to work with a cheer.

Then, heading to the garden where the aftertastes of the banquet yet lingered, as he had done ten days prior to the masked ball, he leaned against the wall, striking it with the back of his helmet.

When he did so—

???: “No need to guess, the Madam is aware of what happened that night, isn’t she?”

Al: “Damn well seems like it. ‘Course, she wouldn’t have any way of knowing the finer details, but she’s aware of the commotion I was in… I wonder if she knows about you, though.”

???: “Uehhh… if the Madam discovered me, Al-sama, you’d have to punish me, right?”

Al: “Yeah, that’s the plan. That’s why, you should go full shinobi-mode and stay low.”

Both of them leaning against the wall as they exchanged words back-to-back, Al looked towards the mansion, which was still being tidied up from the evening party two days ago,

Al: “So then, what about our cleanup?”

Yae: “I’ve scattered all of the corpses amongst fertilizer in the forest. Also, about Hamayal-san…”

Al: “The owner of the Phantom Wolf, right? What happened to him?”

Yae: “He has passed. The Phantom Wolf that was sent back must have been disposed of. The lives of a shadow beast and shadow master are intertwined with one another, and if either of them dies, the other will also perish; that’s the price of the power.”

Al: “So I messed up all those times ‘cause of that… I mean, if you knew that, then you should’ve told me.”

Yae: “You never asked though~?”

Picturing her saying that with a bit of an odious expression on her face, Al sighed deeply.

With his mind having been shattered by Al in that tunnel, Hamayal did what he was instructed, sending the Phantom Wolf back to the mastermind who had ordered Priscilla’s assassination, and had lost his life. That in itself was exactly what he had expected, and he was hoping that the other party would receive the message, and conclude that it was not worth the hassle.

Only, after shattering Hamayal’s mind, the thought had come to him again.

Al: “Yae, there’s something wrong with you, yeah?”

Yae: “Well. What’s that supposed to mean? Even though you’ve captured the adorable Yae-chan, there’s still a limit to abusive language.”

Al: “I’ll admit that it was an abusive remark. But…”

Painstakingly and conscientiously, Al had used every means possible in order to get Hamayal to do what he was told.

But, he had been unable to shape him into the same sort of loyal pawn that Yae was, and judging by the results, he clearly felt that Hamayal meeting his end was only natural.

In that case, why had Yae arrived at a mental state of resigning herself to her current position?

Yae: “Even though it was none other than Al-sama who made me into a woman, how could you say such a thing?”

Al: “…You’ve been a woman since you were born, I played no part in that.”

Yae: “…But even from this point forward, it’s still possible for you to play a part, y’know?”

Al: “Don’t say such scary things. Giving me hella goosebumps.”

Likely, Yae was making a cute face overflowing with smiles, but at that invitation of hers, Al rubbed the goosebumps on the back of his neck, giving a curt response.

From time to time, Yae would mix in a womanly lust into the words she used to tease Al.

That was because her survival instincts were calculating the optimal means to win Al’s affection.

And, there were likely no mistakes in that optimal solution. Supposing he went along with her intentions, Al would likely become unable to make use of Yae like he had on this occasion.

Hence, making sure he never accepted such an invitation, was Al’s greatest means of self-defense.

Al: “Well, in the first place, you’d never be able to sway me while being no match for how sexy the Princess is.”

Yae: “Breasts, is it~? Is it really the breasts after all~? That’s always how it is with men~.”

Al: “No comment.”

That was also part of Priscilla’s charm, so Al would not deny it out of hand.

On top of that, hesitating about how he should put his next sentiments into words, Al put them into words.

Al: “Yae, you really helped me out this time. Thank you.”

Yae: "—. Oh, to think Al-sama would properly voice his gratitude… will it perhaps rain fire tomorrow?"

Al: "I'll always at least say my thanks. What the hell do you think I am?"

Yae: "—A monster, y'know?"

Al: "…"

At the immediate answer which showed no hints of being a joke, Al gulped down his breath. Receiving Al's silence, Yae, whose face remained unseen to him, resumed.

Yae: "Al-sama is a monster. That, is something I know. What differed between myself and Hamayal-san, I think was surely a discrepancy in our tolerance towards "terror"~."

Al: "…So, Hamayal was weaker?"

Yae: "It's the opposite. It's because, not once had I ever found anything to be scary."

As far as he had heard, Yae had not faced any failures in the shinobi village since a young age, easily overcoming various trainings that were considered to be penances; likely, there had never been anything terrifying to her.

That emotion to which Yae had been unbeknownst, Al had engraved, had demonstrated it to her soul.

Al: "—Aggressor of the Territory."

Existing within the activation of Al's cheat technique—his Authority, that was a unique definition.

The forfeit of confidence, the deficiency of a sense of duty. Al had analyzed that those were the causes, but just a bit earlier, the subjectivity of Al's Authority had wavered, causing a situation in which the initiative would frequently shift between Victim and Aggressor.

Ever since he had resolved to make Priscilla the Monarch, that had ceased all wavering. —That was, until he had to engage in mortal combat in order to stop Yae.

The Crimson Sakura, Yae Tenzen, had been strong. —She had given an overwhelming sense of weakness to Al, whose resolve ought to have been hardened, to the extent that she had ended up becoming trapped in the position of Aggressor of the Territory.

What could be described as nothing more than a bug of his Authority, the activation of an inescapable loop. Engulfed by the phenomenon that had effloresced even the deluded obsessions of Leip Barielle, Yae had managed to escape meeting the same fate that Leip had, but she had come to know "terror".

Henceforth, she—

Yae: "I'm scared of Al-sama. Outside of Al-sama, I don't fear anything. Even the thought of defying Al-sama makes me tremble uncontrollably, and I even start to tear up. For that reason, I obey you."

Al: "Yae…"

Yae: "I'll do anything. I'll obey. I'll devote myself. I'll serve. So, I'm begging you, please don't do anything to frighten me… to frighten Yae again."

At that sincere entreaty, Al felt the weight of that which he had trampled upon, and closed his eyes.

Some time ago, before Yae had done her part as his assassin, the insurmountable precipice of "terror" had not yet existed between her and Al.

Their comfortable relationship from back then, never again could it be restored.

Al had made the decision to sacrifice that relaxed relationship in order to secure Priscilla's future.

That was why—

Al: “Ahh, don’t defy me from here on out, yeah? So long as you obey properly, I won’t do anything bad to you.”

After saying it aloud, he thought about how it was the sort of thing a super-lame villain would say, which drove himself crazy. But, since he could not afford to laugh there, Al bit down on his inner cheeks, enduring the urge.

He had been far too late in gaining awareness that he was a real villain, how truly odious.

Yae: “…Yes, Al-sama.”

As Al derided himself so, back-to-back with him across the brick wall, Yae muttered.

Clutching her chest, throbbing with the untamed “terror”, Yae followed her heart, whispering a vow of her submission to the man beyond the wall, the absolutely permanent resignation of her soul, in a voice inaudible to him.

END

Short Story Collection 12

First Mission
(Translation Pending)

First Mission After

1

???: “—In regards to the matter on this occasion, your lack of involvement has been proven. Hence, your house arrest has been lifted. Though, I’d considered it an unnecessary measure to begin with.”

Indeed, told so by the Commander of the Knights who wore a stern expression, Heinkel Astrea narrowed his eyes.

Heinkel: “…Proof of innocence, huh? At this stage?”

???: “…”

Heinkel: “Ahh, that wasn’t referring to this case alone. I don’t need to spell it out for you right, Commander?”

Twitching his eyebrows alongside his paltry smile and words, Heinkel shrugged his shoulders. Upon hearing the emphasis on his title, the other party’s eyebrows formed an even deeper frown; a dark delight for Heinkel.

That was because at the very least, the person who carried that title obviously had some dissatisfaction with it.

The Commander of the Knights—the Boulder, Marcos Gildark, bearing rock-like facial features with rough edges that suited his alias, trained a silent gaze on Heinkel. There were intricate hues housed within that gaze, however, unlike before, Heinkel was unfazed.

It was strange. Before, he used to be absolutely terrified of Marcos’s every action, but now, he could not care less. It was neither that their rift in strength had been crossed, nor was it that their positions had been reversed, it was simply that the priorities within Heinkel had shifted from what they had been before. That was all it was.

Heinkel: “Was that all? If so, that wasn’t anything worth calling me all the way out to the guard station for. You should’ve just fetched some messenger. Commander of the Knights is a position important enough to get to do that sort of thing.”

Marcos: “You’re sure well-informed. Was a relative of yours perhaps Commander of the Knights?”

Heinkel: “—Hk, yeah, right, that’s it. Even if you’re acting all polite now, you’ll always be the same at heart.”

Receiving the scathingly sarcastic riposte, Heinkel clicked his tongue and feigned composure. He had already thought to himself just a moment ago that he would no longer be perturbed by Marcos’s words.

That was why—

Heinkel: “If there’s nothing else, let me go home. Oh yeah, I’ve yet to congratulate you on your promotion—”

Marcos: “—There is also the matter of you being appointed as the Deputy Commander of the Royal Guard.”

Heinkel: “…Huh?”

His attempt to use an unpleasant congratulatory address as an excuse to leave, was shattered by an unthinkable proposition.

Blinking several times, Heinkel gave a long, hard stare at Marcos’s face on the other side of the desk. From his stern expression, he could not discern any precise colorings of emotion.

Only, it was obvious that even he, who had spoken it, was not welcome to the idea.

Heinkel: “What’s your goal here? Me, as Deputy Commander? As the Commander of the Knights, that isn’t a joke you should be making!”

Marcos: “A joke would have been much more preferable. Of all the things for a man who, until just a moment ago, had been placed under house arrest on suspicion of being involved with the trafficking of illegal drugs, the second most important position of the Guard?”

Heinkel: “What are you speaking about as if you weren’t involved…”

Marcos: “It was decided by the Council of Wise Men. Although I am Commander, the power of appointment isn’t something I can dispute.”

Heinkel: “The Council of Wise Men…?”

The institution responsible for important decision-making within the Kingdom, supporting the Lugunican Royal Family, and aiding the King to determine the nation’s policies—under that pretext, the Council of Wise Men was a gathering of the nation’s mainstays who essentially ran the Kingdom. Hearing that his own name had been raised by them, Heinkel frowned in bewilderment.

Then, he immediately understood who the Council of Wise Men was truly focusing their attention on.

Heinkel: “They’re scared of my son, so their motive’s to butter me up?”

Marcos: “I won’t deny it. After all, no matter what pretenses they maintain, that would still be the truth. Reinhard will also turn fifteen next year. He’ll be joining the Guard. Isn’t that right?”

Heinkel: “Ask him yourself! Hello hello, aren’t you the current generation’s Sword Saint-sama who’s inherited the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint? Do you plan on becoming a Knight? Or whatever the fuck!”

Marcos: “I have asked. And, this is what he told me. —That is for my father to decide, or something like that.”

Heinkel: “…”

Relying on the thick emotions surging up, Heinkel had begun to speak in a vulgar manner as his expression distorted.

The plot of the Council of Wise Men, Marcos’s actions taken beforehand due to finding that plot disagreeable, as well as Reinhard’s answer in response to him, absolutely all of it rubbed Heinkel’s soul the wrong way.

Only, letting the erupting hatred rise to the corners of his mouth, Heinkel spoke.

Heinkel: “Who the hell would want to become the Deputy Commander. That lot of senile old fools in the Council of Wise Men can go eat shit.”

2

After parting with Marcos at the guard station, he did not intend on returning home directly to the mansion.

He violently stripped away his Knight uniform, and took on an appearance with which he could mix amidst the commoners, heading for a bar in the Commoner District of the Royal Capital so that he could drown himself in as much cheap liquor as he desired.

There was a bar in the Royal Capital known as the Silver Shield where Knights typically frequented, but Heinkel absolutely would not set foot there.

He did not wish to come face-to-face with the shopkeeper there. Not to mention, if he were to hear even a single rumor regarding his father, whose whereabouts were currently unknown, he foresaw that both his head and stomach would be ravaged for several days.

Thus, bearing a pain that had not numbed no matter how much alcohol he drank, Heinkel was on his way home with flushed cheeks and staggering steps—

???: “—Father.”

As his head swayed side to side, the moment his body was about to tip over after parting from the wall he had been leaning on, an outstretched hand caught him, and Heinkel immediately locked eyes with a nearby blue glow.

Seeing that double due to his state of intoxication, Heinkel instantly realized that they were the eyes of a face he knew. Upon understanding that, he violently attempted to shake free from the arms supporting him, yelling “Let go of me!”. He could not shake them off. Even though the strength gripping his arms was not very intense, his attempt to shake free was easily swept away, and evaded.

Heinkel: “I said, let go of me!”

???: “I cannot do that. If I were to let go, you would end up tumbling down.”

Chiding the rambunctious Heinkel, was a yet youthful boy—the fourteen year old, Reinhard van Astrea.

As his trueborn son lectured him so, Heinkel still continued to resist. But, the scuffle between father and son on a rather empty street, ended in Heinkel’s crushing defeat before it could even be any sort of actual contest.

Then, being lent a shoulder by his son before he could register it, they resumed walking home.

Reinhard: “Please moderate your alcohol consumption. Today, you were called in by Marcos-san, correct?”

Heinkel: “I’ve got no reason to be lectured by you. Besides, you’re…”

Reinhard: “—? What is it?”

Heinkel: “…No, nothing. That’s right, Marcos called me in. My house arrest has been lifted.”

Reinhard: “Is that so? Even if it is only natural, it relieves me to hear that. Father has nothing so shady going on, so it was a valid decision.”

Heinkel: “A valid decision, eh?”

Being dragged along as they walked, Heinkel peered at the side profile of Reinhard beside him.

The composed face of his son, when he was young it seemed to be composed only of the facial features of his wife, Louanna, but now at fourteen, he could more or less spot features that aligned with his own face.

While thinking that absolutely all of that was unnecessary—

Heinkel: "…Marcos, he asked me to be Deputy Commander."

Reinhard: "—! Is that true?"

As Heinkel grumbled that out, Reinhard's eyes gleamed, and his voice grew slightly lively.

Likely, Reinhard himself had concealed that liveliness from his voice. However, Heinkel could tell. He could tell that this had truly delighted Reinhard. —This vain promotion of his father, had.

Simultaneous to perceiving that, he also thought the following.

Heinkel: "Reinhard, when I was under house arrest, what did you do?"

Reinhard: "…"

Heinkel: "Answer me. What did you do while I was under house arrest? Don't tell me, with someone from the Council of Wise Men…"

Reinhard: "You are mistaken. Father, during your house arrest, I did not make contact with any members from the Council of Wise Men. Of course, I did with Marcos-san. Their evaluation of you, Father, is completely disconnected from me…"

Heinkel: "—There's no fucking way that's true!"

Stringing together shallow words, Reinhard attempted to keep up appearances, and Heinkel grabbed him by the collar. Then, slamming his son against the wall of the street, Heinkel peered into his eyes up close.

Reinhard had said something that he ought to have never said. —That Heinkel's special treatment had nothing to do with Reinhard.

Heinkel: "You shouldn't be saying things that you don't even believe in. For my wretched self to be something like Deputy Commander…"

Reinhard: "—. But, Father, you ought to necessitate time, is that not correct?"

Heinkel: "Ah?"

Reinhard: "Time and status, it is best to have as much of those as possible. I know that you find it irritating, Father. For that reason, please accept this appointment. If you do so…"

Heinkel: "…"

Reinhard: "If you do so…"

Leaving the following words unclear, Reinhard frowned his well-shaped eyebrows, unable to continue.

That was Reinhard's own way of expressing sadness, and it was clear that the genesis for those emotions had been the act of witnessing Heinkel's expression before his eyes. Likely, if he were to look into Reinhard's eyes, he would glimpse at the pathetic man who had caused his son to feel that way. But, Heinkel did not look.

Only, beaten down by Reinhard's reasoning, he acutely felt his own wretchedness.

Heinkel: "…I guess, it's exactly as you say."

He desired time. The higher his position, the greater his title, the more help it would be. Things that the title of head of House Astrea, the lineage of Sword Saints, was not enough for, if he gained an important position within the Guard, if he could gain more time to spend negotiating, then those very things might come within his reach. —The means by which to awaken the slumbering Louanna Astrea, might finally come into his hands this time.

Heinkel: “I was being extremely stubborn. When things need to get serious, there’s absolutely zero value in any of my meagre feelings of pride.”

Reinhard: “Father, I am…”

Heinkel: “—Heinkel Astrea-dono.”

Releasing his collar, Heinkel thrust his finger at Reinhard’s face.

Heinkel: “I’ll become the Deputy Commander of the Guard. Reinhard, you’ll also enter the Guard when you turn fifteen. Go brandish the power of the strongest Sword Saint in history to your heart’s content. It’ll make it easier for me to operate… Perform the work of the Guard, pull both your weight and my own.”

Reinhard: “—. Understood. Father… Deputy Commander, if that is what you wish.”

Picking up on Heinkel’s intentions, Reinhard silently accepted them. At the answer lacking any hesitation whatsoever, Marcos’s words flashed through Heinkel’s mind.

Whether Reinhard became a Knight or not, depended entirely on Heinkel.

Heinkel: “Become the number one Knight. A Knight amongst Knights. To the point that they stop worrying about me as an individual, become the sort of Knight that everyone in this nation is utterly dependent on.”

Reinhard: “Deputy Commander, if that is what you desire.”

Heinkel: “That’s right, that’s what I want. It’s what I desire, so go make it happen.”

At some point, Reinhard’s expression had forgotten its sorrow, and had returned to being a calm one. Unable to bear the sight of that, and finding it harsh to remain here, Heinkel turned his back on Reinhard.

In the opposite direction of the mansion, he would return to the guard station of the Knights he had departed from earlier, and inform Marcos.

Heinkel: “I’ll go tell him that I gratefully accept the appointment. Don’t follow me.”

Reinhard: “—. Yes.”

As Heinkel began to walk, Reinhard, who had been about to accompany him for a moment, halted his step. As his son’s presence faded into the distance, though still feeling the gaze clinging to his back, he walked, and walked.

His head hurt. But, unrelated to the alcohol he had consumed, that was a terribly self-deprecating drunkenness of sorts. With tottering steps, he returned to the guard station at a rather late hour. It was likely a real nuisance, but he cared not.

Heinkel: “After all, you’re also the type who presumes upon your wife’s kindness and doesn’t go home, right, Marcos?”

As if spitting those words out, he foolishly wounded himself again with his own words.

In order to accept the promotion to Deputy Commander which he was not suited to in the slightest, Heinkel Astrea totteringly tread up the road to the Royal Castle. —Still having yet to carry the sword name of “van” in his name.

3

Until the very moment that the back, advancing down the street with unsteady steps, fully faded from his vision, the boy was tormented by an inner turmoil of whether or not to pursue it.

If the boy felt like it, it would be no difficulty for him to follow behind without the other person detecting his presence. Only, considering the final comment “Don’t follow me” that was added, served to fetter the boy.

???: “—You don’t need to worry, if it’s your old man, our people are keeping an eye on him.”

And, as the boy stood still on the street in hesitation, footsteps and a voice belonging not to the boy interrupted him. Having slipped out from the darkness, was a lanky young man wearing a flimsy cap —

Reinhard: “Belmont-san.”

Belmont: “And as for yourself, would Adelheid suffice? I always found it strange, but a girl really can transform herself into a different person… no, were you never a girl to begin with?”

Reinhard: “It was thanks to the Divine Protection of Makeup. Though, I am the one who failed to realize that you were from the Six Tongues, Belmont-san, so it came as quite the surprise.”

Belmont: “Hahaha, thanks. But, even if you didn’t think I was with the Six Tongues, you must have realized that I had been hiding something, right?”

Reinhard: “…”

As Belmont closed a single eye, the boy did not answer his question. Belmont seemed not to pay that any particular heed, and exhaled a “Well then”,

Belmont: “I made sure not to listen in on the exchange, but how did your conversation go? Were you able to persuade your old man to accept the appointment of Deputy Commander?”

Reinhard: “Yes. Father told me that he would accept it.”

Belmont: “I see, I see, that’s good, then. We also had to pull a bunch of strings. The best thing is that it all didn’t go to waste.”

Scratching his head with his bandaged hand, Belmont gave a broad smile.

There had been no falsehoods in the words the boy had exchanged with his father a moment prior. In reality, the boy had not made contact with the Council of Wise Men that controlled this nation’s politics for this matter. —That was because, he had entrusted that task to another party.

Belmont: “Originally, it was a suspicion that collapsed because it took so long for us to uncover their informant. If this can at least serve as some compensation for you… that’s what the boss thinks, at least.”

Reinhard: “I understand those feelings. In addition…”

Belmont: “In addition?”

Reinhard: “I have received permission from Father to become a Knight once I turn fifteen.”

Belmont: “—! That’s certainly good news. Our boss shall be pleased.”

Clapping his hands at the boy’s news, Belmont recalled his injury with an “Ow” as he stuck out his tongue. But, the matter of the boy having received permission to become a Knight, was a feat that warranted an impact to that extent.

For the boy, who had inherited the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint, was already showing prospects of surpassing all the Sword Saints of history, and was adorned with the sword name of “van”, to vow to be the sword that protected the Kingdom, that was.

Belmont: “Undoubtedly, that is the long-cherished desire of we at the Six Tongues.”

Reinhard: “I will never swing the sword for the sake of you people.”

Belmont: “Of course, by all means. Rather, it would be troubling if that wasn’t the case. For your power to be used only for the sake of a single individual, that sort of situation would be a much greater loss.”

Reinhard: “…”

Belmont: “More or less, becoming a Knight will broaden your scope. Our boss would never let that go to waste. I truly believe that.”

There was a complete trust, unique to the likes of faith or devotion, to which the boy slightly frowned.

He would have been able to understand the meaning of a slight change in facial expression were it the father; however, Belmont could not get a read on the boy. Ultimately, as that slight change faded like mist,

Reinhard: “You really believe in that person, don’t you?”

Belmont: “Well, isn’t that the same as your feelings towards your old man?”

Reinhard: “—. Perhaps that is so.”

Belmont also detected the slight hesitation in that answer, but unlike the change in facial expression he could not understand, this Belmont ignored whilst understanding it.

Ultimately, the emotions of this red-haired boy were irrelevant to the Six Tongues’ ideals. —That perception was undoubtedly the stance of defending the country that Belmont had succeeded from his boss.

Thus, the promise on this night—to become a Knight amongst Knights, and the future that would arise as a consequence of that, would be steadily drawn closer by the boy’s own strength, and fulfilled.

But, the Parasite, Heinkel Astrea, who had become Deputy Commander of the Royal Guard, even now, had yet to awaken his wife. —He had yet, to awaken her.

END

Once Upon a Time in Lugunica II (LQ AI Translation)

1

???: “—Marcos-kun.”

On the way back from the training grounds inside the royal castle’s grounds, called to from behind in such a gentle voice, Marcos Gildark froze.

Even though, as a member of the Royal Guard, he was in a position where he should never skip the tempering of body and mind so as to cultivate a robust physique and a sturdy spirit at all times, that was a fatal blunder.

Had the other party been a hostile presence, it would not have been strange for his head to be lopped off in that very instant.

That said, the owner of that voice bore no hostility toward him, and what was more, even had Marcos had not presented a fatal opening, she could easily have taken that thick neck.

She was that sort of person. Because—

Marcos: “It has been a while, Lady Theresia.”

A beat late, Marcos turned and responded with a formal salute to the woman standing there.

She was a woman distinguished by beautiful red hair like burning flames. With clear blue eyes, white skin, and the slender bearing of a woman in her prime—a beauty in her prime—yet to Marcos’s eyes, what stood out was how extraordinarily aligned her axis was as she stood so casually. She wore an awfully pristine air, and her perfectly refined carriage was that of one who stood at the very summit of the martial arts.

But that, too, was only natural. For the one before Marcos now was the Sword Saint, Theresia van Astrea, said to possess the strongest and most excellent swordsmanship in the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica.

At Marcos's salute, Theresia smiled and said,

Theresia: "My, your salute has gotten awfully fitting, hasn't it? And the Royal Guard uniform… yes, it suits you well. You have gained some gravitas."

Casting her eyes up and down, Theresia looked Marcos over from head to toe and murmured such impressions.

While Marcos remained tense, her attitude was easygoing, far removed from severity. At that, Marcos, whose face was said to be like a sheer rock face, lowered the ends of his brows.

Marcos: "To be praised so by you, Lady Theresia, is, ah, I am humbled."

Theresia: "Hmmm, so you have become so formal? It feels like quite a change from Marcos Gildark, the musclehead who would bow to no one."

Marcos: "Spare me the talk of the past. After being beaten down by Commander Wilhelm, I fully realized how conceited I had been."

Theresia: "I see. That is for the best. Working under that man is hard, is it not? He has always been someone whose words are lacking by one word, even two."

Though she said so with troubled brows, Theresia's lips softened with fondness. In them bled an undiminished, great affection that had not faded with the years for the person brought up in the conversation—her husband, Wilhelm van Astrea.

Wilhelm, who was also the Commander of the Royal Guard to which Marcos belonged, was a soldier known at home and abroad as the man who had defeated the Sword Saint. Even now, with fifty just before him, there was no dimming to his swordsmanship, and even now he continued to reign as one of the kingdom's very strongest—the pinnacle among its warriors.

Theresia: “—And yet even from such a lofty station, he is also a scatterbrain who forgets his lunch.”

Marcos: “…So you went to the trouble of bringing the Commander’s lunch yourself, Lady Theresia?”

Lifting the bundle she held, Theresia nodded “That is right” to answer Marcos’s question. Then she turned her steps toward the Guard’s guardroom.

Theresia: “As much as possible, I want to handle by myself the things that concern Wilhelm. That is a wife’s duty, is it not?”

Marcos: “Unfortunately, being single, I have nothing to say to that.”

Theresia: “Aah, yes, that is right. Marcos-kun is still unmarried…”

At Marcos’s shrugging answer, Theresia thought for a moment. Then, timidly, she looked up at Marcos, with whom she had a difference in height.

Theresia: “If you would like, shall I take care of it for you?”

Marcos: “…Why do you sound so delighted about that?”

Theresia: “Because, because, marriage is such a wonderful thing! No matter whose it is, if I can be involved in it, would that not be lovely?”

Marcos: “Unfortunately, being single.”

Pressed forward by Theresia’s earnest appeal, Marcos, overwhelmed, nevertheless answered thus.

She went “Eeh~” in dissatisfaction at that answer, but if he let slip a careless reply she truly might go and pick out a marriage partner for him. Of course, it was true that as the heir to House Gildark, he bore the duty of one day taking a wife and begetting children, but—

Marcos: “For the time being, I seem to be up to my neck with my own affairs.”

Theresia: “If you keep saying things like that, you will stay single forever, you knooow. …It does not have to be because of my meddling, but if you find someone nice, do not hesitate, all right?”

Marcos: “…I will keep it in mind.”

Theresia: “Very good. Then I shall go to Wilhelm.”

Having forcibly pressed the matter upon Marcos, Theresia nodded in satisfaction.

Long since ceased to swing a sword, the Sword Saint set foot toward the guardroom with that in hand.

Theresia: “See you, Marcos-kun. Come over to eat at our place once in a while.”

Marcos: “It would be far too presumptuous.”

Waving her hand lightly, Marcos watched the slim back as she walked away. Only when Theresia’s figure had completely vanished from sight did the strength finally leave his shoulders.

It was not as though Theresia had been putting pressure on Marcos in particular, but—

???: "—Well now, I had heard that Lady Theresia van Astrea was an approachable person, but I did not think she would be quite so easygoing."

Marcos: "…"

Suddenly, another person's voice struck Marcos's ears as he was seeing Theresia off.

At that voice, Marcos knit his brows and turned; his eyes met a dusky blond youth who was walking slowly toward him from the castle courtyard.

Realizing that the other was someone he knew, Marcos visibly twisted his cheek.

Marcos: "What the hell are you doing in a place like this, Russell?"

Russell: "My, what a greeting. Just a moment ago, you paid so much courtesy—am I to take this as being acknowledged as a friend with whom you may speak casually?"

Marcos: "This is called being curt. I only pay manners and respect to those worth paying them to."

Russell: "Hm. Harsh."

So saying, and not even trying to hold it in, he shrugged his shoulders. He was Russell Fellow, the second son of the Fellow family, a merchant house operating in the Royal Capital.

Marcos had become acquainted with him a short while earlier through a third party, and though his limp appearance belied it, he possessed steady nerves, and Marcos evaluated him as a youth with uncanny grit.

That said, no matter how gutsy he was, sneaking into the royal castle was going too far.

Marcos: “By my position, I have to escort suspicious persons who enter the castle grounds right back out, you know?”

Russell: “If you mean me when you say “suspicious person,” that is quite the misunderstanding. I would never do something like go up into the castle without permission. Today I have come to take orders on behalf of my father and elder brother, that is all.”

Marcos: “To take orders, huh?”

Russell: “Yes. Fortunately, the Fellow family is trusted by the merchants’ guild in the Royal Capital. In this way I am also allowed up to the castle from time to time.”

With a hand to his chest, answering calmly, Russell drew a dubious look from Marcos.

To be frank, Marcos felt uneasy about Russell coming and going freely in the castle. He did not think Russell bore malice or treason toward the kingdom in particular, but the youth possessed an acuity of eye and a cunning out of keeping with his age and station, and there was only a nebulous concern that one could not tell what he might pull.

And, as if to substantiate Marcos’s unease—

Russell: “Even so, Lady Theresia does say cruel things.”

Marcos: “What?”

Russell: “No doubt it is because she sees nothing but Commander Wilhelm-sama, but she is far too oblivious to her own charms. For Lady Theresia to offer to introduce you to a marriage partner must be agony beyond compare for you, Sir Marcos.”

Marcos: “You bas—”

At his calm, yet assured manner of speaking, Marcos could not help widening his eyes. In response to Marcos’s reaction, Russell raised a finger to his own lips.

Russell: “Do not worry, I will not tell anyone. The Royal Guard’s promising young man’s faint crush… that is information a touch too delicate to handle.”

Marcos: “… Is that a threat?”

Russell: “When I have told you I will not tell anyone, if you still take it so, I have no move left to play.”

At Russell, who raised both hands as if to say there was no artifice, Marcos clenched his molars hard.

Even if it were told, it would only be Marcos who would be embarrassed, but to make it awkward to face Theresia or Wilhelm would be a pointless blow. Russell, too, no doubt understood that the information had no effect beyond harassment. “By the way,” he said, switching the topic.

Russell: “I am glad to have met you here. I was just looking for you, Sir Marcos.”

Marcos: “Me? What for?”

Russell: “To put it plainly, it is a well-meaning tip. In truth, over in the slums, some fellows engaging in suspicious movements have been sighted.”

Marcos: “… And why me for that? That is the city watch’s job.”

Russell: “Because the place they are using happens to be one that the Brotherhood used to come and go from.”

Lowering his voice a touch, Russell pressed him thus, and Marcos ground his teeth.

Earlier, the talk involving Theresia had indeed not been a threat. Rather, if anything was a threat, it was this information—far more serious was the fact that, until recently, Marcos had served as the ringleader of the slum gang that had been active in the Royal Capital, the Brotherhood.

Most of the Brotherhood’s associates had already left the capital and were working as labor to help develop the Industrial City of Costuul, but that was that; this was this.

Russell: “Regardless of what remains there now, it would not be convenient to have outsiders enter. I felt I owed a warning to you and to Roswaal as well.”

Marcos: “…Are you calling that bastard?”

Russell: “I cannot very well summon a busy Margrave so easily. Of course, should this be beyond your ability to handle, I would have no choice but to take such measures, but…”

Marcos: “—No, forget it.”

At the mention of the young Margrave’s name, Marcos shook his head at the turn toward calling him.

As Russell said, one ought not trouble someone in a position like that over trifles. All the more so because if that young lord got involved, there was a fear the matter would grow far too large. When the thought was to resolve the situation with only themselves, that would be putting the cart before the horse.

Marcos: “I will head over. Tell me the details.”

At Marcos, who cut in thus, Russell nodded as if he had expected it, “Understood.” At the smoothness of that reply, Marcos thought anew—he was a youth whose depths could not be seen, no less than, if not more than, that young Margrave.

2

Originally, the “Brotherhood” was not the work of any particular person; it was a group that sprang up spontaneously out of the anger of those who had let dissatisfaction and gloom build up.

That Marcos came to sit as the head of such a phenomenon-like group began when, ordered on a mission to suppress them, he learned the cause of their activities and abandoned the mission.

Thereafter, for various reasons, the Brotherhood disbanded, and Marcos sought to return to the Royal Guard; yet eyes on Marcos, who had abandoned his duty for selfish reasons, were severe, and reinstatement was a thorny path.

Even so—

“The Royal Guard is meritocratic. Bat back bad press and prejudice with your own swordwork.”

—so ran the gracious directive of the Commander of the Royal Guard who permitted Marcos’s return.

As expected of the man who, by raw ability, defeated the Sword Saint, took her for his wife, and built the position he now holds—he spoke differently. Besides, Marcos agreed with meritocracy; it was just what he wanted.

Hence, since then, Marcos had been the first to volunteer to cut into the field himself. Ultimately, he believed the only place he could bring out his true worth was the very front line.

However—

???: “—Marcos, everyone’s taken their positions. They say we can go anytime.”

Saying so, Marcos looked down at the red-haired colleague entrusting him with the signal to begin the operation. Under that gaze, the man knit his brows and went, “What?”

???: “You’re the squad leader for this mission. We need your orders…”

Marcos: “Why did you even tag along? You’re absolutely useless.”

???: “Wh—”

At that blunt question, the man’s eyes flew wide and he made a stricken face. From Marcos’s standpoint, however, it was the man’s reaction that was surprising. He must have heard that assessment so often he was sick of it—yet he could still be freshly wounded by it.

???: “I came all this way and you call me useless—that’s going too far…!”

Marcos: “That’s exactly the point—what we don’t need. The others are one thing, but what good are you here, Heinkel?”

Ignoring Heinkel Astrea’s mouth opening and closing like a fish, Marcos looked over the knights cooperating in the slum roundup and cocked his head.

They would fulfill their roles. But Heinkel?

Marcos: “Racking up points is my aim too, but I can at least say I’m a shade better than you, seeing as I’m prepared to put my body on the line.”

Heinkel: “—It’s a mission! Don’t say something so ill-sounding as “racking up points”! And implying I don’t have resolve—that’s an insult!”

Marcos: “Don’t raise your voice. Forgotten what we came here to do?”

Face flushed, Heinkel hastily clapped his mouth shut at Marcos’s rebuke. That he covered his mouth with both hands there was lamentable for a man on an active scene who should be aware this was the field. One hand should always be kept ready to reach a weapon—what did it say about the fact that a knight could call himself one with this level of deficiency?

It fell to Marcos to cover for that lack, to heap up the mound, as it were.

Marcos: “I won’t tell you to go home now, but don’t get in the way. Keep to the edge and stay hidden.”

Leaving that behind and turning his back, Marcos glared at the ruin for which they had received information—the building serving as the base of the suspicious figures Russell had tipped him off about.

Tattered though it was, the surprisingly solid building had originally been a church where those who offered prayers to the Divine Dragon gathered. That it had been abandoned and turned into the meeting hall of the Brotherhood, a gathering of youths harboring discontent with the kingdom, was an ironic story.

When they disbanded, he had done a general cleanup, and there should have been nothing left lying around that would carelessly tie back to Marcos—but there might be something disadvantageous to those working in Costuul.

If, in the confusion, he could smash the building as a whole, there would be no loose ends.

Even so—

Marcos: "—No one's here."

Gazing fixedly at the ruin and focusing his awareness on the presence within, he found nothing caught in his net. There seemed to be rats, but they were cohabitants of the slums. It would be unkind to chase them out lightly.

Perhaps the other party was away during the day, or perhaps Russell had sent him on a wild-goose chase.

Marcos: "I'll go take a look inside."

Saying so nonchalantly, he ordered Heinkel and the knights to stand by and went into the ruin.

For now, rats were all he had to show for it, but if he could find some excuse to rampage a bit, he wanted to crush the building physically. It was just as Marcos was picturing a solution by brute force that——out of the shadowy darkness of the corridor, a surprise blow struck Marcos in the throat.

Marcos: "—Guh"

Caught unguarded by a ferocious hit, Marcos's giant body let out a groan and slammed into a wall. Smashing through the corridor wall from his back and toppling into a room, he blinked through the pain and shock.

He had not sensed the presence at all.

Attacker: “Tch, the Royal Guard…!”

Seeing the uniform on the fallen Marcos, the one who had landed the blow spat that out. Without checking whether Marcos was dead or alive, the opponent swiftly spun on his heel and bolted out of the ruin.

“Wait”—with his throat struck, he could not voice it at once, and Marcos forced his body up. His ears caught the clashing of swords as his colleagues began to fight outside the building. At a glance—no, at a listen—Marcos knew the flow was unfavorable, and he stamped down hard.

Marcos: “Oooooooh—!!”

The next instant, at the shock wave from Marcos’s stomp, the ruin’s walls and floors blew away together. Bursting out with the debris in tow, Marcos’s view took in the surroundings of the building—the sight of knights knocked down and Heinkel plopped on his rear.

Right in front of Heinkel, a gaunt man was raising his long arms—and into that back, Marcos, who had leapt out, drove a vicious elbow.

Attacker: “G—bugeh—”

The feel of shattering the opponent’s spine and the bones around it with a direct hit rebounded up Marcos’s arm.

It was the kind of savage pursuit that would either kill, or if not, leave one unable to walk for life. The body bounced like a handball, rocketing into the neighboring ruin, caving it in completely and producing a heap of rubble.

Marcos: “Heinkel, tend to the ones who are down.”

Heinkel: “Uh, ah, uhh…”

Marcos: “Move it!”

Heinkel: “Yessir!”

Sitting on the ground, gaping, Heinkel sprang up at the bark. Clicking his tongue at the disgraceful display, Marcos also moved to tend to his comrades—

—A faint, yet certain growl reached his ears, and Marcos faced the mound of rubble before him. From beneath the debris of the ruin into which he had just slammed the enemy, that growl had come.

The next moment, the source of the growl blew the rubble away and emerged.

???: “—Oooooooon!!”

A gaping maw lifted to the sky, and a beast’s bellow rent the slums.

Hurling rubble aside, it roared with savage vigor—dark brown, imposing, aberrant, inhuman. It was unlike the form just before it; its whole body was sprouting animal fur, and with a head transformed, it turned to the sky—A Werewolf.

The Werewolf’s twin pupils turned golden, and with eyes clouded by anger and hatred, it glared at Marcos.

And—

Werewolf: “Sorry, but you lot—”

It opened a mouth lined with sharp teeth and was about to hurl some kind of threat—Marcos rammed a fist into its throat, forcing it into silence.

Werewolf: “…ghk”

As payback for that first strike to his own neck, the Werewolf let out a warped groan and bulged its eyes.

Marcos then seized the Werewolf’s head and, without mercy, slammed it down into the ground. With an impact that buried its entire head in the hard earth, the Werewolf’s whole body convulsed violently.

Presently, strength left the Werewolf's limbs, and its beastification slowly unraveled.

Marcos: "…And it's still alive? Unlucky bastard."

It was rolling its eyes white and convulsing, but breathing. It was not the breathing of one about to die, either.

As the fur fell off and, under clothing torn from its inability to endure the swelling of its flesh, a scrawny man's bare body came to light, Marcos let go of the head he had been gripping and pitied the fact.

Had the body not been so tough for no good reason, he could have killed him with that last blow. The fact he had not been able to meant that the fate awaiting this Werewolf—

Heinkel: "M-Marcos! A Werewolf… a Werewolf!"

Letting his voice crack to shout what was obvious was Heinkel behind him.

Having watched Marcos's fight with the Werewolf, he was aghast at the form the opponent had reverted to, and his hands tending the injured had also stopped. Marcos sighed deeply.

Marcos: "I know without you telling me. You keep treating the others."

Heinkel: "That… do you really understand, Marcos? There's the treaty with the Vollachian Empire. Werewolves—especially criminals—go to the Empire…"

Marcos: "—Didn't you hear me?"

With a low voice, he cowed him in a way even the thickheaded Heinkel could understand, and this time Heinkel stuffed his grating objections back down his throat. The situation was depressing enough as it was. At the very least, he wanted those on his own side to show some consideration for what was on Marcos's mind.

Marcos: "I hardly think I'll be in any shape to go over for a meal."

So muttered Marcos, answering with a hoarse voice to the brief exchange he had had before the mission.

Thinking of the report he now had to make, the cold treatment he had given to the son of Theresia who had invited him to eat, and even that he had failed, in the confusion, to destroy the meeting hall, Marcos's mood grew heavier than even the Boulder's expression.

3

—The Royal Capital, Lugunica, is the largest city in the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica.

Beginning with Lugunica Castle, facilities with all manner of functions exist in and around the city. The stone tower that rises on the capital's western side is likewise one of the capital's distinctive facilities.

That stone tower was built roughly twenty-five years ago, and as a facility its role lies in the research and development of magic—namely, the Royal Research Institute of Magic.

Long regarded as a special power wielded only by certain demi-humans and Spiritual Arts users, magic is to have its mechanisms laid bare, organized into a general system, and have its user base broadened. Or else, magic that produces wholly unknown effects is to be newly developed and preserved for posterity—that is the objective.

At present, there are not many things that can be trumpeted as achievements, but it is a place where success is awaited in the long view: the completion of guides for the systematization and acquisition of simple Magic, and development expected by tying in with magicreation tools produced in the Industrial City of Costuul, among other things.

The development of this field constitutes a sure benefit to the kingdom compared to other nations, and for that reason the Magic Research Institute is given that much importance—

Roswaal: “One would think that’s how it ought to be, buuut it just isn’t going quite as we’d like, now~”

So said the boy with heterochromatic eyes—Roswaal L. Mathers—as he carefully set a piece of Magic Ore atop the apparatus, appraising the institute’s sorry “bustle.”

What Roswaal was currently engaged in was a reproduction experiment for magic that, using Magic Ore—crystallized Mana—made auxiliary use of Mana outside the body rather than one’s own internal Mana. By succeeding in this experiment, it would become possible to activate magic without going through the Gate—the organ necessary to handle magic—or even in a state where one’s Mana had been depleted.

Russell: “That said, once the system for mass-producing magicreation tools is in place, the value of using things like Magic Stones will be diverted heavily in that direction. I cannot see much of a future where this is widely utilized, can you?”

To Russell Fellow, who peered in from the side at the apparatus on which the Magic Ore had been placed and poured cold water on Roswaal’s experiment, Roswaal prefaced with “Not necessarily,” then continued:

Roswaal: “If we can codify the acquisition of this technique, then having the sons and daughters of nobles carry even a single Magic Stone as a kind of charm would become a means of self-defense. This Royal Research Institute of Magic imposes no restrictions whatsoever on the provision and acquisition of techniques… buuut the handling of something with added value would be a different matter, wouldn’t it?”

Russell: “—I see. If demand for Magic Stones rises, it will generate great profits for you, who owns the mines where Magic Ore is unearthed. Your intent is easy to grasp.”

It was pleasant to converse with a partner who, if you spoke one, would intuit all the way to ten.

While satisfied with this exchange with the rare friend named

Russell, Roswaal was, on the other hand, not satisfied with how the Magic Research Institute was being treated.

Roswaal: “Frankly, for the time being, the kingdom’s attention is skewed toward magicreation tools. If there’s a point of reflection, it’s that the convenience of those tools has sunk tooo deeply into daily life~”

Russell: “If you call it a point of reflection that you made the common folk—who had thought of magic as something out of a picture book—understand that magic is something close at hand, then the previous Roswaal… your father… would find little recompense in that, would he not?”

Roswaal: “Oh, my father would share my view, I’m sure. I’ve every confidence in that.”

At Roswaal’s answer, given with a shrug, Russell returned the gesture in kind.

The predecessor he had mentioned—Roswaal K. Mathers—was the very person hailed as the father of magicreation tools, which brought revolutionary progress to the uses of Magic Stones. Magicreation tools, powered by Magic Stones including Magic Ore, spread branches of possibility far exceeding something like Lagmite ore, which merely emitted light, and were rapidly permeating the lives of the kingdom’s people, commoners included.

Their effects and merits were said to rival even the “Meteor,” which in the Witch Era—before the ravages of the Witch of Envy—had been created to exist, but—

Roswaal: “If you ask me, that’s nothing but an overawed evaluation~”

The “Meteor” was a tool to realize phenomena and miracles unattainable by human hands; at bottom it competed on a completely different stage from magicreation tools that merely assisted in daily life.

Truly, the “Meteor” was something that, as if letting one’s hand reach the stars, was godlike—

Russell: “To be so highly praised and yet not be satisfied by it… Rather than saying your greed is deep, it seems the very premise of what you seek—something other than honor or preferment—differs.”

Catching Roswaal’s murmur, Russell interpreted it thus.

A difference in premise, a gap in what one values. Such things readily alienate people from one another, switching over to the cognition that one’s neighbor is someone incomprehensible. In ancient times, the reason “witches” were hated more than their special power was precisely that difference in values.

However, to that divide Russell added, “All the same,” and said:

Russell: “If there are things I consider valuable that you do not, and things you desire that I do not, that makes it easy to partition our spheres. What is needed is not an understanding of each other’s values, but respect for each other’s values. Wonderfully low-consumption.”

Roswaal: “…”

Russell: “What is it, Roswaal?”

With a hand to his narrow chin and a frown, Russell asked; Roswaal shook his head: “No.”

Roswaal: “I was just thinking again. That you’re a friend not easily come by~”

Russell: “—. For someone who hardly opens his heart that’s something, but being praised without reserve like this is rather embarrassing, you know.”

Roswaal: “Hardly opens his heart… aaah, you mean Marcos.”

Conjuring up in his mind the stern-faced man, Roswaal nodded in understanding.

Among those Roswaal had become acquainted with in the Royal Capital—separate from those of the Brotherhood and the Golden Wing Faction who were now helping expand Costuul, the Mathers main house's city—there were two he kept as friends: Russell and the aforementioned Marcos.

Unlike Roswaal, who was not usually in the capital, both Russell and Marcos lived in the Royal Capital—naturally, they would have dealings in places Roswaal did not know. Among those, it seemed, there had been situations that had made Russell want to put a hand to his forehead.

Russell: "Between ourselves here, a matter recently arose for which I wanted to borrow the Royal Guard's strength, and on that occasion I relied on Sir Marcos's arm… but,"

Roswaal: "Oh? That's quite all right. If it's him, he can subdue most opponents. I think it was the best choice—so long as your opponent wasn't a dragon."

Russell: "Fortunately, it was not a dragon, but it was a troublesome foe. —A wolf."

Roswaal: "—A wolf."

At Russell's voice, which had dropped in tone, Roswaal raised an eyebrow and stilled his hands.

Bringing up a dragon had been a simple jest, but if a wolf came up instead, that complicated matters.

—Werewolves, once turned, in the Vollachian Empire are treated as culprits whose very existence is not permitted.

Wolf-folk and molefolk are objects of aversion in that country, and the magnitude of their hostility even splashes onto other nations. That is to say, there is a treaty: upon discovery, Werewolves are to be handed over to the Empire. Naturally, a Werewolf thus surrendered cannot escape execution in the Vollachian Empire.

It is a cold-blooded policy the Vollachian Empire laid down for the extinction of a race over a long span.

Roswaal: “If it’s Werewolf-related, the Vollachian Empire will get noisy all of a sudden~”

Russell: “Exactly that. To put it plainly, what I brought Sir Marcos was information about suspicious individuals having been sighted, but because it turned out to be a Werewolf, I’m being treated like a jinx.”

Roswaal: “I see. From your standpoint, it was a consideration to let Marcos—whose position in the Royal Guard is delicate—earn merits, and yet he thinks you’ve only increased his troubles. A tragedy.”

Russell: “Yes, a tragedy.”

Nodding together, Roswaal and Russell found common ground by making Marcos the villain.

Of course, Roswaal did not trust Russell’s goodwill without a speck of cloud. By Roswaal’s surmise, Russell stood suspected as the mastermind who had shepherded those bearing the capital’s pent-up frustrations—those other than the firstborn sons of nobles—and organized the patriotic group called the Golden Wing Faction.

That such a man had approached Marcos, who belonged to the Royal Guard—that made it a safe bet that the “suspicious persons” were, nine times out of ten, suspected by him to be something other than mere suspicious persons.

Even so, that did not mean Russell’s goodwill toward Marcos was altogether nonexistent.

Roswaal: “But, judging from where the story is headed, that Werewolf was taken alive, yes? In that case it seems likely the flow is to hand him over to the Empire…”

Russell: “In fact, I hear it is proceeding in that direction. I expect some manner of démarche from the Empire in the near future.”

Roswaal: “And that, too, becomes the Royal Guard’s business, that of the discoverer Marcos. No wonder he bears you a grudge.”

Considering relations with the neighboring Vollachian Empire, there were many in the Royal Guard who did not want entanglement. Marcos was, unsurprisingly, among that number.

For Roswaal as well, relations with the Empire souring at this juncture would be outside his plans. He wanted this knotty affair to resolve as peaceably as possible.

It was just then that Roswaal was thinking that—

Researcher: "—M, Margrave! Director! Margrave Mathers!"

A flustered, disjointed shout rang out, and Roswaal and Russell turned. At the entrance to the research room stood a pale-faced young researcher. He was one of the institute's staffers—a person of reasonably high initiative, but—

Roswaal: "Ilzea-kun, what's the matter? You were assigned to sort the delivered Magic Ore into high-purity and low-purity lots, weren't you?"

Russell: "Are you making a supposedly valuable member of staff do such menial chores?"

Roswaal: "The point is to train the eye. Truly, if they're specialists, they ought to be able to tell the quality of a Magic Stone at a glance~"

Even chores have their meaning. Naturally, there was also a side of Roswaal that did not want those who lagged him by ten or even a hundred steps in matters of magic to get in the way of his focused research.

Ilzea: "I, it's terrible! Th-There is someone who says they want to observe!"

Ignoring Roswaal and Russell's conversation, Ilzea reported in a trembling voice. At its content, Roswaal raised an eyebrow with a "Hm."

Whatever the results, this Royal Research Institute of Magic was a kingdom-sponsored facility. It would not be unusual for persons of importance in the kingdom to take an interest, but if it was a tour, he wanted notice in advance. If they came on the spur of the moment, there were preparations to be made on the receiving side as well.

Roswaal: “In short, it’s an unreasonable request. Even you should be able to judge that, no~? Even if the guest were His Majesty the King, we’d have to ask them to withdraw.”

Ilzea: “R-Really? You would refuse, even if it were His Majesty?!”

Roswaal: “Weeell, if the guest were His Majesty, I’d think about how to refuse… Is the guest His Majesty?”

Ilzea: “N-No, it is not His Majesty, b-but…”

Ilzea’s hesitation was excessive; at that irresolute attitude, Roswaal and Russell looked at each other, then simultaneously slipped past him. Rather than continue the discussion like this, it would be quicker to meet this visitor directly—that was their judgment. In fact, that thought was correct.

However—

???: “—Oh, at last someone who looks able to talk has shown their face.”

So said the person who greeted Roswaal and the others, standing with legs braced at the institute’s entrance.

She was a hard-eyed woman with richly wavy, dark-hued red hair gathered behind her head—older than Roswaal, younger than Russell, perhaps. With long, slender limbs and a supple build, there was a firmness of core to her imposing carriage.

At a glance, one could tell she was the sort of woman the weak-willed Ilzea would be bad with, but the biggest reason the trainee researcher had been at a loss was at her collar, which bore a self-assured smile.

Upon the woman’s fine attire at her neckline was a crest—the “Sword Wolf,” a wolf pierced by a sword—signifying the Vollachian Empire.

Which is to say, this woman's identity was—

Serena: "—I am Serena Dracroy, arrived as a special envoy from the Vollachian Empire. I heard that this is the institution where the kingdom researches magic. I request a tour."

Thus did the envoy from the neighboring country, with almost absurd aplomb, proclaim herself an uninvited guest.

4

Serena: "I am, by nature, a hasty sort. The handover of the Werewolf is scheduled for tomorrow, but I arrived in the Royal Capital ahead of time. However, it would be troublesome if an Imperial wandered the capital at will and caused some incident, would it not? So, I caught wind of an interesting rumor. Here."

Rapping the wall with the back of her hand—knock, knock—the woman who had given her name as Serena Dracroy explained the reason for her visit and her intent.

That said, whether that explanation was one they could accept was another matter entirely.

Russell: "An envoy from the Empire, is it? My, my… I imagine the state guesthouse must be in an uproar right about now?"

Serena: "No need to fret so grandly. Your kingdom would not want to create friction with the Empire heedlessly, would it? It is only a matter of you not making a fuss."

To Russell's question, Serena answered with a feral, carnivore's smile.

Frankly, it was an answer one could only call quintessentially Imperial.

Roswaal: "Quintessentially Imperial speech, indeed. Thinking that in all things, the strong-armed approach will carry the day~"

Serena: “Oh?”

Saying aloud precisely the same impression Russell had harbored inwardly, Roswaal gave the visitor from the neighboring country a sidelong, piercing look. At that gaze, Serena lightly raised an eyebrow.

Then, tapping twice beneath each of her eyes with two fingers, she said:

Serena: “Your eyes are different colors, left and right. Rare. But beautiful. Looking closely, your looks are well above the mark, too. …You—how about coming to the Empire and marrying into my house?”

Roswaal: “…”

Russell: “Is that not rather an inappropriate jest to make to someone at a first meeting, and to a woman besides?”

Serena: “Do not set it upon the scales of man and woman; it is tiresome. I, too, think there are many situations where, had I been a man, matters would proceed more swiftly.”

With a body trained to supple strength, yet with slender shoulders, Serena snorted as she shrugged.

At her reaction, Russell stroked his own chin with a finger, then said:

Russell: “With respect, Lady Dracroy, are you not aware that this gentleman is Margrave Mathers?”

Serena: “Margrave Mathers… Lugunica’s Western Margrave?”

Russell: “Just so. Though he bears a heavy burden for the Kingdom of Lugunica, the Margrave also applies his brilliance to the development of magic. Truly a person indispensable to the kingdom.”

Roswaal: “Mm, being flattered that much by a friend tickles a bit, you know~”

Even though he surely understood the intent of Russell's thrown lifeline, Roswaal gave that sort of reply; Russell silenced him with a sharp glare.

In any case, if Serena realized her counterpart was Roswaal L. Mathers, she would surely change her attitude. Surely, as a special envoy, she would not seriously cause an international incident—

Serena: "I see, then you hold a position. In that case, if I bear a child quickly and make them heir, could I bring you back to the Empire?"

Roswaal: "My, you don't give up."

Serena: "Naturally. I have not lived so obediently as to back down easily. The House of Dracroy—or rather, I—am ever hungry: for capable people, for new ideas, and for technology."

Spreading both arms to indicate the stone tower that was the institute itself, Serena declared thus.

At that audaciously invasive pronouncement, Ilzea and the other researchers looked to Roswaal with troubled faces. As both noble and director, only he could stand against the Empire's envoy.

But Roswaal, at Serena's declaration, closed the yellow one of his eyes and said:

Roswaal: "I understand that you judged me capable… buuut, are you interested in magic?"

Serena: "Ah, I am. The magicreation tools that have lately begun to be put to use in the kingdom draw my interest as well, but what stirs my curiosity more than tools is technique."

Russell: "That is—"

Serena: "To put it plainly, I have a great interest in magic. I would sooner learn it and take it home with me."

Grinning, Serena thumped her own ample chest with a fist. At that Imperial sort of avaricious stance, Roswaal opened the eye he had closed and, with both eyes, looked at her straight on.

At the light that flitted through those eyes, Russell felt a bad premonition. Driven by it, before he could open his mouth—

Roswaal: “You want to know about magic! Splendid. Very promising. Let us talk, shall we~!”

Serena: “—!”

Roswaal’s outstretched hands seized Serena’s, and he spoke first.

Serena’s reaction lagged a beat at his childlike, sparkling eyes and his momentum and words, but soon realizing that this was a positive attitude—

Serena: “Oh? So you will say that! I am grateful. I shall study.”

Roswaal: “I will show you to my lab in the back. Come, this way, Lady Dracroy.”

Serena: ““Lady Dracroy” is a roundabout way of putting it. Serena will do.”

Roswaal: “Then Roswaal will do for me as well.”

Russell: “Roswaal!”

As the two briskly, smoothly advanced the conversation, the one who called Roswaal by name, in a loud voice, was not Serena but Russell.

When the two turned at the volume of his voice, Russell beckoned only Roswaal over with a finger.

Russell: “What do you think you are doing?”

Roswaal: “And by that you mean?”

Russell: “This is an important facility of the kingdom, and she is an honored Imperial guest.”

Lowering his voice yet making the admonishment plain in it, Russell pressed Roswaal.

Though their acquaintance was not long, Russell had watched Roswaal's movements with attention. He had thought he understood that Roswaal bore an extraordinary obsession with magic—but if he was like this simply upon being told someone was interested in magic, he was much too indiscriminate.

If that excessive self would constitute a demerit here, then regrettably, the relationship going forward would need to be reconsidered. —Regrettably, and Russell was somewhat surprised to think so.

Roswaal: "—Russell, that's a misunderstanding born of differing views."

As Russell kept down the hesitation that had arisen in his heart, Roswaal's reply cut in. When Russell furrowed his brow—"A misunderstanding?"—Roswaal dipped his narrow chin and nodded.

Roswaal: "Yes. As a matter of principle, the structure of the Gate differs between people of the kingdom and people of the Empire. The influence of having undergone proper evolution over long years in each land is large. In an environment where heat is harsh, living things acquire traits suitable to living there. Do you see~?"

Russell: "…You mean the same is true of the Gate, the organ that handles magic. Therefore, even if she learns the kingdom's way of using magic, as an Imperial she will be unable to handle it?"

Roswaal: "Exactly so~"

As a teacher giving an impassioned lecture, encountering a student who caught on quickly, Roswaal looked satisfied. Russell's bile went down, yet he was not wholly convinced.

Even if, as Roswaal said, Serena could not learn the kingdom's method of using magic—

Serena: "She might take the taught mechanisms, adapt them to the Imperial way, and rebuild them into something usable in the field."

Roswaal: "—. Lady Dracroy."

Serena: "Apologies. I have had a keen ear since long ago. Thanks to that, I never miss a whispered secret, which is a help. Oftentimes foolish rumors reach my ears, such as that a father finds his daughter tiresome."

Touching her earlobe with a finger, Serena shook the crimson earring without remorse.

Setting aside the rights and wrongs of eavesdropping, her point pinned Russell's concern exactly. Even if, as Roswaal said, the kingdom's way of using the Gate did not apply to Imperials as is, that did not mean it would be entirely unusable.

Even if it were only the basics, it was undesirable for knowledge of the kingdom to be extracted to the Empire.

Roswaal: "Well now, if that's how it goes, that's quite all right too, isn't it~"

To Russell's concern, Roswaal responded as if it were nothing at all.

Russell stared fixedly at Roswaal's face, trying to see through to his intent. But Roswaal, without a trace of malice under Russell's gaze, smiled.

Roswaal: "A field without competitors is apt to advance slowly. The Magic Research Institute, poor in results beyond what the great-great predecessor began, and the clinics where secret-keeping of techniques has gone on for years—one reason great development cannot be hoped for, I think, lies in a lack of a sense of crisis."

Russell: "—And for that you would countenance harming the kingdom's interests?"

Roswaal: "I am saying that to partake of a greater gain, a temporary loss should be tolerated."

So he continued; a quiet staredown ensued between Roswaal and Russell.

Though there were parts of Roswaal’s argument to which one could nod, in the main it was hard for Russell to accept.

That “temporary loss”—those wounds and the flowing blood—ought not be blithely built into a future plan by those unable to tally them.

Was Roswaal L. Mathers, after all, a dangerous person for the Kingdom of Lugunica?

Serena: “—Let the wolf bite your arm. Then you will be able to pierce its trunk with your sword.”

Roswaal: “…”

Serena: “Words left by the first Emperor of Vollachia. The way of being indicated by the Sword Wolf—our national flag’s wolf pierced by a sword—is a reading opposed to this, but I like it.”

Standing by, in a position hard to call that of a third party, Serena spoke.

“Sword Wolf” was an expression used by people of the Vollachian Empire for themselves. It was said to indicate the way of being that, even if one’s body were pierced through by a sword as depicted on the imperial flag, one would still tear out the enemy’s throat—that sort of will to fight—but Serena’s interpretation was the very opposite.

Serena: “Of course, that serving the Empire’s good would in turn lead to the kingdom’s prosperity is unconvincing coming from me, an Imperial. So there is only one thing I can say.”

Russell: “…And that is?”

Serena: “I return what I receive—favor or grudge alike. —You will not take a loss.”

Arms folded, Serena declared it forthrightly; Russell narrowed his eyes and pressed his lips together.

Ultimately, the Vollachian Empire’s policy was to do anything and honor it as right if it was for victory. Aside from the proud look on her face that hinted at that, there was nothing at all by which to believe her verbal promise.

However—

Roswaal: “What do you say, Russell? She has gone this far to say it. Serena is a great personage. You have guessed as much already, have you not~?”

Russell: “…”

That was not the crux of the issue. Even so, Roswaal peered into Russell’s face as he posed the question.

Sensing a will that would not bend, Russell let out a small sigh, then—

Russell: “…In the first place, you are the director of this institute. I am merely an outsider indulging in your kindness by being here. From the start, you have no need of my assent.”

Roswaal: “Hm. If we speak of the facts, that is not wrong, buuut…”

Breaking off once, Roswaal took a moment to think.

For Roswaal, who always judged at once and arrived at answers, it was a rare moment of consideration; Russell frowned at it. Lowering his eyes slightly, Roswaal said:

Roswaal: “I would prefer not to proceed while greatly souring a friend’s mood, if I can help it~”

Russell: “…”

Serena: “Russell?”

An unexpected remark—words like those of a person who valued friendships.

Russell suspected some kind of jest, yet when he gazed at Roswaal’s face in earnest, he found no trace of teasing in the expression; as a result, he was taken aback.

Russell: “I had thought you would not be handled with a single rope, but…”

Whether he ought to consider Roswaal an uncontrollable hazard, or a patriot with great power likely to be guided—once more, it was content that left him at a loss.

And to be honest, this applied not only to Roswaal but to Serena as well.

Serena: “Hahaha, how very cute a thing to say. I like you all the more, Roswaal.”

Roswaal: ““Cute” is disagreeable~ I think you are a few years older in some respects, buuut I harbor in this body years you imagine not. I should like to be treated as a gentleman.”

Serena: “You make a trifling difference in age a reason to sulk? That is not merely cute, but adorable.”

Smiling broadly at the prior exchange, Serena traded words with Roswaal—just as Roswaal had said, Russell could clearly see she would become a personage of the first rank or better.

He might be said to have an eye for people, but Russell’s certainty was of a different sort than such baseless remarks—an unshakable discernment granted by the “Divine Protection of Evaluation.”

The Divine Protection of Evaluation was thought to be a modest blessing that distinguished the good from the bad in things, but Russell’s could discriminate even the capable from the incompetent in people, or the superiority among earth dragons.

Therefore, he could see that Roswaal and Serena were prodigies, and that the timid researchers unable to stand up to Serena were, in fact, talents fit for a royal research institution.

Yet the right or wrong of an ability, and how that ability should be used, had to be judged by looking at the person. That was Russell’s task—and an urgent matter for the Kingdom of Lugunica.

Therefore—

Russell: “If, say, war were to break out between the kingdom and the Empire, and magic were to fly at us from the Empire, I will stab you from behind.”

Roswaal: “Now that would be a rare kind of friendship, would it not~ Even in such a desperate situation, you would still be standing behind me.”

With sarcasm answered by sarcasm, Russell reached an accord with Roswaal by choosing to watch how things developed.

As he had said from the start, Roswaal had no need to seek Russell’s permission. On the other hand, Russell did not need Roswaal’s permission to take his own countermeasures.

For each to play his best move, there was no need to lay his heart wholly bare.

Serena: “It seems the discussion has wrapped up neatly. Now, my curiosity has about reached its limit. Let me hear it at once.”

The delayed Serena clapped her hands and egged Roswaal on. At those words, Roswaal, unable to hide his joy at a partner interested in magic, nodded.

Roswaal: “Ah, I would like to start with the essential question of what the Gate is, buuut… Serena, the gem in those earrings of yours is Magic Crystal, is it not~?”

Serena: “It is. When there were signs of rebellion in my family’s domain, His Imperial Majesty bestowed it upon me as a reward for its suppression. I am quite fond of it.”

Chatting animatedly, Roswaal and Serena headed toward the back of the institute. Following the two backs, Russell called softly: “Ilzea.”

At that call, the pale-faced researcher blinked, but—

Russell: “Do not neglect caution. If the Margrave takes any suspicious action, inform me of each and every one.”

Ilzea: “—Understood.”

Russell did not cast even a glance at Ilzea, who answered in a voice gone cold, as if he were another person.

He only gazed at Roswaal’s back, cheerfully giving a lecture on magic, and, wondering whether he ought to set that boy upon the scale as a friend or as a hazard, could do nothing but let out a heavy sigh.

5

—In accordance with the treaty concluded with the Empire, the handover of the Werewolf in question, Alagar, to the Empire.

That was the content of the next squad assignment given to Heinkel Astrea, who had earned merit by capturing the Werewolf who had hidden himself in the Royal Capital.

They would receive the special envoy from the Vollachian Empire and hand Alagar over. On top of that, they would escort the envoy to the imperial border and complete the transfer without incident.

It was an important duty so as not to worsen relations with the Empire, long gone cold—

Serena: “—You wear quite a brazen face.”

Seeing the Werewolf fitted with manacles and a gag, the Empire’s special envoy, who called herself Serena Dracroy, wore a sadistic smile.

Though still young—she looked in her teens—her words and bearing were those of a noble of dignity and lineage, and even her fierce vigor bore an Imperial sort of danger. At the very least, it seemed certain she was the kind of talent judged such that neither age nor sex would hinder her appointment.

Even so, Heinkel was made to fret by her incautious, overbearing way with those around her. Did she have any awareness that she bore a heavy responsibility for the peaceful relations of both nations?

Serena: “Name, Alagar… a fugitive who fled the Empire and escaped to the kingdom. Though once you took the chains off and let him have his way, he then committed the blunder of getting caught even here in the kingdom—an unlucky man. —You who escorted him here, are you the squad that captured this one?”

Heinkel: “…Y-Yes, that’s right. We are the ones who apprehended that Werewolf.”

Addressed out of the blue, Heinkel bitterly regretted that he stumbled over the opening of his reply. Paying no mind to that cause for Heinkel’s self-reproach, Serena arched a brow with a “Ho.”

Serena: “It may be ungracious to say so, but to think you overpowered him with so few. In our country, he’s the sort of fellow who got away after tearing down even a fort.”

Heinkel: “—. The fruit of our daily training, I would say.”

Serena: “I won’t say training bears no fruit. Only…”

So saying, Serena’s gaze slipped off Heinkel and was turned toward the squad members lined up behind him. There were four in the line; on one of them Serena fixed her eyes.

On Marcos Gildark—so tall one had to look up at him, clad in a cuirass of thick muscle.

Serena: “One alone is in a different class. Yet he isn’t leading the unit. A problem child, is he.”

Marcos: “If you wish to talk, speak with the squad leader, Envoy. I and the others will keep watch on the surroundings.”

Serena: “How cold. Well, fine. There’ll be a chance to loosen that tied mouth along the way.”

At Serena’s narrowed eyes, Marcos gave nothing but a by-the-book answer. Even so, Serena's interest in Marcos did not fade, and that in itself was an affront to Heinkel.

Skipping over his head as squad leader, Marcos drew the attention—though, thinking of Marcos's strength and talent, he knew it was only natural attention.

Heinkel: "Envoy! I would like to discuss the travel plan!"

Serena: "Hm? Ah, I'll leave it to you. That said, I don't intend to meddle. Kingdom matters should be left to kingdom people. I, too, want to concentrate on what's in my hands for a while yet."

Heinkel: "What's in your hands?"

Serena: "I'm in the middle of trying something I learned yesterday from a friend of the kingdom."

To Heinkel, who had raised his voice, Serena answered while toying with something in her hands. In her hand she held a soft, silver, threadlike thing that changed shape.

Heinkel frowned at the unfamiliar object; Serena said, "This is—"

Serena: "If you can pass Mana well between your two hands through your internal Gate, you can make this silver thread change shape as you please. It's a toy for learning how to channel Mana."

Marcos: "How to channel Mana… could it be—"

Serena: "Hm? Has a chance come around at once to loosen that tied mouth?"

Serena's explanation meant nothing to Heinkel, but it seemed Marcos had something come to mind in its stead. Even so, he ignored Serena's desire to hear it, hiding his answer behind a boulder-like expression.

At Marcos's breach of courtesy, Serena said "No matter," and did not censure him.

Heinkel, feeling as though he alone had needlessly worn his spirit thin, felt a sense of grievance, but he shook his head—there was no point in making Serena censure Marcos here.

And—

Heinkel: “We commence transport as planned. You are to follow our instructions to the letter.”

And so, with a gloomy mood hanging about him, the mission began for Heinkel.

Those involved were: Heinkel as squad leader; Marcos as his lieutenant; three kingdom knights as squad members; and four drivers for the dragon carriages bearing Alagar. In addition were Serena, serving as the Empire’s special envoy, and four Imperial soldiers as her guards—for a total of fourteen, a small party.

Yet the number of people involved and the weight of the responsibility incurred often did not correlate. This case was that sort—and that was exactly why Heinkel’s feelings were complicated.

Originally, the one who had taken the lead in the roundup of the restrained Werewolf had been Marcos.

Heinkel and the other knights could not hold their own against the Werewolf—Alagar’s—rampage; without Marcos, they would have been wiped out and let him escape. Even their lives had been in danger.

Nevertheless, Marcos had taken advantage of the fact that the other knights had been unconscious at the time of Alagar’s capture and tossed the credit to Heinkel. When asked why, he said something incomprehensible like, “I’m still in the middle of getting my feel back.”

If he disliked that, one would say Heinkel should have refused as well—

Heinkel: “—Damn.”

Credit though it had been handed over, Heinkel had wanted it so badly he could taste it.

If he was going to fall into self-loathing whether he took it or not, then taking it and hating himself for it was far better—so he thought, and accepted the credit, but in the end the bitterness refused to fade.

To cap it off, for the envoy's transport he would be leaving the capital for several days and had to part from his son, Reinhard.

Heinkel: "Reinhard…"

—Frankly, his son—Reinhard—was in a precarious way.

He might be laughed at for a father's bias, but in Reinhard he felt a natural endowment absent in other children. That included the signs, glimpsed not long ago, of an exceedingly dangerous Divine Protection. Acting upon the human heart, that Divine Protection would, if used wrongly, easily make his son the enemy of the world.

He had pressed him hard, taught him, and Reinhard had sworn never again to use that Divine Protection. But Heinkel was not so optimistic as to think a child's self-control could keep a vow absolutely.

So he did not want to be away from Reinhard for long—least of all leave the house not to the Fauzen couple who ran it, but to his own father and mother.

Serena: "Captain, you look awfully strained."

Heinkel: "—!"

Suddenly peered at from the seat opposite, Heinkel caught his breath. Grinning at his reaction was Serena, who had been playing with the silver thread all along.

They had divided the party between two dragon carriages and riders on earth dragons: one carriage held Alagar and a watchman from the squad; the other held Heinkel and Marcos, tasked with protecting Serena.

They were not a group for lively conversation, nor did they feel any need to make it lively.

Serena: “Any reason to be uneasy? This isn’t the Empire, but the kingdom, is it not? I have no desire to disparage my own country, but if trouble were to arise en route, it’s far more likely to be in ours.”

Heinkel: “N-No, that is…”

Marcos: “In his case, his son clings to his father. That’s what’s making him uneasy.”

When Heinkel panicked, fearing he had offended an important personage, the Marcos at his side covered for him. It was barely more than stating the truth, but Serena expressed admiration with a “Ho.”

Serena: “I see—love for one’s child. I can hardly fault that.”

Heinkel: “…From the look of you, Envoy, you seem rather young.”

Serena: “When I see something that glitters, I’ve a habit of picking it up. That’s why there are many children I keep by my side. They all take work, but they’re dear, promising little ones. —Incidentally, I sense a glitter in you as well.”

Marcos: “Spare me the jokes. Especially the ones that aren’t funny.”

Serena: “My, my, this country has so many who are cold. In the homeland I’m in great demand, you know.”

Waving her hand lightly, Serena traded banter. Yet when she spoke of children, Heinkel sensed a sure kindness that she had not shown until now.

At that, Heinkel at last recognized that Serena had faces and a personality beyond “Imperial Envoy,” unclenched the fist he had kept tightly closed, and looked down. Then, “The truth is—” he was about to, however reluctantly, take the lifeline Marcos had thrown him—at that instant—

Guard: “Enemy attack—!!”

A sharp voice was hurled from outside the dragon carriage, and Heinkel’s whole body went rigid. But beside him, Marcos and Serena moved swiftly.

Serena at once withdrew to the center of the carriage; Marcos stood and sprang for the door. And even as he flew out, kicking the door open—

Marcos: “Heinkel!!”

He barely grasped that this was an urging for Heinkel to protect Serena. He grasped it, and that was all. Heinkel could not recover the composure to carry it out.

Heinkel: “Uwo—aaah—?!”

A violent jolt came the next moment; the dragon carriage lurched over with tremendous force. Unable to oppose the tilt, Heinkel smashed against wall and seat, screaming.

—An attack that ought never to have been had fastened its sights upon the party of kingdom knights transporting a Werewolf and the Empire’s special envoy, and was seeking to narrow its encirclement in one fell swoop.

6

Guard: “Enemy attack—!!”

Rising at the sharp, warning cry of his colleague, Marcos leapt for the dragon carriage’s door.

An attack in the midst of escorting the Empire’s special envoy, Serena Dracroy, to the imperial border—given relations between the kingdom and the Empire, anything happening to her would be diplomatically bad.

Marcos: “Heinkel!!”

Calling to Heinkel, who shared the carriage, Marcos urged him to protect the envoy.

If the panicked Heinkel could get moving with that, so much the better. And if not, whether he was there or not honestly would not affect the big picture.

What would affect the big picture was—

Marcos: “Dammit!”

—the death of the driver handling the carriage, his head burst apart, as seen by Marcos as he clicked his tongue.

He had taken some kind of impact to the temple, and everything above the poor driver’s neck had been blown off. But Marcos and the others had no time to mourn that death—the next instant, the same impact that had killed the driver flamboyantly obliterated a wheel of the carriage.

Heinkel: “Uwo, aaah—?!”

The carriage, having lost its support, tilted violently, and a flipped-over scream rose from inside.

It was hard to stomach that Serena, who ought to be protected, stifled her voice, while Heinkel, who ought to protect, was the one screaming. Even so, in the present situation Marcos could not talk big about Heinkel’s disgrace. He, too, was on the back foot and taking hits.

Marcos: “What about the other carriage—”

Of the two dragon carriages, one carried Serena the envoy, and the other bore the prisoner to be sent to the Empire, the “Werewolf,” Alagar.

Unfortunately, the carriages were on a mountain road of narrow width. Since the one in front—this carriage—was no longer able to move, the one behind could not proceed either. If the rear carriage were operable, there would have been the option of transferring Serena aboard and getting her away from here—but—

Serena: "—Looks like the wheel on the other one got taken out as well. The carriages are at a standstill."

Marcos: "You…"

Serena peeked past Marcos out the side and confirmed the same thing. At her fearless action that made Marcos widen his eyes, she wore a combative smile and—

Serena: "Staying inside like this will only bleed us dry. What now?"

Marcos: "—We get outside and use the carriage as a shield. I'll go kill the enemy."

Serena: "Very well. I'm in."

Feeling a certain satisfaction at Serena's immediate nod, Marcos glared past her at Heinkel, who was on his knees on the carriage floor. At that gaze, Heinkel called out pitiably, "M-Marcos," but cursing him could wait.

Marcos: "Protect the envoy. She's far more important than your life."

Leaving only that, Marcos sprang out of the carriage, deliberately exposing himself to the assassins.

It was an obvious bait. But the enemy could not ignore it—the next moment, the same kind of strike that had killed the driver came flying, aimed at the center of Marcos's body.

At the flash coming in from the far edge of his vision, Marcos matched it with the sword he had drawn on instinct and batted it aside. —Marcos's sword was an extra-large blade that prized unbreakable sturdiness over cutting power. Truth be told, he was better at punching foes directly than handling a sword, but as a knight he could not dispense with one.

Besides, in situations like this, having a sword was useful.

Marcos: "Even I can't realistically swat that away barehanded."

From the shock rebounding off the greatsword and the sound of steel against steel, Marcos inferred that the projectile was a sharp, arrow-like bolt. However, two problems arose: the bolt he should have knocked down was nowhere to be seen nearby, and the assassin who had loosed it was nowhere in his sight.

—A bolt that vanished after it struck, and a troublesome archer who kept his presence wholly concealed.

It was when he stayed on guard against that assassin and resolved to play the decoy further—

???: “So you blocked that. An enemy—cannot be taken lightly.”

A muffled voice as if with a sack over its head landed before Marcos.

The one who dropped off the cliff onto the mountain road with a thunderous crash was a giant more than a size taller than the tall Marcos. His entire body was sheathed in dully gleaming, pewter-colored mineral—no, not sheathed: his body itself was made of that pewter-hued mineral.

At that appearance and intimidating pressure, Marcos bared his teeth with the hair on his back standing up.

Marcos: “No way—Steelfolk?!”

Steelfolk: “Correct. That answer.”

The dutiful reply came with a likewise dutifully swung, mighty arm.

The blow, thick and massive like a column of a great manor, was hurled mercilessly; Marcos met it head-on with his greatsword and held his ground.

It was no exaggeration: the destructive force was like a head-on collision with a dragon carriage. As Marcos gritted his teeth and held it back, the Steelfolk pressed his arm in and—

Steelfolk: “You stopped me. Frightening.”

Marcos: “That so? You’re scared… then I’ll give you something to be even more scared of!”

With the Steelfolk pushing in and applying pressure, Marcos roared and launched a counterattack.

Setting all his muscles to a rhythm and shoving the foe back in a snap, Marcos, still supporting the greatsword with one arm, wrapped his free left arm around the opponent’s leg and slammed him hard into the cliff.

Marcos: “Oooooooh!!”

He drove him into the cliff with enough force for the body to sink in, and the counterattack did not end there. Using the impaled body as his tool, he immediately set about a more large-scale rock-cutting operation.

Among demi-humans, the Steelfolk were a rare race, distinguished by bodies composed, from birth, of substances such as mineral and metal. As a racial trait, they were, naturally, hard and sturdy—akin to a lump of iron with arms and legs coming at you with fists.

With that vaunted body, he would reshape this narrow mountain road.

Marcos: “—Tch!”

As he furiously quarried the cliff with the enemy’s body, a sharp sensation drove into his flank, and Marcos clicked his tongue.

It was a sniper’s shot from an assassin, fired to exploit the opening as he grappled with the Steelfolk. The instant it broke the skin of his flank, Marcos clenched the muscle at the point of impact and stopped the bolt.

Even so, the fact remained that he was wounded. And on top of that, his attention had been diverted—

Steelfolk: “You stopped that too. You are something.”

With those words of praise, a hand seized his head, and Marcos and the Steelfolk's positions were reversed. The Steelfolk grabbed Marcos by the head and swung him around, smashed him back-first into the cliff, and drove an arm in as a follow-up.

The impact pierced from Marcos's chest through his back, punched into the cliff behind, and cracks ran far and wide. The ensuing rockslide choked the mountain road, and the roiling smoke made the battlefield even worse.

And worse yet—

???: "—Bang-Bang-baaang!"

That incongruously lively voice coincided with tremendous sounds of shattering.

Beyond the smoke, he saw shattered trees and blood spray rising, and Marcos instinctively knew that this spelled the fate of the second, trailing carriage.

The earth dragon and its driver, and the guarding kingdom knights and imperial soldiers—some of them, or perhaps all of them, had been killed. And the one who had done so was now entering this field of battle.

???: "What, what, what, you're still, still, still at it, Jimrack! Is something, something off somewhere, or else, or else is the opponent bad?"

Indeed, the one who arrived with that shrill racket was a short, gaunt man with sharp eyes. The man sported a long silver tail, and the manner of his entry was stranger than his appearance: for whatever reason, he came in spinning end over end, cleaving the smoke with that tail as he plunged in.

The Steelfolk—called Jimrack—received the bizarrely arriving man with composure and—

Jimrack: "My bad. An opponent. Shot down and stopped—even the arrows, Elcain's."

???: "Ho, ho, ho! That's, that's amazing. Just when I thought you'd gone soft under the Dragon's Covenant, there's someone, someone who can do it halfway, halfway decently even in the kingdom!"

Jimrack: "You shouldn't—let your guard down. Oulouzo, that's your bad habit."

Calling the shorty who applauded and praised from on high "Oulouzo," Jimrack lined up with his comrade, slowly keeping wary watch on his side.

Facing the two, Marcos pulled his body free of the cliff and let out a sigh.

Both foes were certainly strong. He was clearly on the losing side, but there was not nothing to be gained.

Marcos: "Thanks for the flattery about there being someone "even in the kingdom." Judging by the mix of races, nine times out of ten you lot are Imperials. Your target is… the front carriage or the one behind, which?"

Oulouzo: "Hahaha, I see, I see! Even after getting pummeled this much and that much, you don't go down for free! Good, good, kingdom warrior! A pity it's a surprise operation."

He did not answer the question, but neither did he deny the assertion thrown at him.

At that point, their affiliation as the Vollachian Empire was as good as exposed, but that left no room for the situation to improve dramatically. —For improvement, the enemies' heads were required.

Marcos: "Jimrack, Oulouzo, Elcain."

Those were the names gleaned from their exchange—and likely the main force of this ambush.

Unless he took those three heads, there would be no victory and no getting out alive.

Oulouzo: "Coming, are you, are you!"

The instant he set strength in his knees, Oulouzo laughed thus. Thinking how troublesome capable enemies were, Marcos sprang forward as if released.

Marcos: “Nnnnuuuuhn!”

With a horizontal sweep of the greatsword, he aimed at Jimrack and Oulouzo together; Jimrack cut into the sword flash and, with the Steelfolk’s torso, stopped it with his whole body.

Steel grated against steel; sparks flew to the high-pitched sound, and their brute strengths were in balance.

And then—

Oulouzo: “A very, quite, rather fine sword. But, but, not as fine as mine!”

Spinning out such strange words, Oulouzo intervened in the shoving match—no, brought it to a conclusion.

Lightly sprinting up the cliff, Oulouzo leapt into midair and spun end over end; with that long tail whistling, he turned into a silver disc and came hurtling in.

That bizarre strike of Oulouzo’s split in two the greatsword Marcos had set against Jimrack, and its sheer sharpness made his arm slip free without resistance. In the corner of his shifted vision, a flash whipped by in the distance—

Marcos: “Shit.”

He twisted his head on reflex and got away with letting the bolt, which should have pierced his skull, gouge only his temple. But the blood streaming down robbed his left eye’s vision, and the simultaneous attack of these top-class assassins was a crisis point.

A hard, heavy impact and a sharp, deep cut carved a cross-shaped wound into Marcos’s chest and blew him away. He rolled far back, rolled on even after tearing through the smoke, and was plastered to the ground.

And at the blown-away Marcos, a follow-up came, now of all times—

Serena: “—Down!”

It was a woman’s voice—neither Marcos’s nor any of the attackers’.

At that voice, the instant a red light—different from the bolts—leapt at the edge of his vision, Marcos let the strength go from his knees and dropped flat on the spot. —The next moment, light flared.

—A tremendous blast of flame spread as if to swallow the mountain road.

7

Ilzea: “—Director?”

Peering at Roswaal, who had suddenly broken off mid-conversation, the researcher Ilzea knit his brows.

Without responding to Ilzea’s call, Roswaal strode in silence to the laboratory window, threw it open, and narrowed his heterochromatic eyes at the scene outside.

Ilzea: “U-Um, did I do something…?”

In his timid voice showed the sorrow of a subordinate dealing with a superior who was hard to communicate with. From his perspective, he must have suspected he had, once again, soured the mood of a capricious boss.

But Roswaal had no room just now to spare a thought for Ilzea’s sentiments.

Roswaal: “That disturbance in Mana just now…”

What faintly pricked Roswaal’s skin, transmitted through the air, was the sense of a large fluctuation in Mana.

Clearly different from something naturally occurring, it was sure proof that someone had intentionally transformed Mana—in other words, proof that magic had been activated.

What was more, he had a very recent recollection of that Mana’s wavelength—

Roswaal: “Ilzea-kun, get in touch with Russell.”

Still keeping his eyes outside the window, Roswaal told Ilzea behind him thus. At that, Ilzea drew a sharp breath; his eyes wandered.

Ilzea: “Lord Russell? Er, just because he’s your friend, Director, letting him come and go from the lab too freely is a bit…”

Roswaal: “Ah, that sort of face-saving talk is fine for nooow. Right now I want to speak with him. Posthaste.”

Ilzea: “No, I mean, why are you asking me to…”

Roswaal: “If we’re to get in touch with Russell, you’d be the quickest, wooouldn’t you?”

Saying so, Roswaal turned and looked Ilzea squarely in the face. At that gaze, Ilzea’s cheeks tightened faintly, his eyes narrowing a touch.

That change in atmosphere—that expression—was just the kind of sharpness that made it feel worth inviting him into the lab; it was to Roswaal’s taste.

Roswaal: “—Do you recall the Magic Crystal earrings Serena had? It seems those were used as a catalyst for magic. I suspect there’s trouble.”

Having come at once upon being contacted, Russell received from Roswaal this concise explanation.

The disturbance in Mana and its wavelength that Roswaal had sensed, the activation of magic, and the likely catalyst used for it all matched the Magic Crystal earrings worn by Serena Dracroy, who had visited the tower yesterday.

She had said it was an ornament made of very valuable Magic Crystal, bestowed on her as a reward by the Emperor—but—

Roswaal: “It looks like she used it without hesitation when she should. In that respect, her decisiveness is astonishing, but one should say it was an appropriate judgment~”

Russell: “You did speak of a plan to have the sons and daughters of nobles carry Magic Stones for self-defense…”

Roswaal: “It’s not a bad feeling to see a technique I taught put to use immediately. Not only does she have the judgment of a noble, but as a pupil, too, she's excellent. Most agreeable."

Russell: "—Roswaal."

With the blue eye closed and Roswaal expressing his admiration thus, Russell called to him quietly.

As for having been summoned through Ilzea, Russell did not go out of his way to say anything. Nor did Roswaal intend to press that point.

The situation was pressing—and even if it had not been, he probably would not have dug into it.

His relationship with Russell was a good friendship—and that impression held even if each had a dagger hidden behind his back.

On that basis of a relationship shot through with tension, Russell, fingers to his narrow chin, said:

Russell: "Let us set aside Lady Dracroy's excellence for now. The problem is that she used magic—or rather, that she fell into a situation where she had to use it. You are certain of this?"

Roswaal: "No mistake. With Magic Crystal of that quality, I'm not going to confuse its Mana wavelength—the magic pattern—overnight. And the way it was used was just as I'd instructed."

Russell: ""As you'd instructed"?"

Roswaal: "You use the Mana stored in the stone and—kaboom."

At Roswaal's explanation, delivered with both hands spread, Russell silently narrowed his eyes.

It might have sounded like a joke, but in truth skillful instruction over just a few hours was difficult. What Serena had been taught was the most efficient way to use up Magic Crystal.

If that had gotten her out of the pinch into which she had fallen, then good—but—

Roswaal: “Now then, what do you think happened to her?”

Russell: “—Lady Dracroy was a special envoy from the Empire. The purpose of her visit was the handover of the Werewolf captured in the capital and his escort to the Empire.”

Roswaal: “And thanks to the information you provided, Marcos secured the Werewolf.”

Russell: “Yes. Therefore Sir Marcos should also be accompanying the handover of the prisoner and the envoy’s escort to the border.”

Roswaal: “If Marcos is there, I would think it unlikely that anything too serious would occur~”

Though still young, there were few hands in the kingdom’s Royal Guard more skilled than Marcos’s.

Frankly, save for the “Sword Demon,” Wilhelm van Astrea, the Captain of the Royal Guard—and an opponent Roswaal would rather not have to face—there were few others.

In any case, one could say personnel of the highest standard had been assigned as escort. —Even so, Serena had fallen into a situation where she had to use magic of her own accord.

Russell: “What I can imagine is… a situation where Sir Marcos cannot function? Either he was neutralized by some means, or he himself turned against Lady Dracroy.”

Roswaal: “The former, but the latter is also hard to imagine. If the latter were to be the case, since Lady Dracroy has activated magic that could be called a trump card, she would be the one attacked… but given his history and thinking, it is not convincing that Sir Marcos would commit such an outrage.”

Russell: “Reeeally? He does have a prior record of having given aid to the Brotherhood, does he not?”

Roswaal: “Is it not a waste of time to spend on a debate whose conclusion is foregone? Sir Marcos bears no treasonous intent toward the kingdom. If we proceed on that premise, then…”

Breaking off there, Russell briefly met Roswaal's eyes. Roswaal drew in his chin in turn, and they spoke at the same time:

Roswaal & Russell: "—A third-party attack."

That, at present, would be the most consistent form for their inference to take.

Russell: "Sir Marcos and Lady Dracroy should be thought of as having been attacked on the same side. Since Lady Dracroy has activated magic, it is a situation beyond Sir Marcos's lone hand."

Roswaal: "Either the enemy had quite the numbers… no, if they did something so blatant, the Royal Guard could not possibly have failed to sense signs of it. The enemy should also be a small, elite force~"

Russell: "Their aim would be the Empire's envoy, or else the kingdom's knights… or the Werewolf being escorted."

Roswaal: "—There are still plenty who persist in such activities, after all~"

To the structure of Russell's reasoning, Roswaal had little in the way of additions or objections.

Amid the situation surrounding Marcos and Serena, the most likely targets for the yet-unseen "enemy" to have fixed upon were Serena herself and the Werewolf being escorted.

Reasons for targeting the former were many and could be conjectured; for targeting the latter, it was more likely not the Werewolf's life but his liberation that was the aim.

Since the Demi-human War, overt clashes between humans and the demi-human tribes had vanished on the surface in the Kingdom of Lugunica, but embers still smouldered here and there, and at times flared up as small blazes.

However—

Russell: "Involving the Empire's envoy this time cannot be dismissed as a small blaze.”

Roswaal: “If something happens to Serena, it will likely develop into a major diplomatic problem~ All the more so, if she were to lose her life in the kingdom…”

Russell: “—It could become a war with the Vollachian Empire.”

At Russell’s conclusion, Roswaal nodded quietly.

This was no exaggeration. As a matter of fact, the state of non-belligerence between the Kingdom of Lugunica and the Vollachian Empire was a miraculous span of time, sustained upon a very delicate balance.

And there were surprisingly many who wanted to end this miraculous time and strike a decisive blow to the relations between the two nations. That was not limited to the warlike people of the Empire; the same was true in the kingdom.

It was a leap of thought, but if this incident were the work of demi-humans plotting the Werewolf’s liberation, then those who still harbored the grudge of the Demi-human War and hated the kingdom might desire a slide into war brought on by a worsening of relations between kingdom and Empire.

Each was a bud of possibility with ample risk of avalanching toward the worst—

Roswaal: “—And I desire none of them to come to pass.”

Roswaal L. Mathers had a plan, one that would take a very, very long time.

It was a span of years that would make an ordinary person’s head swim, and a one-time chance that would not allow failure—and he had not yet even reached the starting point.

To surely bring it to fruition, any factor that would stop his feet had to be removed.

Russell: “The Royal Guard likely has not yet grasped the situation. I will contact them from my side. You…”

Roswaal: “Naturally, I’ll move at once∼”

Saying so, Roswaal set a foot on the laboratory’s window frame. With Russell’s widened eyes at his back, he cast himself straight out into the air.

And—

Russell: “…Magic is far more out of the ordinary than I imagined.”

Glancing outside the window at Roswaal, floating in midair wreathed in wind, Russell murmured.

Russell: “By the way, if I learn from you, will I be able to fly as well?”

Roswaal: “Rather than “if you learn from me,” if you hone yourself, you can. So long as you judge your own aptitudes and are prepared to spend your entire life on magic∼”

Russell: “I see—so it will not be easy. …Any leads on where to search?”

Roswaal: “For the time being, I’ll try tracing the traces of Serena’s magic. You—”

Russell cut him off: “Then take this,” and tossed something his way. Catching it on reflex, Roswaal found it to be a folding hand mirror—and it was obvious it was not merely a tool for one’s appearance.

A “Conversation Mirror”—a “Meteor” that enabled conversation between paired mirrors.

Roswaal: “You miss nothing.”

Russell: “That’s my one redeeming feature. —Do not overdo it, Roswaal.”

Tucking the Conversation Mirror into his breast, Roswaal waved a hand—“Ah”—to Russell’s words; then he rose in altitude, left the institute's stone tower, and began to pursue the traces of Mana.

It would be a problem if Serena were to suffer something through carelessness and a war between kingdom and Empire not in his plan were to break out.

And—

Roswaal: "Serena and Marcos, too, are friends I would hate to lose~"

8

Serena: "For now, it seems we have shaken off our pursuers."

Leaving the mountain road engulfed in explosions behind them and slipping some distance into the deep forest to hide among the trees, Serena slackened her taut vigilance a little and rolled her shoulders.

Soot and dirt smudged the formal dress of a noble's daughter she wore, but fortunately she had not suffered a single wound. That much was thanks to Serena's own handling of the situation and to the efforts of those around her.

At the very least, there ought to be that much to show for it—that Serena had escaped unscathed.

After all—

Serena: "When it comes to survivors on our side, it is down to me and you two now."

Behind her as she said so, three figures were likewise taking shelter behind the trunk of a great tree, resting their bodies. None of them were Imperial soldiers. Regrettably, the four soldiers escorting Serena from the Empire had not made it out of that mountain road alive.

Nor had the Kingdom's three knights, the drivers, or the ground dragons. In the end, those who survived that place were Serena, the Kingdom knights Marcos and Heinkel, and—

Heinkel: “L-Look, Special Envoy, the situation’s pretty dire… so why are we dragging this guy along?”

Serena: “Hm? Ah, I am aware I am asking something troublesome. But what I was ordered to do is escort that man back. If it is His Imperial Majesty’s decree, I have no choice but to obey, do I?”

Heinkel: “Even so…!”

Alagar: “Yer screw’s loose, you lot.”

Even in this untransformed, scrawny state, the werewolf Alagar, hands bound in manacles, glared at Serena and the others without loosening a whit of the hostility and caution in his eyes.

Finding that fierce hatred almost amusing, Serena curved her lips.

Serena: “Sorry to say, but you are going to stick with us a little longer yet, Alagar.”

Alagar: “…Yer bloody nuts, lady.”

He wrinkled his nose and spat the words.

That they had managed to extract Alagar, bound and all, in the midst of that chaos was a stroke of fortune bordering on the miraculous. From the look of it, the man whose life had been spared had not the slightest intention of being grateful.

Serena: “And to have my sanity questioned on top of that is unfair. I am your lifesaver, or ought to be.”

Alagar: “Damn right we’re questionin’ ya. Riskin’ yer own neck to haul me outta there? ’Cause the Emperor told ya to? Only thing to call that is “crazy lady, drop dead.”“

Heinkel: “Watch your tongue!”

It was not Serena but Heinkel who snapped at the werewolf’s attitude, insolence taken to the extreme. The redheaded knight hardened his mild features and thrust an awfully grand-looking sword toward Alagar.

Heinkel: “Don’t you get it? If the Special Envoy hadn’t decided to save you, you’d still be back on that road right now—”

Alagar: “Either way I’m gettin’ hauled back to the Empire to be executed. Try lookin’ at the heart of it, rich boy.”

Heinkel: “—Kh, why you!”

Heinkel raised his blade, face gone red at Alagar’s mockery. For a second it seemed his temper would end the mission then and there, but—

Heinkel: “—nngh.”

His movement froze with the sword still raised. The hand gripping his weapon was clenched with abnormal force and trembled faintly.

Winking one eye, Serena called out to him.

Serena: “Sir Knight Heinkel, that is far enough. We risked our lives to save that life. It would be laughable to cut it down with our own hands.”

Heinkel: “…If that is your order, Special Envoy.”

He answered, and with reluctant air slid his sword back into its scabbard.

It was a farcical exchange, but Heinkel was one of the few people they still had. With the need for solidarity being absolute from here on, needless friction ought to be avoided whenever possible.

Between his poor response under pressure and that trembling a moment ago, Heinkel’s problems were not ones Serena could hope to solve here.

Which was why, of those present, the person she most needed on her side was—

Marcos: “Quit making the Special Envoy babysit you with that worthless back-and-forth.”

Heinkel: “M-Marcos!”

Marcos: “Keep your voice down. Where do you think we are, and what do you think we are doing?”

A low voice came from the shadow of the tree, and Heinkel squeaked. Irritated, Marcos rebuked him. Marcos had been there, tending to his wounds in that shade.

He had suffered quite deep injuries trading blows with the assailants on the mountain road. Thanks to the first aid, the bleeding from the gashes across his thick, burly chest had stopped.

Serena: “That said, you must have bled a good deal. How do you feel?”

Marcos: “I can move somehow. Your quick wits saved me, Special Envoy.”

Serena: “No, quick wits and clever tricks only matter if there is a situation to make use of them. In that regard, Sir Knight Marcos’s fighting was the lifeline for every last one of us.”

She shrugged, not offering comfort or encouragement but a candid evaluation.

—A deadly rear guard firing from afar, and two exceptionally powerful fighters at the fore. The enemy ambush on that mountain road had been near perfect; it would not have been strange if they had been annihilated with no room to act.

With their means of travel destroyed in the opening move and her escort cut down, Serena had been cornered.

She prided herself on being more resourceful than the average girl and that she could wield a sword, but Serena did not delude herself into thinking that would get her through a pinch like that. Their continued survival was thanks to Marcos’s efforts. There would be no laughing if the thin ice underfoot had given way.

Serena: “Sir Knight Heinkel, as well, did not turn his nose up at me for being an Imperial and followed orders. Thanks to that, the duty of escorting the werewolf can still continue.”

Heinkel: “N-No, Special Envoy, I only did what I should have…”

Marcos: “Is this really the time to curry favor? Button it. —About the flash you just used as a smokescreen: for a smokescreen it packed a lot of punch. That earring must have been a very valuable piece, no?”

Serena: “I used it where it should be used. That is what tools are for.”

Quick to notice, Marcos had seen the missing earring. Serena touched the ear now bare and replied.

It had been an ornament bestowed by the Vollachian Emperor in recognition of her quelling a revolt in her domain, but the stroke of luck was having learned the proper way to use it just yesterday.

The method she had learned from Roswaal during her visit to the magic research institute—that was what had become a smokescreen far beyond excessive, buying them the opening to flee.

Serena: “If we were careless and the pursuers had died in that blast, the matter would be simple, but…”

Marcos: “…That is a long shot. Those bastards were skilled, every last one. Even if not, the ones at long range will not have been caught in it.”

Serena: “True enough. I only said it.”

When they broke away under cover of the Magic Crystal’s explosion, Marcos had left a very large parting gift to keep the sniper’s head down, but counting on that having killed the target would be overly optimistic.

For the time being, they should assume all three of the enemy assassins were still alive.

Serena: “We came down the mountain road and made it into the forest below, but how long will it take the Kingdom to grasp the situation and send reinforcements?”

Heinkel: “Th-That… of course, as quickly as possible, the Knights will respond…”

Marcos: “…We cannot say. What I can say is they were waiting for us fully prepared. That being so, there is a good chance they have already moved to keep word of the commotion from spreading.”

Serena: “So banking on reinforcements and waiting out the pursuit is unrealistic.”

She nodded at Marcos’s answer while ignoring Heinkel’s vague one.

It had been an ambush arranged with meticulous care. The problem was who had leaked that they would be passing through that place at that time—or rather, from which nation the leak had come.

Depending on whether the fault lay with the Kingdom or the Empire, the depth of the problem changed for Serena.

And then—

Heinkel: “Special Envoy, I have a proposal. —We hand that werewolf over to them.”

Serena: “Oh?”

Raising a small hand and lowering his voice, Heinkel offered a proposal that made Serena arch a brow.

It was the first time Heinkel had truly taken her by surprise, and it was also the most worth considering of his suggestions so far. Of course, all would depend on his intent.

Heinkel: “Those guys Marcos was fighting looked like demi-humans at a glance. If so, their aim is to free the werewolf. If we hand him over, we might have room to negotiate… uagh!”

Marcos: “Heinkel! What the hell are you saying!”

Marcos suddenly flared up, fisting Heinkel by the chest mid-sentence. He lifted him with such strength that Heinkel's feet left the ground, and glared at him from up close.

Marcos: "They killed the Envoy's guards, and they killed our own. And you want to hand the werewolf to them? What happens to the ones who died!"

Heinkel: "I-I feel the same…! But you're the one not getting it!"

Marcos: "What was that?"

Heinkel: "The Envoy's safety comes first! That's what you said!"

He kicked his dangling feet, twisting at Marcos's hand with both of his own. The difference between their arms was like the trunk and a branch of a tree, yet the strength of conviction had them even for now.

When all was said and done, Marcos's position was one of emotion, as someone whose own had been killed; his words lacked grounding. Heinkel's was a position that took diplomatic issues into account, though it, too, was short on certainty.

If one had to say which of them had the better theoretical armor on in that moment, it would be Heinkel.

However—

Serena: "That supposes their target really is Alagar. That is the weak point."

Heinkel: "…You think it might be something else?"

Serena: "Easily. At the very least, so long as I am inside the Kingdom, I am like a fire Magic Stone. Wherever I am detonated, some degree of damage will result. If the damage itself is what they are after, your proposal is irrelevant whether we hand Alagar over or not."

If what the enemy wanted was simply for Serena to die in the Kingdom, then Heinkel's proposal would be ignored and there would be no room for negotiation. Or perhaps, taking Serena's life and freeing Alagar's person both would be the surest way to rub both Empire and Kingdom entirely the wrong way.

Either way—

Serena: "Sir Knight Heinkel's valuable proposal is one where, if we try it and fail, there will be no recovering. On top of that, I will add one more thing."

Heinkel: "A-And that is?"

Serena: "As I just said, this is His Imperial Majesty's decree. We risked our lives to pull Alagar out for that. If I return alive yet fail to fulfill that decree, I am not sure my head will remain attached."

In short, from the very premise, Serena did not have the freedom to release Alagar.

Hearing this, Marcos let Heinkel drop back to the ground, then raked his own head with his free hand.

Marcos: "Which means we are cut off and on our own, with no reinforcements, and we kill every last pursuer and press on with the mission."

Serena: "At the limit, it would be good enough if we slipped the pursuit and made it to the border fortress. But depending on where the pursuers hail from, I cannot say the fortress will be safe."

Marcos: "You cannot say the fortress will be safe?"

Serena: "I have many enemies. Not only in the Kingdom, but within the Empire as well. Add to that, my most immediate enemy is… No, that is enough of that for now."

She slowly shook her head and left it unsaid.

Then, having listened in silence, Alagar suddenly rumbled deep in his throat. For a man in manacles, in a position as precarious as it got, it was a sullen smile.

Their gazes turned his way, and he snorted.

Alagar: “Before we set out ya were so high ’n mighty, but now yer spot ain’t so different from mine, huh. Maybe I oughta howl and bring ’em right to ya?”

Heinkel: “Wh-What did you say?”

Alagar: “That gag slipped off in the chaos. Just sayin’ I got options, right?”

Serena: “There are always options. I do not particularly recommend that one.”

Hands on her hips, Serena stated it plainly. If it sounded like begging for life, she would not deny it, but that was not all.

Serena: “Given the situation, I do not think they are after your freedom. If that is so, what role are you expected to play, just for being there?—A convenient place to pin the blame.”

Alagar: “…”

Serena: “An Imperial envoy and the Kingdom knights escorting her, wiped out to the last. As the culprit, “the werewolf who was to be returned to the Empire for execution”—that is very convenient.”

As she laid out the logic, Alagar’s expression gradually clouded.

Serena was only voicing a possibility, yet she was confident the reasoning fit Alagar’s position rather well.

However, there was a decisive hole in her argument from Alagar’s point of view.

Alagar: “I get it, sellin’ ya out don’t save me even if I let ’em kill ya. But that’s the same even if I don’t sell ya out, innit.”

That was the hole.

Even if Alagar threw in with them, made it to the fortress, and they managed to get the situation under control, what awaited him would be the scaffold. If he would die either way, Serena had no right to condemn him for trying to drag them down with him out of spite.

Therefore, to collapse that premise—

Serena: “Quite so. Which is exactly why there is room for you and me to negotiate.”

Alagar: “Negotiate, huh?”

Serena: “Yes. Listen, Alagar. If you agree not to sell us out here, I am willing to declare you dead and let you go.”

Heinkel: “Wha…?!”

Heinkel gasped, as did Alagar, at Serena’s offer spoken with her arms folded.

Only Marcos, with a face like bedrock, stared steadily at Serena as if to probe her.

Marcos: “…I believe you only just said you could not go against His Majesty’s decree.”

Serena: “I did. But needs must. If Alagar howls and draws them down on us here, that is the end. In that case, to protect our own lives, shall I silence him?”

Marcos fell silent, and Serena smiled.

Serena: “I do not favor filthy tricks like that. You feel the same, I take it.”

To Serena, pride was something to be valued as highly as life itself, if not higher.

Serena: “And if I am to take both my life and my pride, the compromise in the middle is “deceiving His Majesty.” What do you say, Alagar?”

Alagar: “…Hard to answer that one.”

Serena: “Naturally, to report you “killed” rather than “released,” I will need convincing proof—an eye, perhaps, or an arm. In return, I will give you a way to live. That is my offer."

Alagar: "…"

Serena: "Apologies, but we cannot give you long to think. Sir Knight Heinkel is even more impatient than I am."

She flicked a glance at Heinkel as she spoke. He blinked at her, then caught on immediately and drew his sword again.

The gleam of steel gave the dithering Alagar a firm shove in the back.

Alagar: "…Fine. I'll do it your way."

Serena: "Well done. Needless to say, even if they kill us, you will not be saved. So when it comes down to it—"

Alagar: "—Crazy lady."

Grinding his teeth, Alagar looked at her with naked loathing. Serena laughed.

Somehow, the rational talks with the werewolf had concluded. Whether she could really talk Drizen Vollachia, the Emperor, into accepting a lie was a gamble, but first they had to make it back alive.

Watching Serena's profile as she finished the negotiation, Marcos let out a long breath.

Marcos: "…Now I get why you're pals with Roswaal."

Serena: "Oh? So you did know Roswaal. You said nothing about it and let me talk; that is unkind of you, Sir Knight Marcos."

Marcos: "You and him, and one more of Roswaal's pals, you're all worse than I am."

Serena: "You mean Russell Fellow? In that case, I met him yesterday as well."

Marcos: “…Figures.”

The honorifics slipped from his words, and the respect from his demeanor; Marcos wore a face as though the world were ending. Smiling at his reaction, Serena looked up to the sky.

The thick canopy blocked out the light; in the overgrown forest, no sunshine reached them. That was a tailwind for those who had to hide, like Serena’s party, but if there was anyone besides the pursuers searching for them, it would be a headwind for that party.

An idea struck her. Serena fished in her breast and played a thin, light thing between her fingers. Fortunately, blowing away the earring had also let her grasp a certain sense for it.

Serena: “So long as I do not throw away pride and dignity, I will use every measure I can. That is how I do things.”

—While Serena was laying down an extra precaution just in case.

Marcos: “Heinkel, keep your eyes on the werewolf. The Special Envoy struck a deal with him, but I cannot say how seriously he took it.”

Testing the feel of clenching and unclenching his fist, Marcos gave Heinkel his orders.

At this point, the question of who the squad leader was meant nothing at all. Heinkel answered that order with a grim face and a nod.

Only, after that he shut his mouth and stared fixedly at Marcos, which Marcos could not make sense of.

Marcos: “What? Your staring’s getting on my nerves.”

Heinkel: “You’re okay… right? I’ve never seen you pressed that hard before.”

Marcos: “…Told you, they were skilled. And it was two on one—no, three on one, counting the long-range shooter. Of course it took doing.”

Heinkel: “…”

Marcos: “If we had more competent allies it would be another story. Getting bailed out by the Special Envoy’s quick thinking—don’t you think that looks pretty bad for a knight?”

Heinkel: “Th-That’s…”

He still could not answer Marcos’s needling with anything proper, which was tiresome.

He had managed to talk back when Marcos lost his temper a moment ago, which had been a surprise, but now the man’s lack of spirit made that look like a mistake.

In any case, Marcos had no room to indulge Heinkel’s self-doubts any further.

Marcos: “I’m the vanguard, you’re the rear. At least be the first to spot the enemy.”

Heinkel: “R-Right. …Don’t you lose.”

Tacking on an unnecessary extra comment, Heinkel headed over to Alagar and used his blade to keep the now-docile werewolf in line.

Watching that, Marcos once more dropped his gaze to his own hand.

Marcos: “Tch.”

In his vision, the fist that opened and closed was trembling ever so slightly.

—Bit by bit, the wound the arrowhead had gouged was throbbing in an ominous way, and it was downright unpleasant.

Having taken off from the Royal Research Institute of Magic, Roswaal followed the traces, relying on the spell pattern he had sensed.

Magic Crystals were pure crystallizations of mana; Serena's magic that had used one as a catalyst should have been quite powerful, but as expected, the traces had grown faint as time passed, making it hard to pin down an exact location.

Thus, it seemed that tracing their steps would not be easy—but—

Roswaal: "—Was this Marcos's doing? As outrageous as ever."

Saying so, Roswaal looked exasperated at the overly conspicuous signs of battle he had discovered below.

What lay there was a bizarre sight: a dragon carriage wedged into the cliff of a rocky mountain road. Even if an accident had sent a dragon carriage tumbling off the cliff, it would not end up like this. As seen, the proper conclusion was that someone had forcibly slammed the dragon carriage into the cliff and stuck it there.

Roswaal: "The very notion of "proper" gets a bit fuzzy here… buuut there's really no one else~"

One would not say just anyone could perform such a feat, but if even a single likely candidate came to mind, it would not be wrong to call it within the realm of possibility.

Roughly calculating the angle and line by which the dragon carriage had been hurled into the cliff, Roswaal set his sights across the valley on the mountain road opposite, and headed that way.

And then—

Roswaal: "—Hm."

Kneeling on one knee on the mountain road, he ran his palm over the poorly leveled ground as he pondered.

By Roswaal's estimation, this mountain road was where Serena had cast her magic and, at the same time, where her escort Marcos had rampaged enough to throw a dragon carriage. Nevertheless, there was no sign of anything like that in the surroundings; only the dragon carriage stuck in the cliff stood out, entirely out of place.

It was a deeply puzzling sight, but either the dragon carriage in the cliff or the pristine mountain road was lying.

Roswaal: “And in most cases, lies are used to prettify reality, riiight~”

Convinced of this, Roswaal snapped his fingers high in the middle of the mountain road.

At once, a gust sprang up centered on Roswaal, and it swept down the mountain road in one go. —The next instant, unable to withstand the strong wind, the craftsmen who had adorned reality revealed themselves.

They were—

Roswaal: “—Bugs.”

In Roswaal’s field of view, what the wind had torn up and flung aside were innumerable winged insects with their wings folded. By camouflaging the surfaces of their wings as scenery and clustering together, the winged insects had fabricated a “pristine mountain road”.

However, once the trick was exposed and the deception beneath became visible, what lay bare were cracks in the ground, a crumbled cliff, and the randomly tidied corpses of the dead—

Roswaal: “—Oh.”

In that split second, something grazed Roswaal’s navy-blue long hair and shot past right beside him.

Whipping his head around, Roswaal grasped that this had been a shot aimed at him from afar. —The moment he saw that the place where Marcos had hurled the dragon carriage and the place where the actual fighting had taken place were far apart, he had already been on guard for the presence of a sniper who required long-distance throws of super-heavy masses from Marcos.

For that reason, he had donned a suit of wind as armor beforehand, prepared for a surprise attack. Thanks to it, he avoided a clean hit, but the fact that the wind's protection had nearly been pierced at the last instant was power beyond his expectations.

Roswaal: "No wonder Marcos had trouble."

If the foe had been ordinary, there would have been no reason Marcos's physical prowess could not have repelled them. If the enemy were grunts, Marcos would easily have subdued a thousand, two thousand.

Therefore, this was a dire strait—namely, an elite. —All things are moved by those who stand far above the rest.

And Roswaal did not think Marcos so poor a fighter as to fall behind an opponent who only shot from far away. —Thus, when different bugs that had been plastered to the ground for the sake of a surprise attack rushed him next, he, without any preliminary motion, rose into the air and slipped past their ambush with ease.

Roswaal: "If it's not a Meteor that manipulates insects, then it's the work of the Insect Cage Tribe. I don't like needless killing, buuut we're short on time, so I'll have to follow the order of priorities."

Saying that, Roswaal held his hand over the swarming, saw-blade-like bugs massed at his feet—and the flames he unleashed burned them away along with the swarm.

Listening to the grating death-cries of insects, Roswaal turned his other hand to the open air and spread the conflagration to the winged insects that had been fabricating the mountain road as well. If the enemy belonged to the Insect Cage Tribe that manipulated bugs, then to assume these were mere non-combat decoys used for camouflage would be to stop thinking.

He would not stop thinking. On top of that—

Roswaal: "—Kh."

Suddenly, an impact burst through the curtain of flame and struck Roswaal.

It was the enemy's second shot—after the first had been stopped by the wind armor, they immediately responded by using an arrow projectile with increased penetration. —However, Roswaal did not fall short when it came to adaptability either.

The impact had been drawn into the center of his chest, but it had not penetrated Roswaal's body. He had judged that, with this opponent, they would soon counter the wind armor, and had prepared a stone breastplate beneath.

Roswaal: "Riiight there~"

The instant the second attack struck, Roswaal, inverted midair, grasped the general position of the sniper and brought his hand down toward it. —Immediately, over the valley, in the area where the sniper was likely to be hiding, masses of flame came pouring down all at once.

To strike an enemy whose position had been fixed, after blocking the opening salvo with wind armor, he had quietly prepared fireballs above the clouds. With nowhere to run, the carpet bombing would incinerate the foe.

Roswaal: "Putting maximum firepower into your opener is the basis of combat."

Before the opponent could gather information, annihilating them with overwhelming firepower was the surefire method for a magician.

In that regard, Roswaal had been drilled mercilessly by his master. Of course, depending on the situation, he would choose tactics other than that, but as things stood there was no reason to gainsay that teaching.

He had burned away the bugs and scorched the sniper. Next, he would presumably rendezvous with Marcos and the others who must have fled into the forest—that was the moment.

Roswaal: “—Tch, I slipped up.”

Feeling a sharp blow bite into his left shoulder, Roswaal realized his mistake.

Was it the sniper’s last show of grit, bathed as they were in the falling flames? The next shot they loosed did not aim straight at Roswaal; instead, they added a little twist to their aim.

Correcting at once for the fact that a frontal strike had been blocked, the enemy attacked Roswaal’s back—in other words, they pulled off a trick shot by ricocheting it off a third kind of bug that had appeared in the sky, one bearing a carapace on its back.

Thanks to the wind armor, the round was deflected. Even so, it was no mere graze one could laugh off.

Roswaal: “…Their allies will arrive soon. I can’t loooinger here~”

Pressing a hand to the gouged back of his left shoulder, Roswaal decided to withdraw from the spot.

It was a deep wound that needed tending, but if he lingered, he would invite enemy reinforcements. That would be fatal here. Roswaal immediately lowered the altitude of his flight spell and descended toward the forest at the foot of the mountain road’s cliff.

He considered returning to the Royal Capital to report once, but even the sniper alone was an elite among elites.

If he retreated with his safety in mind, Serena would, in all likelihood, be killed, and the countdown to war might begin. That was not what he wished—

Roswaal: “—?”

For an instant he felt his head swim, and the control of Roswaal’s flight spell faltered.

Surprised by what his body had done, Roswaal clutched his wounded shoulder tight. The blood from the wound had not stopped, but the amount was not enough to cloud his consciousness.

Nor had he trained so halfheartedly that pain of this degree would disrupt his control over magic.

And yet, the flying Roswaal was losing stability—

Roswaal: “—Poison.”

Realizing it too late, Roswaal ground his molars.

There was poison smeared on the sniper’s projectile. The enemy was, in all likelihood, of the Insect Cage Tribe, so the poison was probably insect-derived, making its properties hard to ascertain.

From the feel of it, it did not seem the sort to kill instantly, but this was bad.

Roswaal: “I can’t knit my mana properly…”

Breath ragged, Roswaal’s altitude suddenly plunged.

Now on a trajectory little different from gliding, colliding with the branches and boughs of the forest, Roswaal shielded his face with an arm, curled his body tight, and braced himself for impact with the ground.

If the landing point was soft dirt, fine; if it was bare rock, it would be disastrous. Feeling the ground rush up, Roswaal tensed every muscle—

???: “—Reckless bastard.”

Braced for a crash into the earth, Roswaal was caught by something hard—hard, but somewhat softer than his worst expectation—and greeted by a low voice. Blinking in surprise, he looked up and locked eyes with a boulder—no, with a face like a boulder.

It was—

Roswaal: “Heeey, Marcos. I felt you were in crisis, so I rushed over like thiiiis~”

Marcos: “…That your excuse, when you just dropped outta the sky?

If I hadn't caught you, you'd be a bloodstain on the ground right now."

Roswaal: "Which means we're both supporting each other, riiiight? Friendship is truly a beautiful thing, don't you think? …Oww."

Marcos: "I don't."

Saying something so cold, he let go and dropped Roswaal to the ground. Snorting as he looked down at Roswaal was Marcos, the man they were searching for.

Apparently, he had dashed to the spot where Roswaal was falling out of control to catch him.

Ordinarily, if one reached out for a falling Roswaal with that much momentum, the one catching would not come out unscathed either, but it would be boorish to say that to Marcos.

As Roswaal was feeling relieved to have linked up with Marcos,

Serena: "—Oh? If it isn't Roswaal. Have you, after all, found it hard to part with me? In that case, let us head for the Empire together, and you may become my consort."

With the sound of grass and brush being pushed aside, Serena stepped from between the trees.

Upon finding Roswaal, she flashed a gallant smile; she was imposing, and at a glance it was neither bravado nor did she appear to be wounded.

That, it seemed, was where Marcos had staked his pride as a knight and protected her to the last.

Roswaal: "I must refuse the marriage proposal. Buuut, I am very glad my new friend is safe. Are you two the only ones alive?"

Marcos: "No, the Werewolf we were escorting and a Royal Guard squad leader are with us. Neither is easy to count as fighting strength, though… Oh—better keep an eye on Alagar so he doesn't run."

Serena: "—. I could not care less how you evaluate Heinkel. As for the opinion that he's useless, I agree."

At Serena's reply, Marcos answered with a look that said he had a lot of thoughts about it.

At their exchange, Roswaal, for the moment, patted his chest in relief that the worst possibility—failing to make it in time—had been avoided.

Now, without despairing, they needed to probe for a way to escape this situation—

Serena: "Right. Roswaal, the spell you taught me came in handy. No matter the circumstance, when what you've learned comes alive, it's exhilarating. Hm?"

For a heartbeat, Roswaal drew in a breath at Serena's beaming words—then let out a laugh.

He agreed wholeheartedly and thought she was exactly right—but—

Roswaal: "There's a limit to how out of place you can be. —Honestly, you're such a friend worth saving, you knooow∼"

10

Serena: "—I see. If it's true that you took down that sniper, then there are two elites left on the enemy's side, are there not?"

Roswaal: "Ah, that should be the caseee. If they also took Marcos's parting gift, it's hard to imagine they dodged all of my flames. … Ow, ow—could you dress it a little more gently?"

Marcos: "Don't start whining after you put yourself out on the front line."

So saying, Marcos, who had dressed the wound in Roswaal's left shoulder, gave him a smack on the back.

At the utter lack of mercy in that palm, Roswaal let out a "gr…h" in his throat and glared at Marcos resentfully. To take risks to come save him and even suffer an honorable wound, and receive this attitude—this friend was, indeed, one with little worth saving.

Roswaal: “For how frankly she gives thanks, Serena outranks you as a friend even though it’s been but a short while.”

Serena: “From what I’m seeing, the two of you seem to have quite the easy rapport yourselves. And as I’ve said more than once, I also have the ulterior motive of taking you as my consort.”

Roswaal: “To be so incorrigible in this situation… this isn’t merely about having nerves of steeel.”

Arms folded, Serena gave a sly grin, to which Roswaal could only wryly smile.

She truly had some guts. It was hard to think of her as a tragic princess whose life was being targeted. —Having finished exchanging information, Roswaal was newly impressed by Serena’s strength.

In practice, her quick thinking had let her escape the assassins’ surprise attack in that moment of peril, and then, by casting magic, she had alerted Roswaal as well—her resourcefulness was outstanding. One might almost feel sorry for the attackers when Serena was playing so many best moves.

Even so, the situation was one in which it was eat or be eaten. They also had an aim of preventing the outbreak of war. Mercy and pity should be reserved until the time came to hang them over the enemy’s gravestones.

Russell: “—I understand the circumstances. However, even hearing them makes me want to frown.”

Thus said Russell, rubbing the space between his brows with a finger from within the small hand mirror.

At present, by means of a pair of mirrors through which one could converse—the “Conversation Mirrors”—Roswaal’s group was linked with Russell, who had remained in the Royal Capital. Having him participate in the exchange of information with Serena and the others meant the situation on their side had been shared in full.

Hence, it was only natural that Russell would want to knead out the furrow in his brow.

Roswaal: “To add one more thing, the condition of the wound the sniper dealt me is not good. It seems they smeared poison on it, and I’m experiencing malfunctions when using magic.”

Russell: “…Even worse. Are you likely to die?”

Roswaal: “Even if it’s a lethal poison, it’s likely a slow-acting oneee. With proper treatment, the prospects of survival are high. However, to administer proper treatment…”

Marcos: “We’ll have to wring out of that lot what poison it is.”

In a heavy tone, Marcos solemnly picked up Roswaal’s conclusion. It was, however, a mildly surprising statement—after all, the one who had suffered from the poison was Roswaal.

Roswaal: “From your standpoint, your top priority should be Serena’s safety, should it not? I didn’t think you’d concern yourself with me, the one who got poisoneddd.”

Marcos: “—. Unfortunately, it’s not someone else’s problem.”

At Marcos’s answer, his cheek twisted, Roswaal knit his brows. Then Marcos raised his arm and, from the gap in his armor at his left side, showed a blood-seeping wound. Roswaal could not see his own left-shoulder wound clearly either, but the bluish-black discoloration looked the same.

Marcos: “I’ve got this prickly feeling in my fingertips. I thought it might just be in my head, but…”

Roswaal: “I understated it, but I very much feel I’ve been dosed with a rather dangerous poison; size difference or not, the way your body is built is truly monster-class.”

Marcos: “Maybe you’re just freakishly frail.”

Russell: “I’m not taking Roswaal’s side, but given the nature of assassins, using a poison that has no effect would be meaningless. The odd one out is Sir Marcos.”

With Russell’s assistance, the weight of reason in this scene tilted toward Roswaal. That said, receiving only a single click of Marcos’s tongue as recompense was far from the sweet wine of victory.

Comparing the wounds of Roswaal and Marcos in turn, Serena closed one eye and said,

Serena: “So there are two victims of the poison. From what I’ve just heard, this doesn’t sound like something that can be overcome by sheer grit. In that case—how do we bring down the assassins?”

Before the two self-reported victims, Serena sought opinions on a countermeasure. But to her words, “A moment, please,” came Russell’s interjection from beyond the mirror.

Russell: “As I said earlier, the top priority is the life of Special Envoy Dracroy. All the more so if Roswaal and Sir Marcos have but little time left because of the poison. You must not misjudge your priorities.”

Marcos: “You sure know how to say we’ve got little time left.”

Roswaal: “Truly, you’re a friend with so little worth saving, aren’t youuu.”

Russell: “Sharp tongues you may have, but a Roswaal who cannot use magic and a Sir Marcos who cannot put in strength are good for nothing but alleviating boredom. If it’s that role, I can fulfill it even through the mirror.”

Serena: “So you’re telling us to abandon the two and go? An amusing opinion, that.”

With a small snort and a wry smile, Serena continued, “However,” and then said,

Serena: “Russell Fellow, I understand your point. I would like to think I am not so foolish I don’t grasp the impact my life has on those around me. —On top of that, leaving behind two people being eaten away by poison is not an option for me."

Russell: "…May I ask your reason?"

Serena: "It's simple. If I return home without knowing who orchestrated this situation, I will meet an end no different from being poisoned again."

To Russell's cold, clear-cut point, Serena replied with a resolute air. Receiving that, Russell on the other side of the mirror narrowed his eyes, and Roswaal closed one of his as well.

"Poison"—thus did Serena speak of the dire straits to which she had been driven.

Whether poison had actually been administered was not the issue. In her view, a situation in which poison could be administered at any time was already tantamount to having been poisoned. And that was an absolute iron-blooded law in the Vollachian Empire, a nation of survival of the fittest.

Serena: "Besides, not to put too fine a point on it, but I don't think I'll shake pursuit with just myself and a single chatty mirror after abandoning the two. Even if you say you can't use magic and you can't put strength into it, surely you're not going to whine that you're completely useless, are you?"

Roswaal: "…Weeell, I'm at about half of peacetime capacity."

At Serena's provocative gaze, Roswaal answered while checking the state of his body. Then, casting a glance at Marcos, he, too, let out a deep sigh.

Marcos: "I can still move a bit more than that. That said, with those kinds of elites as our opponents, we can't be optimistic."

Russell: "…Even so, we have no choice but to have you win. We are also petitioning the Royal Guard to dispatch reinforcements from our side, but there are not many with your level of prowess."

Roswaal: "In that case, Marcos will have to get promoted quickly, and we'll need to hurry the raising of the knights' baseline strength."

Marcos: "Big mouths, the both of you."

Marcos snorted, tersely pushing away the opinions of Roswaal and Russell.

At any rate, Serena's resolve was firm. Russell abandoned the passive plan dressed up as "rational," and withdrew his objection in favor of the policy of actively sweeping aside the sparks flying at them.

In truth, Serena's thinking was correct. What must be won cannot be won without fighting. —If the one whose station most demands valuing her life would meet them halfway, then Roswaal and the others could only answer in kind.

Roswaal: "Not least because I can't very well die in a place like this myselff."

For the sake of the grand objective he envisioned, for the plan he had long spent time preparing, Roswaal could not gallantly throw away his life for his homeland here.

Roswaal: "Russell, we'll do everything we can on our end. I'm counting on you on yours as well."

Russell: "I will do my utmost. I always do."

Nodding at the reply of his reliable friend beyond the mirror, Roswaal tucked the Conversation Mirror into his breast and slowly looked around at Marcos's and Serena's faces.

And then—

Roswaal: "All right, then—let's work hard so that every last one of us makes it out alive."

11

Alagar felt a deep sympathy for the red-haired knight pointing a sword at him.

Heinkel Astrea—of the Astrea family line, that “Sword Saint” household; a man who had, for a father and a mother respectively, the “Sword Demon” and the “Sword Saint,” one of a bloodline inheriting legend from generation to generation. He was born to what seemed a guaranteed glorious future, yet for all that, he was a man who gave off a scent of ill fortune.

Even his fellow knights treated him offhandedly; even to Alagar, with the troublesome birth of a Werewolf, he looked like he was living as if gasping for air. Of course, if Alagar said such sympathetic things out loud, he would only anger the man, who lacked composure and leisure, and it would turn into a bother, so he did not.

In any case—

Heinkel: “D-Don’t move. If you try anything funny, you won’t live.”

Alagar: “…Told that crazy woman the same thing, didn’t I. I’m not gonna try anything funny.”

Heinkel: “Don’t talk! You Werewolves have a reputation for slyly tricking people. Even if you act meek, no one can tell what you’re thinking deep down.”

Alagar: “You’re the one who started talking to me.”

Not incoherent, but far too emotionally unstable. That said, considering Heinkel’s situation, this lack of composure was understandable.

There was a nonzero chance the enemy’s target was Alagar, and yet the two of them had been left alone in the forest.

While keeping watch on their surroundings, Heinkel had seen something in the forest sky. Serena and Marcos had gone to check it, but it was highly likely they were using that as a pretext to talk about something they did not want him to hear. The more time that passed like that, the worse Heinkel’s complexion grew.

Rising anxiety and tension—the nature of that impatience was obvious.

Alagar: “You’re suspecting you’ve been abandoned and left behind, aren’t you?”

Heinkel: “—Shut up!”

Alagar: “Shut me up all you like, it won’t change the facts—and it’d be a pain if you blew up at me while I kept quiet. If they were gonna abandon you, they’d use you as a decoy in a way that’s a lot easier to understand, so don’t worry.”

Heinkel: “Don’t talk like you know…”

Alagar: “I do know. Want me to teach you how hard life is for wolfmen and Werewolves?”

At Alagar’s low voice, the on-the-verge-of-exploding Heinkel choked on his words.

This red-haired knight with such imagination seemed to have let his thoughts run with Alagar’s last remark. How awful that imagining had been, Alagar did not know, but even so it was probably still soft.

That was the fate of Alagar’s kind, cursed from the moment they were born into this world.

Alagar: “Compared to getting poked with a sword and forced to be a decoy, being left behind is nothing. If anything, that can even be called kind.”

Heinkel: “Being abandoned is… kind?”

Alagar: “Being used is a loss of freedom, but if you’re abandoned, what comes after is freedom. No matter how bad the situation, no matter how short the time, freedom has value, doesn’t it.”

He had seen his kin, their fangs and claws sealed, die like bundles of straw, in the blink of an eye, time and again. Alagar’s parents and siblings had died to no purpose, unable to hope for anything in the end.

Compared to that, even if he were thrown onto a battlefield where death was the only outcome, the fact that he could wield his own strength for his own sake made it a far better way to live and die.

However, in response to Alagar's words, there came a small, dry popping sound.

Heinkel: "…I disagree. I don't think being abandoned is kind."

He spat the words like something vile—and actually spat something from his mouth.

Catching the faint smell of blood and seeing it was a shard from a broken tooth, Alagar understood that Heinkel had clenched so hard he had cracked a molar.

Apparently, Alagar had stepped on some unbearable sore spot of Heinkel's.

Even that, from Alagar's point of view, still felt like a coddled hell—but—

Alagar: "—Comparing hells only makes things emptier, doesn't it."

Licking wounds by comparing the abundance of misfortune. That sort of thing wasn't something you could do without alcohol.

With that sentiment, Alagar sighed—and noticed. —That the smell of people was drawing near.

Serena: "You seem to have been good children. I've come back with a souvenir."

So saying, with a smile-tinged joke, Serena returned.

She would have been the youngest of them—no, that premise might have been wrong. For Serena had come back with Marcos, and with another boy they did not know.

Heinkel: "Special Envoy! That man… is he one of the enemy?!"

Seeing the boy, Heinkel, who had relaxed for an instant at Serena and the others' return, had his voice crack. At once, Marcos snorted "Hn," as if to mock him.

Marcos: "Don't bark at everything that moves. First of all, you think I'd have trouble with a flimsy runt like this?"

Roswaal: "My, you do say things, don't youuu~ And while it's true I suffered a stinging defeat in our first bout, I'd say I put up quite a good fight in the rematch afterward, wouldn't you?"

Marcos: "Don't make this more complicated than it is. —This is the Margrave Mathers. Seems he rushed here to help. He's the one who saw you cross the sky."

Heinkel: "M-Margrave?! My apologies…!"

At the boy—at the person introduced as the Margrave—hunching his slender shoulders, Heinkel went pale yet again and went down on one knee. The Margrave waved a hand "no, no" to the kneeling Heinkel with a friendly smile, then turned his heterochromatic gaze this way.

There was something about that look that made one ill at ease, and the depths of Alagar's belly crawled.

Roswaal: "You're the Werewolf in question, are you. I've heard about the deal with Serena. Can I expect things from you as welllll?"

Alagar: "—. If you can trust a Werewolf, sure. But if you ask me, the very moment you've gotten to the option of borrowing a Werewolf's hand, the odds of defeat are already heavy."

Roswaal: "Ha-Ha, well said. It may be hard to call that a cooperative stance… but regardless of whether your character is trustworthy, surely we can trust your desire to survive, can't we?"

Nodding at his snarl, the Margrave wore a crafty smile beyond his years.

Seeing that smile—which chilled the viewer to the bone—Alagar felt, toward him, a wariness he had not felt toward Serena or Marcos, and certainly not toward Heinkel.

It was a warning that this youthful Margrave was the one who most instinctively stirred a sense of crisis.

Be that as it may—

Heinkel: “You’re not going to run—you’re going to meet them head-on?! Are you serious?!”

Roswaal: “Serious as serious can be. They’re the ones who laid an ambush. They’ve surely grasped the surrounding terrain and prepared their methods of pursuit. There’s little chance we win if it turns into a chase.”

Heinkel: “But Marcos lost. If we go at them head-on as well…”

Marcos: “Didn’t lose. The Margrave here cut our pursuers by one. When there were three, their coordination pushed us back, but with two, the situation changes. We’ve got allies, too. Not you.”

Heinkel: “I-I know that without you saying it!”

Marcos: “Don’t know it.”

Hearing the policy and plan Serena and the others had brought back, Heinkel’s agitation grew intense. But listening at his side, Alagar agreed with Heinkel.

If all you considered was survival, the best plan was Serena making for the fort with the others as decoys. And yet, smiling at that perfectly natural line of thought, Serena said this:

Serena: “If I let them have their way and don’t repay it, even if my life isn’t taken, I die. —If I show my pride, then even if I am killed, I will not die.”

Alagar: “…”

At Serena’s imposing answer, Alagar clenched his molars and fell silent.

—Because he was made to think, anew, that she was a woman who was hideous, hideous, hideous, one who made his skin crawl.

12

In the depths of the forest, the poor footing and worse visibility served only to benefit an opponent launching an ambush.

To break through such adverse conditions, Roswaal's scheme was bold—and ridiculous.

Roswaal: "I rained fireballs down on the battlefield. The enemy has surely already realized that there was reinforcements—me. Which is to say, it's only a matter of time before full-fledged reinforcements arrive… Not just us; the poison has begun to creep through them as well. —Neither side can take long."

Marcos: "So you're saying it's fine to advertise our location out in the open?"

Roswaal: "A short, decisive battle is exactly what they want, toooo. They've already cornered us once and know they're superior in raw ability… there's no reason they wouldn't take the bait, is there?"

Marcos: "…Fine. I'll take that provocation."

Implicitly reminded that they had once been driven to the brink, Marcos twisted his cheek and nodded.

In fact, Marcos agreed with Roswaal's read. The enemy wanted to finish them as quickly as possible. If there was one more push to be had toward that end, they would take it without flinching.

Therefore—

Oulouzo: "Hey, hey, hey—honestly, honestly, what outrageous things you lot have gone and done!"

Bellowing thus, the man wreathed in a silver tail—Oulouzo—burst in just as Marcos finished brute-forcing the battlefield into shape.

If one looked down on this forest from above now, there would surely be a bald patch yawning open. Across this whole stretch—precious great trees that looked a hundred years old or more included—Marcos had ripped them up with his arms, mowed them down, and flattened the ground.

Oulouzo: “You spared us the trouble of searching, but, my, my, what recklessness!”

Jimrack: “You did this alone. Frightening.”

At the forcibly cleared woodland, Oulouzo let out a shrill cackle, and from behind him, Jimrack bared a narrow sliver of emotion: surprise.

To the words of the two assassins—a small Weaponkin and a gigantic Steelman—Marcos nodded with an “Yeah.”

Marcos: “I did it. Seeing as the other guy was just watching and being useless.”

Roswaal: ““Useless,” is it. I bring the brains and you bring the brawn—sounds like nothing more than the right tool for the right job, doesn’t it~?—And besides, where I’m useful starts now.”

Trading barbs, Roswaal—who had been using a felled tree as a chair—stood. When he lined up beside Marcos, the two-versus-two tableau was complete—just as planned.

“…”

Glaring steadily at their foes, Marcos kept the man at his side, Roswaal, in mind.

It was both impressive and exasperating, but things had unfolded exactly as Roswaal had laid out.

The needlessly ostentatious tree-felling to make a battlefield hadn’t just been to keep the enemy from choosing terrain in their favor; there was one more aim—to verify that the sniper’s elimination was certain.

Roswaal: “We made such a show of our position and removed the forest that served as cover, root and branch. Had the sniper been alive, Marcos's back would've been the perfect target to shoot. Which means…"

Marcos: "We assume the sniper's down—eighty percent odds that's the case."

Roswaal: "Splendid, splendid."

Finding the attitude obnoxious, Marcos nonetheless kept a tight rein on himself: he did not discard the possibility that the enemy had simply not taken the obvious bait, and he would not let his guard down.

The enemy was right there; he would turn this pent-up frustration that way.

Roswaal: "Just to confirm—do you intend to talk about the mastermind and their aims?"

Oulouzo: "A question indeed! And why, why would we be the ones to speak? We might deceive, but we would not disclose! It won't change what either of us has to do!"

Roswaal: "Good vibes, tight lips. Looks like you're properly the enemy."

Whether their target had been Serena's life or Alagar's release remained unknown. Roswaal had not expected much from asking; Marcos answered the shrug with one of his own.

There was just one point on which they agreed with their foes—whatever it was, what they had to do did not change.

Jimrack: "No time. For you. For us."

Oulouzo: "Indeed, indeed! That's why we leaped at this clear invitation! Your goal and ours align. Let's do this in a way that's easy to grasp—easy to grasp!"

The "poison"—as Roswaal called it—was infecting everyone present at the same time.

If time's passage would eat away at things like lives and fates, then neither side should drag this out. Above all, Marcos's patience was nearing its limit.

Outmaneuvered in the first bout, taunted as a "loser dog" by Roswaal, his fighting spirit was erupting.

Roswaal: "I didn't say "loser dog" per seee~"

Marcos: "Shut it."

Cutting off Roswaal's excuse in a single, curt line, he faced the enemy.

And then—

Marcos: "—I'll beat you senseless."

Roswaal: "—Come at meee~"

In an instant, triggered by a line from Marcos and one from Roswaal, hostilities broke out.

"…"

The first to move was the Steelman, Jimrack.

That demi-human of a gigantic frame and super-heavy mass, belying his ponderous-looking exterior, flicked up his foot with agility—and then he sent the Oulouzo beside him rocketing toward them with a tremendous kick.

Oulouzo: "Ha-Ha-ha! First, first, a little warm-up!"

Hurtling through the air, Oulouzo began to spin. —Wrapping his silver tail about himself lengthwise, he became a silver disk of slaughter whose edge could shear even a greatsword.

In response, they—

Roswaal: "A "warm-up" would be too lax. I intend to finish this right awayyy."

Oulouzo: “Nu-Nuh?!”

The instant Roswaal snapped his fingers, the leveled forest floor heaved, and pillars of earth surged up with tremendous force, clamping down on the oncoming silver disk from both sides.

Oulouzo: “A trifle, a trifle!!”

Even in the abnormal situation of being pinched midair by the earth itself, Oulouzo forced a breakthrough by accelerating his spin further and grinding down the earthen pillars.

At which point—

Marcos: “You broke my sword—and you’ll pay for it!”

With a powerful step, Marcos swung the great tree he held with all his might and smashed a ferocious horizontal blow into Oulouzo.

The Weaponkin—demi-humans who wield parts of their own bodies as weapons, a rare race alongside the Steelmen.

Oulouzo’s silver tail was the very mark of the Weaponkin; each such person was born with armaments to rival a master craftsman’s blade—a point of pride for the race. Even so, that fearsome disk of slaughter had a weakness. Against a vertically spinning attack, a strike from directly side-on could not be swallowed up.

Oulouzo: “—Gahf!”

Clobbered by the great tree, Oulouzo let out a strangled cry and was blasted away at the speed of a cannonball. He plowed into the trees beyond the leveled ground, and the silver disk vanished even from the edge of sight.

It looked like a child’s game of whacking a stone with a stick, but the force and momentum were on an entirely different scale. And letting that spectacle hold one’s gaze could be fatal.

Jimrack: “Oul—”

Jimrack: “Gwoar.”

The latter half of his partner's name was burned away by the flames that engulfed Jimrack's head.

Wreathed in fire across his gigantic frame, Jimrack thrashed and crashed over with a roar. And, eyes still fixed on Jimrack, Roswaal —who had done it with flawless execution—said,

Roswaal: "Marcos, as arranged."

Marcos: "Don't mess it up."

With that exchange, Marcos went after Oulouzo, whom he had hammered into the forest.

Steelman and Weaponkin: after analyzing the pursuers' traits, Marcos and Roswaal had decided to split their foes up this way. Not strength against strength and technique against technique, but strength against technique and technique against strength.

If they both made full use of their strengths, there was no reason for Marcos to lose. —As for Roswaal, Marcos trusted his strength, too: he would not lose.

Therefore—

Marcos did not do anything so foolish as to follow Oulouzo into the trees. To make full use of the battlefield he had prepared, Marcos chose to attack by hurling projectiles. Not pebbles, mind you, but earthen spears that Roswaal had fashioned—

Marcos: "Eat this!"

The spears he'd had made were each as thick as a child's torso, and hurled from Marcos's hand, their force was enough to shatter the walls of a middling fort in just a few shots.

And, thanks to Roswaal's largesse, ten, twenty of them went flying toward Oulouzo.

"OOOOOH—!!"

Shockwaves gouged the earth, blew away trees, and reshaped the forest.

From what he'd seen in the first clash and now the second, Oulouzo's silver tail had terrifying destructive power, but it required a certain amount of winding-up to unleash it.

So Marcos denied him that, pouring in one-sided attacks from a range where his foe could not reach. This would shave away the enemy's reserves and, if fortune smiled, bring him down—

Marcos: "—What?"

Without stopping, hurling earthen spears, Marcos noticed something amiss.

The forest was being destroyed by the collateral force of his barrage aimed at Oulouzo—but along with that, a distinctly different, brand-new destruction had begun to bloom.

A shrill, grating metallic whine. Homing in on that sound, Marcos sent a spear straight in—and—

Oulouzo: "First off, first off, let me apologize. Sorry for misleading you. And then, and then, let me make sure you don't get the wrong idea. Never, never was I holding back."

His declaration overlapped the crash as the spear was crushed head-on.

With a metal-splitting screech and a spray of dazzling sparks, Oulouzo burst out of the ruined forest—his body, with the silver tail wrapped around it, whirling every which way, become a silver sphere.

Oulouzo: "This, this drains me fast. That's why, that's why, that's why! It's my trump card!"

"—tsk."

The unstoppable silver sphere tore mercilessly through each additional earthen spear.

Every part of the sphere was a keen edge; it had overcome the weakness that had existed when it was a disk, and became a perfect attack form that minced every oncoming menace to bits.

Marcos: “Rrr—OOOAAH!”

To meet it head-on, Marcos, in the instant the last spear shattered, raised his fist. Aiming at the center of the incoming silver sphere, he unleashed a blow with all his might.

Marcos’s fist, which ripped the wind, erased the sound, and reduced whatever it struck to splinters—

“—ッ”

At that very instant, a pain in his side he could not ignore tightened his cheek, and the fist that touched the silver sphere spurted blood —almost simultaneously.

13

—At the very same moment Marcos’s fist burst against Oulouzo’s trump-card silver sphere.

Roswaal: “Well now. Color me impressed—ee.”

Narrowing his heterochromatic eyes at the sight before him, Roswaal let his fighting spirit quietly tremble.

The plan to split the two enemies and meet them each in their area of specialty had been proceeding smoothly. Marcos would overpower the Weaponkin who pressed them with mobility and breakthrough force, using his monster-class strength; Roswaal would elegantly cook the Steelman clad in his innate heavy armor with magic.

It was a strategy where honed skill and mutual trust would seize victory—and in practice, it had been working. —Up until just a moment ago.

Jimrack: “Heard. Me. Magicians… troublesome. Kingdom’s.”

Roswaal: “From where I’m standing, you’re the far more troublesome oneee.”

Answering so, Roswaal gave an exaggerated shrug.

Before him, Jimrack—who spoke in that weighty voice—slowly transformed.

Jimrack’s body had originally seemed made of a dull-hued mineral; that mineral nature shifted, and though the color remained, it turned into a smooth, metallic substance. In chunks, the once-angular outer surface flaked away like scabs, and beneath it a new body emerged.

And that body—was—

Jimrack: “Gwoar.”

A small fireball Roswaal loosed to test it hit Jimrack as if drawn in—only for the next instant, the fireball to reflect off Jimrack’s skin and set some of the trees Marcos had felled alight. Thankfully, it wouldn’t turn into a forest fire, but in every other respect, the wind was against Roswaal.

What the altered Jimrack had acquired was a physique with the property of reflecting magic—mana.

That “gwoar” had been at test spec, but if he reflected not only more of them but ones with greater firepower in that fashion, a large-scale blaze or an accidental friendly hit would be unavoidable.

Roswaal: “…It’s true there are a lot of unknowns when it comes to demi-human traits. But this is a biiit short on reference materials, isn’t it, Master.”

Unable to weave mana to perfection and now facing a Steelman whom magic would not take, Roswaal wetted his lips; feeling the plan collapse and the crisis rising, he opened and closed his fist.

Jimrack: “Dangerous. You—very. Countermeasures, perfect. Me.”

To Roswaal's sense of crisis, the Steelman charged without breaking his mechanical posture.

Even with his body's construction transformed, his agility remained; that mighty, colossal arm rose high—and as Roswaal met it head-on, he, with resolve, wove his magic.

—Unanticipated trial by fire or not, he would break through with the power of the magic to which he had devoted his soul.

14

Serena: "—It's begun."

From far away, the abnormal thunder rolling to her ears served as Serena's notice that battle had been joined.

As planned, Roswaal and Marcos had succeeded in luring the assassins out. It was proof that Marcos's ludicrous, brute-force clear-cutting of the forest had functioned.

Honestly speaking, it was such a ridiculous plan she wanted to see it with her own eyes when put into practice. But this was the role she had decided to carry out even at the cost of that indulgence. Failure was not an option.

Serena: "You made me exercise restraint. Alagar, if you want to live, move your tail."

Alagar: "Talkin' high and mighty, aren't ya…"

Muttering with spite, Alagar turned his head, sniffing with a snuffle.

Even without transforming, a Werewolf's sense of smell was as keen as a Dogman's. Using that overwhelming nose, Alagar had been ordered to search for what they sought.

Alagar was earnestly scenting the air, while on his back the watcher Heinkel had a sword leveled. Though wary of Alagar, he was having his focus shaken by the sounds of fighting reaching them. Each time there was a louder noise, the sword tip wavered, in danger of slicing into Alagar's back.

Serena: "Don't be so tense. Whether you flail or not, when it's time to die, you die."

Heinkel: "D-Don't say something so ill-omened! I-I can't afford to die…"

Serena: "Hm. So you have a reason to survive beyond a simple survival instinct?"

Heinkel: ""Survival instinct"… I have a son. He's only five, and he still can't properly tell right from wrong. My wife is bedridden with illness; without me, my family—"

As Heinkel haltingly laid out his circumstances, Serena closed one eye.

She knew that Heinkel was of the Astrea line, that famed "Sword Saint" house of the Kingdom, but even she had not ranged so far as to know about a wife and child. In any case, hearing that he had such circumstances made even his excessive self-protectiveness understandable.

The presence of family was that great—both as a treasure, and as a shackle.

"…"

As expected of the Astrea house, Heinkel had promise physically as well. He was blessed with a fine build, and even in his posture one could see results befitting someone who had undertaken a certain degree of training.

On the other hand, his mind and body were so imbalanced it was worrisome. Put simply, because Heinkel's heart was brittle, he could not properly wield that body of his.

Marcos's seeming harshness toward Heinkel, Serena felt, also stemmed from that kind of frustration and vexation.

Serena prided herself on being a promising talent scout for the future: whether she wanted Heinkel or not, she itched to do something about talent going to waste—but—

Alagar: "—Oi! Found it!"

Sniffing, Alagar called to Serena and the others in a voice that brimmed with certainty. He jerked his chin lightly, indicating the direction where the target odor lay.

To that result, Serena nodded, "Good work," and said,

Serena: "We go. I hope Roswaal and the others can win according to plan, but depending on what hole cards the enemy has, it wouldn't be strange for it to get flipped on us. In that case, they'll need our help."

Heinkel: "…But—Marcos, losing?"

Serena: "There's no such thing as "impossible." Even if you're the strongest being in the world, this world is one where you can lose your life in the blink of an eye."

Gently chiding Heinkel, who was placing a perilous degree of trust in Marcos's strength, Serena spoke.

A mere few years ago, in Vollachia's great city of Garkla, a former great hero lost his life.

Kurgan of the "Eight Arms," sung of in legend—even such a being could have his life taken by unreasonable calamity in this world. The end of that legend had brought Serena great heartache.

Not that it was the cause, but from then on, Serena had all the less held life as something absolute.

Heinkel: "Even so… Marcos—he's the real—"

Even after hearing Serena's words, Heinkel's trust in Marcos—no, at this point it was close to faith. Heinkel could not let go of that faith.

Prodding his back to get him moving, Serena trusted Alagar's nose and slipped through the forest. Passing through the gaps between the trees and taking to a rock face, before long—

Heinkel: "—Found it!"

Seeing the same thing on the slope as Serena did, Heinkel raised a high voice.

That whole area had been burned clean by Roswaal's flames; the rock face was black and charred. The glimpse of Roswaal's handiwork, who had burned so wide a swath, made her keenly feel the difference between herself—who had paid with a Magic Crystal—and a high-level mage. —What they found was a single charred corpse lying at the end of that mountain road.

One of the attackers' band, the troublesome sniper. —That corpse was what Serena and the others were searching for.

Serena: "Search the baggage for medicine. Keep watch around us."

Leaving those words with Heinkel, Serena ran up to the corpse and quickly examined it.

The body was badly burned, but not to the point that its belongings had been destroyed. If that was the case, then there was a decent chance that an antidote for the poison given to Roswaal and the others—or at least a clue useful for identifying the type of poison—remained. —So she thought, when—

Serena: "—No."

Turning the facedown body over, Serena realized it. This corpse was not the sniper. This was the body of the Imperial soldier who had come to the Kingdom with Serena and should have died on the mountain road—

Serena: "Sir Hein—"

Her hasty call was forcibly cut off by an attack from afar.

Serena: "—gh."

Luring out her prey and shooting them through when they were full of openings—the basic tactics of a hunter. Caught cleanly, the impact that took her in the right breast passed out her back, and Serena toppled over backward.

Heinkel: "…Ah."

Seeing Serena topple helplessly, Heinkel's blue eyes went wide as he froze.

That, too, was a sight a sniper would drool over, and put him at the top of the list for the next victim. Just like that, Heinkel would be the next to fall to the sniper's shot—and then—

Serena: "Hein… kel…!"

Heinkel: "—Special Envoy?!"

Called to by a trembling voice, the frozen Heinkel's face snapped back to life.

Heinkel came running in a flustered, fumbling gait, and Serena, coughing a rough "ehof," grabbed the red-haired knight by the lapels.

Serena: "The mountain road—across. Finish him…!"

Heinkel: "B-But, Special Envoy, your wound—"

Serena: "Go! Heinkel Astrea!"

Heinkel: "…"

Serena: "You're going back to your family, aren't you! Kill the enemy! Fulfill your duty!"

Heinkel, who had tried to talk back, was struck full in the face by Serena's bellow.

Her shout made her bones creak, and her organs screamed. Even so, she did not let any of it show. She would not let anything get in the way of driving Heinkel on, burned by Serena's blazing gaze.

At length, Heinkel, mouth opening and closing, turned with his face slick with cold sweat.

Gripping the sword he had been clutching tight all along, he shifted his hold and—

Heinkel: “O—AaaAAAAHH—!!”

Letting out a voice that flipped high, he charged like a shot onto the mountain road where the enemy lay. His speed—unbelievably fast, as if that hesitance until now had been a lie.

Serena: “See? You can do it… cough”

Seeing that back drawing away, Serena finally allowed her face to twist in pain.

There was no second round from the sniper for Heinkel, who was dashing down the mountain road, nor for her, half-dead. The enemy was fumbling. Likely, they weren’t unscathed either.

If so, there should be enough of a chance, even for the newly spurred Heinkel.

And then—

Alagar: “You think he can handle it alone? He’ll just die.”

Serena: “Which one? Me, left behind with the Werewolf we were transporting? Or the Knight Heinkel, who went to kill a sniper half dead himself?”

Alagar: “…At this rate, both. How’d you cheat death?”

Serena: “How rude. I told you my life is your life as well, didn’t I. You ought to be relieved—glad I’m still alive.”

Alagar: “Big mouth on a crazy woman. —What’d you wrap around your chest?”

Serena: “A gift, from a friend.”

Atop the charred rock face, Alagar stood; to his question, Serena's chest—beneath the torn clothing from the shot—showed her undergarments and, quite different from that, shining silver threads.

It was the silver thread that Roswaal had given her yesterday as a souvenir from the Royal Research Institute of Magic.

If you poured mana into it, it freely changed form; Serena had wound it tightly around her torso. Wound, and willed it to become as hard as possible, the silver thread functioned as a beautiful light cuirass. Its strength was not that great, to be sure; though it had prevented a fatal wound, the penetrating force it had failed to kill might have broken ribs and ruptured organs.

Serena: "Only… the side benefit was a big one."

Barely breathing, she said that, and looked at the arrow wound. There, the projectile the sniper had used had been caught up in the silver thread and was wriggling, squirming.

By that means, they succeeded in identifying the true nature of the poison that had struck Roswaal and Marcos.

Its true nature—was—

Serena: "—Do you hear me, Roswaal."

Struggling in her fallen posture, she fumbled in her breast and brought to her lips the feel that had caught on her finger—the broken shard of the "Conversation Mirror" that Roswaal had brought.

When a "Conversation Mirror" is broken, its mirror face becomes a new pair and changes its connection. The link with Russell in the Royal Capital was severed; the mirror now paired the Serena detachment with Roswaal's main force.

And to that fragment of mirror, Serena proclaimed:

Serena: "—The poison's true nature is insects. They're nesting inside your bodies."

Serena: "—The poison's true nature is insects. They're nesting inside your bodies."

This information was worth its weight in gold, and it arrived just after Roswaal had had every spell of the six attributes reflected by Jimrack, bringing about a vivid, catastrophic ruin of the forest's ecosystem.

The poison's true nature, delivered through the mirror—the voice telling it, Serena's, was one holding back pain; it was a moment that made one worry something had happened to her—but—

Roswaal: "You wouldn't want that kind of concern voiced, would youuu."

Though they had only known each other a short time, he respected the ferocity of her way of being; Roswaal swallowed the unneeded words of solicitude, and poured his all into seizing the victory she would desire.

Marcos, for his part, also seemed to be struggling against the enemy's hole card as Roswaal was. He had not fallen, but his white knight's uniform was dyed with blood here and there, a wretched sight. With the poison's progress helping matters along, the mere fact that he could fight at all with that level of bleeding made him monstrous enough.

In that case, they might as well make him a "monster" in both name and deed.

Roswaal: "—Marcos!"

Marcos: "—!!"

At Roswaal's sharp call, Marcos responded without looking back.

Marcos swung his leg up high, very high—and brought it down. —In an instant, there came a quake so great it could make one think the whole Kingdom had shaken, and fissures tens of meters long opened in the forest floor. The tremendous impact hurled even Oulouzo, in his silver-sphere form, far away.

And where he was thrown—there was Jimrack. For a moment, it seemed Oulouzo's silver sphere would smash Jimrack's formidable defenses—

Oulouzo: "No way, no way, are you aiming for friendly fire? If so, that's far too sweet—far too sweet!"

Jimrack: "Won't happen. Not like that. We—close."

That hope of friendly fire was shattered by the steel giant who caught the silver sphere with ease.

In fact, they had not failed to consider a plan to pierce a sturdy shield with a powerful spear, but seeing the result, they knew they had done well to discard it—it was far too slender a thread to rely on.

Therefore, their real trump was something even more unrealistic—and yet eminently practical.

Roswaal: "It'll feel so bad you could die, but pleaaase don't die."

Marcos: "That depends on how hard you twist the knob. Get on with it."

While Jimrack and Oulouzo rejoined, Roswaal and Marcos regrouped as well. Then Roswaal moved behind Marcos and pressed his hand to that burly back.

Beneath that armor of thick muscle, the insects the sniper had shot in were doing their mischief.

Most likely, they were the kind that parasitized their target's Gate and devoured its mana. For both magicians and Flow Method users, it was a loathsome tactic of the Insect Cage Tribe—a natural enemy.

But if it was insects and not poison—if it called for insecticide and not antidote—there was a countermeasure.

Roswaal: "—El Goa."

He chanted, altered mana, interfered with the world, and manifested the desired phenomenon to accomplish his aim—and the resulting hellfire mercilessly swallowed Marcos's entire body.

Oulouzo: "What, what, whaaat?!"

Jimrack: "Burned… ally. Frightening… flames."

It was a sudden development, and the two enemies were the ones who wavered. Roswaal had abruptly started to burn his own ally; it was only natural to be shocked—no surprise if they doubted his sanity.

However, this was neither madness nor suicidal folly.

Roswaal: "On the contrary. —It's the best move to wiiin."

The very instant Roswaal declared as much—a tremendous gale rose, and a blow fired with shell-like speed and force rammed into Jimrack's torso.

Jimrack: "G…ugh…"

The strike was so powerful that the shock driven in one side burst out Jimrack's back.

On both the impact point and the point where it burst out, a spiderweb of cracks spread across that dull-colored hard skin, and the Steelman's gigantic body toppled forward, helpless.

Even so, Jimrack, with that sudden blow upon him, had shielded his partner, flinging him sideways.

And then—

Jimrack: "R…un, Ou… louzo…"

A huge hand seized Jimrack's head as he spoke to his partner—and the "Boulder" smashed it.

Again and again and again, the Steelman's head was mushed and buckled; again and again and again until it lost all original shape, the “Boulder” punched that face—punched and punched and punched and punched and punched and punched and punched—.

Oulouzo: “S-Stop, stop, stooop!”

Oulouzo swung his silver tail and struck the arm holding Jimrack’s head. It gouged out a great portion of the “Boulder’s” arm, but did not go so far as to sever it. On the contrary, the gouged portion immediately reconstituted as if filled in, plunging Oulouzo into despair at his inability to save his partner.

And so the one-sided violence between the Steelman and the “Boulder” reached its end—

“—o.”

With a ponderous sound, Jimrack, his head crushed in, lay down upon the earth.

The Steelman no longer twitched, and the one who had accomplished it with overwhelming force—the “Boulder”… no, Marcos—looked down at his own hands.

Marcos: “…Oi, what the hell is happening to me.”

Roswaal: “Burning the bugs was the main… no, at this point, burning the bugs might actually be the side benefit.”

Marcos: “That’s no answer. And you didn’t warn me beforehand, either!”

Roswaal: “I did not warn youuu. Even so, I’d like you to feel honored. It’s a stone armor that self-repairs and self-propagates, fueled by your mana. Ordinarily it’s too heavy to achieve usable weight and strength, but a monster like you can handle it.”

Marcos: “Who’re you calling monster, who’re you.”

He might have grumbled so, but the sight of that gigantic frame clad in the helm and armor of the “Boulder” was, to understate it, the very incarnation of a mass of rock—an inhuman figure to give any brat nightmares at a glance. Roswaal’s master, who had branded this a forbidden art incomplete, would surely clap their hands in praise.

Contrary to its original use, the forbidden art—once thought to have no use beyond binding an opponent's movements with rock that self-propagated by devouring mana, or crushing them under its own weight—had been used properly at last.

Truly, to bring forth "Boulder" Marcos Gildark, the forbidden art was complete.

Oulouzo: "Oh, oh, oh, oh—poor Jimrack."

Before Jimrack's corpse, head smashed and beaten to death, Oulouzo wept tears.

Given how coordinated their teamwork had been, Oulouzo and Jimrack—and the Insect Cage sniper—must have had their history, their bonds.

Roswaal: "But we shall have no chance to speak of it over shared drink."

Oulouzo: "—Indeed, indeed."

Watching the demonic aura leak from all over Oulouzo's body as he stood, wiping away a torrent of tears, Roswaal activated the mana within himself, interfered with the insects inside his body, and gave them surplus mana they could not assimilate, forcing self-destruction. —Feeling the insects die and his Gate freed from its constriction, Roswaal was certain he was on the mend.

With this, Roswaal, too, could face the enemy in full condition.

However—

Oulouzo: "…"Silver Tail," Oulouzo Tarask."

Thus naming himself, crouched low and poised, Oulouzo's fighting will was directed toward Marcos, the one who had killed his partner—and any interference from Roswaal would have been boorish in the extreme.

Marcos: "—Marcos Gildark, Royal Guard of the Kingdom of Lugunica."

Receiving Oulouzo's intent, Marcos, too, set himself to take it head-on.

The pause was an instant; the opening of hostilities came right after—and the result, in a heartbeat.

"…"

Straight on, the raging silver sphere charged at Marcos, now become the "Boulder." Marcos, without a hint of play, met it from the front with a fist he unleashed.

It was a primal armament any human could possess—even if not a Weaponkin armored from birth: a pure, unrestrained, unhesitating smash of the fist.

Fist and silver sphere collided head-on; the shock that was born, the balance, lasted but a moment—shattered into the shape of the fist that had driven through it, the silver sphere burst, and Oulouzo's silver tail was torn off at the root.

Oulouzo: "Ha… ha-ha… too splendid—too splendid…!"

Stripped of his innate armament and slammed into the ground, the Weaponkin praised the victor.

Flat on his back, Oulouzo smiled with a twisted cheek, and Marcos—his true face hidden beneath the rock mask of the "Boulder"—tightened his fist once more and raised it.

The loser lauded the victor; from the victor to the loser came not a single word.

Oulouzo: "An ideal—too ideal—a death."

Staring at the falling fist, Oulouzo was satisfied to his very end.

"…"

Quite literally overpowering the two assassins with monstrous arms, Marcos slowly turned back. Meeting him from the front, Roswaal nodded deeply.

Roswaal: “But there’s no excuse to be made—you are an impeccable monster, through and throughhh.”

Marcos: “Shut it. Get this off me, now. I’m boiling in here.”

Still stroking the ever-thickening stone armor with a stony arm, Marcos said as much. To that, Roswaal dipped his chin with a “Indeed,” and looked up at the sky.

That he had done it for the sake of victory was an immovable fact, but a forbidden art was a forbidden art. —How was he to explain it to Marcos, who now wore what had been sealed for a reason?

The tragic fact that the authority to take off that “Boulder” did not belong to Roswaal, the caster.

16

After conveying the poison’s true nature to Roswaal through the mirror, Serena, too, was facing her trial by fire.

She strangled the creepy insect tangled in the silver thread, then moved the thread as-is to compress the wound. Impressed at what a handy thing it was, she slowly raised the body she had been lying down.

And then—

Serena: “Let’s strike a fresh deal. —Reveal who conceived this plan. I won’t do you wrong.”

Fixing her gaze on Alagar’s twin eyes looking down at her, Serena pressed the question head-on.

At Serena’s question, Alagar was struck dumb. But he hastily smothered the agitation racing through his whole body, and at once put on a sardonic face.

Alagar: “You’re gonna jump me like that outta nowhere. What are you even—”

Serena: “Don’t dodge. It’s a waste of time. In this affair, the assassins were far too well prepared. In this case, there are two possibilities—either it didn’t matter which Special Envoy was targeted, so preparations were brief; or the target Envoy had been decided in advance, allowing them to carry out an attack without any loose ends.”

Alagar: “…”

Serena: “If it’s the former, then I’m a fool making a wild guess. But if it’s the latter, you being caught in the Kingdom was also part of the plan. In other words, you’re one of the assassins’ people.”

As she spoke, Serena produced the basis for her deduction—the key to Alagar’s manacles that she had found while searching the charred breast of the Imperial soldier’s corpse used as bait—and smiled.

Naturally, if Alagar was one of the assassins, they would need an inside man to remove those manacles. That insider getting caught up in the first attack and ending up a charred corpse was probably an unfortunate accident.

And just as Serena finished laying out the deduction she had assembled—

Alagar: “You got any idea what the hell you’re saying?”

In a low, growling murmur, Alagar’s scrawny body transformed with an audible creak; his brawny frame swelled, covered over by dark-brown fur, and even the bones of his head reshaped.

A beat later, what stood there was a Werewolf in bestial form with manacles still on—fearsome even so.

Alagar: “If that were true, there’s no way you’d be gettin’ outta this forest alive.”

Breathing a rank breath out of his open maw, Alagar bared his fangs at the badly wounded Serena.

For the moment, it was just the two of them here: him and Serena. Even if he was unreliable, Heinkel had been a deterrent; with him gone, Serena had no means to subdue a bestial Alagar by force.

Therefore, there was only one way for Serena Dracroy to get out of this place.

Serena: "—Throw in with me, Alagar. Galahau Dracroy… my foolish father has no caliber."

Alagar: "Wh—"

Serena: "No doubt the condition he offered was a guarantee of your freedom after my assassination. But do you think a man who, fearing for his own position, plotted his daughter's murder has the mettle to defy His Majesty the Emperor's edict and let a Werewolf live?"

Seeing Alagar's eyes widen, Serena felt both relief and disappointment. —Relief, in that it confirmed her deduction; disappointment, not that her kin was after her life, but in the sloppiness of the plan.

The mastermind was Serena's greatest political enemy—her own father, Galahau Dracroy. That explained everything that had happened thus far. Galahau had refrained from executing Alagar, the captured Werewolf, and let him flee to the Kingdom; he had had his daughter appointed Special Envoy, and selected her as a pitiful sacrifice to open hostilities with the Kingdom.

No doubt, for that father of hers, this counted as using his head—but his lack of discernment of people was fatal.

Serena: "If I can secure certainty, I can drag down a father who toyed with such a worthless scheme. One way or another, that man has no future. Side with me. Unlike my father, I can judge people."

Alagar: "—Tch, how am I supposed to tell that ain't just you beggin' for your life?"

Serena: "Don't be absurd. You should have seen it yourself. How many junctures were there up to now where, had it not been me, you would have died? By that same number, you have hard proof I surpass my father."

Declaring so, Serena seized the opening as Alagar went pale—and stretched out her hand. —Just like that, she slid the key taken from the corpse into the keyhole of Alagar's manacles and turned it.

With a light metallic clink, the heavy manacles came off and fell to the ground. "—ah," Alagar's throat quivered in shock, and Serena smiled at him as he stared down at the hands that had been set free.

It was a ferocious smile befitting a noble of the Vollachian Empire—a "Sword Wolf's" smile.

Serena: "Throw in with me, Alagar. That is your path to survival—and the choice you must make to truly win your freedom."

17

Heinkel: "—Gah."

Shot through by a jolt he'd lost count of, Heinkel's throat let out a strangled groan.

Told by the wounded Serena to rush out and finish the hidden sniper, Heinkel had charged forward—but the speed of his headlong dash dulled, and his head filled up with its usual whining.

A desire to abandon Serena and the others and bolt at full speed welled up—but—

Heinkel: "No, no, this is poison. It's bad."

Having taken the same projectiles as Marcos and Roswaal, Heinkel was already being eaten away by the same poison as they were. So was Serena. Getting an antidote was an absolute must. If they failed at that, they wouldn't make it home alive. —He wouldn't be able to slink back home with his tail between his legs.

Heinkel: "U-oooh—!!"

The surge of emotion from Serena telling him to return to his family revived, and his running speed came back.

Shaking off his inner conflict, he ran in a cloud of dust—and straight at Heinkel, from the front, came the next projectile. He could see its trajectory. And yet he couldn't dodge. It would hit. It would hurt. Even so, he ran and ran and ran—and then he found a compound-eyed demi-human, left half his body charred, lying prone and close to death.

"…"

Heinkel locked eyes with innumerable eyes on someone who looked like they might die even if left alone, and his whole body went rigid.

With wounds like those, a single sword stroke from Heinkel would surely finish him. Strike any part of him—strike even the ground at his side—and he looked ready to die from it. His regained speed dulled again.

And that pallid face of Heinkel's was reflected in every one of the sniper's compound eyes—and—

Letting out a pathetic whimper of "hi," Heinkel found the prone sniper pointing his right arm—hollowed like a tube, the muzzle that spat the bolts for sniping—at Heinkel's head.

Thus the next shot from the muzzle would pierce Heinkel's head—at the very last moment.

???: "JIEEEI!!"

In a do-or-die burst, a silver flash of focused spirit sped forth and mercilessly lopped off the sniper's head.

That sword-light was too dazzling; beyond the spouting blood of the demi-human, Heinkel saw a familiar face standing, and his throat quivered.

Heinkel: "—Father."

Before the dumbstruck Heinkel's eyes stood a man with the hem of the Royal Guard's white uniform fluttering—the captain of Lugunica's knights, the swordmaster known by the epithet "Sword Demon," and none other than Heinkel's own father, Wilhelm van Astrea.

At the entry of Wilhelm, who should not have been there, Heinkel's eyes flew wide open in stunned fixation. But Wilhelm himself flicked the blood from his sword and, without so much as turning around,

Wilhelm: "I heard the situation from someone of House Fellow. The Imperial Special Envoy?"

Heinkel: "Eh, ah… o-over on that mountain road. Only… she was shot by that one, just now…"

Wilhelm: "—. We go render aid. If anything happens to the Envoy, it will be a problem."

With that, Wilhelm jerked his chin and moved to run past Heinkel. He halted for just an instant, glanced briefly at Heinkel,

Wilhelm: "You are… no, never mind. We hurry."

He started to say something, then dropped it and took off running. "W-Wait!" cried Heinkel as he hastily picked up the sniper's gear and gave chase to that back.

The sniper was down. All that remained was Serena's safety and finding an antidote among the belongings. —But that frail relief of Heinkel's was erased by a shocking sight.

Serena: "—You're late, Knight Heinkel. Returning in triumph to your family?"

So Serena greeted Heinkel and Wilhelm; leaning against the slope, she had no sign of the Werewolf who was to be transported with her—there were only the savage claw marks, literal claw marks, carved across Serena's beautiful face, slashing down her left cheek.

Heinkel: "S-Special Envoy! That wound… that Werewolf?!"

Blood flowed profusely down Serena's cheek; the wound could hardly be called shallow, and because she was a woman of great beauty, it looked all the more painful. Even so, while Heinkel flustered, Serena herself only shrugged, her face betraying nothing of the pain.

Serena: "He bared his fangs at me, taking advantage of your absence. As you can see, I took a hit."

Wilhelm: "—We must treat you at once. What became of the Werewolf in question?"

Kneeling beside Serena while Heinkel stood rooted, Wilhelm asked after the vanished Werewolf's whereabouts. Serena jerked her chin toward the rock face of the slope.

There was a pool of blood there different from Serena's wound, and what looked like a trail from something dragging itself continued over the rock face and out of sight.

Serena: "Even if I was taken by surprise, I won't fall behind a shackled criminal. I hit back and watched him drop off the cliff. I can't see from here—can you confirm the body?"

Wilhelm: "…No. Unfortunately there seems to be a river flowing below the cliff. That said, with this much blood loss, if he sank to the riverbed, he won't be coming back up."

At that answer, and as Wilhelm began tending her cheek wound, Serena gave a short "I see," then flicked her eyes at the still-standing Heinkel and made a sign.

It took a moment of stupefaction before he understood what that sign meant. —This was the painful, blood-reeking play Serena and Alagar had staged.

If he cooperated with them, she would let him go—Serena had made that offer to Alagar. Guarding a Werewolf? thought Heinkel—but it seemed she meant to keep that promise.

To do so, she had taken on a wound that would not disappear, and she was forcing Heinkel to deceive those around them—to deceive

Wilhelm van Astrea—and claim the Werewolf had died.

It was an ask that gnawed far too deeply at Heinkel's heart—but—

Serena: "Don't look so pale, Knight Heinkel. This wound is my medal. It is not your fault."

Heinkel: "…"

Added as if to press the point, and Heinkel drew in a breath and fell silent.

Wilhelm's back was turned as he tended Serena; Heinkel could not see his face. But he was afraid to ask what Wilhelm—the "Sword Demon"—had thought of the words just exchanged.

A surge to cast aside all falsehood and spill everything rose up—but doing that would only worsen relations between the Kingdom and the Empire. Heinkel, as always, was at a dead end.

Heinkel: "…Louanna. Reinhard."

Murmuring his wife's and son's names, Heinkel set his hand on the hilt of the sword that had not swung—and hung his head.

At least he could go home. —Clinging to that alone, Heinkel held his tongue.

18

Russell: "—By a hair, but I'm relieved the Knight-Captain made it to the scene in time."

Roswaal: "Myyy, my, we were saved by you getting everything arranged. Without that, by now Alagar would have escaped, Serena and Sir Heinkel would have been killed, and we'd be headed for a war between the Kingdom and the Empire."

Russell: "We're still left with two fissures in parent–child relations, and a number of issues involving the Werewolf."

So saying, Russell shrugged at Roswaal, who had returned safely from a critical situation.

To be frank, it had been a teeth-grinding stretch for Russell, who had remained in the Royal Capital. In the end, being able to send the decisive reinforcements to the site could be called his one saving achievement.

That achievement seemed to have created yet more needless friction in the “Sword Saint” line, but that house’s dysfunction hadn’t started yesterday. In any case, as for a “Sword Saint” who had abandoned functioning as a sword of the Kingdom—Russell could not be bothered.

Roswaal: “At any rate, everyone came back safe. That’s what matters most, riiight?”

Russell: “Yes, no question. Though saying “everyone safe” is a bit misleading, isn’t it?”

Roswaal, who had tried to wrap things up neatly, raised one eyebrow at Russell’s words. Even if he put on a face like he didn’t know what Russell was talking about, there was no way to gloss it over.

After all, the clearest proof of that “misleading” bit was right there in the most conspicuous place of the Royal Research Institute of Magic’s lab where the two of them were speaking, surrounded by researchers.

Marcos: “—Oi, Roswaal. Make the gawkers back off. Don’t let ’em stare like I’m a sideshow.”

In the middle of the lab, thus grumbling resentfully, was a lump of rock—apparently Marcos. The voice and the ill temper in the gestures were Marcos to the core, but Russell could not confirm the face.

It seemed to be the effect of Roswaal’s trump-card forbidden art; he had, at last, become something not quite human.

Russell: “If nothing else, it’s become clearer than before that approaching you carelessly is dangerous, hasn’t it?”

Marcos: “You’re laughing in your voice, idiot. Roswaal, change me back! I’ll beat you senseless!”

Roswaal: “That forbidden art is tied to your Od. Unless you learn to control your mana and switch it by your own will, you’ll have no choice but to live on as a Steelman, I’m afraiiid.”

Marcos: “Don’t talk like it’s someone else’s problem! The hell kinda stunt is this…!”

Roswaal: “A token of friendship—a gift. Once you master it, even bolts ten times as strong as this time won’t be able to pierce you. No more being poisoned, either: the birth of a bona fide monster.”

Marcos: “I’ll kill you.”

With a weighty rumble, Marcos swung his arm while still in rockman state. What that boulder smashed wasn’t Roswaal—but the ice and earthen targets Roswaal had conjured up. Shut into the lab, Marcos was, apparently, being made to learn how to handle the forbidden art through live-fire drills like this.

Russell was no expert, but he did wonder whether simply raging around in anger like that would truly be effective.

Russell: “Let’s hope this is not just you teasing Sir Marcos as usual.”

Roswaal: “Goodness, no such thing. Even I don’t think Marcos could welcome his lady home in that body. If the House of Gildark died out in his generation, it would be more than heartbreaking.”

Russell: “The house, is it.”

Picking up Roswaal’s remark, Russell lowered his gaze to his hands.

There lay the cracked “Conversation Mirror”—for this whole affair, Russell’s own price had been no more than that. But Roswaal’s price had been by no means light.

Russell: “Is it worth so much, forging a friendship with Special Envoy Dracroy? Or is there a fear that, upon her return, she will immediately bend to the malice of her father, her political foe…?”

Roswaal: “Testing someone with something you don’t even believe yourself—that’s a bad habit of yours, as it is of mine. She’ll see it through properly. That’s why you helped me cross that dangerous bridge, isn’t it?”

With one eye closed, turning the blue eye his way, Roswaal drew a sigh from Russell.

Roswaal had called it “crossing a dangerous bridge,” but even that was a bit misleading. Russell had not crossed the bridge. He had only taught how to cross—and shut his eyes while it was crossed.

Those who truly crossed the bridge were Roswaal, and then—

Roswaal: “—Now then, what should I call you, who will become “no one” from here on?”

Turning, Roswaal addressed one man at the back of the room—his face swathed in thick bandages, and to that needling question, the man’s sharp gaze flashed.

Only that gaze retained a trace of his old impression; once those thick bandages were unwound, a face utterly remade, wholly different from before, would be revealed. —It was said the technique involved considerable agony, with unceasing pain continuing endlessly until completion.

Still, one needed at least that much resolve. For this was to be born anew. In the first place, where the mother bears the pain to give birth, in being born again the person himself ought to taste the pain.

The being who had been a “Werewolf” kept silent for a while—and then—

???: “—Gwain. My dead father’s name.”

Roswaal: “I see. A fine name, isn’t it, Gwain.”

Without asking the reason or the story behind the choice, Roswaal nodded to the “Werewolf”—to Gwain, who had been Alagar. Then, holding up a single finger, he continued, Roswaal: “It goes without saying, but don’t forget the promises you made with me and Serena. From here on…”

Gwain: “I know. I’ll never bestialize again… no—won’t. If I can live without doing it, I swear.”

Roswaal: “So we begin with your choice of words, hmm. A fine mindset, wouldn’t you sayyy.”

Answering solemnly, Gwain drew a satisfied smile from Roswaal.

Even to Russell’s eye, his attitude was far more compliant than what he’d heard over the mirror. The resolve not to let go of a chance to live anew—that seemed genuine.

More to the point, it had to be—or Russell would be the one in trouble.

Roswaal: “From here on, you’ll live with your demi-human nature kept secret. So, Russell—teach Gwain how to live well. You’re my accomplice in deceiving both Kingdom and Empire, aren’t you?”

Russell: “You say what you like. —I am not kind. As you say, you’re a “nobody” who has crossed a dangerous bridge. If I’m to take you in, then I will require work commensurate with the investment.”

Shrugging, Russell made it plain: House Fellow would henceforth be Gwain’s keeper.

Roswaal and Serena had decided to let the Werewolf live—but in place of those two, so irresponsibly leaving the method to someone else, Russell would give the man who had nowhere to go both work and home.

Of course, it was no act of charity. —If the House of Mathers of the Kingdom and the House of Dracroy of the Empire had forged friendship, and Russell could bite in having seized on both houses’ weaknesses, it was not a bad cut for his share.

Moreover, according to his “Divine Protection of Evaluation,” Gwain looked to be a decent find.

Russell: “Even so, it was a miscalculation.”

Roswaal: “Oh? It’s rare for you to miscalculate. What did you misread?”

Touching his chin and murmuring, Russell drew a tilt of the head from Roswaal. It was, unusually, a simple question devoid of teasing, and Russell answered with a wry smile: “You.”

Russell: “It was the same when you drew the “Brotherhood” and the “Golden Wing Faction out of Costuul—are you, surprisingly, a sentimental busybody, Roswaal?”

Roswaal: “Ha-Ha-ha, what a funny jokeee. —I consider you my friend, you know?”

That this counted as his answer to Russell’s words was galling in the extreme.

At that exchange, Gwain gave a “heh-heh,” managing a smile even with his face bandaged, and from the lab there came the roaring crash of Marcos rampaging.

For an affair that could, perhaps, have become a turning point in the histories of the Kingdom and the Empire, here were the principal actors who had moved in the midst of the maelstrom, gathered and making this boisterous ruckus.

Russell: “Is this not, after all, the august Royal Research Institute of Magic?”

Roswaal: “Indeed it is. Don’t you know, Russell? Magic is what makes dreams come true.”

With only that, something awfully childlike, Roswaal laughed. Finding in that smile a boyishness befitting his years at last, Russell shrugged.

—What he sought was the maintenance of Lugunica’s peace and tranquility. For Russell Fellow, who put that first above all else, this seemed, unexpectedly, a not-bad place to set things down.

19

—Left behind within the roaring, blazing dragon carriage, raising beastlike death-throes, Galahau Dracroy met his end—and Serena Dracroy looked down upon it.

Serena: “He cares enough about appearances to pay a visit to a daughter who returned home with a deep wound on her face and in despair. —That shallowness was your downfall, Galahau Dracroy.”

Gazing at the inferno from the office of the mansion he had come to visit, Serena murmured without sentiment.

He had drawn up plans, gathered adepts, and schemed this and that, but what proved decisive were that the Werewolf who clung to life retained a shred of nobility—and that he misread his daughter’s ferocity. Neither was an irretrievable blunder on its own, but together they culminated in a searing end.

Days of struggle with her father, ended by flame. She would take this wound on her cheek as a final gift.

Touching, over the bandage, the painful scar carved into the left cheek of the unfilial daughter—left by a Werewolf’s claws—and feeling the ache that would not quite fade, Serena’s lips formed a smile.

Serena: “This should cut down on those vexing marriage talks as well. If I wanted a man-repellent, taking Roswaal as my consort would have been most to my taste… but he settled into the friend’s slot far too quickly. An unfathomable man.”

Thinking of the elusive friend she had made in the Kingdom, Serena closed one eye.

It was a pity she could not bring him into her grasp, but Roswaal had contributed more than enough to Serena’s plan. He had saved Serena from the ambush; and he had done Alagar—whom Galahau had used—a good turn and made him keep the promise between him and Serena.

Precisely because it was a promise that could not be fulfilled in the Empire, this was one thing she absolutely wanted to uphold, even if it meant borrowing Roswaal's hand. —After all, Serena was the one who had dragged Alagar in.

For Galahau's arranged assassination plot had been a trap that Serena herself had set in motion.

Serena: "If we don't know when the poison will be laced in, we prepare a plate on which we can easily lace it."

She did not know the plan's specifics, but if she laid out a path that made it easy to act and gave it a push, then when they would strike would become plain.

Alagar had been a victim swept up into the Dracroy family's political strife.

Therefore Serena had an obligation to save Alagar.

Serena: "No—there is one more who became a sacrifice."

Heinkel Astrea—who had wounded Serena, the transport subject, and, under the pretext of preventing war, had forced both the Kingdom and her own father to hold their tongues—he too had been made to draw a most miserable short straw.

Unreliable in many ways and a man wracked with troubles, Heinkel was someone to whom she would have to repay her debt someday. Whether such an opportunity would ever come between Serena and Heinkel, she did not know.

At any rate—

Serena: "—From here. From here it begins."

Having seized the reins of House Dracroy at long last, Serena had many ambitions in mind.

Because of the failure of this Special Envoy affair, her standing in the Imperial Capital might worsen somewhat; still, compared to being forever hamstrung by her kin, it would now be easier to take a large next step.

Child: “Lady Serena! Outside—outside! It’s burning like crazy!”

Child: “Is this the time to say that, you idiot?! Bring water, water! Ah— it’s spreading, it’s spreading!”

As Serena turned things over in her head, the voices of the children began to clamour around the dragon carriage burning before the mansion gate reached her ears.

They were the future cards she had set her eyes on and was raising at the Dracroy estate. For now, however, they were nothing but troublesome problem children, far from dependable.

Serena: “You lot, don’t carelessly go near the flames. Wounds from battle are an honor; burns from accidents are only laughed at.”

Throwing the window open to chide the problem children thus, Serena stood with an exasperated sigh and started out of the office to head for the gate herself.

As she went, Roswaal—who plotted for the future about as she did—crossed her mind.

Bearing grand ideals no less than Serena’s, Roswaal would surely keep walking forward. If ever there came a chance to lend him strength, she, too, would meet it with all she had.

For that was how Serena Dracroy, the “Scorching Lady,” would show friendship across the border between Kingdom and Empire to a friend who had inspired in her a respect she seldom felt for those of her own years—a friend for whom she had felt camaraderie before any stirrings of romance.

END

Once Upon a Time in Lugunica II After

1

???: “—In regards to the matter on this occasion, it seems as though the Vollachian Empire is not intending to consider this a major incident. You ought to be grateful to the generosity of Emissary Serena Dracroy.”

Indeed, told so by the Commander of the Knights who wore a stern expression, Heinkel Astrea caught his breath.

Heinkel: “…So no blame, huh?”

???: “…”

Heinkel: “Ahh, no, that’s…! I take… my hat off… to the envoy.”

A sharp glare was immediately directed to his sigh of relief, and he flustered to formulate an excuse. Even he knew that his excuse had been a lousy one, so all it did was add to his shame.

The Commander of the Knights—Wilhelm van Astrea, spoke not a word. Only, with a glare so sharp it felt as if he had thrust the tip of his sword against the other party’s neck, he gazed at his trueborn son, Heinkel.

Just when had it begun? When was it, that Heinkel had started to fear Wilhelm’s gaze?

When was the last time he had not felt his father’s gaze to be a sword, and had reacted with anything other than fear; he could not recall. Unable to recall, even now he continued to experience fear akin to a small, defenseless animal.

Wilhelm: “—. That is all, dismissed. As for the responsibility for the appointments on this case, which had flown over my head, I shall question the Deputy Commander later… Either way, it was likely some plot by the Council of Wise Men.”

Heinkel: “That’s…”

Wilhelm: “Dismissed, Heinkel Astrea.”

With the repeated command, Heinkel guessed he did not desire any further dialogue, and barely managed to voice a “Yes” without his voice quavering before leaving the Commander’s office of the guard station behind.

When Heinkel, his face tensed, and his back drenched in cold sweat, disappeared from the room, the remaining Wilhelm massaged the brow of his stern face.

Wilhelm: “Bertol-dono… Honored Father, just how did you handle those impudent youngsters back in those days? What must I do, to be like you…”

Indeed, not as Commander of the Knights, but as a lone, troubled father, he breathed a long, long sigh.

2

On his way home from the guard station, Heinkel ended up greatly disheveled from the self-reflection meeting that had been held in his mind.

The way he fashioned his gaze and expression, the lousy way he had given the responses he prepared, the plain utterances of his innermost feelings, and finally, the demeanor that had likely invoked tremendous disappointment from Wilhelm; in a backwards sort of sense, he had gotten a perfect score.

Heinkel: “Even my self-deprecation is worthless, man.”

Placing a hand to his forehead, he took notice at the juncture his self-reflection meeting had converted into a self-disparagement meeting.

Shrinking before Wilhelm, failing to produce sufficient results as a Knight, and having an unfruitful reflection meeting, it was the same as always. Only, if there was just one thing that differed from usual —

Heinkel: “Did Emissary Dracroy truly conceal the matter of Alagar…?”

This would then be the result of bearing a secret that had not even been reported to Wilhelm.

The escort mission that had served as the impetus for Wilhelm’s disappointment just now, the emissary sent from the Empire, Serena Dracroy, had spared no measure in order to escape the vile clutches of assassination. Even if that meant disobeying the Emperor’s imperial command, and setting the werewolf she had been ordered to return free.

Heinkel: “—. I never want to see them again.”

The future of the liberated werewolf—Alagar, was not a bright one. No matter where he might flee, the fact that he was an outcast would likely only continue to torment his life. Those feelings, he understood.

The life of the young Sword Wolf, Serena Dracroy, had been targeted by her own parent, so just how could she yet hold her head high with such boldness, taking pride in going down a path that differed to others? Those feelings, he did not understand.

The only thing those two had in common for him, was that he absolutely never wanted to meet either of them again.

For if he were to come face to face with one of them again, Heinkel’s own sense of powerlessness would—

???: “—Father!”

Heinkel’s head, which had only been drooping lower, lower, yet lower, was lifted by the sudden call of a voice, and in his blue eyes was reflected a small figure hurrying towards him.

Just like himself, they were a possessor of red hair akin to blazing flames, and eyes that perfectly captured the azure skies—

Heinkel: “Reinhard.”

In Heinkel's vision as he muttered, his young child quickly was quickly tottering towards him.

It appeared that, in his ruminations, he had arrived back home at the mansion. Treading upon the grass of the front garden, he got ready to catch Reinhard, whose face strongly resembled that of his beloved wife, and spread his arms wide open.

Reinhard: "Welcome home, Father. Are you finished with work?"

But, his preparations were rendered futile, as his child came to a halt just before his eyes.

Heinkel: "Yeah, I'm done. I also finished a meeting with father… with the Commander of the Knights."

Reinhard: "So then, will you be in the mansion for the rest of the day?"

Heinkel: "I'll be here, I'll be here. How about we help with meal preparations together? —You wouldn't mind, right, Mother?"

Not knowing what to do with his hands, he brought Reinhard into a warm embrace, and while caressing his head, Heinkel spoke out to the woman who was slowly approaching from behind his son.

The beautiful red-haired woman smiled, closing a single eye, saying, "Isn't that only natural?",

Woman: "I have no recollection of raising my son to be a man who merely quietly sits around waiting for food to be served. The child I raised is the sort who pays attention to the finer things of everyday life."

Heinkel: "Mother, I'm old enough already, how long are you still going to treat me like a child…"

Woman: "My, unfortunately that might be a bit difficult. After all, I've known you ever since you were born. No matter what I do, your tiny appearance will always overlap with the present."

Placing her hand over her mouth, and speaking of such troubled matters was Heinkel’s mother, Theresia.

Soft and gentle though she might appear, she was truly quite stubborn, so ever since his birth, not once had Heinkel bested Theresia in an argument. Even now, that smile of hers was drowning out his fighting spirit.

However, held in Heinkel’s arms, Reinhard spun around and gazed at his grandmother,

Reinhard: “But, when it comes time for a meal, Honored Grandfather always just waits quietly at the dining table.”

Theresia: “…Indeed. That’s how it is with that man. Truly, he’s a man who cannot do anything but swing the sword. That’s why, you mustn’t become like him, Reinhard. If you are to follow someone’s example, it should be Heinkel’s, understood?”

Reinhard: “Yes, Honored Grandmother. I will follow Father’s example.”

Heinkel: “Mother, please tone that down a notch. No matter how you put it, it only makes me uneasy.”

Listening to the heartwarming interaction between grandmother and grandchild, Heinkel sighed from the presumptuousness.

During the day, when Heinkel was away from home working at the Guard, Reinhard would spend a great deal of time with Theresia, or the married servant couple. During those periods, perhaps because Theresia and the other two were filling Reinhard’s ears with things, his internal opinion of Heinkel was ever on the rise.

That high appraisal, which did not match the truth of the reality much at all, only continued to force Heinkel to walk over a bed of needles.

Reinhard: “Father? Is something the matter?”

Perhaps perceiving his father’s anxiety, Reinhard, being hugged tightly, suddenly questioned him so; Heinkel denied his child’s worries with an “It’s nothing”, and picked up that small body.

Heinkel: “Nothing’s wrong! I just finished up a bit of a tough job, so I’m just feeling a little spent. But you see, your dad’s exhaustion is on the lighter side. It was tougher on my comrade who I was working together with.”

Reinhard: “Working together with… Marcos-san?”

Heinkel: “Huh? Have I mentioned him to you before? You did well remembering that. Good job, good job.”

His child had displayed unthinkable excellence, and so, patting him on the head, Heinkel nodded with a “That’s right”, before beginning to walk towards the mansion.

Heinkel: “That Marcos. This time… well, he really helped me out this time as well. That guy, is an incredible person.”

Reinhard: “…Father, is too.”

Theresia: “Indeed, that is absolutely right! You’ve grown up to be so handsome, and you’re my pride and joy, my son.”

Being told such by his own child in his arms, and by his birth mother standing beside him, Heinkel blinked his eyes, and then upon his face emerged a smile, a real one, not one of pretense.

High appraisals that went above his own measure, were a poison that gnawed at Heinkel. However, the admiration of his young child, and the praise given by his mother, touching not upon sword skills, were a different story to his bitter self-evaluation.

—After all, his blazing red-hair, and blue eyes that encapsulated the sky, that which had been complimented by his lovely wife, who slumbered even now, were the very exoneration that allowed Heinkel to remain an Astrea.

3

Sat down on the hard floor, he steadied his heart, and quietly practiced his breathing.

In order to focus his mind on the inside of his body, deep within where he had never paid attention to before, the balance between stillness and movement was absolutely vital; such had been told to him by that odious Roswaal.

During the day, he had been engulfed in a vortex of magic that seemed to toy with him, manifesting as intense movement. Then, after sunset, he had entered a completely altered mental state of nothingness, indulging in unwavering stillness.

That was the reason why Marcos Gildark, who had become the Boulder not just in facial features, but down to his very flesh by means of a forbidden art, was spending this tranquil night at the Royal Magic Research Institute.

Marcos: "—Who's there?"

Sitting with his legs crossed and eyes closed, Marcos's meditation was interrupted, and he uttered that question.

To begin with, he had not even successfully managed to meditate. With an enigmatic power swirling around within his body, he seemed to have been ready for battle for no particular reason. —That was why he had noticed. In a situation in which the staff who were supposed to monitor the entrance were dozing off, he had noticed the being who had appeared with nary a sound or indication.

Only, perceiving the one standing still amidst the darkness, he doubted if his own senses were tricking him.

Marcos: "…A child?"

After all, present there was a child far too small.

Not metaphorically, he was of a height that rivalled Marcos's knee level. A child of a noble house wearing clothes of high quality, with striking red hair and blue eyes—and, upon ascertaining those distinguishable features, he easily figured out which house this person had come from.

And, as far as Marcos knew, the only one corresponding to that age would be—

Marcos: “Reinhard, is it?”

Reinhard: “…”

Marcos: “You’re the son of Heinkel Astrea, correct?”

Reinhard: “—Yes. I am Father’s son.”

The young child, remaining silent even when his name was asked, revealed his identity as soon as Heinkel’s name was brought up. At that proactive response, Marcos raised the eyebrows of his face, covered by rock as it was. He had indeed thought that Heinkel was one to dote on his child, but.

Marcos: “So the inverse is also true. The appa doesn’t fall far from the tree, it seems… How did you get in here?”

Reinhard: “I walked through the entrance.”

Marcos: “If it’s that easy to do such a thing, then I have gained both a reason to yell at Roswaal, and a reason to yell at Russell, who allowed the former to run wild…”

For the most part, this Royal Magic Research Institute was an important facility of the Kingdom, so it was decidedly not good for outsiders to be able to enter so easily. Of course, he did not think that they were so slacking in vigilance, and both Russell and Roswaal could be considered reliable in the sense of lacking oversights.

In other words, the unusual thing here, was the young child who had been walking around so late at night.

Marcos: “…”

Looking at the young child who had appeared in the dim research lab from up to down, Marcos had trouble suppressing a silent, yet unshakable shock.

At five years old at most, not only was his body underdeveloped, it had barely even undergone development in the first place. Despite being such a child, Reinhard’s standing posture had been perfected.

The first thing that separated experts of martial arts from regular people, was their standing posture. To Marcos's intuition, it appeared that Reinhard's standing posture rivaled even that of the Sword Demon—nay, that of the Sword Saint, Theresia van Astrea.

Marcos: "You, what of your sword?"

Reinhard: "…Father said it's still too early for me."

Marcos: "I see. A decision so very much characteristic of that man. —However you arrived here, it's of no concern anymore. Why did you come here? Have you come to meet me?"

At the question, Reinhard slightly widened his blue eyes, and gave a small nod.

He had hit the nail on the head; however, Marcos plunged into rumination. Marcos could still understand if Heinkel had spoken of him to his son. But, being present here, and ascertaining Marcos with such an outward appearance, could not be explained away through simply having good intuition.

Reinhard: "Could you not hit my Father so harshly?"

Suddenly, as Marcos was pondering, his reaction to Reinhard's words was delayed. Processing what he had said after a beat, he frowned his eyebrows behind the boulder.

Marcos: "What, did that guy run off crying to a child as small as you to complain about his cold colleague?"

Reinhard: "That's incorrect…! But, I could always tell by looking at Father. Before as well, Marcos-san caused trouble for Father… you're friends, aren't you?"

Marcos: "Friends, huh…? Was there ever a time when that might have been true, I wonder?"

Indeed, as Marcos placed emotions that were hard to put to words upon his tongue, Reinhard silently watched him.

The child's beautiful blue eyes, at the unfathomable light swirling deep within, when Marcos rejected his appeal, his instincts formed a guess of what Reinhard's intentions were. And, the power to force most people to comply with his demands, certainly dwelled within this child.

This child, shouldering an extraordinary destiny—born to a man unworthy of the lineage of Sword Saints, the child who was far too worthy of the lineage of Sword Saints, adored his father. Adored him a little too much.

Hence, though he was in a position that could not be stated definitively as his colleague or friend, Marcos proffered a warning.

Marcos: "Supposing that, every time something happens to Heinkel, you go like this to complain to another party directly, you should cease all such actions."

Reinhard: "…Is it because, I'm a child?"

Marcos: "No. —Because it looks like Heinkel is making you do it."

Reinhard: "—Hk, that's not how…"

Marcos: "Even if you insist that it's not the case, it won't be taken any other way than what I stated. Your actions will produce the opposite of what you seek. You'll only end up unnecessarily contributing to Heinkel's adversity."

At Marcos's words, Reinhard clenched his small fists.

Sitting with his legs crossed in a form that appeared as a lump of stone, late at night, he was lecturing a young child who had snuck into one of the Kingdom's most important facilities regarding his reckless actions. —To an outsider's eye, it would appear to be a nightmare; he was astonished by himself.

However, on top of that—

Marcos: "I can't make any promises, but I understand your view. I don't believe that you are operating on Heinkel's inclinations."

Reinhard: "—. Will you be more gentle with Father?"

Marcos: “I told you, I can’t make any promises. More importantly, what about you? You’re going to become a Knight in the future, right? In that case, you have to tightly follow what your parent says. Even though that guy’s like that, he’s still the son of the Sword Demon and the Sword Saint. He’s well aware of what it means to be a Knight.”

Marcos did not know how much his words had resonated with Reinhard. Only, a change there had been. —However, not on the child’s side, but on Marcos’s.

Gradually, the proliferation of stone slowed down, and finally came to a halt. Then, the boulder that had been covering his body shed away, revealing Marcos’s real limbs, torso, and head.

Ironically enough, it seemed like the conversation with this senseless child had played a part in bringing unity to his mind.

Marcos: “Yet still no response, huh? Tsk, you undisciplined pipsqueak.”

Giving no indication of whether he would heed the warning or not, the child had vanished from sight before he knew it.

Although Marcos had been distracted by the change in his body, it was an astonishing feat. It almost seemed as if his meeting with Reinhard here had just been some sort of hallucination.

Only, the fact that such had not been the case, was deeply engraved into Marcos’s heart, unforgettably so.

Marcos: “It’s true, you’d have to become a doting parent for a kid like that, Heinkel.”

In the sense of needing to keep a close eye on him, in the sense of him being a handful, the child had been born with innate qualities that required a good parent’s eyes; this Marcos had understood.

Of the many problems encircling Heinkel, Marcos had thought that one among them would be resolved if he eventually inherited the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint, with the resentment between the two of them possibly subsiding, but—likely, the worst possibility that flashed through Marcos's imagination, would be best left as a groundless fear.

Marcos: "For now, it's fine. For now… Oi! I've suppressed the forbidden art! Call Roswaal at once!"

Shouting in a loud voice, he startled the staff who had been dozing off awake.

Sitting with his legs crossed in the middle of the hubbling research institute, Marcos rested his chin in his hands, and sighed.

These chest pains were merely a needless fear, so it would be best if any more troublesome things did not occur.

However, in the not-so-distant future, that unpleasant hunch that Marcos held would prove to hit the nail on the head.

And, that would far surpass anything Marcos imagined, dragging the Kingdom in cataclysmic circumstances that would bring about changes even exceeding that of housing the forbidden art of the Boulder in his body, both unto him, and unto everything.

And yet unbeknownst to this, the future of Marcos Gildark would carve unfading wrinkles into his boulder-like brow, merely a part of the greater influence to be exerted by the Sword Saint's destiny.

END

Guardians of the Crimson Flame
(Translation Pending)

Volume 41

Chapters 24-36

Prologue:
Account of a Witch's Dream

???: "—Just like you, I'm a complete failure of a girl."

Thus hearing the Witch's words, spoken with downcast eyes framed by long lashes, Aldebaran became unsure of what to say, merely sinking into silence.

The grassland upon which Aldebaran's trysts with the Witch occurred repeatedly without fail, that place which did not exist anywhere in this world, was an alternate dimension created by the Witch, one which could be called a castle of fantasies.

Even when he did inquire about its nature, she would invariably attempt to deceive him by saying "It's something like a dream when you doze off"; upon that grassland, on this day—night had fallen, unusually.

Aldebaran: "I guess even unusual things can happen."

As the star-studded black sky looked down upon him, Aldebaran sighed in wonder.

On a fundamental level, the time of the grassland was fixed at midday. Given that this place was merely a landscape envisioned by its creator, the Witch, it was divorced from notions of true time. Hence, the plains were always bright, and decorated by clear skies.

Albeit the topical person required not any colors aside from black and white, were they truly the possessor of such unexpectedly high spirits that a patch of bright, blue sky would peek out of their heart of hearts, without fail?

Yet despite the matter of him harboring such doubts, he had been surprised by night falling upon the meadow nonetheless. To say nothing of the fact that the Witch in question was dozing off atop the hill.

Witch: “…”

Her upper body resting upon the white table, the Witch took muted, sleeping breaths.

As Aldebaran was to inquire on the topic of the unfamiliar nighttime scenery, upon realizing her slumber, he bated his breath, fixedly gazing at the Witch’s sleeping face.

His initial impression, was that of thinking “the Witch also sleeps, eh”.

Obvious though it might have been, that was the extent to which the Witch’s manner of life was an enigma. She was a being who could create something like an alternate dimension at will, so if it happened that she did not sleep, he would not have been surprised. In fact, until the present day, not once had he borne witness to her sleeping visage.

Aldebaran: “She’s infuriatingly beautiful…”

It was something he had known, but even when asleep, she possessed abnormally prominent beauty.

The almond-shaped eyes housing unparalleled knowledge and curiosity were closed, but her facial features had likely taken God quite a bit of time to tune to perfection, and her long, beautiful white hair and seemingly faded white skin seemed to declare that no other color needed be made known to the world. —It truly infuriated him.

Aldebaran: “Thinking about it, this is a rare opportunity, I should hurry and grab something to scribble on her face—”

Witch: “—Uh.”

Aldebaran: “—Hk!”

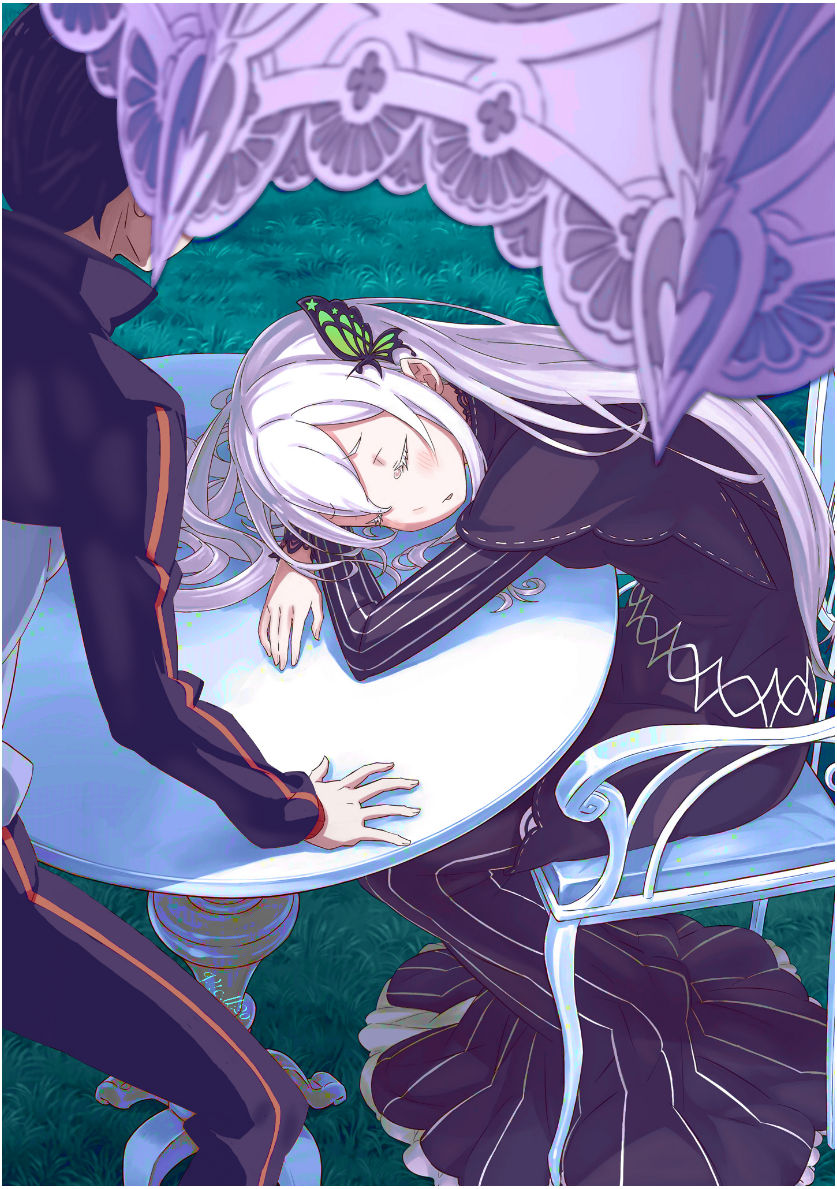
As soon as he thought to do something rude, a faint noise escaped the lips, causing Aldebaran to stiffen.

Despite not having done anything, he felt like a child whose mischief was being reprimanded. However, in the next moment, the tension in Aldebaran's body would break his personal record.

—After all, in the eyes of the dozing Witch, he caught a faint glimpse of a teardrop.

Aldebaran: "Teacher—"

Witch: "—Mph."



Unconsciously, Aldebaran touched the shoulder of the sleeping Witch, and shook her body. With a faint groan at the call and the touch to her shoulder, closed eyelids slowly opened.

As if to ascertain, those black eyes blinked several times, and reflected Aldebaran right before her,

Witch: “…Aldebaran?”

Aldebaran: “Ah, yeah, that’s right, Teacher. It ain’t like yourself to be taking a snooze out here.”

Witch: “…”

Before Aldebaran as he concealed his discomposure, the Witch silently got up. Placing her slender fingers to her jaw, the awakening Witch contemplated the situation.

And then—

Witch: “—A dream, was it.”

The fact that it had been so was unfortunate; such was the nuance carried by the mutter.

After muttering, the Witch wiped away the tears in her eyes with her fingers, clearing away the aftertaste of slumber. At that nonchalant gesture, Aldebaran felt a strange sense of loneliness.

Thus, he unconsciously ended up asking about it.

Aldebaran: “To cry while dreaming, you a kid or something? — What sort of dream, was it?”

So he spoke.

Witch: “…”

Aldebaran fell silent at the awkwardness, painfully regretting his question.

In all honesty, he had envisioned being bombarded with a great amount of knowledge regarding dreams, or to be poked fun at, teased for expressing interest in the Witch's dream; the usual progression.

But, to Aldebaran's question, the Witch did not respond with the usual progression.

Instead, presented as an answer was the Witch's comment from the beginning.

???: "—Just like you, I'm a complete failure of a girl."

Aldebaran: "…"

Ruminating over the Witch's words once more, Aldebaran reached the extremities of confusion amidst the silence.

Just what on earth had she meant? Did she not care about being posed a direct question such as this? Even though she would usually blather on and on without end continuously, what was the reason behind her being so well-mannered right now?

—Even supposing he did enquire it, and ascertain it, would the Witch remain unharmed?

Witch: "…Good grief, just which one of us is the child?"

Aldebaran: "Huh…"

Witch: "You said that I'd become so small, that I was just like a kid. Worry not, I am not some cute existence capable of being hurt by you. —I am a wicked Witch, you know?"

Closing one eye in a wink, the Witch voiced her same old line. Witnessing a glimpse of her characteristic childishness therein, Aldebaran heaved a great sigh.

For some reason, it felt like there was no true lifelike feeling in it.

Aldebaran: "Shit, to be feeling this sorta way because of someone like Teacher…"

Witch: “How peculiar. As far as I know, “Teacher” is supposed to be a title of honor, and yet I cannot sense a shred of reverence. Even though you were just trying to hide your embarrassment at peeping at a maiden’s sleeping face.”

Aldebaran: “You go about these things way too maliciously!”

That he was on the verge of being traumatized, was Aldebaran’s protest, yet the Witch displayed zero concern regarding his complaints, tapping her finger on the table in good humor.

That instant, cups filled with tea manifested, one of them for Aldebaran.

Witch: “Come on now, cheer up. Should I take the trouble of producing confections as well?”

Aldebaran: “It’s fine. Even if I eat here it won’t fill my stomach, so when I return to the other side I’d be all jumbled up, feeling like I’m full while my actual body’s hungry.”

Witch: “When you say that, I just want you to eat even more.”

Aldebaran: “You’re the worst!”

Shouting at the Witch who did not conceal even a shred of her impishness, Aldebaran rested his chin in his palm. Then, stealing a glance at the gleeful Witch, he ascertained that any traces of tears were nowhere to be found.

Aldebaran: “…”

The teardrops had vanished. And yet, an unfading lump lingered in Aldebaran’s chest.

That which the Witch had said was a joke, was likely no such thing, but the truth. —Even she, beautiful and wise as she was, would have times where she cursed herself, and wanted to cry.

Just who in the world could see the Witch as a failed existence?

Witch: “Hm?”

Aldebaran: “—. It’s nothing, sleepyhead Teacher.”

Directing insults at the Witch tilting her head devoid of malice, Aldebaran brought the cup to his mouth.

Likely, he had missed his opportunity. A chance to question her on that very thing, would it ever come around again? Supposing it did, would Aldebaran wish to know the answer?

If he did wish to know, would the reason be because he sought sympathy or compassion?

Or perhaps—

Aldebaran: “—Even a fake starry sky’s still quite the wonder to behold, yeah?”

Was his wish perhaps to have those black eyes, which albeit bore a jet-black hue selfsame to that of the starry sky, appeared to dazzle even more than the latter, turn towards his own self?

Aldebaran, who was the same as the Witch in being a failed existence, knew not.

Chapter 24:
The Enemy of Mankind

1

—Return by Death.

An Authority that, at the cost of one's life, granted them the right to turn back the clock, and redo a time that ought to have passed.

Under the interference of that dreadful Witch of Envy, expending his life in order to remove all the anguish and obstacles he faced, Natsuki Subaru had repeatedly used Return by Death many times over.

And, by no means was that any cute little number like two or three times.

As far as they were aware, Death had befallen Natsuki Subaru over ten times.

Not even once, had there been a way to die comfortably.

Not even once, had there been an end unaccompanied by a sense of loss.

Not even once, had there been any final moments in which he relinquished his life believing that he'd had enough.

Not even once, had Natsuki Subaru ever desired to relinquish his life.

Even so, Natsuki Subaru continued to lose his life, repeating the cycle of Return by Death.

Outrageousness, absurdity, despair, all had robbed Natsuki Subaru of his life. But, neither outrageousness, nor absurdity, nor despair, were things that could not be avoided if he set his mind to it.

And yet, why was it that Natsuki Subaru had nonetheless been unable to avoid Death?

That was—

???: “—Because he’s kind.”

Not a single person, had he desired to lose.
Not a single person, had he wished to relinquish.
Not a single person, had he grown to detest to the point of wanting them gone.

Not a single person, had Natsuki Subaru ever once been able to believe deserved to die.

Henceforth, Natsuki Subaru continued to lose his life, repeating the cycle of Return by Death.

Every obstacle, every malicious intention, every enemy, every Witchbeast, every Sin Archbishop, had stood in the way of his life. Again and again they did kill Natsuki Subaru, granting him Death, and crushing his soul.

But, I know. —I truly know.

Certainly, many enemies, unthinkable obstacles, unavoidable disasters, had heartlessly taken the life of Natsuki Subaru. That was a fact. Without a doubt.

However, I know. More so than anybody else, I am painfully aware.

More than enemies, more than disasters, more than absurdity.

More than the formless malice known as fate, there was something that had killed Natsuki Subaru more than anything else.

—That was none other than somebody who had continued to take advantage of Natsuki Subaru’s kindness.

2

???: “Hey, I don’t think you need to worry too much about this.”

???: “…Even if Subaru says something like that, it’s not like I can just brush it off.”

Petra glanced at “Natsuki Subaru” leaning against the side of the carriage and sighed wistfully as she was driving the speeding dragon carriage.

However, the “Subaru” currently next to Petra was not the real Subaru.

One could say that it was an illusion created by Petra’s brain—an “Imaginary” Subaru. The proof was that he was slightly transparent and see-through, and compared to the most recent image of Subaru in Petra’s mind, his face seemed to be slightly younger.

Probably because the Book of the Dead that Petra had experienced was set about a year and a half in the past—back in the tumultuous days when she had just become a maid.

Petra: “A lot of things happened for both Subaru and me…”

Considering how much time had passed since then, it stood to reason that they had both grown in many ways, for better or worse.

To put it simply, Petra had grown in terms of height and hair length, and she prided herself on her remarkable progress as a maid and as a woman. Meanwhile, Subaru had grown closer to Beatrice, became more boisterous with Otto and Garfiel, and grown warmly alongside Emilia, achieving a very dignified and resolute image of what it meant to be a man.

That was why “Subaru” appeared a little more immature compared to how he was nowadays.

—But even so, he was still in possession of his coolness.

Even if he lost some of his masculine and rugged charm that he held today, his cuteness and charming personality would still be an unfair combination.

Petra: “No, no… Now’s not the time to be thinking about that.”

Scolding herself, Petra put her hand to her forehead and shook her head slowly.

It was okay, she could control herself. It was not the first time Petra had imagined Subaru in her mind after all, making him say what she wanted him to say and strike her favorite poses.

She was a seasoned veteran at imagining all kinds of romantic stories and love poems, picturing various situations and casting herself and Subaru as the characters, their cheeks and hearts racing with excitement.

If she thought of those as rehearsals, then the imaginary Subaru in front of her now felt even more tangible, more lifelike, and nothing short of real.

"Subaru": "That's already way beyond the realm of imagination, could it possibly be beyond the level that self-control of yours can handle?"

Petra: "It's fine, it's just the way I'm feeling. More importantly, don't go looking inside my head."

Subaru: "Don't be absurd! Even if you tell me not to look, I'm literally inside your head, Petra!"

Petra: "…"

Stunned by "Subaru's" retort, Petra's breath caught in her throat. Seeing her reaction, "Subaru" seemed to regret his words and scratched his cheek with his finger.

The gentle look in Subaru's eyes when he showed consideration for others, and his clumsy reactions that were so typical of him, reaffirmed Petra's affection for him.

—Natsuki Subaru's Book of the Dead had violated Petra Leyte's "mind".

That was Petra's self-analysis of what had happened to her.

The original avid reader of the Books of the Dead, Ezzo Cadner, had said that reading a Book was a challenge that put a significant mental strain on one's mind, but it had an even greater impact on Petra than she had personally anticipated.

On the other hand, it was possible that the shock Petra experienced from Subaru's Book of the Dead was completely different from what Ezzo had warned them about.

Petra: "…Things like Returning by Death or being from beyond the Great Waterfall…"

The burden that Natsuki Subaru was carrying was far greater than Petra could have ever possibly imagined.

Subaru was separated from his homeland and was all alone, so what was he thinking when he met Petra and the others? What did he go through to save them? What kind of determination did he have in his heart when he fought for them? That was everything—no, what Petra had learned today was just a tiny part of it.

It was hard to believe that Subaru, burdened with such a tragic fate, had never had to use his Authority since the record in the Book of the Dead that Petra had read after all.

There was no doubt that Subaru had experienced that feeling of his soul being torn apart since then, his heart being ripped out, and his life being trampled upon countless times, enduring and surmounting it all to reach today.

Petra: "…"

The permanent blemish on one's heart that Ezzo feared had indeed been engraved into hers.

Perhaps, probably, unquestionably, Petra thought with a sense of detachment that her heart was deeply wounded, her mental balance completely shattered, and she was in a very precarious state.

She was able to exchange words with her beloved, who was dead yet not dead, and felt everything from joy to sorrow at his words, even in such a situation. This was nothing less than a complete emotional and mental breakdown.

Petra: “But, it’s fine.”

Love is blind, love is a fever. Petra Leyte had been consumed by her feelings of love and had lived like this to this day.

As long as I’m fully aware that I’m abnormal, I can control myself—but that’s not a convenient line of thinking. No matter how much I claim to have sound judgment, it’s the same as knowing not to drive a car after drinking alcohol.

Neither Petra nor Subaru have had a driver’s license, nor did they have any memory of driving under the influence, but it was the same thing.

Petra: “Cars, drunk driving, traffic lights, Tooryanse…”

Suddenly, she was drawn to the words that popped into her mind out of nowhere, and knowledge spilled out one after another like out-of-season clothes overflowing from a stuffed-to-the-brim closet.

It was all words that Petra knew, and words she did not know, loosely crossing the boundary between understanding and unfamiliarity, like the feeling of encountering something familiar, yet foreign.

If she did not begin to carefully sort them out, Petra might end up wearing men’s clothes and carrying a Guiltywhip around before she knew what had happened.

“Subaru”: “Wait, my main weapon is a whip? Isn’t that a bit too edgy? I’m being overly clingy with Beatrice, and I can’t keep up with the generation gap…”

Petra: “By the way, everyone had gotten to punish the Master, Garf-san’s reflected on his chuunibyou, Otto-san hasn’t been sleeping, and Emilia-neesama’s been doing a wonderful job.”

“Subaru”: “I see, Roswaal was the mastermind behind everything, huh… hold on? Why was that guy forgiven?”

Petra: “That’s something you should discuss with Subaru and Emilia-neesama…”

However, Petra still had not forgiven Roswaal, so although she did not completely oppose Subaru and Emilia’s decision at that time, she did not agree with it either. Of course, there had been many times when Roswaal’s assistance was undoubtedly invaluable, particularly in relation to the events in the Empire. But, that was a separate issue, and Petra intended to never forgive him for the rest of her life.

However, right now, there was someone even more unforgivable than Roswaal—

“Subaru”: “—Petra.”

Petra: “…Whatever you may say, I’ll still feel that way.”

The combination of “Subaru’s” gentle, quiet voice and sincere gaze forcibly distracting Petra from her breathing and heartbeat, left her with no choice but to avert her eyes like a child.

As if ignoring the shameless pleas and cries of her heart beating deep within her chest, Petra focused all her attention straight ahead on the endless sea of sand that stretched out before her.

—At this moment, Petra and her group’s dragon carriage had departed from the Pleiades Watchtower and were speeding straight through the Augria Sand Dunes.

Beyond this sea of sand, there was a person they absolutely had to catch up with.

Their opponent would presumably utilize the wings of the Divine Dragon to fly over the Sand Sea with mobility, surpassing that of a ground dragon, even one equipped with the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion, making it extremely challenging to catch up.

Besides, there was another reason why Petra and the others needed to hurry.

Petra & “Subaru”: “—The Witch of Envy.”

Petra, deep in thought, and “Subaru”, who shared her consciousness, spoke of the reason for their desperate haste.

Without regard for the consequences, she drove the dragon carriage for several hours—covering a considerable distance from the Pleiades Watchtower, yet the pressure remained, refusing to let go of Petra and her companions' souls.

It was the terrifying Witch who was supposed to be sealed away in the shrine, who constantly reached out to punish Petra for reading the Book of the Dead and encroaching on the realm of the Taboo. The tsunami of black shadows that had invaded and threatened to destroy the world were now being held back by a single hero.

—The Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea.

His lonely struggle kept the wrath of the Witch of Envy at bay beyond the Tower, preventing the destruction of the world by a hair's breadth and maintaining a delicate balance. However, even now, there was a deafening roar and violent tremors that seemed to turn the world upside down, and flashes of light like distant lightning occurred intermittently, day and night, as if the trumpets of the Apocalypse were blowing ceaselessly.

How long could this balance last? Neither Petra nor anyone else knew. If there was one thing they knew, it was this—

”Subaru”: “If Reinhard were to be defeated, everything and anything would be over.”

Petra: “Yeah. If Reinhard… san gets taken out, the Witch will come after me. There's no way to predict how much damage will be done between now and then.”

“Subaru”: “They don't seem like the type to be polite and give way to others.”

“Subaru's” joke made Petra imagine a kind Witch of Envy who would give up her seat to an elderly person on a crowded train, but she could not bring herself to laugh now.

When considering ways to minimize potential damage, Petra should have remained at the Pleiades Watchtower and accepted being silenced by the Witch, regardless of the outcome of Reinhard's battle.

However, if Petra dared to think such a thing even for a moment—

“Subaru”: “—That’s definitely a no-go. I won’t let that happen even if it kills me.”

Petra: “…”

When Subaru said that directly to Petra, it felt like there was absolutely no room to argue.

She had always been aware that Subaru cared deeply for her. Of course, there is Emilia and Beatrice. Not to mention Rem. She was not so conceited as to think she was treated differently from them, but she was still certain—that she occupied a special shelf in Natsuki Subaru’s heart, where he kept the precious things that were most important to him.

However, until today, she did not realize the true weight behind the words “Even if it kills me” spoken by a seemingly joking Subaru.

Natsuki Subaru was truly someone who’d protect what is important to him, “Even if it kills him.”

Petra: “—. Yeah, I know. I don’t want to die either… Al-san has some way to stop the Witch, right?”

“Subaru”: “Yeah, he’s not stupid. He knows what kind of damage that could cause to the world. He’s definitely prepared something to stop it before it gets to that point.”

Petra: “Yeah, for sure.”

“Subaru”: “Definitely.”

Clenching his fist, “Subaru” declared forcefully, and Petra nodded in agreement.

Catching up to Al, who had left the Tower, and forcing him to reveal his plan to suppress the Witch. Organizing the necessary steps were so daunting that they made her head spin, but “Subaru’s” words were ever-so reassuring. —Unfortunately, however, the same thing could apply to Petra as well as Subaru.

Subaru, who now shared Petra’s consciousness, was fully aware of Petra’s thoughts and anxieties.

The same went for Petra, who shared the same consciousness as “Subaru”.

Petra: “If Al-san wants to end the world…”

The absolute truth that Petra and Subaru confirmed earlier would no longer be the case.

In the worst-case scenario, Al had no actual way to stop the “Witch of Envy” and was prepared to let the world be destroyed, taking his lifeless heart and mind with him.

Al, who lost Priscilla Barielle, his cherished master or rather, someone he held a much deeper love than just being someone of reverence, had every right to hate the world.

However, it was also true that they could not entirely give up on the glimmer of hope.

Petra: “Me, Meili-chan, Garf-san, and everyone else are all still alive.”

Al, who even had the support of the Divine Dragon Volcanica, had the power to decide the fate of Petra and the others in the Tower. However, he had chosen to exercise his right not to take their lives.

Would it be too much to believe that this is a sign that there was still something left in Al?

Petra: “…Maybe I’m overthinking it, almost like I’m not really myself.”

“Subaru”: “Yikes.”

With a finger pressed to her lips, Petra muttered, and next to her, “Subaru“ exaggeratedly shrugged his shoulders. Glancing over, she saw Subaru give her an awkward smile and wave, which prompted Petra to narrow her eyes.

It was unclear just how much “Subaru“ had influenced Petra’s current way of thinking.

There was no way that the influence of The Book of the Dead only had a positive bonus effect for Petra, allowing her to see an imaginary Subaru.

Petra: “I’ve gotta be more careful…”

Petra loved Subaru, but she did not want to be Subaru. Furthermore, she should not become a person who would indiscriminately shower kindness on everyone like Subaru did.

Petra had always admired kind people, had always strived to be kind herself, but she felt that people like Subaru and Emilia were perfect just as they are.

Petra wished to be someone who did not take the kindness of kind people for granted.

For that reason, she must not empathize too much with Natsuki Subaru.

???: “—Petra-chan, it’s time to switch o~ut.”

Then, just as she thought that, the small window of the dragon carriage opened, and a voice spoke to her from behind.

It was Meili, who had been resting in the carriage. When she offered to take over driving, Petra shook her head with a “no”,

Petra: “I’m fine, so you should rest, Meili-chan. You carried me while I was sleeping, and you even kept the Witchbeasts away.”

Meili: “I didn’t do as much as Flam-chan, who carried Fang onii-san and Sensei-san. Besides, with the Sword Saint and the Witch fighting, it seems the Witchbeasts don’t have much time for us.”

Meili shrugged her shoulders, her expression betraying her deep fatigue. It was obvious that she had been unable to relax even a smidgen while in the carriage. In fact, feeling the presence of the Witch in the distance was like being a frog stared at by a snake. It would have been very strange if she had been able to rest calmly.

This must have been even more difficult for someone as responsible as Meili.

Petra: “How’s Flam-chan? Still asleep?”

Meili: “Yeah, she’s still out cold. But I’m counting on Flam-chan’s Divine Protection, so I’m glad we made the right ca~ll.”

“Subaru”: “This girl… It feels kind of weird to see Meili here…”

Meili’s gloomy answer and “Subaru’s” feelings of trepidation at her presence overlapped. Ignoring the latter’s reaction, Petra thought about Flam, and her Divine Protection.

Flam’s Divine Protection of Mindspeak allowed her to communicate with her twin sister once a day. Although it was only a one-way communication, the ability to send and receive messages regardless of distance was so important that, under the current circumstances, it was undoubtedly invaluable.

The condition of “once a day” for the Divine Protection seemed to be closely related to the amount of time she slept, and the more urgent the situation at hand, the more time she needed to sleep.

However, the means Flam had employed to achieve this sleep were beyond Petra’s comprehension.

Petra: “I never thought she would suddenly strangle her own neck and pass out…”

Meili: “It seems like she couldn’t just take a proper rest because she was so worried about Sword Saint-san. Bu~t the fact that she was so determined to do so is typical of someone connected to Sword Saint-san. She’s barely younger than me and you, Petra-chan, she’s so different from normal gir~ls.”

Petra: “I don’t think you’re one to talk, Meili-chan.”

"Subaru": "Look who's talking."

Petra and "Subaru's" comments overlapped, and Meili's lips curled in dissatisfaction.

All she could hear was Petra's words, but by deliberately engaging in this out-of-place, everyday conversation, they avoided facing the reality and the pressure from the Witch.

And it was probably thanks to that stable mind that she was even managing to rush forward with single-minded determination.

???: "—DODOGYUUUN."

A sudden high-pitched cry came from Patrasche, who had been working harder than Petra, Meili, Flam, or anyone else.

Taking into account the events at the Pleiades Watchtower, Patrasche shared the same sense of dreadful urgency as Petra and the others, and her neighing signaled that they had finally reached their destination—the end of the Sand Sea.

Lying there in the distance, near the edge of the Sand Sea, was the town of Mirula.

Meili: "Petra-cha~n!"

Petra: "Yeah, I know!"

In response to Meili's call, Petra strongly gripped the reins and leaned forward.

Patrasche, who had glanced behind her for just a moment, was already refocusing her attention forward and was now sprinting toward the finish line, having had to run nonstop all the way here.

"Subaru": "I love you, Patrasche."

The imaginary intangible Subaru delivered unrequited words of love and gratitude to Patrasche.

As she watched the intangible hand that was unable to touch anything stroke the ground dragon’s neck, Petra’s small head was busy mapping out the roadmap that would be necessary after they arrived at Mirula.

The end goal of this roadmap was, of course, to stop the actions of Al, who had betrayed Natsuki Subaru —but there was something beyond that.

In order to get to that point—

Petra: “—Hk.”

The dragon carriage finally burst through the town gate and arrived at Mirula. With that, Petra opened her mouth wide to speak, realizing that they had made it through the Augria Sand Dunes.

To do any of these things, Petra and the others must first seek the help of a certain individual—a person who was unable to enter the Augria Sand Dunes and bid farewell to Petra and the others at this location.

So, speaking in a paradoxical way—

Petra: “—We’re back, so lend us a hand! I know you’re listening, Clind-niisama!”

Indeed, Petra raised her voice and sought a wild card that could reduce any gap to zero.

3

Felt twisted her face into an exaggerated scowl at the small shadow darting past the corner of her vision.

Its form, colors, and sheen all provoked a visceral disgust within her, and though she had been sleeping in the slums with them for as long as she could remember, she could not feel any sense of camaraderie or affection toward them.

Felt, who had even slept while hugging a giant rat to survive the cold, was still reluctant to befriend even a single Zodda bug.

Truly, they were an abominable entity, worthy of being called an enemy of mankind.

Felt: “Seriously, I can’t stand those Zodda being everywhere…”

With their extraordinary vitality, Zodda bugs could establish habitable environments anywhere. They were often spotted in unsanitary places, but that was by no means an absolute prerequisite.

In fact, it was at this time that Felt caught a glimpse of a Zodda bug from her peripheral, inside a building that was properly maintained and well-kept—a manor in the noble district of the Royal Capital of Lugunica.

The place was opulent and lavish, filled with paintings and ornaments of a value Felt could not comprehend. Now bereft of its lord, the mansion still retained its luxurious splendor.

Felt: “Hey, that thread of yours can go “fwooosh” really far, yeah? So couldn’t you just get rid of some Zodda with it real quick?”

Yae: “Haah~, well here’s the thing Felt-sama. The Steel Thread Technique I use is an extremely rare technique that has had no master for centuries, y’know? In addition to skill, Yae-chan’s brilliant shinobi maid style can only be displayed when I have special rings for the steel threads made by the Master of Curse Tools, Groovy Gumlet. Yet you’re calling for someone like me over a Zodda bug of all things?”

Felt: “That was way too long, I barely even got half of that to stick. Why don’t you just get to the point?”

Yae: “I don’t wanna stain my beloved threads on something so filthy, so~ I’ll pass.”

Having said that, Yae turned her face away while tucking her ringed hands behind her back, to which Felt unenthusiastically responded with “Yeah, yeah, whatever.” Her eyes scanned right, then left, looking for the shadow she had seen earlier, but it appeared she had lost sight of it. That left her with an unpleasant feeling.

Felt: “Just ‘cause I can’t see them doesn’t mean they’re gone from this world, y’know… they’re not only still here, they sometimes fly right into people’s faces.”

Yae: “I understand. If it comes to that, I’ll be prepared to die~.”

Felt: “I want to say that you’re not gonna die, but brace yourself, just in case.”

Emotionally, she felt that resignation or despair were a more appropriate alternative than steeling herself with resolve.

As it was, the shadow of that Zodda bug she had seen prompted her and Yae to have an unexpected mutual understanding—and Felt, with a fresh perspective, took in the interior decor of the mansion in the Royal Capital, the Barielle estate.

A portion of Lugunica’s nobles residing outside the Royal Capital had secondary estates in the noble district, reserved for their periodic stays. The Astrea estate, where Felt was first forcibly taken and confined by Reinhard was no exception, and this mansion—whose construction was personally commissioned by Priscilla Barielle, had been built for an identical purpose.

Felt: “That princess. I’m sure she had people taking care of this place even while she wasn’t living here, but now she’s got Zodda bugs roaming everywhere. Maybe the maids lost all their motivation the moment their master croaked.”

Yae: “Oop, it’d be wise to avoid saying things like that in the presence of Al-sama, even as a provocation, okay~? It’s gonna make you sound like someone with a really nasty personality, and hearing someone badmouth the Madam is something I don’t feel good about, y’know~?”

Felt: “Huh? You’re telling me not to piss off the helmet bastard?”

Yae: “No, no, Al-sama surely wouldn’t lose his temper. But, I think he’ll be hurt. That is something I won’t be okay with.”

Lowering her voice just a little, Yae cocked her head slightly at the end of their exchange. Instantly, Felt registered a faint tension on her neck, and she perceived the presence of the nigh-invisible threads with her very soul.

The steel threads she had hesitated to use on the Zodda bug was once again coiled around Felt's neck.

Felt: "If you hurt me, that helmet bastard's going to be angry, right?"

Yae: "Maybe. But even so, isn't it a problem for you to say whatever you want, Felt-sama, especially for me as a helpful all-purpose maid meant to eliminate any obstacle for my master?"

Felt: "There's something off about you calling him your master. The relationship between you and that helmet bastard isn't really that of master and servant. That said, I guess talking so high and mighty from a safe distance is lame."

As she replied, Felt held up both her hands to indicate to Yae that she had no intention of resisting. After watching her for a moment, Yae shrugged and retracted the thread.

Still, she made clear her intention to mercilessly send out her threads and make a statement by cutting off Felt's finger, or even a limb if necessary, should Felt make any suspicious movement. — Having observed Yae's speed and precision, there was merit to having made the provocation.

Felt: "I already knew it, but you're not someone I can handle…"

Currently, Felt and Yae were the only two that were staying back in the Barielle manor.

If Felt could slip past Yae's watchful eyes or defeat Yae alone, she could escape her current status of being a captive princess that was meant to keep the Felt Camp in check.

Yae: "That strong will to win is just what I'd expect of a candidate in the Royal Selection, it makes this humble servant's heart flutter at such a noble mindset, but please don't get any reckless ideas, okay~? There're some people, like thugs or Heinkel-sama, who I can tie up or slice apart without remorse, but I don't like doing that to lovely girls."

Felt: "I see. In that case, remember this too. I dislike words like "cute", "sweet", or "that really suits you". Remember how many times you've called me those."

Yae: "Hyaa~, scary. By the way, what're you going to do when you count them?"

Felt: "When it's my turn to get you back, I'll kick your ass that many times."

Incidentally, Felt had already decided that she would kick Yae's ass three times. The helmet bastard—Aldebaran and the Divine Dragon, as well as Heinkel each had their own amount of revenge she kept score of.

Felt always precisely settled each and every one of her debts and loans. Whether they were of gratitude or resentment mattered not to her.

Felt: "It's not every day you get to kick a Dragon's ass, much less the Divine Dragon's. If you think about it like that, being held hostage is pretty funny, huh?"

Yae: "So tough~, you're so mentally strong that even Yae-chan here is intimidated. Even if that wasn't the case, I'm afraid of you seducing him, so I don't want you and Vol-sama getting near each other, Felt-sama."

Felt: "Even so, having Reinhard's dad watch over the Divine Dragon is in pretty poor taste if you ask me."

Yae: "With Heinkel-sama's desire for the Dragon's Blood, I suppose an arm, or two or three, might erupt from his throat. I hope he doesn't get carried away and actually attack Vol-sama."

Yae smiled mischievously with a finger to her lip, but the contents of her speech held absolutely no such cuteness.

In fact, from Yae's point of view, even if this imaginary scenario were to come true—that is, if Heinkel were to recklessly get himself killed by the Divine Dragon, she would most likely remain unfazed. It was a rather ill-natured arrangement of things, including her attitude toward Heinkel, who was supposed to be her comrade.

Of course, the Divine Dragon was far too conspicuous to be allowed near the Royal Capital; moreover, keeping it near Felt, who had a beguiling effect on its mind, was out of the question, so it was inevitable that their arrangement would be skewed.

Yae: "You're not just a beauty who can topple a nation, Felt-sama, but also a beautiful girl who can topple a Dragon."

Felt: "That's another time I'm going to kick your ass… But tell me the truth, can the old man really get that Dragon's Blood he wants from that brainless Divine Dragon?"

Yae: "Who knows? Ah~, but in the case that doesn't work, Al-sama will still keep his promise, even if it means retrieving the older Dragon's Blood that's supposedly stored somewhere in the castle. That way, Heinkel-sama's sleeping wife should wake up. But from your point of view, Felt-sama, you're not happy with this arrangement, are you?"

Felt: "Damn right. Frankly, I'm not a fan of that approach."

She had already directly said as much to Heinkel regarding the matter, despite his endless excuses.

Felt did not like that plan. However, it was also unreasonable for outsiders to simply deny the thoughts, actions, and decisions made by the people actually involved.

So even if it resulted in the awakening of Reinhard's mother, Felt wished to take a different path to achieve that summit than what Heinkel wanted.

Felt: "—? What's up?"

Suddenly, Felt, sitting slumped on the sofa in the parlor, noticed Yae's gaze watching her intently and she frowned.

Yae shook her head with a “No, no~” at Felt’s response,

Yae: “I just thought it was unexpected. That you, Felt-sama, want to wake up Heinkel-sama’s wife… that is, the Sword Saint’s mother.”

Felt: “…You know, that bastard sits next to me when we all eat together.”

Yae: “—?”

At first glance, Yae had a puzzled look on her face when Felt said something seemingly unrelated. Felt continued to speak, ignoring Yae’s confused reaction.

In the Felt Camp, when it was time for a meal, Flam and Grassis would call for everyone, and with the exception of Felt, who had a customary seat at the head of the table, the seats would be filled based on when they arrived at the dining hall. Reinhard usually sat next to Felt at the head of the table.

And—

Felt: “While we’re eating, I’ve got the best view of the side of his face. If that aspect were to improve a bit, the food would taste better, yeah?”

Yae: “…I stand corrected. Rather than a beautiful girl, Felt-sama is an ikemen~!”

Felt: “I have no idea what you’re talking about, but I’m kicking your ass an extra time for that.”

Yae: “Ehh~, but why~?!”

Yae pouted in dissatisfaction as Felt turned her face away, replying no further.

She had become used to being held hostage, which was nothing short of disgraceful, but the trick to maintaining mental composure in such a situation was to not reveal too much verbally.

And so, when keeping someone who has baited a fish in reasonable suspense—

Yae: “Yes, yes, I’m sorry if I have upset you. For now, please take this.”

As she spoke, Yae gently handed over a silver tray on which was placed some kind of bread with toasted fillings as a snack, to which Felt’s stomach growled.

Yae chuckled at the sound,

Yae: “There are Zodda bugs even in a place like this?”

Felt: “Those fuckers are everywhere. Even in my stomach… don’t make me think about something that disgusting. Hand it over already.”

She threw a glare at the bantering Yae, and snatched the silver tray from her hands. She bit into the hasamiyaki as it exuded a faintly warm aroma, its pleasant flavor being neither too strong nor too weak. The taste was to Felt’s liking, so she met Yae’s eyes with a smile and thumbs-up.

Yae: “How’d you like it, the hasamiyaki? Surprisingly, it’s Yae-chan’s one and only specialty dish~.”

Felt: “Damn tasty… but, if it’s your only one then it’s a different story. You’re more or less a maid, right? Or maybe the whole maid thing was a lie, and you’re actually an assassin or something.”

Yae: “H~mm, assassination is one of the main jobs of a shinobi, but the part about me being a maid is the truth. It’s just that cleaning is more my forte than making a li~ttle bit of food. Ah, I was lying when I said my one and only specialty dish is hasamiyaki. I’m also good at wraps.”

Felt: “In the end, isn’t that just the same in the regards to sandwiching ingredients between bread?”

Incidentally, Felt’s impression was that vegetables comprised more of the ingredients used in a wrap. As a matter of fact, she did not know what the finer discrepancies between wraps and hasamiyaki were.

At any rate, she was relieved that even the captured hostages were properly fed. On that front, she would not have to suspect that Aldebaran's words were falsehoods.

Although, even if that was the case, the issue of the currently absent Aldebaran's actions was still present.

Aldebaran was off doing something separately from Felt and Yae, his destination being—

Felt: "—The helmet bastard, is he seriously planning to free that Sin Archbishop?"

If she were to believe his words, then that declaration—that he was going to free a Sin Archbishop, the Gluttony imprisoned in the Royal Capital's Prison Tower, was something she would also have to believe.

Presently, the Kingdom of Lugunica had two Sin Archbishops in custody: Wrath and Gluttony. Felt had had direct contact with Sin Archbishops at Pristella, where their menace and inhumanity had left a deep impression on her. She wondered how the world could have such irredeemable people.

Felt: "In Pristella, I encountered Gluttony… either the elder or younger brother of the guy who's locked up, as well as the younger sister. I also went with Reinhard to transport Wrath. So let me tell you, what the helmet bastard is trying to do is insane."

Yae: "That's probably true~. In all things, any truly great deeds cannot be accomplished while sane. Everything that Al-sama has orchestrated up to this point, haven't they been extraordinary events?"

Felt: "Though it's not a question of numbers, it's gotten to the point where you start to wonder just how many things have been overcome. Not to mention, using the Witch to stall Reinhard, that's something I can still understand. But, a Sin Archbishop?"

Yae: "Naturally, that'd be something necessary for Al-sama's objective, ri~ght?"

Felt: "Not even you know the specifics?"

Crossing her hands behind her back, Yae smiled without replying to Felt's words.

Only, this reply was something she had expected. She did not know Yae's true intentions in following Aldebaran, but no matter the astonishing circumstances she might find herself in, it felt as if she possessed such an intense conviction, obsession, that she would have no intention of parting from Aldebaran's side.

Therefore, she would not wait for answers; it was Felt's duty to search for one.

Felt: "…Those Gluttony bastards, they insolently gorge themselves on people's Names and Memories."

Like Crusch, whose Memories had been devoured, or the story of the Name of Anastasia's Knight, Julius, being eaten. Then there was the girl in the Emilia Camp, for whom she had heard Subaru was searching for a way to wake up. —There was perhaps a possibility that the latter girl was not unrelated to the Sleeping Beauty that Felt and her people were familiar with.

In any case—

Felt: "—There's something he wants to feed them. If not that, then there's no way he'd do something like dragging out the shitty Gluttony bastard."

Kept captive with her freedom restrained, Felt's soul refused to yield.

From someone in this world who was surely just as reliable as Reinhard in cornering Aldebaran, that was a life philosophy taught to her by Rom-jii—"live strong".

Felt: "Chomp."

Boldly, while filling her belly with hasamiyaki, Felt devoted herself to actualizing this life philosophy.

By never ceasing her thoughts, by never halting her steps, born would be the margin to which her hands could reach. In preparation for that moment, she licked up the sauce from the hasamiyaki from the corner of her mouth with her tongue.

And to her side—

Yae: “…Wah, there really are Zodda bugs. Even though it’s only been a few days since the custodian was dismissed, this is aw~ful~.”

Whether it was the same one that Felt had seen earlier, or a different one, Yae scowled as she seemed to have discovered the enemy of mankind, grumbling out complaints.

4

—A cramped, dark, suffocating place it was.

Even the phrasing of “solitary confinement cell” being too mild, this space showed no signs of any intention to keep that which it imprisoned alive. And yet, to consolidate that space and the existence isolated within as “cruel” or “cold-hearted” would itself be an act of utmost violence.

After all, imprisoned there was one who had perpetrated numerous vices throughout the world, a blasphemer without peer.

There was a definite demarcation between the manner of imprisonment used generally and this “black coffin” of confinement, in which an existence was isolated from the world, making breathing and heartbeat unrequired. Henceforth, provisions for the purpose of respecting life were unnecessary, in that space.

For that very reason, the place could not have been more appropriate to accurse the lives of one another.

???: “—My bad. Seems like I’ve got plenty of frustration built up. Really couldn’t hold myself back.”

With the sound of footsteps rising from the cold, hard ground, he leaned his back against the wall of the cramped room. The rear of the helmet hit the wall, and the sound of steel striking rock harshly disturbed the frigid atmosphere of the stone chamber.

Attempting to catch his faintly disheveled breath, collapsed at the man's —Aldebaran's feet, was a gasping figure, lying limply and face-down.

That there, was the blasphemer upon whom the Kingdom had bestowed this stone chamber fashioned into a solitary cell.

Having been defeated without riposte by Aldebaran, left to taste the floor was an unsightly loser—Sin Archbishop of the Witch Cult, representing Gluttony, Roy Alphard in the flesh.

Aldebaran: "…"

A deep inhale, a long exhale.

Forcibly taking deep breaths to regulate his disarrayed cardiopulmonary functions, Aldebaran looked around the rock chamber which had become horribly messy in only a minute of actual time, and shrugged his shoulders.

With cracked walls and smashed up floors, it would be valid to describe the utter wreckage that had befallen the cramped room, one that had received nary a care to maintain it, as having been so messy that there was no space left for anyone to place their feet. Considering it was only the size of a coffee shop bathroom, just how in the world had such a huge scuffle unfolded in this place?

But then again, it was not as if this huge scuffle was one he had scuffled in by choice.

Aldebaran: "…I just said that if you obey and follow me then I won't take your life, and you had to go do that immediately afterwards. Even if you were gonna turn coat and rebel, you'd usually wait a lil' while longer for your chance."

Roy: "—. Hahah~, you say some funny stuff~, helmet uncle."

Aldebaran's words, laced with lament, brought out a dogged laugh from Roy, the latter laying sprawled out on the ground.

Still laying prone, Roy directed his glaring gaze to Aldebaran beside the wall, and while licking his lips with that long tongue of his in a lascivious manner,

Roy: "By that, do you mean that we, who cannot help but always be starving and starving and starving and starving, must learn to wait for permission? Such a thing, would that no~t be fair grounds to argue child abuse?"

Aldebaran: "Unfortunately, I've got no obligation to raise an evil brat like you. It's said that in the Showa era, neighbors would help to discipline kids even if they weren't part of the family, but this is Lugunica, and the current era ain't Showa. Well, I did beat you up this much. I ain't gonna be able to deny the abuse allegations."

Placing his hand over the metal fitting on his helmet, Aldebaran rang out a clackering sound, to which Roy let out a jolly "Haha-".

To respond with such an attitude after having been disciplined by having both his arms and legs broken in a scrupulous fashion, he truly was an eerie brat. At the very least, even in the Showa era in which corporal punishment was largely preferred, this level of discipline would not have been acceptable.

Nonetheless, Roy Alphard was beyond being an eerie brat; he was a Sin Archbishop first and foremost. Hence, he was hopeful that hedging a risk like this would be deemed within permissible limits.

Aldebaran: "Well, it's not like I thought this affair would go that smoothly anyway."

So grumbled Aldebaran, silently concluding the count at six-thousand and twenty-two in his mind.

This numerical count, which no longer necessitated any explanation, amounted to the number of attempts Aldebaran had required to subdue a defiant Roy Alphard. If he were to enumerate how many bones and teeth had been broken, the number would grow to be several times that, easily. That was how much of a handful disciplining this evil brat had been.

Aldebaran: “Seriously, I never thought I’d end up having to go through the same kinda trial and error I did with Reinhard…”

Utilizing his moniker of “Bizarre Eating” to the fullest, Roy Alphard wielded the power of Eclipse to reproduce the abilities and techniques of those eaten by his Authority of Gluttony—therefore, being that Roy was essentially stockpiling innumerable warriors within his own self, ditching any ineffective tactics on the spot in favor of immediately bringing out novel fighting styles, this affair had bore a close resemblance to the one against Reinhard, who had adopted Divine Protections adequate to adapt to any given circumstance.

As luck would have it, Aldebaran had already attained experience points in excess of one-hundred and thirty thousand from his battle with Reinhard, thus he had reached a feat in excellence by dealing with a likewise exceptional foe while staying within four digits.

Aldebaran: “Regardless, you were captured right after fighting at the Tower. Considering you weren’t even given proper treatment after that, you’ve sure put up one hell of a fight.”

Roy: “Ehh~? Being so completely and utterly shut down in everything we tried to do, it was our first time experiencing such a thing, and yet, don’t tell me you’re trying to comfort us, uncle? If so~, the number one method to comfort us would be…”

Aldebaran: ““Gluttonous drinking gluttony” will be ringing in my ears till tomorrow. Just hearing it makes this old man’s stomach shudder in fear, digesting fried food’s only getting tougher and tougher for people my age.”

Roy: “How unfriendly~.”

A smile over his mouth lined with fangs, Roy regarded Aldebaran with eyes opened wide.

That gaze of his was tinged with interest and appetite and curiosity and appetite and sadism and appetite and, at any rate it was a full-course meal that made a chill run down Aldebaran's spine. The pain of his limbs having been broken was even now still surpassed by a feeling of hunger, and that fact had been the reason for the chill; so exhaustively distorted was that way of being.

To harbor sympathy for him, he wished not. After all, chosen by the Witch Factors just like the Witches, the Sin Archbishops were likewise detestable pariahs who from birth had been separated from the rails of normalcy.

Aldebaran: "Good grief… Shall I explain the situation to you?"

Roy: "Huh~, you'll be kind enough to do that? What's this what's this, started feeling pity for the child whose arms and legs you broke? But guess so. There's no way a decent adult could remain composed after shattering the limbs of such an innocent child-. Well, calling you a decent adult with this sort of appearance and helmet over the head, uncle, is what you'd call debata~ble."

Aldebaran: "You sure do prattle on… This place's the Royal Capital of Lugunica, far removed from Pleiades Watchtower where you were captured. Your counterpart—"

Roy: "—Ah~, he died, right?"

Aldebaran: "…"

Roy: "Even we, are properly aware of that. Family bonds are far deeper and stronger than you might think, uncle… Sorry sorry, that was a lie. We simply reckoned as such because we can't feel Ley's Witch Factor. Besides…"

Aldebaran: "Besides?"

Roy: "Even if it's impossible to tell from the outside, those within these frozen confines are still able to feel the exterior a bit. Despite such a tight seal, for everyone to be so rattled is pretty patheti~c."

With the repulsive note of his lips being licked, Roy impassively spoke of his counterpart's death. Aldebaran was unwittingly unnerved by his attitude.

His equanimity in accepting his counterpart's death, his sibling Ley Batenkaitos, was also part of it, but his attestation that that "black coffin"—a seal belonging to the same lineage as Ol Shamak, had the margin to permit the apprehension of the outside world, was what truly astonished Aldebaran.

And, putting aside Aldebaran's astonishment, Roy swivelled his body, vocalizing a "Here we go"; now facing upwards, the former's figure was cast upside down in his field of view.

Roy: "Ah~, that was suffocating. This is much better… so? Uncle, based on our Memories you're someone party to the Royal Selection, right~? For you to release us, a Sin Archbishop, like this, would that not bring notoriety to your precious Princess—"

Aldebaran: "In addition to the fighting styles, you also ought to have taken in all kinds of ways of thinking, yeah? If you don't wanna be thought of as an incompetent fool who only gathers tools but can't do shit, then think before you ask."

Roy: "Wow, such outrage. Stirred the hornet's nest? So nice, quite nice, very nice, isn't it nice, because it is probably nice, surely it is very nice! Won't ask any further than that. Certainly no questions like if you're taut in despair because of your precious, oh so precious Princess's death… Gah-!"

Aldebaran: "That so. That'd be helpful. Thank you for your consideration."

Roy's facial expression as he bore a baleful smile was acutely strained once his fractured shoulder was vigorously stepped on. Meticulously did Aldebaran grind his heel down into the fractured bones, lowering his foot.

The compeer was a Sin Archbishop. Though already distinct, from the perspective of proceeding affairs according to plan, he could be denoted as the worst possible party. Even if him snapping to bite forthwith upon the seal's undoing had been anticipated, it was by no means an anticipation that he had been glad about being on the money regarding.

A Sin Archbishop, the kind of enemy who if not a necessary factor for the plan, he would gladly drop down the Great Waterfall, him imprisoned within the coffin as was.

However—

Roy: "…Hk-, to yet go so far that you'd need us. What a tribulation you're in, right~, uncle?"

Aldebaran: "This guy just never stops yapping. Wish your parents'd teach you to pipe down."

Roy: "Birth parent? Or foster parent? The former died upon our birth and took our little sister with them as well, and the latter would surely~ be pretty incompatible with you, uncle."

Aldebaran: "No matter which, I get that neither would be very effective. —No choice."

Even though a dialogue was miraculously established, there lay nothing to gain from his response. Garrulous hollow tirades were a signature characteristic of the Sin Archbishops, and Gluttony was not innocent of that charge either.

Only odiousness and repugnance exacerbated, and rather than comfort it only deteriorated the state of mind of the living.

Aldebaran: "…"

As Roy lay down whilst facing upwards like a carp atop a cutting board, he halfway conceded to him and squatted.

Interchanging gazes through the helmet with Aldebaran as he looked below, the upside-down Roy rounded his eyes in curiosity alongside a tinge of ache from the stomping of his fractured bones.

Roy: "What's this what's this? Uncle, what're you gonna do next? Teach a lesson to a disobedient child through torture? But you know~, we already have gotten used to that type of pain, you see~."

Aldebaran: "Relax. I'm the same as you, I ain't got much faith in using pain to compel others into doing my bidding. If sentiments surpass the pain, then that ain't gonna make the opponent yield. That's why."

Roy: "That's why~?"

Aldebaran: "What I'll tie you with, is neither pain nor sentiment. — A promise."

Enunciating so, Aldebaran inserted his thumb into the jaw portion of his helmet and bit his fingertip. Accompanying the sharp pain emerged a drip of blood, the dyed finger then being pointed towards Roy.

Subsequently, whilst he pressed the finger tinged in blood against the bare body of the collapsed blasphemer,

Aldebaran: "Don't pose needless resistance. Though I was made to practice enough to be able to paint it with my eyes closed… this would be the first time I'm testing its efficacy."

Roy: "To scribble on the bare body of a child with blood, now that's an interest vulgar enough to make even us Sin Archbishops aghast. To even perform such a deviant act, what do you want us to do? Destroy the country or something?"

Aldebaran: "I don't intend that, and I could do that by myself if I wanted to. I've gone out of my way to free a detestable lil' brat like you. It's something that only you can do."

Roy: "Only us, huh~?"

As the bloody finger traced his body, Roy flashed his fangs in a grin as he enjoyed the ticklish sensation.

That obscene look in his eyes, that tone, that exuded presence, all were urging Aldebaran to vocalize the portion he had yet to put to words.

Whilst peevish that it might appear as though he were going along with the other party's intentions by conforming to that urge, he responded.

The reason why Aldebaran had unleashed Roy Alphard, that was—

Aldebaran: "—There's someone I'd like to have you eat with your Authority. I won't be taking no for an answer."

Roy: "Hmmm? Well, I guess that's so. You did release us. It couldn't have been anything more than that~."

Inclining his head with his back to the floor, Roy's cheeks contorted at Aldebaran's demand.

As to whether the intent behind that smile had been an acceptance or a rejection, Aldebaran knew not. Regardless of which it was, Roy's own will was irrelevant.

The means by which he would be made to abide had been inscribed upon Roy Alphard's flesh, engraved into his soul.

Roy: "—A curse mark bound by an Oath. Thorough to the point of obstinacy, isn't it~? Did you come up with this by yourself, uncle? Or perhaps you are echoing some deranged Curse Arts User?"

Aldebaran: "Echoing. There's no doubt in regards to them being completely deranged, but that person wasn't a Curse Arts User. They're a magician. Without a doubt, the most supreme magician throughout the history of this world. Regardless of their personality."

Roy: "And the conditions for the Oath~?"

Aldebaran: "If you eat someone without my permission, you'll die in a fiery blaze along with your soul."

Informing him succinctly, Aldebaran lifted Roy's body onto his shoulders without glancing at his face.

The blasphemer had indulged himself in Bizarre Eating, making a mess of his feed as he pleased; his body, however, was light. Given that his position was that of having snuck into the Prison Tower where Roy had been sealed, him being light was a great help.

He had more or less knocked out all the guards, but it would be best for him to maintain prudence on the return.

Aldebaran: “After this, we’ll link back up with Yae and lil’ miss Felt —”

In order to have support in the Royal Capital, he had ordered Yae to keep watch over Felt and left them waiting in the Barielle Villa. Leip Barielle had had that manor constructed originally, but those plans had been largely altered through Priscilla’s meddling, and thus the residence had been completed in its current form.

All around, it was a mansion that had been left with the vestiges of Priscilla’s favored designs; the fact that they needed a base notwithstanding, it was not a place at which Aldebaran wished to sojourn overlong.

Hence, he would quickly pick up Yae and Felt, then converge with “Aldebaran” and Heinkel outside the Royal Capital.

Roy: “Come to think of it, we also said this earlier~.”

To Aldebaran, who had been ruminating things over internally, Roy suddenly began speaking, being carried atop the former’s shoulder. From a sidelong glance, Aldebaran could tell that Roy, with his limp limbs, was gazing at the floor.

Following that gaze, Aldebaran knit his brow, wondering what the matter was.

Thereupon—

Roy: “That before you took us out, uncle, even within the frozen confines of that blackness, we could still sense our surroundings, even if only dimly. But you see, this place is completely isolated from the outside world~. In such a state, visitations would be utterly preposterous, and so not even rats could enter, let alone a single insect. And yet~.”

Aldebaran: “—Ah?”

Roy: “Zodda bugs, it’s quite the unusual affair for them to have gotten in here unnoticed, isn’t it~?”

Roy's slimy words, they were consistent with the small bug reflected in Aldebaran's vision.

Crawling on the cold ground, their form eerie and repulsive, was a Zodda bug, an insect abhorred by everyone in this world. They were the equivalent to cockroaches, which could be found anywhere, so it was not strange in the slightest for them to be present in the Prison Tower. —Aldebaran thought no such thing.

Aldebaran: "—Hk, I fucked up!"

Unable to control the dread welling up inside of him, Aldebaran forgot to be considerate of the fact that atop his shoulders was being carried a Roy of broken limbs, thus he hastily rushed out of the solitary cell, and out of the Prison Tower.

Were he to not expedite his escape to the utmost, before long Aldebaran's infiltration would be exposed—

???: "—That's enough."

The moment he set foot outside of the Prison Tower, that voice struck Aldebaran's eardrums.

Concomitantly, a numbing drop in temperature upon his skin he felt; and likewise perceivable was the creaking of his helmet due to the thermal swing compared to the interior of the tower. Powdery snow fluttering down through his environs, the arrival of this out-of-season cold wave shook Aldebaran's psyche beyond what a farmer's would be as they imagined the damage to their crop.

A voice he knew well, that of a silver bell.

Treading upon the thin layer of snow that had piled upon the sprawling garden in the vicinity of the Prison Tower, her long, silver hair glistening amidst the snowscape, she gallantly made her approach.

Always did those beautiful amethyst eyes house a calm, gentle light. —But, such did not apply now. To an unmistakable extent, those amethyst eyes were blazing aflare.

Beyond a shadow of a doubt, by her ire they were blazing—

???: "—Return Subaru and Beatrice."

A silent, dignified declaration of purpose, a demeanor permitted exclusively to a ruler of sorts.

Even if for only a moment, that impression was indeed given, for that was the extent to which the woman standing there was so beautiful, so lovely, so noble.

Aldebaran: "…"

Breathing visibly white breaths, Aldebaran had ended up freezing in his tracks. Standing before him, atop the snow, the Witch of Glaciation—Emilia, lifted her well-shaped eyebrows firmly, and declared.

Emilia: "Right now, I'm reaaally angry, so I won't be holding back even if it's you, Al."

Chapter 25:
Emilia was Enraged

1

Emilia: “Right now, I’m reaaally angry, so I won’t be holding back even if it’s you, Al.”

Speaking thus, the Witch of Glaciation, having transformed the vicinity of the Prison Tower into a wintry snowscape, cast him a stern gaze.

The irate emotions ablaze in those amethyst eyes, spurred a dry sensation in Aldebaran’s throat.

Even in the Empire, many a time had he borne witness to the sight of her kicking her long legs with all her might, doing battle with a look of seriousness on her beautiful countenance. But, that look of seriousness had always been deeply tinged with her courage and thoughtfulness, never colored with the hue of fury.

Hence, this was the first time.

Aldebaran: “…”

The first time that he had come across a scene where Emilia’s eyes were filled with anger, casting an intense gaze upon somebody.

Not to mention, to think it was a moment in which that anger was directed fully and entirely unto himself, even the act of imagining that.

Aldebaran: “…To say that I never even imagined it… guess that’d be asking for too much.”

Hijacking the dragonhusk of the Divine Dragon Volcanica, and mobilizing the Witch of Envy with the objective of halting the Sword Saint Reinhard, he was an enemy of the world. —Even before all that, the moment he sealed away Natsuki Subaru, even if not on the scale of the whole world, there were a great number of people who thus became enemies of Aldebaran.

Emilia was at the forefront of that list. This confrontation was the inevitable price he had to pay for the decision he had made.

???: “What’s this~, how peculiar? It seems like you’ve angered her quite a bit~, uncle. That onee-san is terrifying when you anger her, did you know~?”

Aldebaran: “Shut up.”

???: “Ohh, scary, scary.”

Carried on Aldebaran’s shoulders, the immobilized Roy sneered in ridicule.

The circumstances of Roy’s capture had been through combat with Natsuki Subaru’s group at the Pleiades Watchtower—naturally, Emilia was also present there. It made sense for him to know her.

Even before that, Roy had eaten many Names and Memories in Pristella, and it would not have been strange for some of those among them to have known Emilia.

Hence, what he currently ought to focus on was not Roy’s slimy persiflage, but rather—

Aldebaran: “—. Yo, what a coincidence to run into you here, miss —”

Laboring to select the words for his first vocalization, Aldebaran opened his mouth.

But, unfortunately for the effort he had spent to select those first words, it had been meaningless.

That was because—

Aldebaran: “—Hk.”

Halfway through Aldebaran’s utterance, which aimed to examine his opponent’s approach, Emilia pitched forward, ushering an explosion of the snow accumulated by her feet, her silver hair fluttering as she kicked off the ground.

Amidst his snow-blanketed vision, directly after he perceived the glisten of her fluttering silver hair—

Emilia: “Hiyaah!!”

—Sparing no measure, a gauntlet of ice was driven directly into Aldebaran’s solar plexus.

2

—Rewinding time a bit before that blow to the solar plexus.

???: “Subaru and everyone else…!”

???: “That’s the word from one of my people. Everyone in the Tower has been taken out.”

The one who informed them of this was Felt, who was staying in the Royal Capital at the time.

It was their first reunion since the events of the Watergate City of Pristella, but they had no time to catch up on old times.

To begin with, Emilia’s reason for visiting the Royal Capital was not a pleasant one—she had to report to the Royal Castle that Priscilla Barielle had lost her life in the Vollachian Empire.

Emilia was deeply grieved to have to bring back news that would significantly affect the Royal Selection and, above all, sadden the many who knew and loved Priscilla.

What Felt had told Emilia was a huge blow.

Emilia: “Al…”

Why would he do something like that? Those were words Emilia could not bring herself to say.

If Al were to do something reckless now, there was no way it would not be related to Priscilla's death. Al's devastation at losing someone so important to him placed him into an unbearable state, which was why Emilia and the others listened to Subaru's plea and saw them off to the Pleiades Watchtower.

She believed that this would give Al a chance to recover—or at least a chance to move forward.

But despite that—

???: "—Felt-sama, may I ask you for more details?"

Next to Emilia, who was biting her lip and clenching her fists, was Otto, who had come to the Royal Capital with her, and asked Felt.

In contrast to Emilia, who was overwhelmed by the devastating news, Otto's expression, with his eyes fixed on Felt, was calm, and his voice was steady. But Emilia knew what it meant when Otto acted like this—that he was at his angriest.

Felt sensed the quiet pressure emanating from Otto's anger, which was well-known to everyone in Emilia's camp, and crossed her arms, replying, "Yeah, sure,"

Felt: "The Knight nii-chan and the little Spirit are being held captive by the helmet bastard. I don't know how, but it seems he doesn't intend to kill them."

Otto: "No intention to kill…? What about the others at the Tower?"

Felt: "Flam contacted me and said they're okay. Meili and Emilia-neechan's maid are safe. But our Sensei and that Garfiel guy got pretty beat up. It looks like he didn't take their lives."

Otto: "—. Is that so? Thank you."

Felt: "That ain't something to thank me for. I would have felt worse if I knew how they were and didn't tell you."

After telling her everything without hesitation, Felt looked at Emilia, who was still clenching her fists. Struck by the intensity of Felt's gaze, Emilia gasped.

Then, Felt continued as Emilia's cheeks stiffened.

Felt: "We've decided on our plan. We'll use Reinhard to get back to our territory as quickly as possible. We need to consult with Rom-jii and figure out what we need to do next."

Emilia: "Isn't that the Astrea Domain? If so, it's close to the Augria Sand Dunes, so we can go with you, Felt-chan—"

Otto: "—No, we should not do that, Emilia-sama."

Emilia: "What?"

Emilia leaned eagerly forward, but Otto's calm voice stopped her.

However, Emilia was confused, as she did not understand why she was being stopped. After all, she had to rush to the Tower where Subaru and the others were in trouble.

Emilia: "Is it because Reinhard will have a hard time if there are more of us? Well, it would reaaally be difficult to lighten up anymore, but I'll do my best…!"

Felt: "Even if Emilia and Zodda Bug-niichan join in, it won't make much difference to that guy's workload. But that's not what you're saying, right?"

Otto: "Regardless of your perception of me, Felt-sama… yes."

Felt and Otto nodded to each other, while question marks flew above Emilia's head.

However, although Emilia was unable to keep up with what the two of them were thinking, she held no doubt that those thoughts were correct and had been thoroughly considered.

Emilia: "Felt-chan, be careful. Tell Reinhard as well. As for Al…"

Felt: "Naturally, when it comes to the helmet bastard, I can't make any promises. Sorry 'bout that."

Emilia: "—. No, I'm glad you clearly told me that you cannot make any promises."

Their reunion was short-lived, and the content of their conversation had not been pleasant in the slightest. Still, Emilia gave Felt a parting hug, and saw the girl, whose expression had become strange, off from the Royal Castle.

Afterward, Felt and the others had been flown to the Astrea Domain by Reinhard, thereupon, it was a matter of performing a large variety of tasks that would be absolutely vital, even so…

Emilia: "Subaru…"

After Felt's tempestuous departure, Emilia remained in the royal residence with her gaze cast downward.

Even now, she had not been able to relax her tightly clenched fists. Felt had said that everyone sent to the Pleiades Watchtower had suffered terribly.

However, among them, the one Emilia was most anxious about was her Knight, Subaru.

Even in the Empire, he had put in a great effort for the sake of Rem and Spica, he had fought alongside Abel, had been shrunk down to a child, had grown big again, and yet he had not been able to save Priscilla.

The way he had punished himself, by having his many friends from the Empire beat him up, was something she could not bear to watch. And yet, the kindness Subaru had shown in consideration of Al was betrayed—.

Emilia: "I…"

A strange sensation had been lit deep within her chest, and it bubbled forth, making Emilia aware of the heat within her own heart.

A feeling that was neither sad nor heartbreaking, it was an emotion that Emilia had rarely harboured, and was thus greatly perplexing to her.

A sensation like this, within her chest, in the depths of her eyes, at the very core of her heart, this feeling as if vigorously boiling, the last time she had felt this way was—during her confrontation with Regulus, back in Pristella.

At Regulus who had bound the hearts of his brides, Sylphy and the others, for utterly selfish reasons, Emilia had been truly, truly furious. The same rage as back then, or perhaps one even greater, now burned within her.

Otto: “Emilia-sama, thank you for granting my plea.”

Emilia: “Otto-kun…”

Emilia, who had realized that she was greatly furious, to the extent of being nearly unable to contain it, had intuitively understood that Otto, who wore a calm expression, was also feeling the same.

That was to be expected. After all, being worried for Subaru and the others, Otto was one among those who had accompanied Emilia and the others to the Empire. This state, could not be allowed to continue—

Emilia: “Eeep!”

Making a loud thwack sound, Emilia slapped her own cheeks with both hands. It was an act so unexpected that Otto exclaimed “E-Emilia-sama?” in astonishment.

Feeling sorry about that, Emilia lowered her hands from her stinging cheeks,

Emilia: “Just now, my mind was going haywire, and I didn’t feel like I would be able to speak properly, that’s why. But now, I feel alright…! Well, the alright part was a lie, but I can speak properly.”

Otto: “…Is that so. In that case I too shall—.”

Emilia: “Yikes!”

As Emilia nodded, a thwack resounded as Otto also slapped his own cheeks the same way she did. Having done so with such a strength, Emilia was startled by the sound that was loud enough to invoke doubts about an impending nosebleed.

However, Otto did not get a nosebleed, but his cheeks were likely just as red as Emilia's own,

Otto: "—. I shall explain the reason behind why we did not accompany Felt-sama. It is because there would be no point to us going and… to prepare for an unlikely possibility."

Emilia: "…Please continue."

Emilia did not interrupt the explanation that Otto, with both his hands upon his cheeks, was giving.

She had questions. She had plenty she wanted to say. But first, she would listen to everything the other person had to say. For Otto would have already prepared a proper reply for nearly everything Emilia was concerned about.

Otto: "If Reinhard-san is on the front lines, then there is no point sending in anyone based on their military might. Felt-sama must also understand that. Then, the reason why she still decided to return to her domain would be—"

Emilia: "—That's… so she could prepare?"

Otto: "Correct. Just think about it. Aside from Natsuki-san and the others, if Felt-sama's companions in the Tower were attacked, Reinhard-san would obviously appear. Despite all of that, Al-san… That man took the plunge."

Finally, Emilia began to understand what Otto was trying to say.

Reinhard was overwhelmingly strong. Most likely, of the people Emilia knew—no, even including the people she did not know, Reinhard was the strongest in the world. Puck had said so himself, so it had to be true.

Understanding that he would clash against Reinhard, it was strange to expect that Al had nothing prepared. Meaning, Al had definitely prepared something, and so even Reinhard could be in danger.

Emilia: "Felt-chan was worried about Reinhard, so she went back in order to prepare… But then, what about us? If we were preparing, we probably should do so with Felt-chan and all of the others…"

Otto: "We are the ones after Reinhard-san, that Felt-sama and the others have prepared for."

Emilia: "—. I see. If he knows Reinhard is coming, and he was preparing for that, and she is planning for that preparation… Umm."

Otto: "That's right. Of course, if we begin talking about preparing for preparations, then there would be no end to the discussion. The reason behind that man's reckless actions is because of what happened in the Empire… even if his plan is thorough, it does not seem likely he would have had much time to prepare."

Emilia: "…Mm, yeah, that's right."

Thanks to the careful and detailed explanation, Emilia's understanding had caught up to Otto and the others. While Emilia admired the depth with which he thought, she could not help but feel terribly and profoundly sad when Otto intentionally shifted from calling him Al-san to "that man."

Otto had a strong sense of camaraderie. Among Emilia's friends, his was surely the strongest. It was what made him so reliable, but it also forced him to make painful compromises.

Nevertheless—

Emilia: "…I too, don't know what to think, Al."

He had a reason. There had to be one. But, even if he had a reason, there were some things that she could not allow or forgive.

She was worried about Subaru. Was Beatrice okay? She had heard that Garfiel was injured. Petra and Meili were undoubtedly filled with anxiety. Subaru's beloved Patrasche, she might also be crying.

—With roaring flames, the inside of her chest grew hot.

Otto: "—This is my fault."

Like that, in front of Emilia, whose heart was set ablaze with emotions, Otto suddenly muttered this.

Not understanding the contents of his utterance, Emilia's eyes unconsciously widened, as she became lost for words. Otto covered his face with the hands that had been resting on his cheek up till now, and stared up at the ceiling. Because he was taller than she was, when he did this, Emilia was unable to see his face.

However, the trembling of that voice, she understood that it came not just from simple anger.

Otto: "I thought Natsuki-san was getting too involved. Moving for the sake of what Priscilla-sama's death had left behind, I forced myself to agree in order to save him with a distraction from himself. I tried to convince myself that it would be fine if Beatrice-chan, who had been separated from him, would be by his side. The care and follow up, I thought I could leave it to the brave Petra-chan."

Emilia: "Otto-kun…"

Otto: "Above everything else, I entrusted everything to Garfiel. Those things that we should have done, we forced onto our straightforward, ever honest, sensitive Garfiel."

Emilia: "Otto-kun!"

The moment the tremble in his voice bordered on a complete breakdown, Emilia grabbed both of Otto's arms, and lowered his face with her hand, so that she could face him head-on. Then, she saw it.

—For the first time ever, she saw Otto's blue eyes moist with tears.

Otto: "Damn it… why am I always so thoughtless…"

Emilia: "…"

Otto: “When my hands cannot reach, when my feet cannot even make it in time, I have no choice but to use my head to make up for those shortcomings. Even though I act like I understand that, even though I pretend to be clever, at the most critical moments I always —”

Emilia: “—!”

No longer did she want to hear any more of Otto’s continuous self-blame, with that tearful face twisted in sorrow.

So Emilia, without releasing the arm she had been holding, drew him towards herself and hugged Otto’s head against her chest. Perhaps it was the suddenness of Emilia’s unexpected action that rendered Otto frozen without a sound. In the meantime—

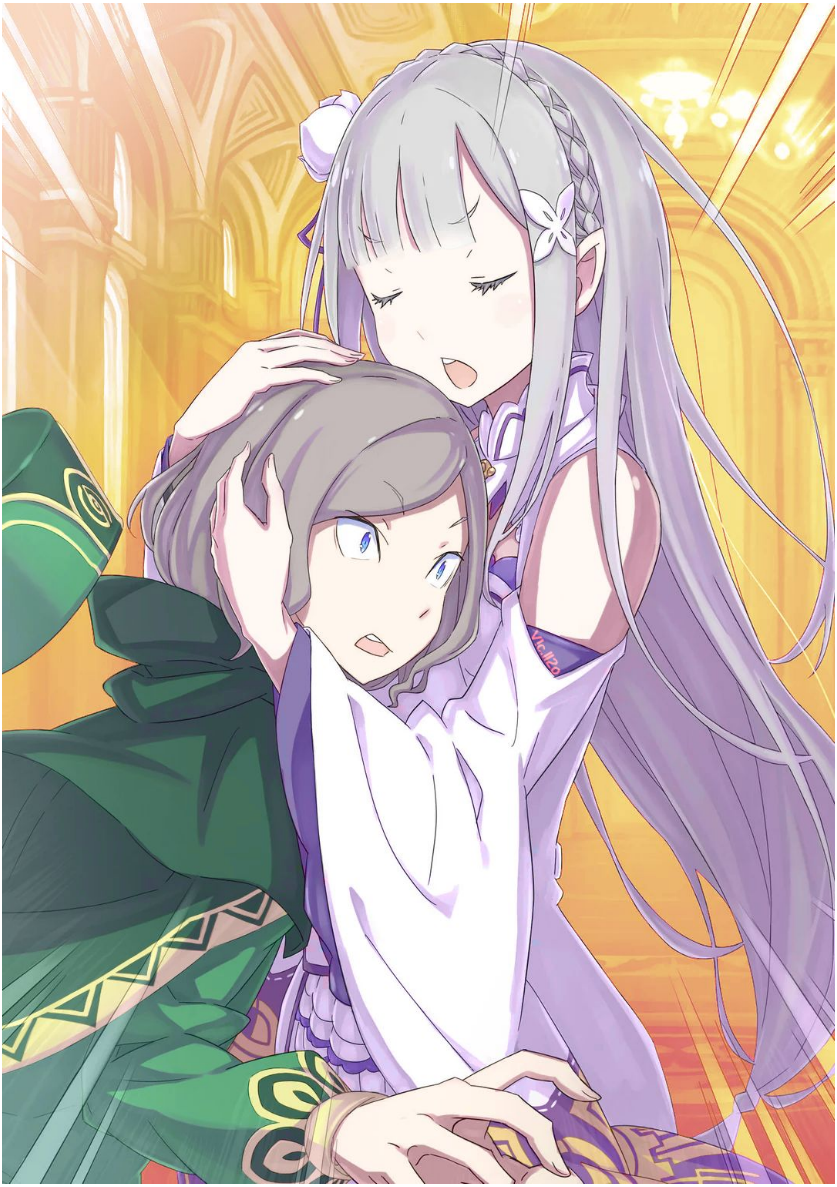
Emilia: “Don’t talk about yourself like that! Otto-kun is always doing his best! We all understand that. And that’s why we want to properly hear what Otto-kun has to say.”

Otto: “Emi… lia-sama…”

Emilia: “I know! Even though I say this, Otto-kun probably understands it too, right? But I only have my own words, and I can only say what I am thinking, so I can at least say it with my own feelings. So—”

Otto: “…”

Emilia: “Nothing is over yet. We reaaally can still do so much more!”



Emilia spoke with a resolute declaration as she tightly held Otto's head in her arms. It was as though she were telling this to herself, yet at the same time, she still carried the belief that her words were true.

It was something that none other than Emilia's Knight, Natsuki Subaru, had woven into her being time and time again.

Together, Emilia and Subaru had crafted this unshakable trust to be the very thing they took the greatest pride in.

Emilia: "We are reaaally bad at giving up."

Indeed, they were not good at it: at holding their heads down in distress, curling up and fleeing from it all. And, precisely because they could not do that, they had no choice but to unyieldingly press on and do their best without ever giving up.

Perhaps Emilia's appeal had found its way to him. Suddenly, Otto's body, which had been rigid until this moment, relaxed, and then,

Otto: "…Please let go of my arms, or Natsuki-san will definitely kill me."

Emilia: "No, no one is going to die! It's precisely for that reason that we are doing this…"

Otto: "I understand! I understand, so please let go of me!"

Emilia begrudgingly let go of the squirming Otto's arms. She watched him intently, as if to ensure that he had truly recovered. Otto wiped his brow with a handkerchief and let out a sigh.

It was a large, deep sigh.

Otto: "I know it is not the time for this, but I just remembered."

Emilia: "What did you remember?"

Otto: "—The reason as to why I am giving my assistance to Natsuki-san and Emilia-sama.”

Otto spoke these words calmly, using his handkerchief to lightly wipe away the remaining traces of his tears. The expression he held now was a stark contrast to the anger that had once contorted his features just moments before, for whatever he had just recalled had now conjured a newfound face of bravery.

Otto: “The enemy has abducted both Natsuki-san and Beatrice-chan. There must be a reason as to why they did this. The aim of abductions is generally to threaten their related parties, or perhaps even the abductees themselves…”

Emilia: “So, it’s either us or Subaru, right?”

Otto: “Yes. If the Divine Dragon truly is involved, it will prove to be an issue for the entire Kingdom. Whatever role we must fulfill, let us do so in the Royal Capital.”

Emilia: “—. Yes, let’s do that. We have to move chipperly.”

As she listened to Otto’s future plans, Emilia was doing her best to suppress her own impulses.

Emilia: “…”

These delayed impulses were an overwhelming urge to rush out at once to help out Subaru and the others. Things that Otto’s rationale had constructed, such as Reinhard’s presence and Felt’s readiness, her fervent desire threatened to push them all away.

She wanted to touch him. She wanted to look at him. She wanted to hear his voice.

When he got hurt, when he surely wanted to lower his head, she yearned to be by his side.

Emilia: “—Subaru.”

Anger was not the emotion that scorched Emilia’s chest, yet she could not grasp what it was that stirred within her whatsoever.

3

Emilia: “Hiyaah!!”

Diving in without so much as listening to a word, she drove a strike carrying every fiber of her being into Al’s solar plexus. —All of this was in accordance with the instructions of Otto, who had dispatched Emilia here.

Otto: “Please suppress the urge to listen to the opponent’s pleas or side of the story. All of that can be sorted out in due time, but for now we must ensure the opposing side does not play their hand.”

Otto, who had urged Emilia onward as she bolted out, had been invoking his Divine Protection of the Soul of Language to trace the whereabouts of Al and his accomplices, causing his already pale complexion to blanch into the deathly pallor of a man beset by illness.

She did not want him to be reckless. But, when it came time to do so, there would be no other choice but to be reckless. Emilia, too, did not live in a way so bereft of recklessness that she could stop him.

That was why, in order to bring an end to that recklessness even a little sooner, Emilia was doing her best.

Emilia: “How about—”

This! As Emilia began to formulate those words, she felt a peculiar sensation in her ice-hardened fist.

The gauntlet should have made contact with Al’s bare skin, but the recoil was making it feel as though she had punched a hard, steadfast wall—

Al: “How abrupt…!!”

Al uttered these words as if wringing them out from his throat, his torso shielded by a coat of stone armor.

This was the preemptive strike that Otto had told her to perform, but it had failed. Still, this was not the time to dwell on it. If the first strike did not connect, then she would just have to try again a second and a third time.

Al: “The fact that you ain’t even gonna lend an ear is kinda cold.”

Emilia: “That’s! Al’s the one who—mmphh.”

Al: “Mmphh?”

Emilia: “I promised not to… SAY—!”

Though Al’s stone armor had absorbed the punch, the impact had flung him backward; as he said those things, Emilia had forcibly shut her own mouth mid-retort, then formed a two-handed hammer of ice, sweeping it at him in a horizontal strike.

The one-armed Al was bearing a small figure slung over his right shoulder. Whilst thinking it unfair to exploit that handicap of his, Emilia deliberately aimed a blow toward Al’s left side.

The strike, unleashed at her full strength, was going to be very painful if it landed. But painful was not all that it would be.

Al: “Tch!”

Al caught Emilia’s underhanded attack with his left arm—a limb of stone forged through magic. But despite blocking the attack, he clicked his tongue, and promptly destroyed and discarded the arm he had gone through the trouble of creating.

The reason for this was that the area struck by the ice hammer was beginning to freeze over, the encroaching frost having been about to reach Al’s body.

Otto: “If we set aside our emotional concerns, capturing that man alive is an absolute necessity in order to rescue Natsuki-san and Beatrice-sama. In that respect, your fighting style is a compatible fit, Emilia-sama. Nonetheless—”

Emilia: “—I promised that I wouldn’t be reckless like Subaru!”

Keeping that exchange and the promise she had forged with Otto before her departure close to her heart, Emilia conjured a new set of twin ice swords. —Emilia's Ice Brand Arts, her usage of it had gained a new variation.

Her weapons of ice would freeze her opponents upon impact, robbing them of control over both their body and weapon. It demanded a modest increase in Mana consumption in comparison to her ordinary weapons, but was within the standard error deviation so long as she would not be fighting too much.

To stop an opponent without taking their life. —The possibility of this new martial art, was what Emilia had desired.

???: "Ah-haha~! Uncle, it seems you've gotten yourself into a real pickle, haven't you~?"

Al: "Shut it!"

Casting aside the artificial arm that had begun to freeze over, Al shouted at the heckler he was carrying.

Upon seeing that the person that Al had gone through such lengths to carry was none other than Roy Alphard, who had been held in captivity in the Prison Tower, Emilia bit her lip.

Roy, the Sin Archbishop that Emilia's comrades had done their utmost to capture at the Pleiades Watchtower with the help of Anastasia's own group. Julius in particular had exerted the utmost of efforts, and his decision to not take Roy's life, as well as Anastasia's courage to accept that, were things that Emilia had looked exceedingly favourably upon.

Emilia: "But now, they'll both be so disappointed…!"

Whatever his reasons might have been, Emilia would halt Al here and now. And alongside him, she would also detain the one whom Al brought out, Roy.

Al: "I ain't got a single reason to go along with your intentions, though."

Immediately after vocalizing such enthusiasm, Al's feet underwent a sudden upheaval, and the two runaways were launched into the sky.

In such a manner, he was distanced from Emilia, and made an attempt to flee from the scene. With a late start, Emilia would be unable to catch up to him even were she to extend out her ice.

But—

Emilia: "—Icicle Line."

A barrier of ice and snow was deployed around the Prison Tower, preventing his escape.

With a cry of "Gwoah-?!" ringing out across the sky, Al's escape sequence ended in failure, thwarted by the canopy of ice spreading out to completely cover the area surrounding him.

Then, as Al's head collided against the glacial ceiling, he was left to plummet upside down; Emilia circled around to the spot where he would hit the ground and slammed her twin swords of ice into the suspended Al—

Emilia: "—Hk?!"

The twin swords parried by a hard sensation, Emilia's eyes widened, her breath catching.

If Al had received the blows with a prosthetic arm, as he had done earlier, it would not have surprised her. Al had indeed created a new arm, but that was not all that had been created. —Manifested there were twin swords, fashioned from rock.

Al: "Earth Brand Arts, or something like that."

Emilia: "You copycat…!"

Al: "It was Natsuki Subaru who came up with this, yeah? In that case, I've also got the right to use it."

Before Emilia, her eyes wide open, Al spun from the recoil of their clashing twin blades of frost and stone; as distance opened up between them, he once again landed upon the snowy ground.

Giving rise to sound in his vicinity, stone weapons began to form one after another around Al. Bracing herself at the fact that Al could essentially replicate her Ice Brand Arts with his Earth Magic, Emilia realized something.

With a stone-forged arm, Al wielded stone-forged armaments—but Roy, who was supposed to have been on his shoulder until a moment ago, was nowhere to be found.

Emilia: "Don't tell me…"

Al: "Ah, I let him get away in the turmoil just now… it would've been cool to say that, but I couldn't let it happen either. I just discarded him 'cause he was getting in the way. Over there."

Emilia's shoulders had been jolted, but Al just shrugged and jerked his chin. He motioned toward the pillar of earth that had risen earlier, to which Roy was affixed upside down in the center.

Covered in a quilt of earth, Roy was bound to the pillar, cackling upon receiving Emilia's gaze,

Roy: "Do your best, Onee-san. If Onee-san doesn't win here, we'll have no choice but to do whatever that uncle says~. Wait a sec~? But even if Onee-san wins, we'll still have to go right back into that Prison Tower… haha-, guess it doesn't even matter who wins, ri~ght?"

Emilia: "…If you can wake up and reflect on your actions, then do that."

Giving that answer to Roy, whose gaze fixedly clung to her, Emilia felt relieved for having not let him slip away, and she turned back to Al.

Roy, having been freed from the seal that had encased him in magic, was exceedingly dangerous, but with his time having been frozen as well, they had been unable to make him reflect. Thus, Emilia's compromise had been manifested: she was going to confine him in an environment from which he could not escape, and while his consciousness remained, he would be forced to reflect on everything he had done.

Emilia: “All that can come later, once everything here’s all sorted out.”

Al: “That’s all fine and dandy, but… what, you finally feel like talking to me now?”

Emilia: “Ah…! From here then. From here on out, I won’t say another word.”

Al: “How cold. Lil’ miss, I figured you’d understand if I just talked to—whoa!”

Al was eager to continue speaking, but towards him was hurled a stake of ice from Emilia; a proclamation of her intent. Al leapt sideways to evade it, and Emilia circled around to his side, thrusting a spear of frost into his flank.

The tip of the ice spear was caught by the blade of a rocky sword, shattering both simultaneously.

Instantly, the two forged their subsequent weapons, Emilia a rapier of ice, and Al a sword of stone, thus the clashing of their blades commenced; ‘twas a duel in which blades would be forged upon shattering, and blades would be shattered upon forging.

Roy: “How nice, so nice, quite nice, very nice, perhaps it’s nice, isn’t it nice, it’s probably nice, because it appears to be nice-! Gluttonous drinking-! Gluttony-!”

The sound of Roy’s voice as he licked his lips could be heard as he watched over Emilia and Al engage in a sword fight of frost and stone.

Whilst deliberately ignoring him, Emilia unleashed a multitude of nimble attacks; attacks that she was certain would strike true, and yet, Al had precariously dodged each one, with each narrow evasion filling Emilia with a growing sensation that something was amiss.

Her attacks would not hit even when they seemed like they would. It felt akin to driving a kick into formless water.

Above all else—

Al: "—I don't wanna praise it too much, but that's a well refined technique. I envy your mutual love and understanding, Lil' Miss."

At that remark that had gone too far—Emilia was enraged.

She resolved to do whatever she must to rid the land of that evil and ruthless king. —Remembering that cliche stock phrase that Subaru had told her that people used when they got angry, Emilia was enraged.

She did not want Al to speak about herself and Subaru in such a manner.

But what had infuriated Emilia even more was the knowledge that Al did not genuinely believe his own words. He had been merely prodding her in a deliberate attempt to invoke her fury.

In addition—

Emilia: "I've been thinking about this for a while, but why do you look so lonely when you talk to me, Al?"

Al: "—. You said you wouldn't speak with me…"

Emilia: "Don't bring that up only when it's convenient for you! Also, one more thing!"

Raising her voice, Emilia lifted her greatsword of ice high aloft and swung it down, prompting Al to position his stone sword above his head to receive the strike—then suddenly, somebody latched onto Al's legs and waist.

Gasping, Al realized that what had latched onto his body was none other than the owner of a pair of icy arms—a soldier of ice.

At the presence of the ice soldier sculpted in the likeness of Subaru, on whom Emilia so deeply relied, Al grit his teeth with a "That's the worst…!”

Thereupon, Emilia raised her foot, clad in a slipper of ice, overhead—

Emilia: “—When you talk to me, look at me properly!!”

This time, her whole-hearted kick pierced through the rocky defenses, slamming directly into Al.

4

???: “…”

Yae’s reaction, slightly raising her eyebrow with a twitch, did not go unnoticed by Felt’s perceptiveness.

It was not as though she held conviction. Only, in a pathetic situation where she could not do a thing, she would attempt to cling to every last shred of hope, believing any further disgrace to be insignificant.

One such shred, whilst recalling a previous occasion on which she had “been instilled with the resolve to die”, was the hope that this conversation between herself and Yae was perhaps being eavesdropped on by an insignificant something,

Yae: “Be quiet.”

Opening one of her usually-narrowed eyes, Yae advanced towards the door of the room.

The pressure of that demand possessed enough power to convince Felt that if she took any careless actions, the thread fastened to her neck would enact her execution.

Ergo, leaving the immoble Felt there, Yae reached out her hand to open the door—that instant, the sharp point of a sword pierced the door with nary a sound, mercilessly surging towards Yae’s throat.

Felt: “—Hk.”

Felt's breath caught, and visible to her was the sight of Yae's white throat, sword piercing through—but it did not. The tip of the sword came to a halt just barely before it could slit Yae's throat.

It was not that her opponent had stopped. By binding a thread to the tip of the sword, Yae had narrowly averted the attack.

By a hair's breadth, she had narrowly snatched survival from the jaws of death, however, the crisis befalling Yae did not end there. —A sword distinct to the one that had been curbed erupted with a flash of light, cutting down the door as its shining steel ran amok.

Yae: "…"

Faced with the oncoming storm of swords, Yae leaped backward as she brandished her threads.

A sword for one, and a thread the other, nevertheless did the clash between the two weapons spark the clangour of steel on steel throughout the room, scorching the eyes of the onlooking Felt with the scintillation of swords.

With skillful control over her hands, Yae released a volley of thread attacks that blanked all sight, tearing apart the room's luxurious interior design. However, her opponent also put on an impressive display of swordplay with both hands, clearing away her ferocious onslaught head-on, and forcefully sweeping aside the threads that had entangled their own sword—

???: "GYAHHHHH!!"

Yae: "—Guh."

Unleashed was a front kick, landing squarely upon Yae's slender waist. Promptly twisting her body, Yae did a half-spin whilst being blown away; planting her feet on the wall before landing on the ground, her hands clutched her stomach.

Then, training her gaze upon the intruder who had performed those acts,

Yae: "To so suddenly deliver a kick to a lady's stomach, what a relentless guest you are~!”

???: “—Was such a thing necessary? Relent, for a shinobi such as yourself?”

Yae: “Isn’t that discrimination against shinobi? That’s not very gentlemanly behavior, now is it?”

???: “Unfortunately, I possess no recollections of ever deserving to be called a gentleman. No matter where the wind blows me, I cannot be anything more than a swordsman, with no talents save swinging the sword.”

With those words, the individual shook the threads off both their swords, turning their calm, blue eyes towards Yae— hearing that self-assessment, Felt softly muttered “Stop spewing that crap”.

To be sure, she did not know if he was a gentleman or not. Only, the evaluation of “swordsman” alone could not encompass his entirety. There were many who would not accept such as a description of this man on its own, this Felt knew.

After all, this man, styling himself as a swordsman, was the Sword Demon who had once surpassed the pinnacle of the sword—

???: “—Wilhelm Trias. Upon catching wind of the predicament driving the Kingdom into ruin, I came at once to offer what little help I could.”

Upon hearing that introduction, Felt retreated to a corner of the room, and sighed.

At the arrival of an unthinkable reinforcement, she was filled with terribly complicated emotions—

Felt: “…Zodda bug-niichan, you really do whatever it takes, don’t you…? What the hell is wrong with all these guys from Emilia-neechan’s place?”

With that, she muttered in equal parts exasperation and admiration.

Chapter 26:
Sword Demon VS Crimson Sakura

1

An intense aura of swordsmanship hung over the chamber, and it was no joke that goosebumps erupted all over her skin.

Her mind had been trained to remain unshaken by most situations, but even when considering circumstances in which the unexpected and unforeseen might occur in rapid succession, a scenario such as this would be considered an anomaly, demanding to be deemed as an exception.

Yae: “—Wilhelm Trias.”

Rolling the name that had been given around within her mouth, Yae Tenzen quietly sharpened her vigilance.

They had exchanged but a single clash, yet her opponent’s opening move had been slamming her with a kick, forcing Yae to find herself at a disadvantage.

Even after she leapt backward to dampen the impact, the damage from that kick had left a heavy impression on Yae’s slender frame. Had she not retreated, the force might have opened a shoe-sized hole in her stomach. He had delivered a kick to a woman without restraint; as he himself had claimed, he could not be called a gentleman.

There was a worthy title for this old swordsman, which had been readied by the nation for more than forty years.

Namely—

Yae: “—Sword Demon-san himself, gracing us with his presence here. To think I would meet such a legend myself, I’m so moved~. That episode in which you avenged your late wife, it must truly be an honor to be the Kingdom’s sword, huh~?”

Wilhelm: "…"

Yae: "Oh? But if I'm not mistaken, I heard you had an unexpected reunion with your wife afterward! Surely the events in the Watergate City must've been terribly painful for you, no? I can only imagine your anguish, boo hoo."

Wilhelm: "…"

Whilst observing her opponent's every move, Yae dabbed a finger at the corner of her eye in a pantomime of tears.

Beneath Yae's crimson gaze, the old swordsman—Wilhelm stood dignified and unwavering, the two swords in his grip radiating a sharp aura as he met her stare.

Within the calm light of those twin blue eyes, Yae understood that her attempts to unsettle her opponent by brazenly trampling on his heart had proven to be fruitless; she had merely succeeded in playing the role of a villainess.

Yae: "…The image I had from what I've heard of you led me to believe you were a more passionate person, but~…"

Apparently, that impression had been unreliable.

Given that the source of this information had been none other than Heinkel, if even details regarding his own biological father lacked credibility, then what exactly could she expect of him? Frankly, it would have been better to assign him to take care of Felt rather than the Dragon.

And, should Heinkel have allowed Felt to escape, then the pretext of eliminating her and cutting ties with Heinkel altogether would simultaneously hold ground.

As for Yae's reasoning as to why she thought such things—

Yae: "Aside from the old village chief, there shouldn't be many people who are able to notice my presence concealment—Felt-sama, might you have done something mischievous?"

Felt: “The hell kind of accusation is that? You know full well I’ve not been able to even lift a finger, you bastard.”

Wilhelm: “…”

Felt: “Besides talking to your sorry ass, I haven’t done anything. Right now, that’s taking up all my effort.”

With a hint of self-resentment in her voice, Felt spat thus as she retreated to a corner of the room.

When it came to feigning anger, she was not the type to be adept. If she truly possessed the refined acting skills to modulate even her vocal tremors, then such a masterful deception would truly be one worthy of awe.

Therefore, Yae, giving a subtle tug on the steel thread around Felt’s neck, just enough to make her aware of its presence,

Yae: “Please don’t even think about running away, okay? I’d hate to make Felt-sama’s adorable head bid a tearful farewell to her torso.”

Felt: “That’s another kick your ass is getting. And, it’s not for me to say, but…”

Yae: “What?”

Felt: “I don’t think you have the time to be looking away, now do you, you bastard?”

Felt stuck out her tongue with a blunt “bleh”, and the act’s lack of charm was itself cute. But, Yae did not need a reminder, as she had never once let her guard down against Wilhelm. —He remained rooted in his original position, unable to determine how to respond to Yae’s unfamiliar Steel Thread Technique. Such was only natural.

—Most shinobi techniques specialized in exploiting an opponent’s openings.

That was why, unlike the fighting techniques of warriors utilized in battle, the techniques of the shinobi utilized for killing were called jutsu. Yae’s Steel Thread Technique was a prime example of that distinction.

The more veteran the warrior, the more cautiously they would approach combat. Meanwhile, the true skill of a shinobi lay in setting trap upon trap, like the web of a spider, ten layers, then twenty, until—

Wilhelm: "—Four moves."

Yae: "—? What was that?"

Suddenly, Yae furrowed her brow, unable to comprehend the words born from Wilhelm's lips.

To Yae's query, Wilhelm offered no verbal reply. —But, there was a response. His eyes narrowed slightly, and a piercing aura of swordsmanship was released, cleaving through Yae's entire body as an answer.

Yae: "—Hk."

The moment she sensed the incoming attack, Yae mobilized all ten of her fingers without hesitation, but rather than attacking to subdue, she rained slaughter upon the Sword Demon with her steel threads. So long as Al's order not to kill was kept in the end, it would be fine. It would be preferable for her opponent to survive when the intention was to kill; but, if an attack was unleashed without the expectation to kill, would it work on this adversary?

Thus, from all directions, first subdividing into sixteen, and then further into thirty-two, was launched an overwhelming assault of steel threads, each new strand finer than the last; in response, the twin blades in Wilhelm's grip flashed—

Wilhelm: "OOOH—!!"

The whirlwind raised by the swing of the twin swords quite literally swept aside the approaching murderous steel threads of carnage.

The extreme speed of the swords' movement caused the collision between blade and thread to be heard in unison, generating sparks that gave Yae the illusion that her eyes were being seared. Though her initial strike had been neutralized by the overwhelming force of the sword, her Steel Thread Technique remained uninterrupted.

Slackening the steel threads emitted from her rings, she readied an assault of even further segmented threads—in that moment, the “floor” of the room was cleaved upward before Yae’s eyes.

—That which rose was a portion of the floor that had been slashed and stepped upon, lifting its face. The size of this “floor” rivaled that of a luxurious bed, blotting Wilhelm from Yae’s sight.

Wilhelm: “…”

With a thud and a forceful step, the “floor” was kicked, launching it straight toward Yae.

Within the confined space of the room, there were no gaps she could use to escape; therefore, using her left hand, Yae adjusted the angles of the steel threads she manipulated to combat the incoming “floor”. However, rather than slicing it, she instead bound it, deflecting it with a bounce.

The “floor” recoiled with the full momentum of the initial kick, returning along its trajectory with even greater speed and danger, barreling toward the Sword Demon with the aim to blast him away.

But then—

Yae: “Huh?”

A sharp, piercing sound resonated, and Yae’s eyes widened upon the sight of the “floor” being pinned midair.

Its momentum had accelerated, its force doubling in proportion to its weight. Yet, the Sword Demon’s blade struck the rebellion of the “floor” in the dead center of its mass, its tip aligned to the surface with surgical precision, voiding all of its power.

It was truly a divine feat that transcended what mortal hands could accomplish.

Yae, too, understood this, having spent a great deal of time being hailed as a child prodigy beyond the limits of ordinary humans. —Even in his old age the Sword Demon's swordsmanship was planted in the realm of the divine.

Wilhelm: "Three moves."

Within the vision of the breathless Yae, Wilhelm murmured so from beyond the "floor", which was still suspended in midair.

Hidden behind the "floor" of modest width and ample height, Wilhelm remained beyond Yae's sight. Yet, the true advantage of her steel threads lay in their capability to land strikes that would not otherwise land, in places she could not otherwise see.

She made her threads snake around the "floor", forcing the Sword Demon on the other side to move either to the left or right.

Yet, no matter which side he chose, left or right, the threads would be awaiting him—

—Immediately afterwards, piercing through the suspended "floor", the tip of his sword approached Yae's nose.

The timbre of steel striking steel resounded, and the sword launched at a velocity which rivaled even the most tightly drawn bow. The sword that had been thrust into the "floor" to stop it was struck from behind, causing the "floor" to be penetrated by the sword.

This far exceeded her expectations; faced now with a projectile that defied all norms, Yae abandoned any attempt to entangle the sword within her threads, and instead slightly deflected it as she tilted her slender neck just enough to avoid a fatal strike. The tip of the blade passed right by her throat before it was lodged into the wall beside Yae with a thunk.

She had dodged it. And, even in that fleeting moment, Yae never once averted her eyes from the Sword Demon.

And so, in that same breath, she recognized that she had made a tactical misstep.

The sword had been buried deeply, sticking out just to the right of Yae's neck. —Her only means of escape was to the left.

And thereupon—

Wilhelm: "RUAAHH—!!"

Using the "floor" as a springboard, the Sword Demon then kicked off the ceiling to accelerate, descending with a slashing strike.

The blade executed a seamless monk's robe cut, aiming for Yae's very life as his blade carved deeply into her left shoulder.

2

Wilhelm van Astrea. —No, Wilhelm Trias, had been sojourning in the Royal Capital, seeking a way to heal his master, Crusch Karsten.

In the midst of the battle against the Witch Cult that had unfolded throughout the Watergate City of Pristella, the Sin Archbishop of Lust had poured a wicked poison into Crusch, corroding her body and soul; she had continued to suffer through such accursed agony.

Even the Kingdom's greatest healer, the very one bearing the title Blue, Ferris, had been facing the hardship of his inability to alleviate her suffering, nor had any ray of hope emerged for some time.

There had been no dramatic improvements in Crusch's condition. Only, a means that opened up new possibilities—a path to the Pleiades Watchtower had been paved, tidings of such had arrived.

Were they to borrow the power of the Sage Shaula, one of the Three Great Heroes of the Kingdom of Lugunica, rumored to be omniscient and omnipotent, perhaps they might find a way to liberate Crusch from the malevolent poison afflicting her.

Ferris: "If it's to save Crusch-sama, then don't we have to do whatever it takes, no matter what that might be?"

As desperation drove Ferris to cling to that news, Wilhelm possessed no words to admonish him.

Having been robbed of her Memories at the hands of the Witch Cult a year prior, Crusch had been left as a largely changed person, and it was Ferris who had devotedly supported and assisted her. Ferris himself must have experienced hellish agony and confusion as he attempted to rebuild his relationship with Crusch from scratch.

After nearly a year of suffering, a bond of mutual trust had finally been formed between the two of them—a bond different to how it was before, but still unshakeable in spite of the difference; it happened right around when that bond had been formed.

That was when the Sin Archbishop of Lust, Capella Emerada Lugunica, utterly wrecked it.

The following suffering that Crusch went through was as had been described prior, but the pitifulness of Ferris as he nestled to her side, was an exceedingly painful sight to behold.

That was why, when they heard that Subaru's group, sights set on the Pleiades Watchtower, had succeeded in reaching it, a fire of hope was ignited within Wilhelm and the rest, more acutely than any of them had anticipated.

Although it was disconcerting that Subaru's group had not relayed that information directly, there was no way to dig deeper into the movements of the other Camps.

However, he had heard that a trial run was being conducted in order to ensure that visiting the Tower could be done reliably. Unable to sit idly by any longer, Wilhelm and Ferris made their way to the Royal Capital in order to ascertain the success or failure of that expedition, and, if possible, request to join the next group bound for the Tower.

Then, in a room inside the royal mansion, reserved only for dignitaries to stay—

???: "—There is a matter I wish to share with you, and something I would like to ask for your assistance with."

And so, the young man, bearing the role of Internal Affairs Minister within the Emilia Camp, delivered to Wilhelm a summation of the catastrophe poised to shake the Kingdom’s very foundations, along with the names of the two individuals who served as Wilhelm’s reasons to take up the sword.

Wilhelm: “RAAAAAGH—!!!”

Blasting off the ceiling, he delivered a devastating shoulder-to-hip arc to the red-haired girl—nay, to the masterful shinobi.

The impossibly fine, thread-like weapons proved to be lethally versatile; he scattered their oncoming threat through erratic trajectories. Such was the result of seeking a swift and decisive end to the bout, for every second the conflict raged on would only multiply the chances of being caught off guard.

With a single brutal motion, the blade bit into her left shoulder and carved diagonally across her torso, bisecting her very life with a monk’s robe cut—or so it should have.

Girl: “—Hk.”

In an instant, the girl’s body sank into the floor as she gritted her teeth—no, she had not sunk. Shredded to smithereens by her threads, the floor itself had come apart. Then, the girl’s body plunged into the basement ahead of Wilhelm, to which he gave pursuit.

Promptly extending his arm out, he wrenched out the sword that had immobilized the girl from the wall, securing his twin blades.

Though he had failed to sever the girl’s left shoulder, there was no mistaking that the wound was deep. What was truly formidable about shinobi was their vanishing act; the moment they would slip from sight, they would become five or even ten times as troublesome than they would have been visible.

All this to say—

Girl & Wilhelm: “—This is where I take you down.”

And, without prior rehearsal, Wilhelm and the girl's voices had overlapped.

As Wilhelm plunged into the gaping maw of darkness below, for but a moment he caught sight of glimmering filaments, reflected by the light shining through the darkness. —The pit leading underground bristled with murderous threads, spun like a spider's web.

3

As she fell backward toward the basement, Yae bound her left shoulder with her steel threads to stop the bleeding.

She admitted that the blade had penetrated deep into her maidenly soft skin, yet the chastity of her life remained intact, so she refused to accept her loss, and at the same time marveled at the terrifying swordsmanship of the Sword Demon.

The first move defended against Yae's steel thread, the second move kicked away the floor he had cut up, the third move seized the floor she had sent flying back, and the fourth move slashed at her with the sword that had pierced through it—just as he had declared at the outset, she was about to be killed in four moves.

Yae: "All these pesky old men…!"

The first elderly man that came to mind was the Vicious Old Man, who had the worst possible personality and was the closest to Yae, followed by the elderly giant who had tormented Al on the plains until he was on the verge of defeat, and finally, the Sword Demon, an elderly man who had reached the pinnacle of swordsmanship despite his age. —All of these elderly men were people who did not know how to grow old peacefully.

To begin with, it was the way of the world that one's life could be extinguished at any moment. Nevertheless, the fact that they were still alive at such an old age meant that they had survived natural selection.

???: "That's why old folks are so damn terrifyin'. If ya think old folks are weak and fragile, you'll end up dyin' before ya even get old yerself. Well, I'm kinda an exception to the exception, since I'm such a long-lived shinobi, but still…"

Her cheeks twitched as she was reminded of the loud laughter of the village chief, who had lived and survived a particularly harsh life.

The ultimate technique of a shinobi was to steal their opponent's attention, cloud their mind, immobilize them, and take their life. Yae was an excellent student in the art of clouding the mind, but she knew that she was no match for the village chief's years of experience.

Yae believed that she was probably not that twisted, nor did she anticipate living long enough to become so. In fact, Al nearly killed her once before.

She had no expectation that her good fortune would continue. — After all, the whims of a kind monster were nothing more than a miracle.

Yae: "…"

Wilhelm chased after Yae as she fell, pulled the sword from the wall, and dropped down into the hole as well.

As the Sword Demon moved with confidence that appeared to be born from actual combat experience against shinobi, presumably shinobi deployed by the Vollachian Empire in the past, she held unending resentment towards her shinobi predecessors who had failed to kill Wilhelm then.

Yae took in a single breath and exhaled. With that, a switch flipped inside her with a click—and her field of vision expanded, allowing her to see as clearly in the darkness of the basement as if she were standing in the brightness of daylight.

This was the result of training to become accustomed to the darkness of night, a type of physical manipulation that altered her blood flow around the eyeballs to adjust vision.

As the white figure of the Sword Demon emerged within her now gray field of vision, Yae spread her arms wide, as if finally bringing him into her own realm of expertise—

Yae & Wilhelm: "—This is where I take you down."

They both uttered the same words in unison, but there was neither a smile nor a feeling of surprise on either side.

They resolved to kill each other. Since mental attacks were deemed futile, they abandoned all techniques designed to disrupt the mind and focused solely on reaching the opponent's life with sincere determination.

This was the location Yae had prepared for that purpose, the Crimson Sakura's killing field.

—The underground passageway in the Barielle mansion was not something Priscilla had built when she had renovated the mansion, but rather a remnant left behind by the legacy of the original owner, Leip Barielle.

Priscilla's late husband was said to have been plagued with pathological distrust and paranoia, and had made preparations for any eventuality, not only in the mansion he built in the Royal Capital, but also in his other residences and hideouts within his own domain.

This hole that led to the basement was also one of those preparations. It had been originally intended as a secret escape route, but Yae had destroyed it beforehand because it could have been used as an entry point for enemies, leaving only the deep hole that continued underground.

Yae had never met Leip and felt nothing but disgust and contempt at him for forcibly marrying such a young and beautiful wife like Priscilla, and then trying to use her as a puppet to control the country's government. However, she sympathized with Leip's attitude of wanting to be prepared for any potential disaster and was grateful to take advantage of the opportunity he had inadvertently given to her.

A gallows for slaughter, where she could string up her steel threads and only Yae could move around as she pleased.

She had infiltrated the Royal Capital in order to, if such a time were to come, assist Al. She had kept Felt, brought along so that she would be under surveillance, in that room so that it would serve its purpose in such an emergency.

That was why—

Yae: "—From here on out, no more holding back."

Having said that, Yae bent her knees in order to smoothly slip off her shoes, extended her toes wrapped in black stockings, spread the toes of both feet—and shot steel threads from rings fitted to each of them.

Literally, without mercy or restraint, skillfully manipulating all twenty digits of her hands and feet, Yae Tenzen's masterful killing technique rampaged in the darkness—

Yae: "…"

Both sides sought a swift victory.

As she fell, Yae hooked her knee around one of the threads she had spun, stopping the momentum of her descent and reversing her direction; utilizing the tension of the thread within the large, well-like cylindrical pit, she sprung up and began her attack.

With the agility of an acrobat, Yae danced like petals twirling in the wind.

Yae's graceful dance was accompanied by silver threads that lured those entranced by their beauty to their deaths, and around her, the blood of those whom she had danced upon blossomed like flowers—hence the name Crimson Sakura.

These were beautiful, yet cruel, red cherry blossoms that bloomed in all their glory by feasting upon the blood flowing from those fallen corpses.

Wilhelm: “—Hk.”

The ferocity that earned itself its nickname was wielded without mercy, and Wilhelm’s entire body, left to free fall, was torn apart, his well-tailored clothes torn open, his flesh and blood scattering into the air.

As she fell, Yae’s hair was blown back by the wind created by his twin swords, and she was astonished by the intensity of the Sword Demon’s gaze.

Unlike her steel threads, the swords could only reach as far as the arm wielding it. Therefore, on the gallows she had set up, Wilhelm had no choice but to focus on defense.

Naturally, with Wilhelm pulled by gravity and thus restricted, Yae, who could move freely in the darkness with the help of her threads, would never approach him.

Maintaining a safe middle distance where his sword could not reach no matter what, she unilaterally continued her attacks with her steel threads. Before the dance was finished, before the Sword Demon reached the ground and regained his freedom.

Yae calmly raised her arm. —Blood sprouted forth.

Yae’s slender legs smoothly traced the wall in mid-air. —Blood sprouted forth.

Yae’s slender body twisted and contorted to its limit. —Blood sprouted forth.

As Yae’s dance approached completion, the Sword Demon was stained with his own blood, unable to completely defend against the relentless barrage of steel threads.

The sharp steel threads carved wounds into his legs, torso, shoulders, neck, cheeks, and forehead, and the Sword Demon was lured towards death as he bled.

However—

Yae: “—What un~pleasant eyes.”

His eyes, filled with a terrifyingly serene aura of swordsmanship, did not dull his will to fight one bit.

Yae: “…”

In addition to the steel threads wielded by both Yae’s hands and feet, there were also threads she had already spread throughout the basement.

It went without saying, but if one were to inadvertently touch a taut string with their arm or leg while being preoccupied with Yae’s actions, that limb would be lost, and if one’s neck or torso were to come into contact with it, one would simply lose their life.

For Wilhelm, this deep pit was now like the jaws of a Witchbeast he had jumped into without thinking, his flesh being torn by its teeth, its tongue lapping up his blood, and finally dropping into its stomach to dissolve his life. —Yet his eyes were not those of one who pointlessly resisted in despair.

Yae: “But, there’s not much you can do, is there?”

Even without that look in his eyes, Yae did not underestimate the Sword Demon enough to believe this was the end. She had long since dismissed Heinkel’s assessment of Wilhelm as unreliable and evaluated him based on what she had seen with her own eyes amid the struggle for life and death.

Therefore, as the Sword Demon fell helplessly, she was prepared for two attacks.

One was for him to kick off the wall of the pit and deliver a sword strike equivalent to the one that had knocked Yae underground. The other was for him to throw his sword at Yae’s vital points, just as he had done above ground.

Whichever of the two options was chosen, the decision had to be made in the blink of an eye.

Yae: “—Tsk.”

Immediately after her extended black-clad feet drew a circle and inflicted three wounds on Wilhelm's cheek, he swung his dual swords straight down and repelled the steel threads. The Sword Demon's strong legs moved back rhythmically, and he planted his soles against the wall.

With the Sword Demon's knees slightly bent, he gathered enough strength in his legs to launch himself through the air—and at the last moment, he swung his arms and launched his two swords, surging towards Yae's life.

Two silver streaks flashed through the air, but Yae dodged them with a series of dance-like movements.

Using the stretched threads as a foothold, she performed a somersault, the blade just barely passing between her thighs and the curve of her back, and emerged unscathed. Then, she struck the Sword Demon who flew after his blades with the steel threads attached to her feet.

With both of his swords gone and no way to defend himself against the steel threads, Wilhelm twisted his body and shielded his head, escaping the web of threads with minimal damage. However, Yae was already out of the way, and the unarmed Sword Demon could not reach her as she rebounded from the threads and escaped.

With that, both threats that she had been wary of were successfully averted—but it was still too early to breathe a sigh of relief.

Wilhelm: "—OOOH!"

Wilhelm had kicked the wall, missing Yae, and landed on the opposite side of the cylindrical pit. There, the twin swords he had thrown earlier were stuck in the wall, and Wilhelm grabbed them and kicked the wall again.

Wilhelm pursued Yae, who had escaped diagonally upward, and took a path upward with the speed of a bullet. —He leaped forward, kicked off the opposite wall, and flew toward the other wall. Repeating this over and over, he quickly caught up with Yae who was rising upwards in a dance-like motion.

Yae: “You’ve got to be kidding me… hk!”

Yae’s throat trembled in shock as Wilhelm pursued her with all his might.

He kicked the wall and ascended using a three-step jump. That was not surprising; Yae could do the same. What was unexpected was that Wilhelm was repeating this in a place where Yae’s hands had stretched out countless of her steel threads.

Naturally, if he flew without taking the time to check his surroundings carefully, there was a risk that he would hit a thread and be torn to pieces.

However, Wilhelm was not afraid. Why? —Because when he had fallen through that space once before, he had noticed where the threads were, and he jumped up so as not to hit them.

That was his terrifying way of fighting, possessed of both an exceptionally keen sense of combat and powers of observation, as well as the unwavering determination to risk his life based on what he saw with his own eyes.

As the Sword Demon fluttered and dived boldly into the storm of silver threads, Yae had no choice but to reach for her trump card—

Yae: “—Uu, ya.”

Building momentum with her threads, Yae sprang high up, and reversing her stance, she extended all her arms and legs. She let loose steel threads from all twenty digits, entwined them with the threads she had previously placed, and drew in all four limbs.

Yae’s masterful Steel Thread Technique utilized entwining threads and the surrounding objects, and was even capable of binding over a hundred ruffians at once in forest combat. Taking that into account, Yae exerted all of her strength, to the point that it felt like all of the muscles and bones within her body would be torn asunder, and simultaneously pulled all the steel threads tight.

That instant, within the cylindrical pit that led underground, the torn steel threads ran amok.

With a mechanism similar to that of cutting a sausage with a string, Yae utilized the tensile strength of the strained steel wires being torn to completely and utterly ravage the space, a thread-rending onslaught of trajectory and magnitude that not even Yae herself could read.

Furthermore, thereupon—

Yae: "—A capable maid always goes the extra mile!"

Witnessing the space below her being crushed by the innumerable thread attacks, Yae brought the rings on both her hands to her mouth, kissing them. —Immediately after, tongues of flames licked down the threads extending from the rings, and after a beat, the infernal flames exploded.

In addition to the berserking threads, a scorching hellfire that burned all to naught—playing two of her trump cards, Yae's merciless shinobi techniques engulfed the Sword Demon in a crimson radiance, scorching him to a crisp.

Yae: "As expected—"

Unable to uphold the policy of not killing anybody, Yae found the result of this combat rather vexing.

But, it was something she had thought the moment it began. This was not an opponent who could be defeated without going for the kill. Only by fighting with the intent to kill, would one have a choice between survival or demise, that was the sort of opponent this man was.

For that reason—

Yae: "Let's keep this a secret from Heinkel-sama—"

Wilhelm: "—That will be fine. He, too, had better know that I am coming."

That instant, the Sword Demon burst through the explosive inferno, the glint of his blade slashing through to caress Yae mid-air.

Yae: "—Uh."

Torso scythed by the flash of the honed sword, Yae spurred blood to helix in a manner different to her usual dance as she revolved through the air, having been unable to disperse the might of the blow; as her eyes widened, she groaned in confusion regarding what had just occurred.

That which had occurred was clear. The enemy had survived both the tempest of steel threads, and the explosive flames that had followed. The question was, how in the world had he done it?

Wilhelm's final leap had been straight upward, much unlike the trajectory of his previous leaps, where he kicked off the walls and flew diagonally. Thus, in order to achieve such a leap within the pit, he would have had no choice but to use the same method as Yae—using the steel threads as a foothold, and jumping.

Yae: "How did you, my threads…"

Wilhelm: "You demonstrated it many a time. —Your threads are terrifyingly sharp weapons, but with a specific angle and application of force, they can be used to bind without cutting."

Wilhelm's answer was accurate, having fully seen through the properties of Yae's steel threads.

What was strange was that he had seen through it in such a short time whilst amidst the heat of battle, and that he had not hesitated in his decision to risk his life on something for which he possessed no definite evidence.

Another baffling matter was—

Yae: "Then, the fire?"

Wilhelm: "I cut it."

Receiving a terribly blunt answer to which nothing could be argued, Yae breathed an exasperated sigh.

In all likelihood, he was telling no fib. The response had simply been that bold. While accepting that, Yae simultaneously suddenly recalled some words from a corner of her mind.

Words that Yae had once dismissed as useless and thrown away—

???: "—My father is strong. To an absurd degree. You and that Aldebaran guy might be pretty capable yourselves, but still, it's my father who scares me more. That's what's known as the Sword Demon."

It aggravated her to full-throttle, but Heinkel's assessment was accurate.

Yae could not recognize him as being stronger or scarier than Al, but he was at least more terrifying than she was.

—At this moment, Yae Tenzen made a miscalculation in her assessment.

That was the fact that she had estimated the credibility of the information to be around half accurate based on Heinkel's opinion. And above all, the fact that since the battle against the White Whale, the subjugation of Sloth, and the siege of the Watergate City, all of which Yae had investigated, Wilhelm's skills had only continued to be honed. This was something Yae had no means of knowing, but he was once again reaching the levels he had achieved during the prime of his active duty—the age in which he had defeated the Sword Saint.

Ergo, the battle that had commenced at the Barielle Villa, between the Crimson Sakura and the Sword Demon—

Wilhelm: "—Zuahhh!!"

Thwarting the completion of her dance with a flash of his blade, the Sword Demon, having stained the sakura of crimson with blood, was thus declared the victor.

Chapter 27:
Words of a Child

1

With a cross-shaped swing, the twin swords carved a decisive wound into their opponent.

Bleeding from countless shallow wounds that covered his entire body—Wilhelm was unable to hide his frustration at his own poor sword skills.

Wilhelm: "—Weak."

What poured out from behind his clenched teeth was disappointment and frustration toward his aging and worn-out self.

As time passed and he grew old, he felt so ashamed of his own inadequacy that he wanted to hide his face. If he had been a poet or an artist, the accumulated years would have become knowledge and skill, and his words and brushstrokes would have become more refined, reaching heights he could never have achieved in his youth.

However, that was not the case for a swordsman.

The passage of time had made him feel his age, and had only intensified his passion, leaving him with no excuses. His strength, skill, and speed were nothing compared to when he was at his peak.

—And, that was simply frustrating.

He had experienced the same frustration many times before.

Even when he decided to withdraw from the front lines and retire from active duty as the captain of the Royal Guard.

Even when his wife was lost to the White Whale and he spent fourteen years seeking revenge, only then did he realize that he had no choice but to face his sworn enemy with weakened sword skills.

The unbearable frustration that now consumed Wilhelm was unparalleled by anything he had yet experienced in his life—equal only to the moment he first learned that Theresia was the Sword Saint during the Demi-Human War, when he realized he was no match for her.

Weak. Far too weak.

In a world where strength was valued above all else, that weakness was an unforgivable sin.

In this world, petty excuses did not work. Being strong or weak, those were the only factors.

Talent, slothfulness, illness, old age; none held meaning once one stepped onto the stage where strength was pitted against strength.

After all, a sword cannot choose its wielder.

Then, it was only natural that those who wield swords had no excuse. —No, in this world, there was a sword that chose its wielders.

Hence why, the one chosen by that sword stood atop a world without excuses.

—That was precisely why Wilhelm Trias, who could not use his advancing age and declining condition as an excuse, had to defeat this opponent with his own hands at any cost.

Wilhelm: "…"

Regardless of Wilhelm's self-assessment, the battle where he demonstrated his most formidable swordsmanship in decades came to an end, and the formidable shinobi was defeated.

Among all the shinobi Wilhelm had faced, she was undoubtedly the most skilled.

It was impossible to imagine how much training the girl had undergone to reach such heights, but there were no consolation prizes in the world of combat. —That was the cruelest aspect of the way of the sword.

Even if one loved the sword above all else, whether or not the sword reciprocated that love had nothing to do with the depth or magnitude of their love.

Instead, the deeper and greater that love was, the more the heart would crack and break irreparably when that love was not reciprocated.

With that sentiment in the back of his mind, Wilhelm remained vigilant even though the outcome had already been decided.

In the distance, the body of the fallen girl caught his attention, hanging in midair upon a single thread. Blood dripped down her upturned body, but her thin torso was not severed. —That was the reason for his caution.

In such a life-or-death battle, there was no room for mercy.

Wilhelm gave no consideration whatsoever to his opponent's age, gender, or circumstances.

He had swung his sword with the intention of taking her life, of this there was no doubt. And yet, the fact that the girl's body was not sliced in two demonstrated not only Wilhelm's lack of skill with the sword, but also that the girl had somehow avoided a fatal blow.

The most likely reason being—

Wilhelm: "—Threads, is it?"

Using all of her fingers and toes, the girl had weaved threads that extended into the hole that led to the bottom of the underground chamber.

In order to wield them freely, one would need rare talent and painstaking training. This technique could be used as a blade to cut through opponents, or as chains to restrain enemy movements. When wrapped tightly around the body, it could even serve as armor to protect against sword strikes.

As the final blow was about to be delivered, the girl made a move to protect her neck and heart, and Wilhelm slashed at her exposed torso with all his might; such was her momentary evasive maneuver.

With her split-second judgment, the girl had managed to keep a glimmer of hope alive. He had nothing but respect for her.

Although he remained vigilant, Wilhelm also wanted the girl to survive. This was because it was the common opinion among his allies that it would be preferable to capture her alive if possible.

???: “—Uh.”

A faint moan escaped from the suspended girl’s thin throat.

Wilhelm was about to approach the girl by positioning himself, thrusting his sword into the wall. Sensing his presence, the girl’s trembling eyelids opened, and her red eyes reflected Wilhelm.

Wilhelm remained on guard in response. However, he was certain from the feeling of his sword that it was impossible to counterattack from that position.

He had wielded the sword for fifty years now, and during that time, he had danced with death in countless life-risking battles and reaped the lives of numerous opponents.

All the past experiences of bloodshed and taken lives were telling Wilhelm the exact depth of the wounds he had inflicted on his opponent.

Wilhelm: “…”

Therefore, no matter how much the girl tried to hint with her deceitful gaze at still having some kind of trump card up her sleeve, Wilhelm saw through it as the desperate bluff it was and did not stop his ceaseless approach.

Wilhelm: “I do not know the details of the situation either, but it would be best for you to stop resisting and us not to fight any longer. Soon, Al-dono shall be held in custody too.”

Seeing through her bluff, Wilhelm attempted to stop the girl from pointlessly resisting any further.

That girl was one of the individuals who had conspired with Priscilla Barielle's Knight, Al—or so Wilhelm had heard. He could only speculate that the tragic and unfortunate loss of Priscilla's life in the Vollachian Empire might have been the catalyst that had driven Al to commit these crimes.

Wilhelm understood all too well what Al, someone who had just lost a loved one, was currently feeling.

He must have felt like his body had been mutilated, his heart torn apart, and his soul feeling as if he was burning endlessly with an unfathomable sense of powerlessness.

However, the world could not be allowed to be destroyed purely because of those negative emotions. Moreover, it was impossible to overlook the fact that one of Wilhelm's benefactors was among the victims of this rampage.

—Al's plots must be averted.

This was tantamount to suppressing all who were complicit in the scheme and cooperating with Al for whatever reason. —The same applied to the other co-conspirators, no matter who or what they were.

This shinobi girl was merely one of the cogs that needed to be removed from the machine—

Yae: "…This… is the worst."

These words were uttered in the weak, faint breaths of someone barely clinging on to life.

The girl suspended in the air seemed to realize that her bluff had not worked on Wilhelm, and could not hide her immense disappointment in herself.

That was—

Yae: “I can’t believe… I’m dragging you down like this.”

If she had not been suspended in mid-air, her deep remorse might even have been accompanied by actual tears.

If that remorse had only been based on the outcome of the battle with Wilhelm, Wilhelm might have finally let down his last shred of caution.

However, he did not. Immediately after the girl’s muttering, a sound was heard. —Overhead, from outside the hole.

There was a heavy thud, like something falling to the floor. Following that—

???: “—Guh, eargh!”

Hearing a sudden cry of pain, and realizing it was Felt’s, whom he had left in the room above, Wilhelm kicked off the wall and jumped up, using the sword that he had stuck into its structure for support.

Wilhelm performed a triple jump and leaped out of the hole, his eyes wide open in a frantic hurry.

Felt: “~~Hk!”

Floating in the air was Felt, frantically kicking her legs, desperately clawing at her neck with her fingers.

She was hanging in midair from a thread around her neck. However, the girl who orchestrated this most likely did not have the energy left to do so. —Then, Wilhelm saw that part of the wall had collapsed in the corner of the room, and realized that it had been the source of the sound he had heard earlier and the mechanism that was now keeping Felt suspended.

A thread had been attached to Felt’s neck, and when the wall, which had been cut at an angle in advance, collapsed at the appointed time, the thread was pulled, leaving her hanging in mid-air. —This way, no matter how the battle progressed, regardless of whether the girl lived or died, the trap would have been activated and Felt would be dangling in the air.

Wilhelm: “I will—”

Help you now, Wilhelm was about to say, running over to Felt with sword in hand.

The thread was strong, but without its user, its strength could not surpass a sword strike. Rescuing Felt was simple. And, the girl who set the trap could not possibly escape.

Originally, her purpose in setting up the timed trap must have been to distract Wilhelm from herself in the event of a prolonged battle, and to catch him by surprise or to allow for a quick escape.

However, the battle had been decided before the trap ever had the chance to be set off, and the girl was too severely injured to make an escape.

The trap gave her no opportunity for a surprise attack, or time to escape. Either way, Felt, who had gotten the brunt of the surprise attack, was still being hanged. —Or so Wilhelm thought.

At this point, Wilhelm’s train of thought was natural, and no one could blame him.

After all, at that point, the only people who truly understood the significance of Felt’s hanging were those who were the source of the threat to the Kingdom.

It was just—

Yae: “I can’t believe… I’m dragging you down like this.”

If there had been time to fathom the true meaning behind the remorseful words of the girl hanging in mid-air, things might have been different. The girl’s regret was not in her defeat itself, but what came after.

What she regretted was not her defeat, but the “insurance” that followed.

Felt: “—n, away.”

Just before Wilhelm’s sword strike cut the thread, Felt, who was being hanged, was desperately trying to make some sort of appeal with a hoarse breath.

It was not a plea for help. —It was a plea for him to run away.

Wilhelm: “…”

Immediately after, Wilhelm’s eyes caught sight of it. —The giant arm of a Dragon effortlessly smashed through the wall of the Barielle manor, and mercilessly struck Wilhelm from the side.

2

—To infiltrate the Royal Capital of Lugunica and release the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, held captive in the Prison Tower.

When Aldebaran revealed that utterly preposterous, batshit insane course of action, before promptly entering the city on his own, Heinkel harbored some complex reservations.

The root of Aldebaran’s objective, this had not been shared with Heinkel.

He seemed to possess a similar amount of information as the obedient Yae, but unlike Heinkel, who sought recompense for assisting Aldebaran, the reason behind Yae’s participation in these plans seemed to stem from a distorted obsession regarding Aldebaran.

Heinkel: “A distorted obsession, huh…? How could anyone declare that so shamelessly?”

Neither love nor hatred, the emotions Yae bore for Aldebaran were enigmatic. When he measured himself against that, Heinkel derided himself in a terribly bleak manner.

To begin with, through what means could one even measure whether something was straight or distorted?

If Yae’s obsession was to be evaluated as distorted, then what about his? What about Heinkel’s obsession, which had reduced him to a traitor in pursuit of the means to awaken his ever-slumbering wife?

Heinkel: “—Hk.”

A soliloquy tinged with self-condemnation and derision, as it triggered the outbreak of a fissuring headache, Heinkel pressed a finger into his temple, attempting to mask the pain.

Normally, the best remedy for this pain, akin to a fog that gave no answers, was alcohol. Though it would not alleviate the pain, alcohol would numb him, allowing him to temporarily forget about it.

Though he knew it to be unhealthy, Heinkel could not so much as open his eyes to see things properly unless he was swimming amidst the intoxication of alcohol.

And yet, right now, he could not afford to drink, to seek that intoxication to mask the pain. —At long last, the time might finally be upon him.

After nearly twenty years of pursuit, the time for the dearest wish he had longed for, coveting to the point of fissuring his very soul, was upon him.

Heinkel: “—Louanna.”

On the backs of his closed eyelids, as his lips spun the name of a lovely woman, her visage emerged.

Just the same as the day he met her, the form of his youthful, sweet, lovely wife had not changed in the slightest since the year she began to slumber. That was not because of a lack of forming any new memories; her sleeping visage had truly disregarded all passage of time, continuing to be as it always had been.

He wished to see her open her eyes again. Spinning words with her lips, with nary an inhibition in contrast to her pretty appearance, unable to sit still for even a second; he wished to burn her lively way of being into his consciousness.

So long as that came true, Heinkel’s life could end without desiring anything further—

Heinkel: “I’m…”

???: “—Ah~, old man, you being negative again? You’re giving off that sorta vibe, you know?”

At the sudden voice from right under him, Heinkel’s breath caught. As Heinkel continued to bore into his temple, the Divine Dragon called out to him like so as it spread its wings.

Contrary to its grand and mighty presence, the Divine Dragon spoke in an exceedingly frivolous manner, and despite not even being able to see Heinkel riding upon its back, it still perceptively picked up on his subtleties.

At a question that could not be classified as concern from the Divine Dragon, Heinkel was at a loss for an answer.

That was a matter of course. —After all, for Heinkel, being left alone with just the Divine Dragon like this was something akin to a flying dragon or water dragon having their favourite food dangled before their snout.

In order to wake up the slumbering Louanna Astrea, Heinkel had searched through all sorts of methods; magic and Curse Arts, Meteors and Magicreation Tools, he had tried everything. With each and every one of those hopes severed, Heinkel’s final ray of hope was the Dragon’s Blood.

With that great treasure, said to cure every disease and bring about bountiful harvests to even the most barren of lands, he would awaken Louanna. —And right now, the heart fueled by that very treasure was asserting its presence, beating in a place so close that Heinkel could draw his sword and reach it.

But then again—

Heinkel: “…Leave it be. Don’t concern yourself with me.”

Divine Dragon: “I said to stop having such sulky reactions. Old man, I get that you want to hurry, and how frustrating it must be for you to be alone with me. That’s why, I intended to properly put on the brakes for you, old man, as my own sorta consideration.”

Heinkel: “Consideration, you say? Don’t tell me that’s what you think this was supposed to be.”

Divine Dragon: “I did intend on telling you that’s what I thought this was, but I guess saying it’d be no-good?”

Without a hint of ill-will, what the Divine Dragon’s seemingly puzzled words were referring to, it was none other than the current location of itself and Heinkel—that being far from the land, high above the clouds.

Riding on the Divine Dragon’s back, Heinkel was present in high altitudes of the aether. Perhaps because the Divine Dragon was controlling the wind, he was exposed to no shaking or strong gales, and excluding the stiffness of the scales, it was a comfortable environment. But, the consideration that the Divine Dragon was speaking of, it likely had nothing to do with this comfort.

Rather, for the unlikely chance that Heinkel drew blade, it was regarding the maintenance of this high altitude permitting no salvation.

Divine Dragon: “Even if you were able to gouge out my heart and obtain my heart’s blood, it’d be meaningless since we’d both plummet to our deaths. Hence, even if we’re left alone, you can’t lay a hand on me here, old man. How about it? Not too shabby an idea, yeah?”

Heinkel: “I don’t want to hear that from you. First of all, that sort of thing shouldn’t even be called concern or a calculating move. What if your planning was off, there’s a possibility that I just draw my sword without thinking of the consequences…”

Divine Dragon: “Nah, you’d never do that. Old man, you’re too decent for that.”

Heinkel: “Wha…”

Divine Dragon: “Decent guys, they always consider fear. I’ve come to know many various people with a screw loose until now, and you'd never be like 'em, old man."

Saying all it had to say, everything it pleased, the Divine Dragon's oracle caused Heinkel's mouth to gape open and closed, unable to form an immediate refutation.

Only, the reason for his ears flushing a bright red, was it anger, or embarrassment?

In the case of the former, then the fact that he did not begin shouting curses without thinking about the consequences was in accordance with the Divine Dragon's expectations. In the case of the latter, then the fact that he had an idea of what he was being chided about was in accordance with the Divine Dragon's expectations.

In other words, the moment his ears flushed red, Heinkel's defeat was set in stone.

Heinkel: "Me, decent, you say…"

Pressing his finger into his head with greater strength, Heinkel's voice rasped at the Divine Dragon's evaluation.

Decent; considering Heinkel's current position, it was far too ironic of an appraisal. What the hell was the Divine Dragon thinking? Would a decent person fall to the extremities of self-centeredness, turning traitor against their country?

Heinkel was neither decent, nor honest. He was not worthy of an appraisal that expressed such virtue, ubiquitously earned by many townspeople.

Heinkel: "That's why, when Miss Priscilla passed away, I went along with Aldebaran's proposal."

Intervening in the national crisis befalling the Vollachian Empire, Priscilla Barielle had lost her life.

Heinkel was in a position such that, no matter what, he would never say that he had pledged loyalty to her. His relationship with her had been a cooperative one, borne of shared interest—even that, with how things were now, Heinkel would never know just how much value Priscilla saw in him.

Only, though Heinkel had not pledged his loyalty to Priscilla, neither did he doubt her capacity as a ruler to win the throne, guiding the people of the Kingdom as their new Monarch.

With outstanding capabilities, the wisdom to see ahead, and a beautiful appearance, all fine attributes befitting a queen.

Priscilla possessed the qualifications to become the queen of the Kingdom of Lugunica. —Upon the dawn of her ascendance to the throne, he was supposed to have received a licence to the Dragon's Blood as his reward.

That hope had wilted in the Empire, alongside Priscilla's life.

From the bottom of his heart, he found it unfortunate. —The fact that he had been unable to secure the Dragon's Blood, and the fact that Priscilla's rule over the Kingdom of Lugunica never came to fruition.

Thus having lost all hope, the stricken Heinkel was proffered a hand by Aldebaran.

In exchange for assisting him, and becoming an enemy of the world, he could obtain the Dragon's Blood. —To Heinkel's ears, that proposal rang far too sweetly.

The hope that he was supposed to have obtained, seeing it ripped away right before his eyes was harsh. —Moreover, this was the second time for Heinkel, the second time that the light of hope was extinguished right when he was but a step away.

The first time, he had missed his chance due to a foolish mistake, and the accompanying feeling of helplessness was difficult to forget.

Hence, this time, Heinkel would absolutely cling to any wretched possibility.

For him to be "decent", was extremely off-base from the Divine

Dragon.

Divine Dragon: “Has your husk been filled with displeasure again? This may be coming from me, but there’s nobody who’d love a difficult middle-aged man, yeah?”

Heinkel: “…It’s too late, for that sort of thing.”

Divine Dragon: “You sure complicate things, don’t you now…? Well, it’s seriously like a boomerang, so I won’t say anything more.”

Even with just the simple gesture of shrugging its shoulders, the Divine Dragon’s body was far too exaggerated.

In that eerily human gesture, Heinkel found a certain commonality with Aldebaran, and ignored the increasing pain of his headache at the inscrutability.

To not be loved by anyone. That was exactly what Heinkel desired.

That he had not been loved even once, he was not such a fool to make any such warped, careless remarks. Heinkel had been loved from birth, and there was no shortage of people who had loved him since.

And, not only did he fail to repay the affection that had been directed towards him, he betrayed it, marching through the rain.

Divine Dragon: “—. Come to think of it, we never really get this sorta one-on-one time, and I remembered that there were some things I wanted to check with you, old man.”

Heinkel: “Can’t you just be quiet and wait?”

Divine Dragon: “I’m the type who can’t bear silence. Might be ‘cause I was always with someone who would never stop talking.”

He was completely ignorant regarding how the Divine Dragon operated, but the other party had not spoken much about it, and Heinkel was not eager to know. Either way, once this was all over, this was an individual whom he would have die in order to procure its heart’s blood. There was no need to go out of his way to add any reasons to feel guilty for doing so.

Besides, though consideration might have been the reason, he was grateful for the flow of the conversation to shift from what it had been to that point.

Were they to discuss another topic, then perhaps this headache might fade a bit.

Heinkel: “So, most esteemed Divine Dragon-sama, what was it that you wanted to ask me?”

Divine Dragon: “Ahh, it’s nothing too important, but you’re excessively sturdy, right old man? So, I was wondering if you had any idea of why you’re so sturdy?”

Heinkel: “…”

Divine Dragon: “Huh? Did I do something?”

At the Divine Dragon’s innocent words, Heinkel ground his teeth in annoyance.

The pain in his head intensifying, this served as proof that Heinkel’s plans from a moment ago had failed. —He had hoped for the focus of the conversation to change, but this was evidence that it had not.

Heinkel: “…”

Hushed in silence, Heinkel looked down at his open palm, and sighed.

The Divine Dragon’s query had been in regards to Heinkel’s body. Of course, that was his own body. He was aware of its abnormality, and was also properly aware of the reasons for it. —Among the many sins Heinkel had committed, this was punishment for an especially grave one.

Louanna Astrea’s unwakeable slumber. —Including Heinkel, that was undoubtedly the beginning of the Astrea Family’s division, but more decisive had been the events of fifteen years prior.

In the midst of Theresia van Astrea's deployment to the subjugation of the White Whale, the transfer of the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint had resulted in the change of Sword Saint, and Theresia's death. —Serving as the impetus to all that, was the abduction of Royal Prince Ford Lugunica's esteemed daughter.

The night of the incident, Heinkel had perpetrated an unforgivable betrayal, and the worst possible mistake that had made his betrayal meaningless. —The divine punishment bequeathed, was the current Heinkel.

Heinkel: "I've got no reason to deliberately reveal that to you…"

Divine Dragon: "Oh, you're really saying that? In that case, if you don't tell me, I'll report to the other me that you were being uncooperative, old man, annulling that promise you guys had, what if I threaten you like that?"

Heinkel: "YOU…!!"

Divine Dragon: "I'm kidding, just kidding. There's probably fifty or a hundred things that you don't wanna say. You and me both, old man."

Heinkel: "…A hundred things, that's a lot."

As the Divine Dragon made small talk that could not be perceived as anything small, Heinkel feebly responded with just that.

It had said fifty or a hundred things, but the things Heinkel harbored could be counted on a single hand. And, that single hand was already heavy enough to crush his fragile self.

Even so, connecting that which had been fractured, dragging along that which had been tensed, just a little bit more, if he just continued a little longer, then finally—

Divine Dragon: "…"

Heinkel: "—? Ah, um… what is it?"

Perceiving a slight change in the atmosphere, Heinkel questioned the Divine Dragon. For a moment, hesitating on whether to regularly call it Volcanica or not, he ultimately settled with an innocuous phrasing. But, paying no heed to Heinkel's indecision, the Divine Dragon took a nosedive—facing downwards, below the clouds, towards the Royal Capital.

And then—

Divine Dragon: "—Hold on tight, old man!"

Heinkel: "Gwoah-?!"

The next moment, as a windstorm seemed to push down on him from above, it slammed Heinkel down onto the Divine Dragon's back as if he were prostrating himself. Without even the time to catch his breath from the sudden impact, the Divine Dragon descended in one fell swoop with Heinkel affixed to its back, piercing into the Royal Capital's skies.

Their act of lurking above the clouds to conceal themselves while Aldebaran was raiding the Prison Tower, came to naught. —That was to say, the need to reveal themselves had been born.

In such a manner, the Divine Dragon arrived at their destination with such speed that Heinkel had not even been able to lift his head. With a swing of its unruly Dragon forearm, a hole was perforated through the wall of the building alongside an intense sound of destruction.

The reason and the target of that exceedingly sudden violent outburst, were entirely unknown to him.

Only, the building on the receiving end of the Divine Dragon's calamitous strike was ruthlessly demolished, the dragonclaws thoroughly crushing everything inside—

Divine Dragon: "—You've gotta be kidding me!"

That was a voice of absolute shock, spilling from the mouth of the Divine Dragon who had perpetrated that merciless act of destruction.

Sharpening its golden eyes, the Divine Dragon surveyed the interior of the building it had thrown its arm into, and faced with the result of its relentless demolishment, it expressed its astonishment.

That was only natural. —The Divine Dragon’s claws, tougher and sharper than most of the blades in this world, had been severed, torn off, and reduced to dust.

And, as for the one who had done that—

Heinkel: “—Esteemed Father.”

Taking a stance with their twin swords in the half-destroyed building, was the being who had just fended off the Divine Dragon’s claws.

The Sword Demon, Wilhelm van Astrea.

3

???: “—My thanks.”

Parrying the dragonclaws, barely managing to repel them as both his arms went numb, Wilhelm proclaimed his gratitude to Felt, who had informed him of the looming threat.

A thread bound to her neck, Felt had been hung up in the air. —Whilst in a situation in which her own life had been in danger, she had nevertheless commanded Wilhelm to ready himself, rather than seek his help.

Thanks to her, he had managed to take a defensive stance by the skin of his teeth.

???: “Nah, normally, that ain’t something you can stop even if you react in time!”

And, in regards to Wilhelm’s deep emotions, the one to raise their voice was the enormous body standing outside the manor—a presence so fearsome and mystical that many would prostrate themselves upon merely laying eyes on them, an individual harboring absolute power.

The imposing form of the Divine Dragon Volcanica, had been peering into the mansion from outside.

Felt: “Cough, cough… I’m in agreement with that Dragon. I told you to run away, yeah? Not, to get ‘em… eough…”

Of all the things for Felt to have said in her violent coughing fit, she expressed agreement with Volcanica’s opinion.

Taking advantage of the chaos of the dragonclaws, she had been released from her midair suspension—no, Wilhelm’s eyes had grasped the events that had come to pass in even more accurate fashion.

It was no coincidence that Felt had been saved without a hand from Wilhelm.

Wilhelm: “It cannot be, you came to save Felt-sama?”

Volcanica: “It’s tough to say yes or no given our positions, but if I went and said yes here, would Felt-chan then be publicly considered to be a member of our team of traitors?”

Felt: “They aren’t, my allies. But, there’s no doubt that it came flying in to save me…”

With a faint lingering sensation of having been hanged, Felt responded so as she rubbed her neck. No refutation came from Volcanica’s end, either. It seemed that through some means, the Dragon had sensed Felt’s predicament, and had flown to this place in order to rescue her.

In other words, the shinobi girl had aimed that far ahead in attaching a thread to Felt’s neck.

Be that as it may—

Wilhelm: “It appears to be a sore spot for the person in question. After all, the fact that you have come here would mean…”

Volcanica: “I can’t go to backup the me over there.”

Wilhelm: “Indeed. —Incidentally, your manner of speech has altered quite a bit. Compared to forty years ago, when I merely captured a glimpse of you, you are almost a completely different person… no, a different Dragon.”

Volcanica: “There’s a saying that goes “If you don’t see a man for three days”. Forty years is a hell of a long time. A summer can work real magic on girls, grandpa.”

Wilhelm: “I see.”

Though those words had been given in response, it was not an answer that provided him with an understanding of Volcanica’s change. Only, Wilhelm had not the time to investigate that change in demeanor here.

There were things to prioritize over that. —In its intrusion, Volcanica had not been by its lonesome. It seemed that the Dragon was carrying another upon its back. For their mouth to have remained without use up till this point, concealing their presence, had not been with the intent of catching Wilhelm off-guard, but rather—

Wilhelm: “—Are you unable to even show your face before me, Heinkel?”

Heinkel: “—Hk.”

At Wilhelm’s call, the other party recoiling could be felt through the atmosphere.

Even if he lowered his head, stifled his voice, and endeavored to conceal his presence, Wilhelm had already been made aware that Heinkel was among those complicit with Al, who had become a traitor opposing the Kingdom.

Al’s actions were already more than enough of a threat to the survival of the Kingdom.

To not swing his sword amidst this critical situation was an impossibility for Wilhelm, former Commander of the Royal Guard as he was. Even without such underlying circumstances, the reason as to why Wilhelm had resolved himself to take initiative and take up the sword, was Heinkel's presence.

Wilhelm: "In rough terms, you have been told that you will be lent Dragon's Blood if you cooperate, yes? Through those means, you intend to awaken your wife… Louanna, correct? In that case, your discretion has been far too lacking."

Stored in the Royal Castle, Dragon's Blood certainly housed tremendous power.

With that power of the Kingdom's greatest treasure, even awakening Louanna Astrea, slumbering for reasons unknown, was entirely possible.

However—

Wilhelm: "You believe that Al-dono… no, that the turncoat known as Al will keep to his word? That individual betrayed those left behind by the master he served, Priscilla Barielle-sama, and is even attempting to cause a stir by deceiving those who had worried about him. Why in the world would he grant your, and your desires alone?"

Volcanica: "Nah, well, I get that it might be dubious? But, that's way too one-sided—"

Wilhelm: "Exalted Dragon of Lugunica, I am not speaking to you at the moment."

As Wilhelm displayed an attitude and words that left it no place to interject, Volcanica fell silent with a "Mh…". Towards the other side of the hushed Dragon, to the person hiding on its back, he resumed.

Wilhelm: "What is the matter, unable to say a word? Perhaps I have hit the nail on the head, or perhaps you had not even considered it? I suppose that is right. For a long time already, you would do nothing but avert your face, plug your ears, run away from anything you found unpleasant. That is why even now, you do not even attempt to look at anything other than what is convenient for you—”

Heinkel: “—Hk, SHUT UP SHUT UP SHUT UP!”

Wilhelm: “…”

Heinkel: “Anything you please… Hk, you just say anything you fucking please, don’t you…?! No matter what I may do for Louanna, YOU’VE GOT NO RIGHT TO SAY ANYTHING ABOUT IT, FATHER!!”

With a blood-curdling bellow, a silhouette rose up from Volcanica’s back.

A face he knew, a voice he recognized; at the temper of the trembling finger thrust towards him, Wilhelm deeply sighed. It was a sigh consisting of exasperation and disappointment, as well as a faint relief.

There were various reasons for that relief. One being whether he would still have any fighting spirit left to raise his face after being spoken to so insultingly, another being whether he would attempt to lay low as a coward whilst cooperating with a traitor.

But, what could be said on the whole—

Wilhelm: “…So, you have finally shown your face?”

Heinkel: “Uh…”

Wilhelm: “Well then? Have you no objections other than shouting noisily? Is your reason for supporting that man in accordance with my guesswork? If that is the case, can you think of why he would grant your desires alone? Have you worn yourself out by wishing, causing your eyes to cloud over?”

Heinkel: “I, am… hk.”

As Wilhelm piled on the questions, the silhouette on the Dragon’s back—Heinkel, hung his head.

Wherever that explosive temper of his from a moment prior might have gone, it was easy to tell that he was dejected. And, the act of Heinkel shrinking before Wilhelm, was not something that had only begun now.

Such had been the case for a long, long time already. —Ever since he had taken his vows to become a Knight, and had been granted Wilhelm's former beloved sword, Astrea.

Felt: “There's no doubt that pops is aiming for the Dragon's Blood with the objective of waking up his sleeping wife.”

In place of Heinkel, unable to form words with his eyes cast down, it was Felt who answered Wilhelm's question. Lowering her hand from rubbing her neck, Felt straightened her back. Despite being the most powerless person present, she wore an expression that gave no such impression whatsoever,

Felt: “I heard it straight from his mouth. Though I haven't heard all the details.”

Wilhelm: “—. No, I thank you for your answer in my incompetent son's stead. Furthermore, I am sorry that you had to go along with such a dialogue.”

Felt: “I don't need any backward apologies. I told this to pops as well, but it's simply a matter of his methods being different to mine. It's got nothing to do with them being good or bad.”

Despite having been embroiled, and having suffered damages herself, there was no anger in Felt's response. From that dignified way of looking at things, Wilhelm certainly saw the capacity to be Monarch within her.

Unmistakably, Felt, like Crusch, was one of the five individuals selected by the Dragon History Stone. —And despite that, for that very Divine Dragon to be obstructing the way like this.

Wilhelm: “There would have already been many bearing witness to the sight of you having descended to the surface, mercilessly swinging your claws. The foundations of the Dragon Kingdom are shaking. Have you awareness of that?”

Volcanica: “Yeah, I feel a bit bad. From the very bottom of my heart. But you see, even if the Dragon Kingdom reverts to being the Lion Kingdom, it’d still be way better than the complete destruction of the world.”

Wilhelm: “Although, I believe this rebellious spirit of yours is a matter of concern grave enough to be on par with the world’s destruction.”

At the very least, there was no doubt that violent tremors would run through the Kingdom of Lugunica in the near future.

Those tremors would likely cause the jeopardous foundations of the Kingdom to fissure, and those emergent cracks would likely swallow many. Even supposing the actions of Volcanica and the other traitors were for the purposes of opposing something that eclipsed even that—

Wilhelm: “Even if an anomalous Dragon is among them, that is not a situation for a mere few people to decide. Especially given that one of those few people is yet inexperienced, unable to see anything beyond their own feet, there is no salvation to be had for you lot.”

Volcanica: “When including this exalted Dragon, wouldn’t it be a miraculous oracle from the heavens?”

Wilhelm: “In that case, as you once did before, right now, at this moment, please save the many people who are struggling through the pain. And then, furthermore, given the greater amount of people it contains, you ought to save the entire world. If you are unable to do so—”

Volcanica: “If I’m unable?”

Wilhelm: “—Then I shall have no other choice but to consider you the same as my foolish son, puppeted by sweet words.”

Stating thus, Wilhelm held his twin swords at the ready, squaring off against the Divine Dragon Volcanica.

The numbness that had arisen from repelling the first strike had faded from his hands. But, if that was an example of a volley, merely three more exchanges would suffice in wresting his sword away from him. Either evasion, or parrying to a much higher degree.

Volcanica: “Don’t move, Lil’ Miss Felt. I’m not confident in being able to have a soft touch on this.”

Felt: “Maybe I shouldn’t listen to anything you say. Ever since Rom-jii tried to pull the wool over my eyes, I’ve had plenty of resentment built up.”

Wilhelm: “If that is the case, then I apologize for any inconvenience this may cause you for the time being.”

Felt: “Stop acting like you’re on friendly terms with me!”

Shouting in anger, Felt scowled at Wilhelm and Volcanica in turn, sticking out her tongue.

Sparing a minimal amount of his focus upon her, Wilhelm observed every single action of Volcanica’s. Its position, likewise, was that of having rushed to the shinobi girl’s rescue. With their figure having been sighted already, before long the commotion would magnify, and their freedom to fight would be limited. —This, too, would be a short yet decisive bout.

Volcanica: “Technically, even if decayed, I’m a Dragon of legend, yeah? Shouldn’t you be looking into options other than fighting?”

Wilhelm: “Unfortunately, I was just thinking that now is the time in which I must once more surpass a legend. My deepest apologies for making use of this convenience, but please endure my company.”

Heinkel: “—Hk.”

Volcanica’s intimidation was met with Wilhelm’s response; it was apparent to the latter that Heinkel, having not spoken a word for a good while, had his breath hitch, had his cheeks stiffen.

Eyelids trembling unceasingly, Heinkel’s azure eyes regarded Wilhelm in bewilderment.

Heinkel: “Father, you don’t mean…”

Wilhelm: “…”

With Heinkel having seemingly realized something, Wilhelm shut both his eyes at once.

Before Volcanica, that was far too recklessly defenseless an act; yet, the trust that his opponent would not take advantage of that opportunity, was a sense mutually shared through their fighting spirits.

Surrendering his being to that sense, upon the back of his closed eyelids, Wilhelm’s remorses were envisioned.

An overcast sky, a headstone marking a vacant grave, bereft of any contents. A great multitude of attendees overcome with desolation, the words of His Majesty the King extolling that act of sacrifice for their duty.

The son not present where he ought to have been, and his weak self devoid of the willpower to bring him there.

And, at last—

???: “—It’s alright, honored grandfather. When she passed, honored grandmother wasn’t the Sword Saint. That’s why, the Sword Saint didn’t lose.”

???: “After all, the Sword Saint shouldn’t ever lose. Father said so.”

???: “So, don’t be so sad, the Astrea Family is safe and sound, honored grandfather.”

Wilhelm: “—Nothing, but the words of a child.”

Words lacking any malice, from a child who had just inherited the qualifications to unsheathe the Dragon Sword alongside the Divine Protection.

Recollecting in great detail the remorses of that day, Wilhelm batted his eyelids open, and gazed at the Dragon. —At the Divine

Dragon, its name writ in legend, once a savior of the Kingdom, as it had attested itself.

With the Kingdom facing an existential threat, with the hearts of many in turmoil, the imprudence was well within his awareness.

However, akin to the saving of the Kingdom, of the world, Wilhelm possessed an important duty he needed to fulfill through his sword. —An important duty, one impossible to fulfill with any means but the sword.

Naught else, did Wilhelm know. —Naught, but the way to return the Sword Saint to being human.

Henceforth, for this blade of his, he sought swordsmanship akin to that which he held in the past—nay, swordsmanship greater than even that, and challenged the Dragon. All for the sake of surpassing the legend that eclipsed legends, awaiting him beyond that point.

Wilhelm: "—Sword Demon, Wilhelm Trias."

Volcanica: "—Divine Dragon, Volcanica."

Simultaneous with their declarations, both sprung into action. —By sword's shimmer and dragon's claws, all notions of sound were consigned to oblivion.

Chapter 28:
A Stanza of Legend

1

—Indubitably, that had been a stanza of a battle that would go on to be told in legend.

???: “…”

The Sword Demon’s twin swords capered, and the Divine Dragon’s dragonclaws stirred up a gale whilst moving to intercept.

Reigning supreme over all other existences, Dragons were born as ultimate lifeforms; the Divine Dragon, possessing abilities outstanding even among that species, its talons, its fangs, its scales, all were artefacts that ought be considered sacred treasures of nature.

Upon each occasion the tremendous power it concealed was brandished, the wind would raise death throes, the heavens would be rent asunder, the world carrying a newfound heat would be perceivable. Even basking in a single direct hit, would make the continuation of combat unfeasible.

A method to prevent those dreadful sacred treasures from being wielded to the fullest, indeed resided within the Sword Demon.

The impetus for the Divine Dragon making an appearance before the Sword Demon, that had been the peril befalling the girl who bore the same features as the lineage of Lion Kings. That girl had been present within the room in which the bout had broken out, attentively watching over the battle without holding down her hair, flapping by the updraft of wind.

Maintaining that girl to the rear, the Sword Demon positioned himself such that she would get caught up in the destruction wrought by the Divine Dragon.

By doing so, the Divine Dragon, fearing harm may befall the dame for whatever reason, was made unable to display its full strength, thus alleviating the footsteps of death's dominion from encroaching upon the Sword Demon, to some extent.

Ergo—

Sword Demon: "…"

The Sword Demon abandoned his position of keeping the girl to his back, and personally closed his distance with death's dominion.

To a rampaging tempest of destruction and annihilation he exposed his own self, nary a lifeline save the dual implements of steel seized in both his hands, and threw himself towards the precipice of doom, with even the slightest of missteps meaning his life would be forfeit.

By using the battleground to one's favor, by taking advantage of the opponent's emotions, it was indeed possible to edge towards victory.

But, that was inelegant. And beyond being inelegant, it was extremely impertinent, unbeneficial, and futile. —A victory stolen through underhanded means, rather than skill, to make up for swordsmanship that was lacking, what value could such a thing possibly hold here and now?

—The Sword Demon was a man who had lived on the battlefield.

The existence of battles fought for the sake of survival, of history untold by any save the triumphant survivors, of defeats and deaths that could not be excused; of these he knew all, by virtue of the weight of his victims' blood clinging onto his soul.

However, the current time was different. —Nay, from this moment forward, in all the clashes the Sword Demon would grip his blades, doing battle against individuals through his steel, there would be no meaning in stolen victory.

Through his swordsmanship he would force the surrender of the one against whom he possessed the greatest need to emerge triumphant.

Along that journey, the Sword Demon had not the time to squander on detours. If he was going to forge this old, withering body into the steel it had once been, he could not squander his time on anything but steeping his soul in the most scorching of heats.

Sword Demon: “…”

At the raging blow of a swordlike wind, the dragon’s claw, peeled and sliced off, danced through the air. Cramped. In order to swing his swords, in order for the Divine Dragon to wield its tail and fangs to the fullest, this battleground was far too cramped. The Sword Demon’s heels exploding, his shimmering swords flashed at a speed that consigned all notions of sound and wind to oblivion, piercing into the chest of the Divine Dragon, and causing the space around them to burst asunder.

A Dragon’s scales, their hardness was greatly influenced by the aggregate amount of Mana possessed by the individual.

The mightier and longer-lived the Dragon, the more robust and tenacious they grew; henceforth, in regards to the Divine Dragon who reigned supreme over all others, its draconic scales were of a hardness that surpassed even diamond.

Against those diamond dragonscales, the Sword Demon relentlessly swung his steel, repeating attacks of the striking, slashing, and stabbing variety. Even after all that, the steel in his grip was in prime condition—specially prepared for the Sword Demon to accomplish his goal, the twin swords Trias were a masterpiece of the same swordsmith that had forged the renowned blade Astrea, with which he bore a deep connection.

Their handles fit comfortably in his hands, and integrating their weight with his body, the swords’ shimmer traded blows with diamond, still unchipped—

Sword Demon: “…”

In regards to the Sword Demon’s furious onslaught, the Divine Dragon was not one to allow itself to be ravaged unceasingly like such.

Even if the mind concealed within was not the original, there was no hesitation in exerting the abilities of what could be called the strongest dragonhusk in the world; thus the Divine Dragon manifested might on the level of a natural disaster as if elementary.

To transform the shape of the world, to append unto reality any conclusion in accordance to what it deigned, forcing its showing upon the stage, was the right bestowed upon the Divine Dragon by Od Lagna, unmistakably.

A roar shattered the sky, dragonclaws cleaved the earth. Dragonscales repelled the Sword Demon's fullest wrath a hundred times over, and the draconic aura emitted from the entirety of its body stained the Royal Capital's atmosphere in the hue of the Divine Dragon.

The tail slammed down, striking the aged Sword Demon true. —Nay, the Sword Demon had thrust the tip of his sword into the tail to evade the strike, before immediately dashing up its length, drawing near to the throat. An intercepting roar. Light torn to smithereens head-on, a decapitating glint flashed. With the dragonscales on its shoulders it deflected, instantly poising itself to go again—the clash began anew.

Sword Demon: "…"

Unfurled wings becoming as if blades, the Divine Dragon ushered in a gusty storm of swords that carved up the Royal Capital. As the Sword Demon slipped through that gale, the former drawing a band of blood, the tail slammed to align with his trajectory, carving with it death's dominion. At the echoing tremors of demise, the Sword Demon's body was furiously blown backwards. A direct hit—falsehood, as upon perceiving its unavoidable nature, the Sword Demon had aligned himself with the revolution of the tail, and from his fingertips, his ankles, his knees, his hips, his lumbar, his ribs, his shoulders, his neck, and the top of his head, he released all strength, allowing the lethal impact to pass through his entire body, as he flew, and flew, and flew.

Slamming through one, two, three buildings, the Sword Demon drove his sword into the ground, and lifted his visage. His fighting spirit was not shaken in the slightest. Thereupon, the Divine Dragon's breath took the form of a corona, and drew near.

Sword Demon: "…"

A flash of swordly shimmer, the Sword Demon cleaved through the breath's cusp, forcing his body through the meager gap that had only been formed, and reached salvation from the scorching light, waiting in the open air. Then did the Divine Dragon beat its wings, swooping down to mercilessly snap its maw at the Sword Demon.

Dragonfangs, boasting durability and sharpness that exceeded even that of draconic claws, moved to sink into the flesh of the Sword Demon. Perfectly aligning the tips of both his swords together, the Sword Demon created a support brace that prevented the jaws from snapping shut. Supposing he had instead aimed the tips of the swords towards the maxilla and mandible respectively, the jaw would have closed, crunching his life to naught.

It was his sense of smell that rejected Death—nay, his avariciousness to seize victory that had prevented that, thus prolonging his life.

With the Sword Demon captured in its unclosing maw, the Divine Dragon abandoned its efforts to plunder his life by means of its fangs—giving a powerful click of its tongue, the Dragon gave birth to an explosion within that space and struck the Sword Demon's body true.

Sword Demon: "…"

As blood spurt forth from ears left and right, his ruptured eardrums, and the semicircular canals within, each quivered. Gnashing his teeth, the Sword Demon stood his ground as the Dragon's tongue extended to strike him, launching him outside its maw—out towards the high skies of the Royal Capital, defenseless.

During his capture in the jaws, the Sword Demon had been carried off to the sky by the flapping wings of the Divine Dragon; jostled around by the wind, in free fall, bereft of the means with which to counter, his altitude high as to cause those faint of heart to swoon upon a mere downwards gaze, he faced straight towards the ground, descending in a swift, unceasing motion.

Were he to continue and descend in this manner, Sword Demon though he might be, he would not escape harm's way. Between a human who lived on the ground, and a Dragon permitted to lord over the skies with its large build, that was the definitive—

Sword Demon: "…"

But, even in a situation that appeared as a decisive blow, the Divine Dragon did not abandon the Sword Demon to chance.

The Dragon greatly inflated its lungs to ready a breath, the release of which would give rise to tremendous damage to the sprawling Royal Capital below, shattering the endeavor to abstain from killing —no, the Noble District directly below had been evacuated.

Somebody, having established this place as a battlefield beforehand, had evacuated every residence liable to being caught up in the damage, thus constructing this arena. He regarded that skillfulness with admiration, and gratitude.

Sword Demon: "…"

The breath unleashed was greater and more sweltering than before, blitzing towards the Sword Demon as infernal heat.

The Sword Demon, unable to even look straight at the white light as he was, and possessing not the wings or the methods with which to resist the force of gravity, would have no choice but receive the blast directly—that instant, below the Sword Demon as he revolved his body midair, a foothold hastened.

Sword Demon: "…"

One of the buildings the Sword Demon had slammed through, before ascending to the sky; the tall time tower intercepted the path of the plummeting old swordsman, functioning as a foothold for the Sword Demon. Bending his knees, the Sword Demon landed on the tower, held his twin swords tightly, and gazed to the sky. —Across the breath, the Sword Demon and Divine Dragon exchanged glances, and that instant, a beautiful flash of sword clashed head-on with the white light.

Sword Demon: “…”

A chain of sounds akin to water’s surface being flicked, to the shattering of fragile glass, and the corona was split asunder from within.

The Divine Dragon’s breath, it was. And in it dwelled both the power and the right to engulf the many things it collided with, flaying their outer layers, and stripping off the profound to lay them bare. Nevertheless, the Sword Demon had ignored all that to his heart’s content as it was thrust before him, cleaving through the light with a brandish of his blades.

—As something truly pure, allowing no interference from the wicked, the sword flash beautifully bisected all.

Sword Demon: “…”

As the breath, severed as it was, radiated across the surface, it demolished the Noble District of the Royal Capital, leveling it flat.

The tower stood on by the Sword Demon, which had become the epicenter of the explosion, and the crimson mansion under the protection of the Divine Dragon, were the only things to have escaped direct harm, but aught else had learned the tremendous degree of the Dragon’s power.

The aftershock of the white light had stained the Sword Demon with white soot, jumping off the crumbling tower, and the Divine Dragon flapped its wings, still continuing to exert its hostility from the heavens; between ground and sky, their gazes crossed.

And then—

Sword Demon: “…”

As swordly aura, surging forth rather than reaching its limit, and draconic pressure, compelling aught to surrender, clashed anew, all living things in the Royal Capital of Lugunica, organic or not, shuddered.

2

???: “Do you, like flowers?”

Amidst a world hazed in white, audible was the voice of a lovely woman, her back towards a bed of yellow flowers.

The world misshapen by the draconic aura, Wilhelm spun his body through the advance of a fatal zephyr, and as he brandished the gleaming swords carried in both his hands, a multitude of reminiscences flowed within himself.

???: “Have you come to like flowers?”

A lovely woman, she had been. Drawn to her at first sight, the foolish man had placed a lid over those sentiments unfamiliar.

Yet still, as their relationship went unsevered, Wilhelm had indulged in that environment, fearful of cutting too deep into it, immersing his body and soul in moments of laxness, of terrible, oh most terrible timidity, neglecting that time went by.

???: “To swing the sword to protect someone. I think that’s nice.”

His hometown enveloped in a blazing inferno, a sword flashing with beauty had delivered Wilhelm from the clutches of death.

The woman had harbored no desire to take up the sword, yet nonetheless was loved by the sword; the reality that he had conferred her with a reason to swing the sword filled Wilhelm with myriad anger, his soul a conflagration born of repudiation.

Towards weakness, towards the secrets, towards his own inadequate being, anger, anger, anger—.

Cleaving through the anger entire, overpowering it, by devoting his everything to the act of channeling that violent sentiment into his blade, at last, he attained the right to stand before her, and cross swords.

And thus, he had rescued the lovely woman from the abominable Sword God, making her his own.

???: “Are you, in love with me?”

—Nay, was it that he had made her his, or had he been made hers? He knew not the answer.

But, they had been happy. They had been fortunate. From the very moment he had met Theresia, to the very instant he had lost her, Wilhelm had continued to be blessed to the greatest possible extent.

—The Death of Theresia, was unmistakably a tragedy.

Unable to even exchange words of parting, failing to convey the words he ought to have imparted, Wilhelm had been dominated by grief and lamentation. Amidst his despair, by overlooking much, he had erred.

But, the days he had spent with Theresia, for Wilhelm, had been those of happiness.

That joyous time shared between the two, was it really something that could conclude with it all being ruined, fading as if its entirety had never even occurred, the moment it had come to an end with a single day of tragedy?

Even if its color had faded in transience, could he truly remain without ever desiring that it ripen with fresh color once more?

Decidedly, that could not be so.

So that Theresia’s Death, that her Life, would not come to an end alongside a tragedy, he sought vengeance.

Thus, if swinging his sword for Theresia had returned color to those days, then he desired to return color to a similarly dulled scene, unceasing in his struggle to do so.

A raging gale, the savage roar by the Divine Dragon unleashed.

Stabbing the tip of his sword into the Dragon’s ire as it immolated the world white, he sliced it apart; as ever, there, beyond the cleared vision, did he witness the bloodcurdling remorses into which he would need to cut.

—An overcast sky, a headstone marking a vacant grave, ceaseless weeping and desolate voices, words of prayer imploring serenity.

Present at the center of the many weeping individuals who had gathered for she who had been beloved, he could not recall what words he had chosen to speak, to impart, to deeply engrave Theresia's nature in them all.

What he recalled, were remorses. Immensely powerful, towering, and unerasable, were Wilhelm's remorses.

A child yet unaware of reason, a child who had not been with the mother and father with whom he ought to have been. The words the child had chosen as consideration and consolation his own foolhardy self had rejected, unable to accept them.

In that moment, dull had turned the sky, the ground, the faces of the people, his own self, the child—

???: "—It's alright, honored grandfather. When she passed, honored grandmother wasn't the Sword Saint. That's why, the Sword Saint didn't lose."

Wilhelm: "…Please stop."

???: "After all, the Sword Saint shouldn't ever lose. Father said so."

Wilhelm: "I am begging you, please stop."

???: "So, don't be so sad, the Astrea Family is safe and sound, honored grandfather."

Wilhelm: "Right now, right here… Please don't speak of that."

Again and again, words of rejection bereft of power.

Over and over, words of consolation from a child settled in that which he believed.

And then—

???: “I’m the next Sword Saint. —Just before honored grandmother passed away, I received it.”

Wilhelm: “—Stop already! What is it that you want me to say?! Do not make me say that it was your fault that Theresia… that your grandmother died!”

???: “…”

Wilhelm: “Do not, make me say it… Hk.”

Amidst the faded scene, erasing aught else, he and the child were made two. Through his immature, foolish self of that day, of that moment, Wilhelm thrusted sword, and pressed forth.

Words that remained forever unspoken, would never be imparted unto the other party. Even supposing a mutual understanding of feelings between both parties, the thousands, tens of thousands of words that ought to have been devoted, would never be delivered unto the other party.

And likewise, the words that had ended up being vocalized, no matter the manner in which they had formed, would always end up being imparted unto the other party.

How exactly that would be received, depended entirely on the capacity of the receiver.

But, to pour more water than could be deemed acceptable into a yet incomplete container, and blaming that container for overflowing, unable to take it on whole, how foolish of an act would that be?

The face of the child—of Reinhard, in the faded world of that day, he could not recall.

After all, once he had let slip words that he ought never have, he had not even been able to look upon his face. It was not that he could not recall it, he did not even know to begin with for he had failed to look upon it.

Thus, those who received the words he had ended up speaking, were not confined to that single person.

???: "…I heard that you were blaming the kid at Mom's funeral service. And yet, you still want to see Reinhard? You can't even make the distinction on what's not fine to say, Dad, and yet you think you've got the right to apologize to him?"

???: "That child, is mine and Louanna's child… To say he let Mom die, that he stole her Divine Protection! That's all some sort of misunderstanding! I'll… I'll prove it!"

???: "I'm not you, Dad. I'm me. —This is something, I have to do, no matter what."

Once words had been uttered, no longer could they be retracted.

Wilhelm's reckless remarks towards Reinhard had spread in the blink of an eye, even reaching the ears of Heinkel, who had not attended the funeral service, causing him to lose his chance to apologize and explain himself.

Concurrently, the foolish reprimand from grandfather to grandchild had been spread even to those outside the family, so as a result of that scandal, the truth of the succession of the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint became widely known.

Heinkel, had absolutely not allowed Wilhelm to see Reinhard.

Reinhard, had avoided Wilhelm in accordance with what Heinkel had told him, severing all interaction.

Wilhelm, had kept his distance from Heinkel and Reinhard, devoting himself to vengeance by his lonesome.

The relationships between those three, in conflict as they were, once more came together due to crossing the corpse soldier Theresia at the Watergate City, and once more had definitive cracks been born. —Were that to be the finale, then it would indeed be a tragic ending.

But, for Wilhelm, who had opted not to permit Theresia's Death, her Life, her Existence to end in tragedy, he too would chant objections to this relationship drawing to a close as a tragedy.

And, as for the way to exclaim objections towards that overpowering fate, he knew no method but to exclaim them through his sword.

—Reinhard was the Sword Saint.

So long as he continued to bear that as an unshakable duty, never would the chance come around to exchange sentiments with Reinhard, present behind the veil of Sword Saint, never would the chance come to restore color to that faded scene.

Henceforth, Wilhelm van Astrea—nay, the one who dispossessed Sword Saints of their swords, Wilhelm Trias, had no other choice but to bleed his very life into his sword's shimmer.

3

—Again. Indubitably, that had been a stanza of a battle that would go on to be told in legend.

The battle unfolding between Sword Demon and Divine Dragon amounted to a back and forth bout with a score of factors at its conception, pitting the tempered swordsmanship of steel against the power of an apex lifeform by birth.

In the Royal Capital, the area of the Noble District that had become a battleground had been leveled, the collapsed buildings and pulverized streets telling of how tremendous the clash between those individuals present in the same domain, unreachable to any ordinary person, was.

Even considering their body size, the presence or absence of footing, and the trading of their decisive blows, the sword's shimmer and the draconic presence were evenly matched.

A battle between Dragon and man, in the current world, was a fight to the death of such rarity that whether it would be possible to witness one such event in the span of a hundred months, or even years, was impossible to know; and yet, astonishingly, this made it twice the Sword Demon met a Dragon in battle.

The gist of that, was karma, karma that could not be explained by anything but the fact that he had continued to desire and tread foot upon the most dangerous battlefields in this world, and that the large something that governed fate had continued to provision the Sword Demon with worthy enemies.

Considering the preconditions, the Sword Demon had been at an overwhelming disadvantage going into this fight.

The slashes of the Sword Demon's twin swords could not pierce the tenacious scales of the Divine Dragon, whereas the Divine Dragon's claws and fangs would easily pluck the Sword Demon's life from his flesh with as much as the slightest graze.

The Sword Demon had continued to evade them with techniques employing the most strenuous of his efforts, but he would eventually reach his limit. —In theory, that would be so.

But, just who could possibly imagine the sight of the Sword Demon, stained in blood, covered in white soot, swinging his swords as his back was scorched, using up the last of his strength as he succumbed to the Divine Dragon's talon.

The bloodcurdling visage of the Sword Demon, the swordly aura so intense that merely being exposed to it from head to toe would cause one to feel as though the edge of a blade had been trained to their life, the swordsmanship hot on the heels of the prime in which he had once defeated the Sword Saint; all of them refuted the natural reality, instilling onlookers with the manifestation of irrational hope and expectation.

—The Sword Saint, was the sword of the Kingdom of Lugunica, the bearer of hope.

At the time that hope had been unseated by the Sword Demon, the people ought to have despaired, turning to the heavens. The Sword Saint had been defeated, so such a continuation would be logical. However, reality had differed.

Not a single person had lamented the fact that the Sword Saint had been defeated, setting aside their sword; rather, the masses had blessed it. That had been because a new hope had sprouted—they had begun to harbor new expectations, for the Sword Demon who had bested the Sword Saint.

Pursuing strength and strength alone, unable to do anything except hone his own self much like the steel he brandished, was the Sword Demon.

The Sword Demon's direct, unyielding way of being, had caused a great many people to raise their visages, instilling them with hope, giving them expectations for the future.

Now, in this moment, the impossibility of imagining a future in which the figure of the Sword Demon would be laid low by the Divine Dragon, was the same as that. —In witnessing the Sword Demon's way of being, people would end up finding hope.

So long as there remained a desired scenery for that sword to cut through to, it would instill the belief that it not being reached was not a possibility.

Ergo, the battle between Sword Demon and Divine Dragon was at a deadlock, with the two involved, each unable to discover a winning move, having been constantly ascertaining how they could excel their opponent in this life or death bout.

—That was why, the progression of the bout between individuals transcendent, was performed by neither Sword Saint nor Divine Dragon.

Sword Demon: "…"

Divine Dragon: "…"

At the nexus of the townscape transformed into a theater of war, Sword Demon and Divine Dragon crossed gazes, exchanging silence. However, albeit the result was mutual silence, the essence of that silence differed between the two.

To one, patience, the other, shock. Both were emotions meriting silence, but that which followed was different.

Sword Demon: “Guh.”

A faint groan, accompanied by great volumes of blood, spilled from the Sword Demon’s mouth.

But, with his twin swords yet clasped, the Sword Demon made no attempt to stifle the overflowing ichor, and looked down at his own body—he caught sight of a sword’s tip piercing through his abdomen, stained with blood.

The blade had entered from behind, perforating the Sword Demon’s torso, and causing blood to spill outward. The sword responsible for that act, was a sword the Sword Demon knew well. —It was none other than his own former beloved sword.

The sword inscribed Astrea, its current owner—

Sword Demon: “—Heinkel.”

Blurred by the frothing of blood at his mouth, he bore no confidence that his mutter had become a definite sound.

But, from the quivering of the sword thrust through his body, he understood the intentions that had charged the deed. If he turned around, it was possible that his torso would be torn asunder, hence the Sword Demon grit his molars, and stood his ground.

Behind him, while tightly clasping the hilt of the sword that had stabbed the Sword Demon—

Heinkel: “…With your way of doing things, I can’t get Louanna back.”

Sword Demon: “…”

Heinkel: “I’m not you… I’m not you, Dad. I’m me. —This is something, I have to do, no matter what.”

A wrung-out voice it had been, mixed with sobs that seemed to be tearing his chest apart.

As he listened to that, the stabbed Sword Demon took a long, deep exhale, and reminisced.

The figure of his own child, whose cries brought about by his own self in the midst of training had been cause for his wife to scold him, which in turn had led him to badger his child to bear through the tears.

As far back as those times, all odds of victory would be lost upon his child's cries.

—That had been the deciding blow interrupting the climactic bout between Dragon and man, driving the stanza of legend to its coda.

Vic.H2o

Chapter 29:
Foot of the Table

—Tempestuous wind and land, collisions of preeminent power, as if being composed was truly a new stanza of legend.

A blink after the bout between Sword Demon and Divine Dragon, transcending human comprehension, had commenced—in that meager of an instant, Heinkel had tumbled off the Dragon's back, ousted from the legend.

Heinkel: "…"

During their descent from above the clouds, the Divine Dragon had fastened him in place with wind, but as soon as it had begun combat with the Sword Demon, the Dragon had lost that consideration—no, that leeway, forcing him to fend for himself. And thus, bearing no fruit whatsoever, Heinkel had been promptly cast off-stage.

Incapable of even clinging to that back, he fell to the ground, and pitied himself as being a wretched, pathetic disgrace. —Even that excessive self-punishment was not permitted to Heinkel at the current moment.

Heinkel: "…"

The battle that had commenced at the Barielle Villa had already greatly expanded its stage to encompass the Noble District, and the extraordinary combat between man and Dragon unfolded alongside a fantastical sight, as if it were a daydream. —From that, Heinkel had been unable to remove his eyes.

Heinkel: "…"

In his heart, he wished to look away. Not only did he want to avert his gaze, he wished to turn his back and run away. If that would not come to fruition, then he wanted to hold his head, cower, plug his ears, and reject everything.

But, he could not. He could not do that. —As Wilhelm van Astrea swung his sword, how could Heinkel Astrea attempt to avert his gaze?

Heinkel: "…"

As the aged body of the Sword Demon flourished with vigorous motion, he challenged the Divine Dragon that towered over him with a build several tens of times his size; evading the borderline of death many times, he delivered innumerable sword strikes that seemed to chip away at the dragonscales.

Encroach, leap, brandish, parry, posture maintenance, bodyweight transfer, vision guidance, applied technique, utilization of obstacles; the ultimate swordsman who made use of everything to elevate his swordsmanship—beyond any shadow of a doubt, Wilhelm, wielding his swords against the Dragon, was the strongest swordsman Heinkel knew.

For not even an instant, could he take his eyes off that Sword Demon's exquisite performance.

Catching his breath, forgetting to blink, to the point that even the beating of his heart felt as if it were a hindrance, he was enchanted by the numerous sword flashes.

'Twas nothing so elegant or polished as the likes of a sword dance. The nature of the Sword Demon, who sought to cut deep into the lives of his opponents from whatever angle necessary, was more uncouth; violence akin to a beast's instincts.

The violence would be turned to drive, sublimated from drive to technique, finally arriving at the legend vying against the Divine Dragon.

Heinkel: "…"

—In Wilhelm's figure as he traded blows with the Divine Dragon, Heinkel caught glimpses of countless battlefields.

Of the Watergate City, of the figure crossing swords with the youthful form of Theresia van Astrea.

Of the Lifaus Plains, of the figure swinging its sword against the mighty foe known as the White Whale so that he could take revenge for his wife.

Of the Commercial City, of the figure lopping off a mighty head of the Three-Headed Blight Dragon, dominating the skies.

Of the same Commercial City, of the figure carving its name into history as it clashed with the Eight-Arms Kurgan, strongest of the Empire.

Of the Royal Castle Lugunica, of the figure dispossessing Sword Saint Theresia van Astrea of her sword.

Of the Demi-Human War, of the blood-stained figure sentencing numerous enemies to fodder for its blade, who would go on to be called the Sword Demon.

Of countless other battlefields, of the figure that had come to bring about victory through its sword as the greatest sword wielder; Heinkel perceived all in Wilhelm's current figure.

And concurrently, he understood. —As things were proceeding, the Divine Dragon would be defeated.

Heinkel: "It's no good."

Wringing those words out, Heinkel, who had fallen to his knees, stood up.

As he used his hand to ascertain the presence of the sword carried at his waist, Heinkel was provoked by that conviction.

The Divine Dragon would lose. After all, its opponent was the Sword Demon, who had decided on victory.

Heinkel: "…"

Alas, Heinkel's eyes could not perceive the upper limits of the Sword Demon's and Divine Dragon's strength.

Just as how those who stood upon the ground could not be sure of the scenery present above the clouds, even supposing there had unfolded a scenery beyond their wildest imaginations, they would never get to lay their eyes upon it.

Hence, there was no other choice but to put his shoddy imagination to work, and envision it. —Thus, in the world conjured by Heinkel Astrea's meager imagination, the Divine Dragon would succumb to the blade of the Sword Demon.

Considering the preconditions, the Divine Dragon had been at an overwhelming advantage going into this fight.

Even as Heinkel saw it, the Sword Demon's blades pierced not the Divine Dragon's scales, and even after many attempted assaults, a decisive blow had yet to be delivered. Conversely, each and every one of the Divine Dragon's attacks were lethal, such that even a graze a few millimeters deep would rob the Sword Demon of his life, scattering his corpse to the battlefield.

Heinkel understood those preconditions. —Even so, his vision of the Sword Demon winning went unshaken.

There was no logic to it. Logic and reason were not things that could surpass the Sword Saint. That was to say, the strength of the Sword Demon, who had once bested the Sword Saint, went beyond logic and reason.

The strength to deliver the tip of his sword to that beyond resided within the Sword Demon, and so—

Heinkel: "—It's no good."

That indisputable, worst-case scenario, was unacceptable for Heinkel's course.

Were he to triumph over the Divine Dragon here, the Sword Demon would likely move to challenge the Sword Saint next. Then, just as he had bested the previous-generation Sword Saint, he would triumph over the current-generation Sword Saint—over Reinhard.

That, was no good. That alone, was no good.

There were many obstacles in the way of realizing such a battle, such as the presence of the Witch of Envy that Aldebaran was utilizing through some method, but even without such elements, it was no good.

It was no good. No good at all. No good, so because it was no good, it was absolutely no good. As to why it was no good, the extent to which it was no good warranted no need for explanation, anyway, it was no good. No good was no good, and no good was all that it could be. No good. It was no good after all. That which was no good, was no good. No good would be no good, so it was no good at all. The perfectly pure blade of the Sword Demon, could not save Louanna Astrea. It could not save her, that was why—

???: "—Heinkel."

To his fore, present was the back of the Sword Demon, standing still.

A muffled voice from across the back, muffled by the froth of blood, that which sounded as if it was nearly drowning, erred not in conveying to Heinkel that his own name had been called.

Having perceived that, whilst exerting his fullest restraint to suppress the trembling of his arms, he gripped the sword's hilt tight.

Heinkel: "…With your way of doing things, I can't get Louanna back."

Struck in the forehead by a fragment of a collapsing building, blood had been flowing. Blown away many times by the blasting shockwaves, he had also found himself getting trapped under a collapsing pillar. With half his body also scorched by the aftermath of the Dragon's breath that had been sliced apart by a sword's flash, he forced himself through the agony of burning blood, bone, and flesh, still continuing to walk.

His body soiled to the utmost extent by dust clouds and shed blood, he walked, and walked, and walked—Heinkel stood behind Wilhelm. —Standing there, with Astrea drawn, he skewered his biological father from behind.

Wilhelm: “…”

Through the piercing sword, he felt Wilhelm attempting to turn around. In order to forestall that movement, he poured strength into his grip, the flaring of the deep wound thwarting all thought of turning around.

At that moment, he could not glimpse Wilhelm’s face. Were he to see his own self reflected in those eyes, the Heinkels of both past and present would be rendered incapable of speech. That was why, he would not let him turn around. No matter what.

He could not afford to let him turn around, to let him say it.

If the Sword Demon was permitted such, being allowed to say that he would carry it out, he would end up prying it open with his sword.

In that opened up future, perhaps all the dark clouds would be cleared away, and a patch of the long clouded blue sky would be glimpsed. —But, Louanna’s figure would not be present there.

Through the blade of the Sword Demon, Louanna could not be awakened.

And, if she was not present, then Heinkel—Heinkel and one other, would be beyond salvation.

Heinkel: “I’m not you… I’m not you, Dad. I’m me. —This is something, I have to do, no matter what.”

That which had been wrung out, he wished to curse the fact that it had been a feeble voice tinged with sobs.

Grit your teeth, good-for-nothing. Put strength in your voice, coward. Do you really have time to hang your head, craven?

Even with these hands, this sword, stained with Father’s blood, you can’t even stifle the roots of your teeth quivering, the sensation of heat in your eyes, the feeling of all your insides crawling like worms, making you want to just spill everything out, you parasite.

Bragging about how you've settled your resolve, since when have you ever been able to fool your wavering self, you pant wetter?

Wilhelm: "—You utter moron."

With unceasing curses, Heinkel negatively spurred himself onward.

To Heinkel's ears was delivered a reprimand not of his own, yet one that could only have been in agreement with him.

The voice had not been drowning in blood, and after his cheeks tensed at that fact, Heinkel gazed in amazement. —To his fore, he locked eyes with Wilhelm, whom he had been attempting to prevent from turning around.

Heinkel: "—Ah."

Looking at his hands, the sword was in the same position. Nevertheless, the reason Wilhelm had been able to turn around was because he had twisted his body, forcibly removing himself from the sword piercing his torso.

Naturally, blood would flow once a sword was removed from a wound. And if it had been forced out, the wound would have expanded.

But, the Sword Demon had removed the blade himself. After all, had he not done so, he would have been unable to turn around.

Wilhelm: "…Heinkel."

Leaving Heinkel speechless with that outrageous deed, Wilhelm called to him again.

His throat clogging up, Wilhelm gulped down the rising blood, ensuring his voice would be unclouded. However, he had sustained wounds across his body from his duels with Yae and the Divine Dragon, so having also received a deep wound from Heinkel, his body was already losing a fatal amount of blood.

Sure enough, having lost the support of the sword piercing his body, Wilhelm's knees collapsed.

Heinkel: “F-Fathe… Dad…”

In the spur of the moment, Heinkel reached out his hand to prop up that collapsing body. But, to the contrary, Heinkel’s outstretched hand was grasped, unexpectedly pulling him close.

As Heinkel’s cheeks stiffened at the physical strength unthinkable for one who had lost so much blood, on the verge of death, Wilhelm regarded him with eyes from which strength would by no means fade—

Wilhelm: “Enough, wake, up…”

Heinkel: “…”

At those words, a dusky heat was lit within the cowering Heinkel’s heart.

Was he really going to lecture him to “stop dreaming”? The pipe dream of awakening Louanna, if that were to come true, would Louanna be glad? —Even without needing to say it, he knew that there was no way Louanna would be glad.

Not a single one of the things Heinkel had done until today, would Louanna approve of.

She would scorn him, fall out of love with him, have her affection for him flip to loathing; Heinkel’s name would not avoid being engraved into Louanna as the most repulsive man in this world.

But, that would be fine. Anger, loathing, scorn, all of it was fine. If it meant that Louanna would awaken from her slumber, that her blue eyes would reflect the world once more, that her lips would celebrate life, that would be fine.

The likes of a convenient dream, he saw not.

In this reality that was so nightmarish, yet ultimately not a nightmare, Heinkel would live, and die.

For that purpose—

Wilhelm: “—Incorrect.”

His dusky resolve had returned alongside the pain in his head; however, Wilhelm had put the brakes on that.

There did Heinkel’s breath catch, staring at Wilhelm in bewilderment. Without averting his gaze from his incompetent son, Wilhelm moved his bloodstained lips.

The expression on his face, was one Heinkel recalled. An unpleasant memory of times past. —The sorrowful expression Wilhelm had worn when delivering the news that Theresia, that his mother, had not returned from the battle against the White Whale.

Wilhelm: “Wake up, Heinkel… You…”

With the face that, as far as Heinkel knew, the Sword Demon Wilhelm had only worn the time he had displayed his utmost weakness—

Wilhelm: “You… no matter whose hatred you incur… Reinhard will never abandon the seat… of Sword Saint… hk.”

—Just as it had been back then, the words uttered had wounded Heinkel’s heart to the utmost.

Chapter 30:
Plan B

1

???: “—When you talk to me, look at me properly!!”

The moment he was struck by the intense kick unleashed, an alarm blared inside Aldebaran’s mind. The cause of that alert had been the kick itself, alongside various factors surrounding it.

Firstly, the sheer force of the kick had incurred tremendous damage, leaving him astonished at the absurd length of the leg that had punted him, thinking “From here to there is all leg?!”. The tip of the icy slipper worn on the kicking leg bore into him, smashing past his stone chestplate and placing him in a serious bind; the ice had begun to freeze over his chest, causing his sternum to creak.

But, the greatest reason for that clamorous alarm was the fact that she had hit the bullseye on him with piercing words leaving him no room for excuses.

—Look at me properly, she had said. And priorly, you look lonely when you talk to me, as well.

Aldebaran: “—Hk.”

Honestly, it was shocking that she had correctly guessed the complex emotions Aldebaran harbored.

He was not so conceited as to think he had done a good job of hiding it, but he had arbitrarily assumed that she was ignorant to these sorts of subtleties. But, on reflection, she was simply bad at harboring ill will towards others, though alert to such malice stemming from those others. —She had been born into this world a silver-haired half-elf, so that was only natural.

Aldebaran: “The tuition fee cost a damn fortune… hk.”

Just below where the frost had begun to erode the abdomen of Aldebaran, as he spat those words out in frustration, clinging was an ice-made man modeled after an odious individual.

The ice-man obstructed his movements, and so, grabbing its head with a stone left arm crafted through magic, Aldebaran mercilessly ripped cranium from torso. The cries of its sculpture audible as an "Ahhh!", the decapitated body of the ice-man shattered in a ruthless manner, its ice scattering to the ground.

Not only did they look the same, even the ease with which they died was spot on.

Aldebaran: "There, you take it!"

Emilia: "Kyaa! Geez, that's awful!"

Unlike the shattered body, the decapitated head was attempting to bite him, so he threw the ice man's head back towards the woman who had been chasing him—Emilia. After glancing back at Emilia, who caught the head before her body as if it were a dodgeball, Aldebaran looked down at his stomach.

The frost began to spread from where the kick had landed, and as things were, his entire body would end up being frozen in ice—

???: "If that happens, you'd be done for, uncle. You know what to do, don't you?"

Affixed to a pillar of earth, topside down, was the spectator feasting his eyes on the clash between Aldebaran and Emilia—Roy Alphard, grin stretching from one ear to the other, hinting at how Aldebaran ought to deal with the ice.

He had no need for advice from a Sin Archbishop. Without needing to be told, Aldebaran grit his teeth, gouging his own abdomen with the tip of his sword as it began to freeze over. Through feverish pain and spilling blood, he forcibly closed up the wound, an inch away from having been a seppuku, with stone, evading the bad ending of being encased in ice.

His vision flashed bright red in agony, and the heartfelt, jovial laughter of Roy grated on his eardrums with “Ah-haha~! That’s it!”.

Emilia: “—Hk, such a painful countermeasure.”

Aldebaran: “Oioi, you ain’t giving me any other choice. “If you don’t like pain, then yield and be frozen in ice.” You’ve gotta have some awareness that that’s the sorta attack you’re using, Lil’ Miss.”

Emilia: “—. Yes. I think the same thing. But, don’t get the wrong idea, Al.”

Aldebaran: “Wrong idea?”

Emilia: “You can’t withstand using the same method that you used for your stomach for your entire body, can you?”

That was a declaration of her intent to assail his body with the same blows she had delivered unto his abdomen.

As if to substantiate that, the heartrending grimace of Emilia’s beautiful face lost its harshness, and white fumes began to blow with a cool wind in the vicinity of the Prison Tower. As white powder snow fluttered down to encoat the war theater, in his chilly fingers did Aldebaran feel the gravity of Emilia’s seriousness.

Aldebaran: “This is the part where I’d wanna say that you’re cute even when you’re angry, but honestly, it’s just plain terrifying. Besides…”

As Aldebaran cracked a joke, the atmosphere creaked before him as the head of the ice-man clutched in Emilia’s arms began to regenerate its body. As if to say “Here’s a new body!” instead of “Here’s a new face!”, the ice-man completely recovered in just a few seconds, making an appeal of his good health by doing stretches.

That meaningless, incendiary liveliness was a faithful recreation of the original, and so truly annoying.

Aldebaran: “…You’ve got him down to even the finest details, it’s disgusting.”

Emilia: “Your way of complimenting’s the same as Ram’s. It has a reputation among everyone at the mansion, they all think it's reaaally just like him."

Aldebaran: "Heh. Though, he himself must have been the only one to react with an unpleasant face."

Emilia: "How did you know?"

Aldebaran: "I get it. It's the face he'd wanna not see the most."

At his reply to the simple question, Emilia's widened eyes tensed in anger. She may have thought he was speaking contemptuously, but it truly was Aldebaran's unreserved opinion.

In the first place, if she was going to make someone out of ice, it would have been better to use a more reliable, strong outer appearance—for example, someone like Garfiel, as a model, and yet she had chosen Natsuki Subaru, of all things.

Thanks to that, Aldebaran had been able to destroy the ice-man with zero reluctance.

Aldebaran: "If it's a soldier, shouldn't you have used the most reliable guy as a model?"

Emilia: "—? But that's why I used Subaru as the base?"

Aldebaran: "…I see. Shouldn't have asked."

Sticking his tongue out inside his helmet, Aldebaran felt as if he had eaten a bitter bug.

Even more so than the damage he had received from being kicked, the mental damage from speaking face-to-face with Emilia like this was incredibly draining.

For Aldebaran's Authority, for the maintenance of his Territory, a stable mind was indispensable. Despite that, Emilia was the very character that defined the meta of easily disturbing Aldebaran's mind.

Aldebaran: "Damn piece of shit."

In all honesty, encountering Emilia here had been outside his calculations.

After returning to the Kingdom from Vollachia, Aldebaran had controlled the party headed for the Pleiades Watchtower to his convenience. Of course, he had grasped that Emilia and Otto would head to the Royal Capital, but he had intended on quickly retrieving Roy and departing the Royal Capital safely before trouble could be encountered. —To think the rug would be pulled out from under him by a Zodda bug.

Aldebaran: "…I guess the one who started this string of bad luck, would've been Lil' Miss Felt."

In order to engage Reinhard in his worst possible condition, in the Augria Sand Dunes, Aldebaran had deliberately made use of Flam's Divine Protection at the Tower, having her inform her little sister of his betrayal. As a corollary of that, Reinhard had appeared at the Sand Dunes, and an ambush had been prepared by Felt's group—Felt had not kept that information to herself.

It was a state of emergency in which her allies at the Pleiades Watchtower had been wounded, and the Divine Dragon, which was supposed to be the protector of the Kingdom, had submitted to the enemy, so she had done well to display such a composed ability to make decisions. He had thought it might have been another suggestion from that Valga Cromwell, but to that notion he had to shake his head.

Felt was someone whom Priscilla had recognized as an adversary. Her caliber to be Monarch ought to have been praised with sincerity.

Either way, Felt had chosen the best course of action amidst high pressure circumstances, and so Emilia, having received the information from her, would not put it to waste.

Consequently, his escape from the Prison Tower had been obstructed, leaving him with the worst-possible present, facing off against Emilia.

Aldebaran: “…”

To his fore, Emilia slotted her hands into gloves of ice while standing beside the aggravating ice-man who had taken the Gear 2 pose, and she cast a gaze of vigilance over Aldebaran.

In her amethyst eyes could be felt a strong ardor, as if to say that she would not lose no matter what Aldebaran might do, but even without all her vigilance, there were not many things Aldebaran could do.

He had been fending her off with swords of rock that mimicked her Ice Brand Arts, calling it Earth Brand Arts, but the effectiveness of the weapons each of them made was a difference of day and night. Their respective staminas were not even worth comparing, and neither could Aldebaran create reliable soldiers of earth.

Moreover, it tormented his heart to bring harm unto Emilia, let alone wound her psyche. —This was the fatal flaw that the being known as himself had been furnished with since birth.

To make matters worse, Emilia’s techniques, specialized in capturing people alive, had the worst affinity for Aldebaran’s Authority.

Ergo, now that the ones considered to be the greatest obstacles to his plan, Natsuki Subaru and Reinhard, were out of the picture, Emilia would be the natural enemy of Aldebaran—excluding one other person, she was his worst “enemy”.

Aldebaran: “Regardless—”

No matter how he analyzed the situation, he could not find even a single good ingredient and wanted to cry, but not once had he experienced a precedent of his complaints breaking through such an impasse.

If he could not forge a decisive blow through his own merits against the opponent who was unconsciously countering him, he would have no choice but to rely on outside help to end this. —And then, it happened right when he was about to play his trump card.

—Piercing the cumulus, he bore witness to the Dragon descending upon the Noble District.

Aldebaran: “Are you serious?”

As it sliced down through his vision, Aldebaran unconsciously muttered.

Beyond the foggy white sky, currently drawing a line of pale blue light descending through the sky, was “Aldebaran”, planned to be Aldebaran’s trump card. If it was headed to the Noble District with such vigor— to where he had kept Yae and Felt on standby, then it was very likely its objective was to rescue them.

That was to say, a being that Yae could not deal with alone had been dispatched to the Barielle Villa.

Since “Aldebaran” had intervened immediately, Yae’s survival would have been fifty-fifty. —At the same time, it meant that Aldebaran would be unable to borrow a hand from “Aldebaran” in his predicament.

Aldebaran: “Are you serious…”

With the same words, Aldebaran became even more keenly aware of how much worse his situation had become.

He could try to redo with his Authority, and call “Aldebaran” to himself before Yae and Felt. But, if he did so, Yae, without any reinforcements, would likely succumb to the unidentified enemy.

Neither Yae, nor Felt, could be described as essential to Aldebaran’s objective.

They could not, but—

Aldebaran: “SHIT!”

Relinquishing his chance to swallow the poison in his mouth, Aldebaran cursed out.

Using “Aldebaran’s” draconic aura to dispel the cold wave Emilia had used to put the entire field under the control of her snow, thus allowing for a safe withdrawal from the battlefield, had been the trump card of Plan A. Now that he could no longer use that, he would have no choice but to urgently enact Plan B.

And, in order to execute Plan B, he would have to hurry and think of a Plan B.

In the meantime—

Aldebaran: “You see that, Lil’ Miss? At this rate, my partner’s gonna rampage through the Royal Capital—”

Emilia: “I was told that I’m not in charge of worrying about over there!”

Emilia resolutely charged at Aldebaran, the latter wishing to prolong his time to think.

While sensing beyond the wall the assault of “Aldebaran”—the Divine Dragon, Emilia’s courage to trust in her allies and ignore it was simply far too much. That alone was likely proof that she had faith in the person who had concocted this strategy, but this was not something a person could do just because they were told.

Thus, the fact that it was the best possible move against Aldebaran made it all the more unbearable.

Emilia: “Hiyah! Tei! Dudoh! Yah!”

Following her initial policy as if just having remembered, Emilia abandoned dialogue and unleashed a tumultuous chain of attacks.

The frost-clad fists fired off a volley of innumerable punches, smashing right through his hastily made boulder shield. Amidst the scattering debris, he caught the frozen spearhead with a prosthetic rock arm, only to discard it when the ice began to encase it, and he leaped backwards. —Thereupon, the ice-man had circled around, crashing into him with a Tie Shan Kao.

Aldebaran: “Goh, ahh—!!”

On the receiving end of the secret Bajiquan technique, learned through imitation, Aldebaran was launched forward. Waiting for him there, Emilia transformed the lance of ice into a glacial mallet, resolutely holding it aloft. Pulling down her slender, supple arms, she unleashed a full swing of inconceivable might.

The atmosphere was pummeled by the frigid blow, laden with drive, and as soon as Aldebaran accepted that he would be unable to dodge it, he encased his entire body in earthen armor, leaving nary a gap—the tremendous might struck him true.

Aldebaran: "—Hk!"

Unable to raise even cries of pain or screams, Aldebaran spun through the air.

He had defended against the ice eroding his earthen protections, but his defenses had provided no more comfort than if there had just been a handkerchief between himself and the weapon. His vision spinning wildly as he was blown away to a position unknown to him, he was caught by a strong impact, falling to the ground.

Roy: "Uhya~, that looked painful. Seems like the end of the road for you, uncle."

With his hand down on the snow-blanketed ground, hearing the delighted voice of an onlooker from above him, Aldebaran realized that he had crashed into the pillar of stone to which Roy had been affixed. He had been sent flying ten-odd meters, and there was a grating pain in all the bones in his body. He had not even had the time to clap back with abusive language.

Aldebaran: "Shit…"

It was not desirable for Aldebaran to waste any more time on this.

Plummeting the temperatures around her, Emilia's fighting style was a devilish method in which debuffs would accumulate over time in a manner akin to snow, and it was also possible that enemy reinforcements would begin to show up as he dawdled.

The more opponents that showed up, the level of difficulty in emerging triumphant would rise exponentially; he had become keenly aware of that in his battle against Felt's faction. —And, it was entirely possible that his "natural enemy" could be among them.

Roy: "Can't really see because of the snow, but it seems things are getting tough over at the town too, doesn't it~? Gonna try and call for help at the very top of your lungs or something? Uncle."

Aldebaran: "Shut… the hell up. You… just keep quiet and stay—"

Roy, upside down, conscientiously piqued Aldebaran's nerves as he was backed into a corner.

He felt his rage well forth, wondering if he should pointlessly die an additional death just to deck that grinning mug—and beyond his indignation, what Aldebaran saw was the fluorescent hope of a Plan B.

Aldebaran: "If he's me…"

Afar, from the sensation of the white haze being swayed, it transmitted "Aldebaran" being engaged in a raging battle.

Within the farthest extents of Aldebaran's knowledge, there were not that many candidates capable of engaging in a fight to the death against "Aldebaran", but he had no choice but to believe and entrust that victory to the Dragon.

And that which he had to believe in was not merely the Dragon's triumph, but that "Aldebaran" must have also been laying foundations for the unbeknown Plan B while knowing that it could not assist Aldebaran.

In order to realize that unascertained Plan B—

Aldebaran: "Roy! If you don't wanna die then lend me a hand!"

Emilia: "—Hk! Al!!"

As Aldebaran shouted, Emilia widened her eyes, her voice honed in rancor.

At the sense of disbelief resounding through her voice, Aldebaran was astonished that his stocks still had the margin to be devalued after he thought they had already hit rock bottom when he released Roy out of the Prison Tower—no, when he entrapped Natsuki Subaru.

Aldebaran: “But, if it’s necessary, then even the power of a Sin Archbishop is to be borrowed. Natsuki Subaru did the same thing in the Empire, yeah? What’s so bad?”

Emilia: “Even though you know it’s not that sort of problem!”

Aldebaran: “Guess so. I’m saying that while fully aware. Loathe me all you want.”

He was accustomed to being loathed by Emilia. —A falsehood.

In truth, his position was that of not even ever being noticed, let alone loathed.

Emilia: “You—hk!”

Upon Aldebaran’s response, ire flaring through her sorrow, Emilia created stakes of ice in the air.

Capable of magician-esque battling styles besides hand-to-hand combat utilising ice, Emilia pointed the floating ice stakes towards Aldebaran and Roy and avalanched them as though carpet bombing. Anyhow, though it was an expression of her intent to stop their wiles, Emilia’s rushed attack was intercepted by Aldebaran pulling off the ground like a carpet through magic, as though overturning tatami.

Roy: “Even if you ask for our cooperation, you see~.”

The ground rocked by the piercing impacts, this hurriedly constructed shelter of earth would not last much longer either.

Aldebaran’s concentration was torn in its maintenance, but despite being subject to the same predicament, Roy paid no attention to that whatsoever and crooked his lips in displeasure, Roy: “As you can see, our limbs are fractured, and we have been prohibited from eating. So then, what are you telling us to even do? Or perhaps… you’re giving permission to eat that onee-san, is that what it means?”

Aldebaran: “Wrong. Neither am I letting you eat her, nor am I letting you go on a rampage.”

Roy: “Then what even is there for us to—”

Aldebaran: “There is. —Spew it out.”

A low-toned edict, Aldebaran met gazes with Roy, who was upside down on the earthen spire shielded behind him, and connoted Gluttony a third choice besides eating or rampaging.

Roy rounded his eyes at the bid, then immediately smirked a broad grin,

Roy: “Geez, uncle, just how much do you know about us? It can’t be that you’re truly our real father, right~?”

Aldebaran: “If I’d brought up brats like y’all, I wouldn’t be able to live with all the apologies I’d have to give to society.”

Their relationship was one of forceful compulsion to listen, bound by a curse mark. Aldebaran’s attitude, in no manner intending to establish friendly relations, was yet welcomed by Roy with a licking of lips.

He was Roy Alphard, commanding the name of Gluttony, therewithal Bizarre Eating per his accord. How would a glutton whose mouth partook no matter what crude product, have evaluated Aldebaran? —A useless thought regardless, he did not have the leisure to enquire.

Emilia: “—Stop!”

That instant, what smashed through the mud shelter was an enormous ice boomerang—identical to the Flying Wing Blade used by the Empire’s Madelyn Eschart, it was thrown in, and through the opening of the piercing ice, Emilia charged towards them.

Aldebaran obstructed Emilia's path with an artificial rock arm created to be a size bigger. His palm was covered from above in a manner akin to a baseball glove, thwarting her path with tenderness and certainty.

However—

Aldebaran: "—Hk, a decoy?!"

Placing its hands on the glove of rock, the ice-man leapt over the obstruction through hand springs.

Acting as the vanguard and using herself as a decoy, Emilia let the ice-man proceed forward. He wanted to point out that normally between oneself and their creation, the role of being a decoy would be the other way around, but he had utterly fallen for it.

The ice-man vaulted over Aldebaran's head and approached the pillar of earth. Shards of rock did Aldebaran create, pincering the ice-man to the sides in an attempt to shatter it to fragments, but—

Aldebaran: "It's harder than before!"

With elevated bone density, nay, glacial density, the sturdy ice-man's new body repelled the shards.

Dismissing the obstruction, the ice-man stretched its arms towards the affixed Roy, drawing closer to hinder any action—at that split second, its head bid its torso a tearful farewell.

Emilia: "What?!"

Having witnessed first hand the ice-man's decapitation, Emilia shouted after slashing the rocky glove with a sword of ice.

She remained nescient of what had destroyed the ice-man, rebuilt in strengthened tenacity. —To think it had been begotten by a steel thread spun from the ring on Aldebaran's right ring finger.

The silver thread glistening in the icy haze perforated through the ice-man's defenses, decollating it. That which he mastered in the midst of his battle against Felt and the rest, a single finger's worth of the Steel Thread Technique.

Art would bring bread. An instant subsequent to embodying that idiom—

Roy: “—Given the choice, I guess this one would be the most amusing∼.”

As he heard a voice lacquered in dour glee, Aldebaran—nay, the world cried out.

2

Instantly, that which had assailed Aldebaran, was a vomiting sensation of the soul.

Roy: “Oergh.”

He believed he had understood the principle. He had even managed to conceive of what would occur.

But, once it actually transpired, comprehension and imagination had been of no use whatsoever.

Neither unto flesh nor unto spirit, that was an onslaught unto Memories intangible.

Roy: “Oergh.”

There existed a phenomenon known as déjà vu, where during the first time one laid eyes upon something, they would feel as if it could by no means be the first time they were seeing it; currently, Aldebaran was—no, every single person undergoing these effects, was experiencing something several tens of thousands of times more pronounced than déjà vu, a “regurgitation” that could not be ignored.

As evidence of that—

Emilia: “—Ah.”

Spilling a husky breath, from Emilia’s hand fell a javelin of ice.

Feebly dropping that which she had been ready to throw, its form unravelled, returning to Mana before it hit the ground.

Vehement turmoil flickering through her widened amethyst eyes, she fell to her knees on the spot. Gazing over her state of being, Aldebaran grit his molars, and leaped backwards.

Roy: “Oergh.”

A vociferous sense of disgust, there was. But, not enough to bring him to his knees.

The impact of “regurgitation” would vary from person to person. A matter of course. Emotional attachments were to each their own. Between Aldebaran and Emilia, the ardor they respectively harbored towards those Memories differed.

Odious though he might have been, Roy had made the appropriate selection. Accurately, he had selected Memories that had inflicted a great impact unto Emilia, while not going as far for Aldebaran.

Hence—

Roy: “Oergh.”

Bearing the nauseating sensation of emesis, Aldebaran raised his hand aloft to the heavens.

The whitish haze of ice yet shrouded the Royal Capital’s sky, obstructing him from regarding it with due reverence. However, there did Aldebaran believe that “Aldebaran” had laid the groundwork for Plan B.

—’Twas a boon of the combat experience they had acquired during their battle against Reinhard at the Augria Sand Dunes.

In that battle, Aldebaran and “Aldebaran”, fellows in whom dwelled the ego of the same man, had exercised magic through a shared magic signature—they had assumed a system in which Aldebaran borrowed the Mana of “Aldebaran” to invoke magic, but it was the reverse this time.

The Plan B that “Aldebaran” had prepared above the clouds—with a mechanism awaiting activation, it instead fell to Aldebaran to follow the magic signature, and pour in Mana to flip the switch.

A conception reached only because their egos were one and the same, the execution of a Plan B that had not existed prior—

Aldebaran: “—Oergh.”

Subsequent to the invocation, bearing witness to the entirety of what “Aldebaran” had prepared as a Plan B, Aldebaran spilled out a belch distinct in essence to those that had come before, yet it still fell in line with Roy’s “regurgitation”.

Plan B, the entire picture of that was—

Emilia: “No… hk.”

Sensing an intense torrent of Mana, Emilia’s lips quivered, still down on her knees.

She was not standing, however, with her visage raised, her amethyst eyes managed to grasp it. —Floating in the sky of the Royal Capital, was a rocky mass around a hundred meters in size.

It was a sense of scale that seemed as though some small hill had been unearthed in its entirety and raised up. Though Aldebaran had never encountered it, this might have been the same feeling that people had given accounts of experiencing when beholding the White Whale from nearby, overwhelmed by witnessing such a mighty thing skybound.

Either way, the intent of “Aldebaran” in elevating that rocky mass to the sky was obvious—

Roy: “Oergh.”

The next instant, there resounded a report of the sky shattering, stemming from numerous cracks fissuring through the rocky mass, as was apparent to all who had noticed the abnormality in the aether.

The hill-sized mass split into boulders numbering around ten or twenty, and at that rate would continue down towards—

Emilia: “NO…!!”

Foreseeing that outcome, Emilia reprimanded her trembling knees, and stood up.

She had surely understood. Even if it had fractured into pieces, if the heavy boulders, each bigger than ten meters, were to fall, there would be a great amount of damage to the city, leaving a large number of casualties.

Thus, the only way to avert that, was for people capable of preventing it to go put a stop to it.

Aldebaran: “Even now, I’m going at this with the intention of not letting a single person die. That’s why…”

Emilia: “—Hk, Al!”

Aldebaran: “I trust you to not let even a single one of those fall onto the city.”

Forcing a selfish, one-sided request upon her, Aldebaran disregarded Emilia’s voice, shrill with fervent emotion, and ran up the earthen pillar to secure Roy.

Akin to the foul odors emitted from the anal sacs of a frightened weasel, the ice-man, once again reduced to being merely a head, rolled over in one last ditch effort to impede him, but Aldebaran mercilessly crushed it underfoot, and removed the affixed Sin Archbishop from the spire.

Roy: “You’re quite the nasty guy, uncle.”

Responding not to Roy’s superfluous words, Aldebaran carried that small body on his shoulders, and ran.

With nary a glance back at Emilia with whom he had been doing combat until a moment prior, as fast as his legs would carry him.

Emilia: “Al! You can’t! Don’t run away… AL!!”

He could hear Emilia’s heartbroken appeal, but no attacks were issued to halt his steps. Naturally. All of her strength was now being fully diverted to the purposes of saving people.

Were she able to simply pursue Aldebaran at this point without thinking of the consequences, she would have had an easier time living her life. Undoubtedly, if she had been a person capable of that, it would have been a salvation for both Emilia and for Aldebaran.

But, Emilia did not give in to selfishness, and by wielding her magic to save people, she had ended up letting Aldebaran get away.

Emilia: “Don’t go! Return Subaru, return Beatrice—!”

In concert with the heights of those emotions, sounds of glaciation could be heard in the sky loud and clear.

Aldebaran invoked the protrusion of the ground beneath him, and with that as a foothold he surmounted the wall enclosing the Prison Tower, withdrawing from the white battlefield made manifest by Emilia. With legs still unhalting, he ran, and ran, and ran.

Roy: “She’s crying, you know~, that onee-san.”

A fact ignorable had it not been delineated, the detestable Sin Archbishop deliberately did delineate.

The tearful voice rending his heart, Aldebaran continued running, never halting his feet. At this moment in time, hoping only for all his accomplices to be present at the point of regroup, he continued to run.

The torrent of boulders meteoring down upon the Royal Capital was intercepted by towers of frost that sprang up one after another, preventing harm from befalling the city.

Neither to the enkindling perpetrator, nor to the stalwart savior, to nobody did it bring glee.

Merely—

Roy: “—Ah~, thank you for the treat-!”

Only Bizarre Eating, licking his lips to surfeit the acrimonious joy and saccharine sorrow, was smiling.

Chapter 31: One-Hundred Percent Effort

1

—Its visibility accompanied by a thundering clangor of the skies tearing apart, an enormous clod of rock fell.

Surely, a great margin of doubt existed whether simply “clod of rock” was enough of a descriptor for it.

After all, this clod of rock was at least a hundred meters in size with ease. It was no longer befitting to be called a clod of rock, but more so a rocky mountain levitating in the sky.

Fissures permeated through the rocky mountain, and the hundred meter clod crumbled to pieces, followed by countless small—yet still five to ten meter-sized boulders cascading upon the ground.

The boulders’ point of descent was the township of the Royal Capital, with estimated casualties of around five to ten thousand people.

To execute this massive of a massacre, the only ones of equitable kill rates in the present-day era would either be the Blue Lightning, Cecilus Segmunt, or the Sin Archbishops of Greed and Sloth.

Above all—

???: “If we don’t limit it to just the present day, I suppose there were a good number of ’em in the past.”

Disgust dyed his fatigued voice, as Aldebaran viewed that atop a rampart.

Plan B—the tactic of dropping the aforementioned rocky mountain, had been a dirty tactic utilized by Aldebaran upon being cornered, to create an opening so that he could escape his predicament.

Considering the circumstances of him recoursing to this tactic, Aldebaran should have had no leisure to halt still, and rather instead resume his escape as soon as possible, darting away from the Royal Capital whilst ignoring the wails of agony.

However, Aldebaran was incapable of that. —Bearing the responsibility, he must see it through with his own eyes.

Aldebaran: "—As you'd expect."

To the spectacle reflected in the squinted black irises inside his helmet, Aldebaran murmured a husky commendation.

From the onset of the play where the rocky mountain thundered the rupturing of skies, an overwriting howl of the world no inferior to that had occurred, and a beautiful tower of ice stretching from the ground's surface intercepted the countless clods of rock from one side.

Inverse to its icy, congealed appearance, it was a warm hand of salvation bound in compassion and kind affection. On the other hand, the tower of ice glistening pale blue in light also seemed to reveal the deep sorrow of the user.

???: "To think of it in that way~ is a bit too poet-ey, don't you think, uncle?"

Saying so, Roy ridiculed Aldebaran as he viewed the spectacle, whilst being carried on the latter's shoulder.

Roy was immobilised due to his fractured limbs, but he skillfully used his dorsal muscles to upraise his torso, surveying the cataclysm that had assailed upon the Royal Capital atop of Aldebaran's shoulder.

The former, having healthy enough of a mouth to be babbling about everything despite being incapable of anything, made Aldebaran wince.

Aldebaran: "You too, your tongue's gone along with depicting my emotions so much that you're starting to sound poetic. Not that I know much, but that sense would've been much more fitting for your dead counterpart who personified Gourmet rather than you of Bizarre Eating, no?”

Roy: “Haha-, taking a blow at a dead family member shows you had some pretty awful~ upbringing, no? Truth is, it wasn’t us, but Ley who went about evaluating what had been eaten one way or another. What a mystery~. In the end, for both we and us, that which was eaten would always end up in the same Stomach of Souls, and yet…”

Aldebaran: “This must be what they mean when they say that thieves; no, that food snitchers are shameless.”

Roy: “Don’t treat us like a thief~. We just want, to eat a teensy bit more than a full stomach… that’s just the kind of adorable gourmandiser we are, and yet…”

Always with a clapback. The unabating mouthed Bizarre Eating’s abundant lexicon and strength of debate stemmed from the efficacy of his Authority of Gluttony, and would be outstanding foremost among not only the Sin Archbishops, but the entire world.

It was easy to be deceived by his childish appearance and his manner of speech laying bare his rotten nature, but the being riding atop his shoulder was a monster of accumulated synthesis of wisdom, having indulgently devoured knowledge and experience beyond innumerable, and for that he must not forgo his vigilance.

That was precisely why he had abandoned persuasion through words, but opted to forcefully make him abide through violence and the Curse Mark.

Aldebaran: “…Anyhow, the job’s done. Let’s go.”

Roy: “There’s no longer any need for you to toss out a lifeline to that onee-san in case she missed any of the rocks, right~. Uncle, are you not often called weird or just plain abnormal?”

Aldebaran: “Thank you for your critical reviews of me for these coming two-to-three days.”

Correctly guessing Aldebaran’s reason for stopping with zero explanations, with a few unnecessary words appended at the end by

Roy, he replied, forgoing the will to compete with a kid.

Thus, with the Royal Capital having escaped harm’s way thanks to Emilia—Aldebaran ascertained a corner of its Noble District, which had been entirely flattened, and once again hastened his feet.

2

—With the culmination of his battle against Valga Cromwell, Aldebaran had revised his perception that his Authority, which he had assessed to be peerless, also had hazardous adversaries capable of sinking their teeth into it.

Even now, his conviction that none could defeat him wavered not.

However, in order to turn that conviction into firm assurance that he must not grow complacent concerning his Authority, that he must never stop thinking, he admonished his own self.

Therefore, in his plan for sneaking into the Royal Capital and breaking Gluttony out of jail, he had not opted for an easier redo, but challenged it with his utmost might, firmly and thoroughly using each and every one of Aldebaran’s lives with the assiduousness to squeeze out the tube of toothpaste till the very end, concluding with a count of six-thousand seven-hundred and twenty-four.

—To interpret that as too numerous or too few would depend on the person, but fundamentally, Aldebaran would think of each count as being “pertinent”.

No matter what the magnitude of a count might have been, he wasted not a single run, braving the necessary challenge to surmount the wall.

On extremely seldom occasions, he had also expended a single life of inaction in order to calm his heart, but those lives had been ones in which a breather for the heart had been indispensable.

Hence, no matter the count, if he attained the results he had sought, Aldebaran would insist that six-thousand seven-hundred and twenty-four had been the “optimal” number of attempts.

???: “—Yo, shitty helmet bastard.”

The rendezvous point had been agreed upon in advance—this place, sufficiently far from the Royal Capital, was a long-abandoned quarry, perfect for scoundrels hiding from the public eye to meet up.

In this quarry, the one to greet Aldebaran with a sharp accost was Felt, her back leaned upon a crumbling stone wall, red irises ablaze with rage and animosity.

Her fang visible between her distorted lips, she postured herself with arms crossed and evinced her scorn for Aldebaran. Her way of calling him had also downstepped from simply “helmet bastard” to “shitty helmet bastard”.

Felt jerked her slim chin, indicating the Royal Capital visible from afar,

Felt: “That large rock, if Emilia-neechan hadn’t stopped it, just how many people do you think it would’ve killed? What happened to your policy of not causing anyone’s deaths? Do you intend to flout everything you decided on each time you lose heart? “Lame” can’t even begin to describe you.”

Aldebaran: “…Guess so. I’m also relieved that you’re safe, Lil’ Miss Felt.”

Felt: “Huh?”

Aldebaran: “It’s a joke. Or rather, a quip. A gag that fell totally flat.”

As Felt’s prickliness compounded with his reply, Aldebaran powerlessly responded. Perhaps perceiving this attitude of Aldebaran’s as insincere, she pitched forward as if to snap at him when Roy enounced a “You know Felt-chan~” from atop his shoulder,

Roy: “Wanna tell you to keep it up, keep it up, but when it comes to naggingly pressing this uncle, we’ve completed the preliminary preparation of ingredients on our end. So, may as well try changing up the flavor with a different seasoning, how about it?”

Felt: “How about shit… So you’re the Gluttony who got caught. Are you the older brother? Or the younger one? Whichever way, you’ve got an irritating mug that resembles your sibling’s.”

Roy: “Ah~, you’re also acquainted with us? Well~, makes sense. We heard it from Louis too, you know~? That because of Felt-chan, Ley suffered food poisoning, you see~.”

Felt: “You mean back when they were blaming my name for something or the other? Served ’em right.”

The girl progressively sharpening her cussing, Felt had reputedly once encountered Gluttony—Ley Batenkaitos, in Pristella. Her speech made light of his sibling from back then, who had since died on top of that, but just like with Aldebaran’s instance, Roy only showed a smile alongside a “Haha-” in good humor.

Roy: “By the way, amongst us, it’s unknown who of us was the eldest son~. As for us, there were times we felt like being the eldest son, yet also felt at times like being the second son, maybe because of that~, is what we’re saying.”

Felt: “Don’t go yapping on with such stupid reasoning. The order of brothers and sisters isn’t something you can just decide by feeling. You gotta decide if you’ll yield it or accept it before it’s gone.”

Roy: “Haha~! Both uncle and Felt-chan, you think you can say anything if it’s to the hated Sin Archbishops? Very nice very nice, it’s what you call everyone’s shared consensus, right~?”

Felt: “Hey, shitty helmet bastard, I’ve got no intention of having a fun little chat with him. Hurry up and shut his fanged mouth, then answer my questions.”

Aldebaran: “I agree with you that he needs to shut up, but the time for the question-answer session will have to wait a bit. Before that…”

Obstructing Felt’s demand, Aldebaran turned his head on the spot. Apprehending the intent behind his act of surveying the insides of the quarry, Felt clicked her tongue with a “You” and jerked her chin. Deep within the quarry, a humble cabin barely maintaining its shape, Aldebaran guided his line of sight towards that, and—

???: “—Al-sama.”

Aldebaran: “…”

The very moment that Yae appeared from out of the cabin, her eyes met Aldebaran’s.

Accompanied by a faintly warm aroma, Yae had likely been preparing a meal inside the cabin. He was grateful for that consideration. And even though he was grateful—

Aldebaran: “From the looks of it, you had it pretty rough, yeah?”

With merely a glance, Aldebaran perceived a difference from her usual easygoing and elusive self.

Her characteristic waso maid outfit was torn all over, and her red hair, which she never failed to maintain even on the battlefield, was frayed. But above all else, was her expression.

An atmosphere of meekness, or rather, one bereft of naivete, was doing the greatest harm to her usual image.

And as proof of that—

Yae: “…Thank goodness.”

Softly placing a hand over her chest, Yae muttered at the convergence with Aldebaran.

Sensing the hue of emotion painting that voice, Aldebaran felt a bit daunted, though he would never admit to it, so he shrugged his shoulders with an “Oi oi”,

Aldebaran: “Isn’t that a degree of auspiciousness unbefitting Yae-san, the helpful all-purpose maid? To not even be able to back me up, what kinda surprise guest did you have an affair with?”

Yae: “—. To say that I had an affair would be bad for my reputation, Al-sama. You are well aware that you have complete control over Yae-chan’s heart, Al-sama.”

The hesitation that had accompanied her answer for a moment vanished, returning Yae’s demeanor to business as usual. Sliding her finger down her chest, she resumed “But, but”,

Yae: “I suppose it’s true that I spent some passionate time with a gentleman~. The one who graced the mansion with his presence was the Sword Demon, Wilhelm van Astrea… no, Wilhelm Trias-sama.”

Aldebaran: “The Sword Demon grandpa, huh? That’s…”

At the unforeseen assassin, Yae would have also likely been stupefied. But, it was difficult to label him the worst-possible enemy.

Of course, there was no doubt that he was one of the foremost powerful fighters in the Kingdom, but a swordsman would have been far more manageable than a magician for Yae. In addition, she had laid her traps all around the Barielle Villa, converting it into the perfected hunting ground of the Crimson Sakura, so to speak.

However, given that “Aldebaran” had ultimately hastened there to provide relief, the Sword Demon’s honed edge had exceeded that of Yae’s. And from her expression, it was clear that it had not even been a narrow defeat, but rather one of complete annihilation.

And likely, the reason behind that sharpness was—

Aldebaran: “The old man, sulking over there as he is, ain’t unrelated, now is he?”

Where Aldebaran had directed his attention, on a neglected stump of a wood-chopping block next to the cabin, was a red-haired man hugging one knee as he cast his eyes down—Heinkel.

With his head hanging limp, the blood soiling Heinkel’s entire body had yet to be cleaned off. From Aldebaran’s position, it was difficult to tell whether that blood was his own or someone else’s, however.

Aldebaran: "What happened?"

Yae: "…My consciousness was all fuzzy at the time, so I didn't catch it with my own eyes, but…"

Aldebaran: "But?"

Yae: "Supposedly, Heinkel-sama slew the Sword Demon-sama."

Aldebaran: "…"

Yae's response, lacking any conclusive evidence, caused Aldebaran's breath to catch, and he turned his gaze to Heinkel once more.

Naturally, Aldebaran was aware of the relationship between Heinkel and Wilhelm. It had become a story of confrontation between parent and child, ending with the son slaying the father.

He was aware of Heinkel's excessively fatal flaw as a swordsman, but—

Aldebaran: "Between his father and his son, the old man sure was stuck indefinitely between a rock and a hard place."

The discord within the Astrea Family, down to its core, Aldebaran knew not.

Only, he knew that the existence of the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint and the title of Sword Saint had given rise to friction across three generations of parent, child, and grandchild. And, that friction had amounted to something definite because of this occasion.

Aldebaran: "…"

Reinhard and Wilhelm, over these few days Heinkel had taken a position in complete opposition to both of them; Aldebaran and the rest had no right to worry about his feelings.

He was someone caught up in this for the sake of being used. It would have been nothing but shameless to call out to him and ask if he was okay. Hence, Aldebaran returned his gaze to Yae, asking "So then”,

Aldebaran: “What about the grandpa? If the old man slayed him, then all of that would be his blood, so…”

???: “—For the time being, only the most minimal of treatment’s been applied. We couldn’t stay there long at all, so it’s really just the bare minimum.”

Aldebaran: “Uoah?!”

The sudden voice jolting his shoulders, Aldebaran goggled at his surroundings. But, “Aldebaran”, who should have been the owner of that voice, was nowhere to be found. It was the Divine Dragon’s dragonhusk. It was not of a size that could have been overlooked—and, right when he thought that,

“Aldebaran”: “Sorry, sorry, for now, optical camouflage cancellation.”

No sooner than those words were uttered, in the space that ought to have been completely empty until then—resting its jaw on the rocky wall that Felt had been leaning against, there appeared the massive body of a limply reclined Dragon. Watching the way it appeared, as if the blurred atmosphere was gradually gaining color, Aldebaran widened his eyes with an “Ohh”,

Aldebaran: “Optical camouflage, is that bending light to make yourself transparent? So you can do that sorta thing?”

“Aldebaran”: “As you’d expect, correcting it while moving in real time’d be impossible, you know? But, when limited to just the times when I’m completely still, most of the demerits that come with this body quite literally disappear, yeah?”

Aldebaran: “Sounds about right. I think a Dragon that turns invisible’s pretty damn cool.”

It was possible to realize magic that bent light by combining Yang Magic and Wind Magic, but it would consume far too much fuel to have it continuously active. It required a very precise control of magic to blend into the surrounding environment, and it was a challenge that would very likely not reach the sought-after standard.

In reality, it had been difficult for even “Aldebaran” to perform, so instead it had kept it on standby, concealed above the clouds of the Royal Capital.

Aldebaran: “If you’ve become capable of doing it, then… must’ve been quite the hard-fought battle.”

“Aldebaran”: “Was neck and neck with the other side. To be honest, without the old man’s backstab, a bit of fear flashed through my head that I might’ve lost.”

Aldebaran: “A backstab, huh…”

Shaking his head, Aldebaran processed the two surprises.

First, was the thought of how fearsome the Sword Demon must have been to inspire visions of defeat within “Aldebaran”. Even if the currently loaded software was different, the hardware specs were undoubtedly that of the Divine Dragon, so to reach that sphere immediately following a battle with Yae, one would have had to have been an unthinkable monster.

Thus, the second surprise was naturally the manner in which Heinkel had intervened with the battle—

Aldebaran: “It likely wouldn’t have been easy to have settled things fair and square, but ending things with a backstab’s probably wrecking the old man’s mental.”

Yae: “Well, I think there’s no doubt about that~. Ultimately, ever since we fled the Royal Capital, he hasn’t spoken to us even once.”

Aldebaran: “Is that so…”

Receiving an affirmation from Yae that Heinkel’s affliction was just as he had imagined, Aldebaran took a deep breath, and looked over those present once more.

Yae was dejected by her defeat, and “Aldebaran” had been overwhelmed by the Sword Demon. Heinkel was cowering with the shock of stabbing his father, and Felt was not even trying to hide her enmity to the rest of them. Finally, atop his shoulders, Roy was in merry spirits, and Aldebaran himself was an atrocious villain going full speed down the path to being a coward.

On top of being a lineup of good-for-nothings, they were in quite a tattered state.

Aldebaran: "—Even so, everyone's alive."

Upon reuniting face to face with everyone at the quarry, ascertaining their survival, Aldebaran released the tension from his shoulders, silently rescinded his Territory, and reopened a new matrix.

With his restart point updated, the events that took place at the Royal Capital were set in stone for this world's history.

In other words, he would no longer be able to take back the tears that had flowed from her amethyst eyes.

Aldebaran: "But, that's fine. The moment I decided to betray everything, there'd be no such convenience as making an exception for any one person."

He would not compromise. Wavering of his heart was forbidden. Were he to falter, all would come to naught.

In order to conclude that there had been meaning in all the pain he had suffered with his body, with his heart, Aldebaran's party could not afford to fail, let alone halt their legs.

Aldebaran: "Yae, if you've prepared food, then give it here. I'm starving."

Yae: "I couldn't take any of the ingredients from the mansion with me, so I stole from stores along the way. I noted down what I took from which stores, so please pay for it all later."

Aldebaran: "How shrewd of you… got it. Also, this guy here…"

Yae: “You want me to tie and hang him up? In that case, I’ve already done so.”

As she spoke, Yae made a fluid motion with her upraised finger, and Aldebaran’s shoulder suddenly felt lighter. Roy’s body was tied up by a steel thread, suspended on the stone wall of the quarry.

Roy: “What’s this what’s this, this treatment again? Well~, maybe it’s better than hanging upside down, but still~.”

Aldebaran: “Stay put like that for a bit. Once I decide on how to discipline you, I’ll heal your arms and legs. However…”

Roy: “Don’t forget the Curse Mark, right~? Isn’t it fine? There’s no way we’d ever say that we won’t plot anything, but for the time being we’ll hold off and evaluate for you~.”

Aldebaran: “Evaluate, eh.”

Roy: “Because Ley died, perhaps~? We have no intention whatsoever of succeeding Gourmet or anything like that, but let’s try taking a bit more of an interest in things before serving atop the platter, is what we’re saying!”

With both arms and legs bound, hung up rigidly like a shrimp, Roy swung his body. Shrugging his shoulders at that eeriness, Aldebaran crossed gazes with “Aldebaran”.

Possessing the same ego as himself, it drew back its large jaw, a firm promise that it would not avert its eyes.

Aldebaran: “That reminds me, Plan B was a huge help. Thanks to that, we got away.”

“Aldebaran”: “Ahh, so that’s what you went with, Origin. I’d thought of it as a “second plan”. Well, it’s a good thing that we landed on the same idea.”

Aldebaran: “Origin?”

“Aldebaran”: “It’s getting a bit tiresome to keep calling you “the other me”, yeah? And so, I was thinking, how about Origin, as in progenitor. How’s “descendent” for me?”

Aldebaran: “Progenitor and descendent, sorta like iekei ramen.”

At “Aldebaran’s” proposal, Aldebaran lazily dodged it with an “I’ll think about it”. Then, he finally turned to face the angry expression on Felt’s face, which he had been putting off.

With her arms crossed, Felt’s eyes had been ablaze with an unaltered indignation, but—

Aldebaran: “You figured out that it was Lil’ Miss Emilia who stopped that massive boulder, yeah?”

Felt: “Ah? Are you making fun of me? Nobody else but Emilia-neechan would perform such an idiotic feat.”

Aldebaran: “The way you said that makes me wonder which one of us is making fun of who… but yeah, you’re right. I dropped the boulder knowing full well that Lil’ Miss Emilia would stop it all.”

Felt: “…You’re gonna be getting much more than just an ass-kicking.”

The despicable trick Aldebaran had pulled in order to get away, Felt had understood it true, and her lips contorted more and more as she threatened him. Her threat stunk of the undercity, and he sensed that it represented her utmost rage; however, Aldebaran harbored another emotion simultaneously.

Aldebaran’s method of doing things, and Emilia, who had been ensnared by it. Including the jailbreak of Gluttony, it was a lineup that would naturally incur Felt’s ire.

But, it seemed like there had also been other reasons behind the overflowing of Felt’s anger—.

Aldebaran: “…The thing with the old man and the Sword Demon grandpa, it ain’t your fault, Felt-chan.”

Felt: “I never once thought it was my fault. Without a doubt, it’s you… you guys, Reinhard’s father, and his grandfather, who are at fault. But still, I’m angry, and just thinking about what sorta face that idiot’ll make when he finds out about this makes me even more angry.”

Aldebaran: “…”

Felt: “The moment I made him my Knight, it wouldn’t make sense for me to be uninvolved with the things involving him, no matter what they might be. Remember this, you shitty helmet bastard.”

Aldebaran: “…What?”

Felt: “Even if you do stuff with the intention of taking responsibility for it yourself, there’s no way it’ll ever be talked about in isolation from that princess. All you’re doing is kicking her corpse.”

Felt’s sharp tongue and glint in her eyes gnawed at Aldebaran more so than any other poison until now.

The relationship between Knight and master was something that would not disappear even if one of them were to die. If Aldebaran gained notoriety, that would also become notoriety for Priscilla Barielle.

With that thrust before him anew, he experienced fresh pain and bitterness. But—

Aldebaran: “The Princess, is no longer among us. Didn’t even leave a corpse behind.”

Felt: “—Hk, it’s not that sorta…!”

Aldebaran: “It is that sorta thing. To me, that’s what lives are.”

As Felt laid her anger bare, she was silenced by a dry answer.

Postmortem renown and notoriety held no meaning whatsoever to the deceased. Everything hinged on being alive. The feelings of joy and sorrow regarding the reputations of the dead were entirely formed from the sentimentality of those who lived.

Aldebaran: “You gotta do your best while both you and your partner are still alive. That’s all I have to say.”

Felt: “—. You shitty helmet bastard, what the hell even are you really?”

Aldebaran: “…I’m a following star.”

Felt: “Following star…?”

Aldebaran: “A failure of the star that shines brightest in the night sky.”

On that note, Aldebaran turned his back on Felt, and resigned from the exchange. Then, Aldebaran strode up to the chopping block, over to Heinkel.

Heinkel: “…”

Eyes downcast without raising his visage, Heinkel ignored Aldebaran. But, he ought to have noticed him. His breathing, and the flinch of his body had perceived his presence.

It was easy to imagine that he would feel on edge. It was a bit troubling to decide on what to say, but,

Aldebaran: “I’ll keep my promise. When this is all over, the Dragon’s Blood will be yours no matter what.”

Heinkel: “—Hk.”

Right now, what Heinkel necessitated was neither consolation nor apology, but a firm, definite promise.

At Aldebaran’s words, formed by his thinking, Heinkel’s breath caught, followed by his outstretched hand grabbing the hem of Aldebaran’s tunic, pulling him closer by sheer force. Suddenly down on one knee, Aldebaran felt the cold edge of a blade fastened to his nape, and his eyes met Heinkel’s.

With blood splattered on his face, Heinkel’s blue eyes were bloodshot,

Heinkel: “No matter what…!”

Aldebaran: “…”

Heinkel: “No matter what, keep your promise. The Dragon’s Blood, whatever it takes… the Witch of Envy too…!”

Aldebaran: “I know. I’ve got no intention of letting the world end. That’s the purpose of Gluttony.”

Feeling the sharp pain on his nape, Aldebaran composed himself and responded so. He softly raised his arm as well, forcing Yae to back off as she was about to respond to Heinkel’s rash action.

Then, after Aldebaran and Heinkel stared at each other up close for a while,

Heinkel: “SHIT!”

Spitting that word out, Heinkel shoved Aldebaran back. Getting his body back up after falling on his backside, Aldebaran looked to his fore, and saw that Heinkel had returned to hanging his head, shutting himself away like before.

Witnessing that, Aldebaran fiddled with the metal fixture of his helmet, and sighed.

For the time being, he had grasped the state of each party member.

He would not deny that as a result of entering the Royal Capital, everyone had been exhausted for better or for worse, but the fact that nobody had been lost, and the fact that he had secured Roy made up for that; thus, he could proceed.

Frankly, he was well aware that he was not cut out for this, but he had no choice but to lead them.

Aldebaran: “For the time being, we should be able to settle down here. We’ll eat Yae’s food, and resume movement after a bit of a rest. The chaos from the Royal Capital’s only gonna continue—”

Snapping his fingers as a substitute for clapping his hands, Aldebaran gathered everyone’s attention.

Until this point, Yae and Heinkel, who had been accompanying him from the start, had been marching on nearly three days without rest or sleep. He had intended on taking some time to let them rest.

—That was, if a giant boulder had not been dropped from high in the sky, almost as if to interrupt Aldebaran’s words.

Aldebaran: “Wha.”

With that, right after mistaking it for a thin cloud’s shadow, Aldebaran was crushed by the extreme weight.

Merely, far in the distance, he felt as if he could hear the buzzing of insects.

3

—Otto Suwen was enraged.

He resolved to do whatever he must to rid the land of that evil and ruthless king. —To the point that that nonsensical, cliche stock phrase that Subaru had told him that people used when they got angry flashed through his mind, Otto was enraged.

There was no need to disclose who the direct cause, and target, of that rage was.

The great sinner, Al—nay, Aldebaran had committed an unforgivable transgression. That was not only due to his betrayal of the hearts of those who were concerned for his mental and physical well-being, but also due to the fact that he had broken nearly a hundred of the most important laws prescribed by the Kingdom.

However, what enraged Otto the most was the fact that he had antagonized Otto’s very own family.

Otto considered himself a pacifist.

He fundamentally disliked conflict, and believed in avoiding any trouble that he could. In fact, even during the time he traveled together with Frufoo as a merchant, he seldomly stuck his nose into the disputes of others or chose the usage of violence unless he was given no other option.

However, his situation changed upon joining the Emilia Camp and taking on the position of its Internal Affairs Minister.

He did not appreciate Subaru's teasing of him being a militant Internal Affairs Minister—but, pacifism and mild-mannered diplomacy were not top priorities in his current position.

The caliber and intensity of the malice he had to face was far greater than anything he had experienced as a traveling merchant, and if he continued to respond in a half-hearted, passive manner, he would fail to protect those whom he wished to protect the most.

Likewise, he exercised both self-awareness of his status as someone entrusted by a Royal Selection Candidate, and self-control that he warned himself must never slip.

As the Camp's Internal Affairs Minister and a key administrator of the Mathers Domain's management, Otto held a status and power of his position that he could have never dreamed of before. So that he would never be swallowed up by that and lose sight of his place, Otto admonished himself daily.

Those efforts Otto made to admonish himself, however, were forgotten the moment someone laid their hands on his family.

Otto: "Everyone has their own circumstances. But, I will not tolerate someone who is unwilling to find a solution at the negotiating table."

If they desired mercy, he would show them mercy. If they desired generosity, he would show them generosity.

That kind of consideration and goodwill was present within everyone in the Camp, led by Emilia. Therefore, Otto also did his utmost to respect the integrity of that spirit of theirs.

Even so, if the other party continued to trample over and take advantage of them, he would be left with no choice.

If they desired his blessings, he would give them his blessings. If they desired his support, he would offer them his support.

And, if they desired to be hostile, then he would show them his utmost hostility.

Otto: “Thanks to Emilia-sama, the city came out unscathed. The evacuation of the Noble District was also completed in advance. The Knights of the Royal Capital have proven quite capable.”

Tightly clenching his fist, Otto processed the damage caused by the events that had just taken place.

Since he needed to dedicate his mind to getting a grasp on the situation and understanding how things had progressed, he could not allow himself to give in to indignation. Truly, he felt mortified deep within his heart. —Mortified, at his own pathetic disgrace.

When the initial weight of the situation that had begun to move struck him over the head, Otto shamefully lamented his powerlessness, and was consoled by Emilia of all people. It should have been the opposite. That should never have occurred. The purpose of Otto’s position was to ease Emilia’s concerns.

And yet, the reality was that Otto had been on the verge of tears as he was comforted by Emilia, and had his head raised back up by the words of one whom he ought to have been supporting, before being given a push to his back.

He had jokingly told Emilia that Subaru would kill him, but in his heart of hearts, Otto truly wanted to strangle himself to death.

However, the dead would never get a chance to redeem themselves. So instead of foolishly wrapping his hands around his own neck, Otto would use his head with all his resolve. Fortunately, half-crying like that helped him clear his head out a little. —Though the thunder was still rumbling in his mind, the lightning allowed him to peer into the darkness.

He thought back to a time long ago, when it was just him and Frufoo; they were hurrying through a thunderstorm when a bolt of lightning struck the carriage bed, resulting in their entire load of cargo being reduced to ashes.

As Otto lamented his great misfortune, his beloved dragon said to him “Let’s be glad that neither of us was hurt, alright?”, and he could not deny the truth in her words.

If one traveled through a thunderstorm, they had to be prepared to get struck by lightning. —In that moment, however, it was up to the individual’s luck whether they could avoid being burned to death by said lightning.

By shaving away as many elements that luck could sway as possible, he forged ahead through that thunderstorm.

That was the essence of the enraged Otto Suwen’s no-holds-barred fighting style—for that singular purpose, he would even play cards in his hand that were branded as ruthless without hesitation.

The manifestation of that was—

Otto: “While we are staying in the Royal Capital, we cannot prepare a military force surpassing Reinhard-san, nor combat strength that exceeds Felt-sama’s group. As it is, when the turn to act comes back around to us, sheer force and numbers can no longer serve as absolute measures to stop them.”

By some artifice, Aldebaran had slipped past the Sword Saint Reinhard. Then, with the Divine Dragon Volcanica in his wake, he had pushed through Felt and her forces before reaching the Royal Capital.

Otto and his group, having only just returned from the Vollachian Empire and having gone separate ways from their allies, had no means to oppose the baffling ability of Aldebaran.

Thus, neither Emilia, who was dispatched with orders to capture him alive, nor the summons to Wilhelm’s group, who coincidentally were staying at the royal residence, were conceived as decisive strokes.

Naturally, were Emilia and Wilhelm’s group to reign victorious, it would have been ideal, but Otto had anticipated that such an outcome was likely unattainable. As matters stood, Otto's group had possessed no means of aggression beyond deploying the entirety of their available forces.

—Otto Suwen possessed neither Reinhard van Astrea's combat ability nor Valga Cromwell's strategic ingenuity. He did not presume himself blessed to rival such talent, for he harbored no such inflated assessment of himself.

Otto did not expect himself to transcend his mortal limits. —At best, he could only muster one-hundred percent of his own ability.

With that one-hundred percent, what Otto Suwen could do was—

Otto: "—An abandoned quarry, west of the Royal Capital."

The tidings were borne with the sound of fluttering wings; Otto narrowed his eyes as he marked the map. With one hand pressing a bloodied handkerchief to his nose, he tapped his hazy head.

Divine Protection overheating—when Subaru had thus dubbed the exhaustion born from overuse, Garfiel's eyes had shined at the wondrous sound of it. Remembering that, Otto's lips relaxed.

Otto: "Overheating, that sounds quite nice. Even if my head splits open, I will not stop, I…"

Blood still trickled from his nose as Otto grumbled thus under the gathering whir of wings—Zodda bugs, at whom he snapped his fingers, instructing them to their next course of action in the continuation of their surveillance.

The Zodda bugs possessed an amiable disposition with a faint sense of individual awareness. They shared directives as one being, and to persuade but a single insect would demonstrate results equivalent to persuading the entire swarm. For their service, they demanded but a single reward: a peaceful life.

By virtue of his position as the Internal Affairs Minister, Otto had intended to secure their compensation. In return, the swarm must pledge obedience unto tasks of mortal peril whilst performing reckless endeavors that surpassed human capability.

—They had clung to the fleeing Divine Dragon to pinpoint its rendezvous point, mobilized swarms of a hundred thousand strong to drop boulders upon their foes, gathered every message left by the captured Felt; such deeds they wrought.

Otto: “…The Grand Mogolade Geyser.”

It was a missive Felt had left in her captivity amidst Aldebaran’s gang, cast forth in hope of reaching allies which would later be salvaged within the ruins of the Barielle estate. The very manner of this delivery, evading surveillance to entrust her message to the Zodda bugs, spoke volumes of Felt’s unshakeable courage.

In truth, the missive contained naught but a toponym from the Kararagi City-States. It was likely Aldebaran and his group’s next target, or possibly their ultimate destination. If that was where they were headed, then by all means, let them go freely. —Otto’s watchful gaze would never leave them.

Wherever they went, however they concealed themselves, Otto would endure ceaseless ringing in his ears and crimson streaks from his nose to track every last movement of Aldebaran’s faction.

Otto: “Please do not delude yourself into thinking you can sleep again. —The entire world is your enemy now.”

He had nothing like the strength to claim victory. Naught remained but to continue to whittle away at his enemy’s might.

Thus did Otto Suwen fight, not as the Sword Saint or the Great Strategist, but as Emilia’s Internal Affairs Minister, one who exerted one-hundred percent of his strength.

V!c.1120

Chapter 32: The Man Named Clind

1

—While Aldebaran’s party was being relentlessly pursued by powerful adversaries, there were two other places in the Kingdom where gruelling and fierce battles of equal intensity were being fought.

One battle was between the Sword Saint, who continuously sought to prevent the destruction of the world, and the Witch of Envy, who persistently sought to swallow up the Augria Sand Dunes after manifesting a part of herself from the sealed shrine.

Both the Witch of Envy and the Sword Saint possessed the power to instantly end any battle if they were facing any other opponent, but exactly because they were facing each other in battle, the fight remained evenly matched, and the outcome continued to be left undecided.

The battle would continue for a full seven days and seven nights. —Bringing the grave cost of the world’s destruction with it.

The other battle, as opposed to Aldebaran’s party and the Sword Saint’s, did not involve physical conflict, yet had the potential to influence the outcome of the other two battles greatly.

In other words, it was the struggle of those who were pursuing the “Following Star”, with Petra Leyte as the key.

—Petra knew very little about the man named Clind.

He was on her side. That, there was absolutely no doubt.

Annerose Miload, his master, was a shrewd little girl who, despite her young age and the unfortunate blemish of being related to Roswaal, remained unfazed through and through. She was one of the Emilia Camp’s strongest supporters and, even from Petra’s perspective, was undoubtedly charmed by Emilia.

Clind, who dedicated himself to supporting Annerose and was trusted as a versatile all-purpose butler, had also given Petra lessons in etiquette and manners when she first started working as a maid.

Clind had not only educated Petra, but almost everyone associated with the Mathers household, even Frederica and Ram were taught the fundamentals of being a servant by him.

Therefore, Clind could be considered the point of origin for the servants of the Mathers household, and Petra should therefore have regarded him as a teacher or mentor.

However, it was none other than the person in question who had corrected Petra's perception.

Clind: "I never intended to take on such a noble role as teaching and mentoring. Misinterpretation. I am merely conveying what I have heard from my predecessors. It is only because I have remained in this position for many years that I have had many opportunities to do so. Declination."

Clind's way of thinking could have been interpreted as a sign of humility and modesty.

However, Petra intuitively sensed that these were Clind's true, albeit rarely expressed feelings.

???: "In the end, that man undervalues himself. Because he has such low self-esteem, he thinks his work is not worthy of any praise… He is being so condescending!"

This was Frederica's unusually harsh critique directed solely at Clind. Still, while Petra believed she was absolutely correct and the most wonderful person in the world, she was also in partial disagreement with her.

At first glance, Clind's attitude indeed appeared to be that of a person with low self-esteem. However, Clind lacked the apparent hesitation or indecision when communicating with younger people or his junior colleagues, whereas a person with low self-esteem would tend to show more hesitation and indecision.

Clind's attitude displayed no such simple and mundane hesitation.
—Just like Petra.

Petra: "If I put my mind to it, I can do anything."

Most people would probably dismiss such a statement as mere arrogance, but Petra did not care about most people; she only cared about those closest to her. And she believed that the people closest to her believed in her confidence and potential.

Petra was aware that she was full of potential and had the talent to bring it to fruition.

Not only was she cute, but she also possessed the talent necessary to walk her desired path and the determination to believe in that talent and continue striving toward her goals without ever stopping. She was fully aware that she had been blessed with numerous gifts worthy of heaven.

As someone who was blessed with such talent, she would have said that Clind's attitude was not that of someone with low self-esteem, but rather the opposite.

Clind was well aware of his exceptional talents. However, he did not consider them something to be proud of. This made him appear modest and reserved at first glance.

Petra: "But, I really don't like that."

—Petra knew very little about the man named Clind.

However, Petra honestly did not like Clind, the man she knew so little about.

It was not unrelated to the fact that Frederica, who was always so polite and kind to everyone like a loving mother, showed a particularly special attitude and uncharacteristic expressiveness only toward Clind, and that she was able to discern his underlying emotions. Of course, it was also a factor that Clind had been acquainted with Roswaal for a very long time and appeared to be on very good terms with him.

But, the biggest reason was derived from Clind's own nature, which differed from his relationships with Frederica and Roswaal.

—The main reason was that the way he conducted himself, which seemed as if he had already given up, was completely contrary to Petra's principles.

Petra: "—We're back, so lend us a hand! I know you're listening, Clind-niisama!"

As the dragon carriage passed through the gate at the entrance to Mirula, the town closest to the sand dunes, Petra raised her voice and called out to the familiar man.

It was all thanks to Patrasche, who had ceaselessly raced fiercely across the Sand Sea for a day and night from the Pleiades Watchtower, that Petra and the others were able to return in the shortest possible time and route. Even so, they were still lagging far behind Al, who had borrowed the wings of the Divine Dragon.

His strength was indispensable to catch up with that increasingly distant target.

Petra: "Clind-niisama!"

Petra pulled on the reins to stop the dragon carriage and raised her voice once more in the town square.

Petra's desperate plea was met with silence from the man she had just called out to. But, she was convinced that her voice had reached him, and she started glancing around herself.

???: "Huh? Where is everyone?"

As if echoing Petra's gaze, the Imaginary Subaru spoke.

Just as the Imaginary Subaru had said, even though it was midday, there was not a single soul to be seen in the square. —No, it was not just the square. There was no sign of life in the entire town.

Mirula gave off the impression of a deserted roadside town, but even so, there should have been at least one or two hundred residents living there. It was very much odd that there was not a single person to be seen anywhere.

???: "…Maybe helmet-ojisan wiped everyone o~ut?"

"Subaru": "That's a scary thing to say! Don't act like Elsa!"

Petra: "Don't say such scary things, Meili-chan. —As for you, Subaru, Meili-chan isn't like that anymore. It's just the result of her upbringing."

The first half of her remark was for Meili; the second half, for the Imaginary Subaru.

To say that Meili's worst-case scenario did not briefly cross her mind would have been a lie, but the possibility was able to be ruled out because the town was deserted but not damaged.

If Al had wreaked havoc with Volcanica, the town would have been completely wiped off the earth, and irreparable devastation would have ensued.

The appearance of the town was not so much a scene of devastation as much as it was—

Petra: "It looks like they ran away in the night."

"Subaru": "It's like they ran away in the night."

Then, the impressions of Petra and the Imaginary Subaru unexpectedly overlapped.

Since the Imaginary Subaru resided within Petra's mind, it was only natural that this would occur. However, as a young woman in love, she was secretly a little bit delighted that her thoughts were mirrored by her beloved.

Besides, there were other reasons why she was able to stay positive.

???: "—Although that may be a slight generalization, that assessment seems to be correct. Perspicacity."

With that, a man stepped forward into the now completely deserted town square.

Amidst the bleak and desolate townscape, this person maintained a refined aura that stood out. Their mysterious presence was like a single drop of deep blue paint on a blank sheet of paper, exuding a subtle, unobtrusive, yet powerful strength.

That man had something so innate about himself that would make one believe that even if this were not a deserted roadside town but the bustling Royal Capital or even a noisy, crowded summer fireworks festival, no one would be able to overlook the man's presence.

"Subaru": "Wait a second. I'm now loading Petra's knowledge real quick."

Petra: "—Clind-niisama."

"Subaru": "Aww, you beat me to it!"

When the unfamiliar figure appeared, the Imaginary Subaru from the past looked a bit disappointed at being beaten to the punch, while Petra quickly jumped down from the driver's seat and looked directly at the newcomer.

The versatile butler, and the man who held the key to overturning this situation—Clind.

Clind: "—. Considering the state of Mirula and the turbulence in the Sand Sea, it appears that it was the correct decision to abandon the return journey. Fortuitous."

Adjusting the position of the monocle on his left eye with his hand, Clind narrowed his eyes at the scene of the empty town and what lay behind Petra and the others—the murky sky that had caused all of this.

And then—

Clind: “Petra, it appears we need to talk. Urgency.”

2

Clind: “—I understand. Deliberation.”

Upon hearing a rough explanation, Clind touched his narrow jaw with his finger and closed one eye.

The sharp beauty of a man, lost in thought, was in itself as majestic as a painting, but unfortunately, Petra had no time to admire it, as her sensibilities lay elsewhere.

If she simply wanted to see a beautiful face, the quickest way would have been to look in a mirror or at Emilia.

Clind: “What is the condition of Garfiel and the one called Ezzo? Verification.”

Meili: “I don’t think you need to fear for the lives of either fanged onii-san or Sensei-san. Fanged onii-san is really tou~gh, so I’m worried since he hasn’t woken up yet, bu~t…”

Petra: “Yeah, I think Garf-san was probably protecting Ezzo-san.”

Picking up the second half of Meili’s answer, Petra considered the two individuals who had been laid in the dragon carriage.

Garfiel, whose durability was one of his strengths, had suffered as much damage as Ezzo, a dwarf and magician, perhaps because he had shielded Ezzo by standing in front of him when they were attacked by the Divine Dragon.

Without those heroic actions, Ezzo might not have survived.

“Subaru”: “So, Garfiel took a direct hit from the Dragon, huh…? I still can’t quite wrap my head around the fact that he’s willing to risk his life like that, even though he’s only fourteen with a major case of chuunibyou.”

Petra: “Just so you know, Garf-san is fifteen now. By the way, I’m turning fourteen soon.”

“Subaru”: “Time just flies by. No wonder Petra’s gone from being a pretty girl to a beautiful woman.”

Petra: “…”

Again, Petra had to keep in mind that this was just the Imaginary Subaru in her mind, and not what the real Subaru would say. However, even if it were the real Subaru, he would have said something along those lines, and she remembered hearing him say something similar before.

Even though she knew it was not flattery, but rather sincere words, the fact that he could say it so casually to anyone other than Emilia was somewhat troubling.

Regardless—

Petra: “While I’m also worried about Garf-san and Sensei-san, my biggest concern is Al-san. Clind-niisama, you waited for us because you feel the same way too, right?”

Clind: “The feeling is not quite the same. The reason I chose to remain in this place was because of a slight sense of unease I felt when I saw Petra and the others off. Misgivings.”

Petra: “A slight sense, of unease?”

Clind: “Yes. In fact, I informed both Subaru-sama and Beatrice-sama about it. Retrospective.”

Clind cast his eyes down gloomily upon relaying the information that Petra and Meili had not known. In actuality, since the two who had been informed had both been taken by Al’s hand, Clind’s self-reproach must have been considerable.

Even the Imaginary Subaru, who was unfamiliar with Clind, felt a twinge of sympathy for this unfortunate situation,

“Subaru”: “Well, the more I hear about what happened, the more I think Beatrice and I were in the wrong. I mean, Clind-san communicated everything properly, right? But, we didn’t say anything, did we? So, this is the result; it’s only natural…”

Petra: “Subaru and Beatrice-chan aren’t to blame. Subaru, quiet down.”

“Subaru”: “My intentions aren’t reflected in my written apology!”

Subaru lamented as if he had struck upon something unreasonable, but Petra would not tolerate any careless disparagement of Subaru, even if it came from Subaru himself. Moreover, Beatrice would also be implicated with that remark. Beatrice was cute and kind, so she could not be at fault.

Without hesitation, she would dispense harsh justice that would make anyone tremble upon hearing it. These were the rules of Petra Leyte’s court, and the verdicts of Judge Petra.

Meili: “So? What was it that was bugging you, Butler-sa~n?”

Clind: “At that time, I was unable to identify it specifically. Inadequacy. However, now that the situation has developed this way… I feel that I have doubts about the establishment of the situation. Concern.”

Prompted by Meili, Clind kept his eyes downcast and put his thoughts into words.

The “establishment of the situation” that Clind found troubling likely referred to when he saw Petra and the others off at Mirula.

Clind: “It did not seem unnatural. Upon hearing the explanation, the choice of personnel seemed reasonable. —However, it also felt like a combination that would require two or three difficult justifications to make sense. Intentional.”

Petra: “Intentional…”

As Clind gave his explanation, Petra chewed on those words.

To be honest, the fact that Clind was vague and avoided making a clear statement about the mistake in the selection of members to travel to the Pleiades Watchtower—this fact nagged at Petra’s conscience in the form of guilt-ridden speculation.

If Emilia, Ram, or Otto had gone with Subaru instead of Petra, things might not have turned out this way. Indeed, if Frederica had been there instead of Petra as initially planned, Al's terrible actions might have been prevented.

Meili was irreplaceable in breaking through the Augria Sand Dunes, and Garfiel was the camp's most dependable fighter as an escort. These two were essential members of the expedition.

It was only Petra. Petra was the only member who was replaceable.

Petra: "…"

Perhaps she should have been more assertive. Whether it was postponing the trip to the Tower or everyone taking action together.

Of course, it was imperative to report immediately upon their return from Vollachia on the events that had transpired there, and it was also true that Schult, who had lost his only support, needed emotional care. Given the necessity of making such sound judgments, there was no doubt that the current members were chosen for the right reasons.

However, Petra was not confident that her subjective, arbitrary wishes had not influenced these decisions.

Having been separated from Subaru for so long, Petra did not want to be apart from him even for a moment, and she was driven by a selfish desire to be useful to him. In a place where Emilia and Rem were not present, Petra hoped that her strength and presence would be able to support Subaru.

As a result, she did not even recognize the uneasiness that Clind had sensed—.

"Subaru": "—Petra, you're definitely overthinking this."

Petra tightly gripped the hem of her skirt, and the intangible hand of the Imaginary Subaru overlapped hers, gently whispering in her ear.

However, Petra was not easily comforted by Subaru's words.

"Subaru": "Well, I know it's not my place to say this, but it's not impossible that you had some non-zero amount of ulterior motives, like wanting to be with me. But that's not a bad thing. And even if you did feel that way, it was only a single percent. I know that the other ninety-nine percent was Petra's kindness that I know so well."

Petra: "No… I'm just making the Subaru in my head say that…"

"Subaru": "If you say that, isn't there nothing I can say?! That's like playing a banned card!"

It must have been embarrassing for him to say that he wanted to be with her, but Petra let out a long breath at the sight of the Imaginary Subaru, blushing slightly as he pleaded with her.

To be honest, Petra hated herself for being so easily taken in by his kindness. She thought perhaps she was not a cheap girl; it was just that Subaru's words were too powerful.

"Subaru": "Besides, I suspect that your suffering isn't really your fault, Petra."

Petra: "Does… that have anything to do with Al-san being so strong?"

"Subaru": "Well, I've never actually seen Al fight with a sword, so I might be talking nonsense… but I do know Reinhard."

Even though Al's abilities were unknown, he knew the abilities of Reinhard—the pinnacle of this world.

Both Garfiel and Ezzo were incredibly skilled fighters who were out of Petra's class. Since Al defeated them, assuming that he was even stronger would be natural.

However, no matter how strong Al was, he was no match for Reinhard.

"Subaru": "When I first saw him in the loot house, I didn't really have an understanding of the norms of this world, so I was confused… But even by the standards of this world, he's still a monster."

Petra: "Yeah. But Al-san also did something about Reinhard-san. There's no doubt that Flam-chan used her Divine Protection to summon him, so…"

"Subaru": "At the very least, he wasn't instantly killed by Reinhard. Even with an assist character like the Divine Dragon, it's common knowledge that that's not something anyone can do easily, right?"

Petra: "Is that related to how we were grouped up?"

"Subaru": "Maybe. But I really feel like strength alone doesn't explain everything."

Petra also carefully considered the implications of what the Imaginary Subaru had said.

Indeed, no amount of strength mattered when facing Reinhard. With strength alone, it would be impossible to overcome Reinhard and achieve one's goal.

In other words, besides his strength, there were other reasons for Al's frightening nature.

"Subaru": "Honestly, things have been going too well for Al until now."

Petra: "But, people who always seem to be lucky have other reasons besides luck, right?"

"Subaru": "Right."

Although the heart of the matter remained unclear, Petra believed that it was worth remembering that point.

By exploring other possibilities, her feelings of guilt with nowhere to go were somewhat alleviated. Perhaps this had been what Subaru really wanted all along.

Meili: "Petra-chan? Are you okay? You're looking kind of spaced o~ut.”

Petra: “—. Sorry, Meili-chan, I’m fine. Anyway, Clind-niisama.”

Clind: “What is it? Confirmation.”

Petra: “I think your sense of unease is correct, Clind-niisama. I’m not exactly sure why, but if we don’t understand that unease, no one will be able to stop Al-san.”

Clind: “…”

Petra: “It’s just us. We’re the only ones who can stop Al-san. —We have to stop him, then get Subaru and Beatrice-chan back.”

With her hand placed on her chest, Petra pleaded with Clind.

Building it up, building it up, and then finally exhaling that breath, it had taken considerable courage for Petra to do so.

“Subaru”: “…”

The Imaginary Subaru stood with his arms crossed and stared at Petra’s profile with a complicated expression. Without looking in his direction, Petra remained steadfast in her conclusion. She believed it with all her heart.

—Petra had read Subaru’s Book of the Dead. In the worst-case scenario, Al might have killed Subaru and Beatrice and erased them from the world. It would be natural to think so, given that Natsuki Subaru’s Book of the Dead existed.

Petra: “But, my Subaru isn’t normal.”

The “my” slipped out subconsciously, but it was true. The “isn’t normal” part of it was true.

Natsuki Subaru had a power called Return by Death, an incredibly cruel and agonizing power that only a kind person could make use of properly. Petra surmised that the Book she had read had been but one of the volumes containing Subaru’s experiences of dying up until now.

That was because—

Petra: “After what I saw in that Book, did Subaru really manage to survive without dying even once?”

“Subaru”: “It feels like you have negative trust in me, huh. But, then again, with my impression of what Petra knows… all of the Sin Archbishops coming up to bat at once, the adventure at the Pleiades Watchtower, and the hell of the Vollachian Empire… for me to overcome all of that without a single mistake is, well, unbelievable even for me, wouldn’t you say?”

Petra: “…Yeah.”

When Petra realized that Subaru’s glorious achievements, which had already been considered remarkable given the hardships he had overcome, were, in fact, a collection of hellish trials far worse than she could have imagined, she was far from feeling disappointed in Subaru, but rather, she felt heartbroken by that self-sacrifice.

And at the same time, she was aware of it. —Of the depth of Subaru’s psychological scars, caused by Priscilla’s death.

Subaru was so deeply, deeply hurt, more deeply than anyone could possibly imagine. For precisely that reason, he had taken the blame upon himself and resolved to do anything for Al’s sake.

Not only was it those feelings of Subaru, but moreover his unparalleled resolve to “save everyone even if it means dying”, Al had betrayed all of it. If he had killed Subaru and Beatrice, then even if Petra tore apart Al’s body, mind, and soul, she would be unable to fulfill her revenge.

Meili: “Petra-chan, Onii-san and Beatrice-chan a~re…”

Petra: “They are alive. Absolutely.”

Meili: “…Yea~h. Both of them, especially Onii-san, are really tena~cious.”

Meili said so quietly and gently rested her head on Petra’s shoulder.

Even Meili, who was never so straightforward with her feelings, was genuinely concerned for Subaru and Beatrice. The fact that those around her felt the same way was a testament to Subaru's achievements thus far.

"Subaru": "Whether it comes to Beatrice or Meili, what the hell did the me I don't know do?"

Even though they concerned himself, the Imaginary Subaru muttered in a bewildered tone regarding those unknown actions. Seeing the Imaginary Subaru's expression, Petra relaxed her lips into a smile and turned back to Clind.

Petra had already conveyed her intentions and objectives. All that remained was to wait for his response.

Facing Petra's gaze directly, Clind quietly let out a sigh from his thin lips,

Clind: "Only you can do it, you say. What a bold statement. However, your resolve is a sight to behold. Admiration."

Petra: "…"

Clind: "Frankly speaking, when the Witch emerged at the end of the world, bringing about a situation that only the Sword Saint could possibly thwart, I had already half resigned myself to the fact that it was irreversible. Regret. However, if you are determined to fight on, then—"

Petra: "Hold on, Clind-niisama."

Clind had begun to speak, only to be met with Petra interrupting him mid-sentence.

It was not because she was concerned that the conversation would have become lengthy or gone off on a tangent. —To put it in Clind's words, it was an unease that she could not clearly articulate. However, it was precisely because he regretted overlooking that previous unease that Petra could not overlook this one.

What caught Petra's attention was the way Clind said it.

Petra: “I said “we”. That includes you, Clind-niisama. Don’t talk as if you’re not one of us.”

Clind: “That is… Hesitation.”

Petra: “Even if this might not be the right time, I will say it. Clind-niisama, you’ve always acted like you’re an outsider when you’re with us. I don’t like that.”

If he was dealing with Petra and the rest of the Emilia Camp as adults, as people in positions where it was necessary to take a step back, then she could still understand it.

But Clind was different. He treated everyone the same.

Annerose, whom Clind adored most; Roswaal, who had a relationship like partners-in-crime with Clind; Frederica, who could not bring herself to cut Clind out of her life; the same was true for all of them.

Petra: “That kind of lifestyle would never be tolerated in Emilia-neesama’s ideal Kingdom.”

Clind: “…”

Petra: “This isn’t someone else’s problem. If you’re alive, meeting people, talking to them, and spending time with them, then the good and bad things that happen are all part of it. You shouldn’t just pick out only a few bits, or only the good parts, because you can’t cheat like that.”

Meili: “Petra-chan…”

Petra: “If you keep doing that, eventually everyone important to you will turn their backs on you!”

Having felt Meili’s presence brush against her sleeve, Petra spoke with such force that she was out of breath.

Halfway through, she was no longer able to tell if she was expressing herself clearly, or if her message had gotten through at all. She had surely been influenced by the “Subaru” from the Book of the Dead.

“Subaru”: “Oioi, aren’t I part of the cheating you were just talking about?”

The Imaginary Subaru spoke thus with a frown, but she consciously ignored him for now. What was more important was Clind’s reaction—

Clind: “Everyone important to me turning their back on me, is it…? Keen realization.”

At Clind’s muttered remark, Petra gasped softly.

This was partly because the horribly poignant emotions contained within Clind’s low voice resonated tragically deep within her heart. But more than that, it was Clind’s expression that caused her to feel this way.

Petra: “…”

Clind rarely showed his emotions on his face. Petra could not think of any instances where he smiled, became angry, or appeared sad; Clind simply conveyed everything with a blank expression.

There was a change in Clind’s expression. —One of deep sorrow.

A poignant voice and a sorrowful expression. When both overlapped, one could describe it as ephemeral.

At that moment, Clind had an ephemeral and painful expression, as if reminiscing about the past.

Clind: “That… has already happened. Nostalgia.”

Petra: “Clind-niisama…”

Clind: “I have already had everyone turn away from me before, Petra. Self-deprecation.”

When she heard those words, Petra felt ashamed, remembering what she had said just before.

With arrogance, she spoke grandly about feelings she had only just begun to grasp, as if she knew everything. Clind already knew those feelings, and yet he acted the way he did.

However, despite feeling ashamed, Petra still wanted to say something.

Petra: “Even so…”

Clind: “—Yes, even so. Admiration.”

Petra: “Huh?”

Clind: “Once before, I relinquished everything. Even though it is true that I was left empty by that, there were things I gained and accumulated along the path I walked afterwards. Reflection. —Petra, my relationship with you and everyone else has been one of those things. Revelation.”

After he said that, Clind closed his eyes and gazed into the sky.

What did he see in that sky, where scattered clouds were being torn apart, as if barely holding back the end of the world on the other side?

Clind: “Why did I stay here, even though I was not ordered to, just because of some slight feeling of unease? I suppose it was because I, too, found it unbearable to let things continue like this. Unclouded mind.”

Petra: “Um… Clind-san, would that mean…?”

Meili: “That would mean it is like Petra-chan said, and you are apologizi~ng?”

Petra: “Meili-chan!”

“Subaru”: “Whoa, Meili-paisen said it.”

Confusing Petra, Meili’s clear response brought surprise. Next to Petra, who was staring wide-eyed, Subaru called Meili “Paisen” in an admiring tone of voice, and even though she had no memory of him doing that, she thought it was a typical reaction for Subaru.

Unconcerned by Petra's confusion, Clind let out a small laugh,

Clind: "Forgive me for causing you anxiety due to my lack of awareness. Sincerest apologies. That said, Petra, I am deeply appreciative of you. Debt of gratitude. —I, too, would like to contribute positively."

Petra: "Clind-niisama…"

Declaring thus, Clind bowed respectfully, to which Petra's eyes lit up.

However, as if to dampen Petra's excitement, Meili interjected with "I mean,"

Meili: "I don't think Butler-san had any intention of standing in our way or refusing to help, ri~ght? Petra-chan, aren't you just overthinking thi~ngs?"

Petra: "Th-that may be true, but…"

Clind: "No, that is incorrect, Meili. Rectification. Perceiving a situation as one's own means that I will also take initiative in proposing plans toward the solution. A great difference from an onlooking bystander. Different people."

"Subaru": "That's a bit of an exaggeration to say it's different people!"

Petra: "But, we can expect that much, right? Then! Clind-niisama, use your mysterious power and take us to where everyone is…"

Eagerly leaning forward, Petra was determined to make full use of Clind's power.

In fact, what Petra was counting on most in this situation was Clind's ability to Teleport. His teleportation, which instantly removed the distance that separated them from their destination, was an indispensable power for chasing after Al, who was headed somewhere with the Divine Dragon in tow.

Al’s destination was unknown, but the very conspicuous Divine Dragon accompanied him.

With the cooperation of Emilia, Ram and the others, and even the odious Roswaal, it should have been sufficiently possible to determine their destination and catch up with them.

So proclaimed Petra’s enthusiasm as she exhaled a rough breath from her nose, but—

Clind: “Unfortunately, my teleportation is not something that can be utilised without restriction. Rather, in terms of restrictions, it is a fairly inversatile power. Regrettable.”

Petra: “Clind-niisama, you liar! You traitor!”

“Subaru”: “That’s no fair after getting our hopes up! Clind-niisama, you killjoy!”

Meili: “P-Petra-chan, you’re being too ha~rsh. I don’t think Butler-san meant any ha~rm.”

The glimmer of hope was abruptly extinguished, and Petra seethed with the Imaginary Subaru in tow. Only half of their anger reached Clind and Meili, but him being a killjoy was the truth.

In the first place, it was a power of unknown mechanism, but when it was established that they could not use the Teleport which they had been counting on, the conversation just came down to a handsome man proactively accompanying them.

Clind: “It is not precisely Teleportation, but the Compression of space and time. Elucidation. It Compresses the distance one would originally have to travel and the time originally requisite for it. However, in order to avoid it having a substantial effect on the world’s way, it requires Od Lagna’s oversight. Expedience.”

“Subaru”: “Od Lagna? The hell’s that s’pposed t’mean?”

Petra: “The root of Mana and such, and according to Subaru’s knowledge, something like a god with no consciousness… probably.”

Clind uttered a term that struck them like a sucker punch, as Petra explained it to the Imaginary Subaru whilst he tilted his head in confusion, and she herself was not entirely sure she understood either.

While studying magic under Roswaal, Petra had received a general explanation of Od Lagna, but she was not sure if she understood it properly. Even Roswaal had said it would be hard for him to claim that he fully understood Od Lagna.

However, Od Lagna was an incredibly large concentration of power, and in a sense, it was said to be something that rested in a special place even from the pinnacles of powerful beings like the Sword Saint, the Divine Dragon, and the Witch of Envy.

Meili: “So, what happens if you can’t foo~l this Od Lagna?”

Clind: “That is unknown. The fact that it is unknown is terrifying. Shudder.”

In response to Meili’s question, Clind slowly shook his head.

His answer did not seem deceptive or evasive. In other words, despite seeming to know everything, Clind shared Roswaal’s perspective.

But, if that was the case—

Petra: “Clind-niisama, haven’t you done it several times before? That means you were able to deceive Od Lagna… what should we do?”

Clind: “Petra…”

Petra: “You were able to use your power because there was a method to it. What do you need, Clind-niisama? For example… Mana is needed to use magic. A Contract is necessary to control spirits. So, do you need to compensate Od Lagna in order to use it?”

Clind: “—. You are truly such a surprising child. Admiration.”

Clind’s reaction served to confirm Petra’s suspicions.

In other words, by offering compensation to Od Lagna, they could obtain permission to use Clind's extraordinary power. Or, as Clind himself put it, to turn a blind eye.

"Subaru": "So like bribes and kickbacks… What a corrupt materialist, despite being a god."

The sour-faced Imaginary Subaru's remark was something Petra wholeheartedly agreed with. But on the other hand, she felt that a god who demanded something in return was more trustworthy than a god who gave freely without asking for anything in return.

Most importantly, Petra knew all too well that the world was not set on easy mode where one could just get what they wanted without making any sacrifices.

That was why—

Petra: "Please tell me what you need, Clind-niisama. I will arrange for it without fail, no matter what it is. For Subaru, Beatrice-chan, and everyone else."

Meili: "O~h, Petra-chan, you're being si~lly. You just said it yourself, but it's not "I," it's "we.""

Petra: "—. Sorry, sorry. But, thank you."

Meili directed a miniscule smile at Petra and held her arm, who had resolved her determination.

Looking back, she never imagined that she would have this kind of a relationship with Meili. When Meili was imprisoned in the mansion, Petra often visited her because she wanted to move her through compassion and keep her from becoming dangerous.

Petra never imagined that she would nestle close to her at her moment of solitary decision.

Clind: "—It is possibility. Response."

Following a pause, Clind stated so before Petra and Meili.

Nothing so pessimistic as irresolution or incertitude, nor the hesitation or woe to apprise such youthful children of this.

Clind accepted the present circumstance as his own, and deemed Petra and Meili to be certain allies faced before the same problem. Henceforth, he resumed.

Clind: “It is possibility, the influence to be exerted upon the world, upon Od Lagna, that shall be forfeit as compensation. That is the condition for the utilization of the Authority belonging to the Witch Factor of Tristitia in my possession. —Divulgence.”

Vic.ll20

Chapter 33:
The Girl Named Petra Leyte

Petra: "—Possibility, as compensation."

Ascertaining what she had been informed of by repeating it, Petra furrowed her well-shaped eyebrows.

Possibility, that was the article necessary in exchange for using the mysterious power of Teleport that Clind was endowed with. She had been envisaging the requirement to be something simpler to comprehend, like vast amounts of Mana or a rare Magic Crystal—

"Subaru": "Possibility as compensation, the hell's that s'pposed ta mean."

Faced with the same question as Petra, the Imaginary Subaru greatly wrenched his neck. Making proper use of his nature as a substanceless phantom, he rotated horizontally in the air, ardently appealing his lack of understanding for Clind's elucidation.

But then again, that cute appeal of his was only visible to Petra.

"Subaru": "First of all, did this guy just say "Witch Factor of Tristitia"? He did, right? Witch Factor was one of those useless-sounding keywords Echidna mentioned!"

Petra: "…I don't really think too fondly of that Witch of Greed, so I don't know how much I can trust her."

"Subaru": "Well, I guess, she's one of those types who easily cause misunderstandings. I don't trust her at heart, but if you consider it to be a show of her lack of personability, I do think it puts things in a different light. She's unquestionably ill-natured. Ill-natured, but."

Petra: "Yeah. With my handkerchief… Never mind."

Attention turning to something outside the topic of compensation, the voice of the Imaginary Subaru trembled, and Petra averted her eyes from him.

The disconsolate spectacle she had witnessed via the Book of the Dead, the method Subaru had adopted in order to bring it to an end, one prepared by that Witch, was not something Petra ever wanted to vocalize. Something she wished to not look upon directly it was, yet it also was something she was unable to turn a blind eye to; troublesome just the right amount.

Anyhow—

Meili: “Witch Factor would mea~n, that Butler-san was also a Sin Archbisho~p?”

Meili, who was in a sense a natural airhead, cut right into the details difficult to ask.

‘Twas a term that Petra would have had no recollection of prior to reading the Book of the Dead, but it seemed Meili had gotten an opportunity to learn about Witch Factors. The relationship between not only the Witch Factors and the Witches—but also the Sin Archbishops, was something Petra also considered she must necessarily enquire about.

In all honesty—

“Subaru”: “If this Clind-san’s a Sin Archbishop like Petelgeuse was, then I don’t know how much I can trust the harmonious conversation till now…”

Petra: “Can you really say that, Subaru, after having forgiven Spica-chan, who used to be the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony?”

“Subaru”: “The hell are you saying?! There’s no way I’d forgive Gluttony after all that they made Rem go through?!”

Petra: “…It may be better to take a moment and show you my recent memories.”

Like his relationship with Beatrice, chronologically, the Subaru Petra saw in the Book of the Dead had many discrepancies in knowledge and relationships with the present Subaru. Thinking back to it, she remembered Subaru speaking ill of Echidna every once in a while, hence much had to have happened between Subaru and Echidna in an extent unbeknownst to Petra, she conjectured.

She was, unmistakably, a bad woman, therefore Petra's instincts were right. —And, in addition to conducting this mental conference, Petra kept a close eye on Clind alongside Meili.

She had faith that Clind was no villain, and there was also the precedent of the former Sin Archbishop Spica, but her being able to trust the other party without reservations the way Emilia could was a wholly different matter. Although, that simplicity of Emilia's was adorable and charming, so she wished to quickly grow up the same way.

Clind: "Albeit Meili's misgivings are a matter of course, I am not a Sin Archbishop. Refutation. To begin with, the Witch Factor of Tristitia is an article of an exceptional kind. Unenumerated. Even were I one compatible with this Factor, I would not be enlisted among the ranks of Witches or Sin Archbishops. Outcast."

Petra: "…"

Clind: "The erstwhile owner… the one compatible with the Witch Factor of Tristitia, named himself as the Warlock of Tristitia. Self-named… no, named by another. That individual had no fixations towards any manner of address, but his wife simply deemed it would be suitable to call him as such and named him. Pet name."

Petra: "Warlock…"

Subaru: "Not a Witch but a Warlock! I totally get it. Would've been worried had he said "man-witch" or something like that."

As if it had conformed to his sensibilities, the Imaginary Subaru displayed his admiration with a snap of his fingers. On the other hand, Petra looked at Clind as she whispered the word.

If this explanation were to also apply to Clind himself,

Petra: "Then, does that mean you're also a Warlock of Tristitia, Clind-niisama?"

Clind: “No. Refutation. I am not compatible with the Witch Factor of Tristitia. Consequently, I necessitate compensation in order to draw out the Authority of Tristitia. Inadequate. By nature, those compatible with a Witch Factor do not require compensation in order to exercise the Authority. It is the right to rewrite the world, as recognized by Od Lagna. Official.”

Meili: “A right to rewrite the world, hu~h. I often hear about i~t, but I wish this Od Lagna person was a bit more selective about who that is given to~.”

“Subaru”: “Agreed with Meili.”

Meili tapered her lips in displeasure as the Imaginary Subaru’s intangible hand patted her head, whilst Petra put a finger on her lips and processed the information.

She wished to believe Clind’s repudiation of being a Sin Archbishop, of being a Warlock. Following that, regarding the special power seemingly brought forth by the Witch Factor—she digested the rule that for a person incompatible, compensation was required to utilize that which a compatible party could employ to their heart’s content.

If that was the payment to use Clind’s Teleport, no, Compression, then,

Petra: “Let’s say, if the Witch Factor in Clind-niisama’s possession was used by someone else… by me, then can your Teleport be used as much as I want without paying the compensation?”

“Subaru”: “Petra! That’s totally one of those things that won’t end well so stop it!”

Petra: “Why? Subaru, you know it too, right…? That your Return by Death is without a doubt the same as those Witch Factors Clind-niisama is talking about.”

“Subaru”: “That’s…”

The moment it hit him, the Imaginary Subaru sank to silence with a bitter expression.

At the tea party with Echidna, Subaru had learned the truth of having taken in a Witch Factor—back then, the topic had been about that which had belonged to the Sin Archbishop of Sloth whom he had defeated just prior, but upon considering everything including the reason for the Witch of Envy's fixation to Subaru, then there was probably more to it.

Return by Death, was neither Magic nor Curse Arts nor honed technique, it was a clearly disparate power—in other words, there was a high chance that it was an Authority. If so, Natsuki Subaru was a Warlock all the same.

Petra: "In that case, I don't mind becoming a Witch. I'm not afraid if I'm with Subaru, after all."

"Subaru": "…You may be jumping to the wrong conclusion. Regardless of whether my Return by Death is an Authority or whatever, you know, there's an unavoidable pattern in "another world" stories of receiving a gift from a god who won't even show their face yet."

Petra: "Subaru, you keep a lot of secrets, but you're a bad liar."

That was perhaps why he must have kept things hidden, always avoiding conversation to stop himself from revealing any of his secrets.

Cherishing the kindness of her beloved with affection, Petra closed her eyes, then once again looked back at Clind. Clind slightly widened his eyes, his expression suggesting awe at her gaze and strength of will—

Clind: "Regrettably, that method cannot be adopted. Rejection."

Petra: "—Hk, why?"

Clind: "To begin with, it is inconceivable that you, Petra, would be compatible with the Witch Factor of Tristitia. This Factor and one other, the Factor of Vanagloria, are both unenumerated… no, supernumerary is the right word. They are exceptional Factors, with each having been fine-tuned to their respectively singular and uniquely compatible persons—the Valiant and the Saintess. Tailored. They shan't ever be compatible with any other, and besides."

Petra: "…Besides?"

Clind: "Even they who were compatible, were unable to escape the corruption of their minds. Disgrace."

Casting his eyes down, Clind pursed his lips. From his response, Petra was able to intuit that the aforementioned compatible individuals—the Valiant and the Saintess, were two people with whom he had been acquainted. Furthermore, the person singularly compatible with the Witch Factor of Tristitia, the very Warlock of Tristitia whose mind had fallen into corruption, was that Valiant.

Moreover, the fact that Clind possessed the Witch Factor of that Warlock, signified that said Valiant no longer existed in this world —

Meili: "Yea~h, yea~h, I know you're talking about something really impo~rtant, but since Petra-chan's dangerous determination won't wo~rk, let's get back to the main topic, o~kay?"

Petra: "Mph, dangerous, you say…"

Meili: "It was totally dangero~us. Even if Petra-chan takes a liking to something like a Witch Factor, I'm definitely against it. You can't rely on that kind of powe~r."

Petra: "Meili-chan…"

She could tell they were words of genuine concern for Petra, devoid of malice.

Meili knew about Witch Factors without having attended the Witch's tea party. Judging from her phrasing, she might have encountered a being in possession of a Witch Factor—a Sin Archbishop. Her advice was, yet, ironic.

"Subaru": "…"

Lowering his brows, the Imaginary Subaru gazed at Meili with an expression that was too gentle to be one borne of mixed feelings.

The incident surrounding the Sanctuary and the Roswaal mansion, and having been captured in the midst of it all, Meili had also been involved in the matter—in the deaths of Petra and Frederica, that she herself had witnessed in the Book of the Dead.

That Petra and Meili's relationship did not end as merely that of victim and aggressor of Death, was thanks to none other than Subaru's Return by Death.

Because of that, Petra could not help but think that a power depended upon how it was used—

Petra: "…Yeah, I understand."

Meili: "That's ri~ght. You're a good gi~rl."

Meili was visibly relieved by Petra's reply. Holding the former's hand, Petra nodded.

Either way, if the Witch Factor of Tristitia was not compatible with Petra, then the strategy of becoming the Factor's holder in Clind's stead and ignoring the compensation would not work.

Petra being the Witch to Subaru's Warlock was solely a charming scenario, but an alternative that ought to have been abandoned if it had no merit.

Clind: "Per Meili's words, let us return to the main topic. Restatement. Anyhow, as I explained, payment of the compensation will be required. And, that compensation is the potential to exert influence upon the world. Possibility."

Petra: "—. Could you please explain it in more detail?"

Clind: "For example, let us say there is a magic spell that can start a fire with a single incantation. Its convenience goes without saying, and contingent upon this spell a great number of futures may open up. Prospects. Cooking, medicine, metalwork, smithing, warfare… there is no time to list them all. Extensive. This is potential influence, ergo, possibility. Thus—”

Petra: “…If that spell were to be offered as compensation, everything that would have happened due to that spell would disappear?”

Clind: “In its place, there will remain a vacancy where the possibility would have originally been used in the world. In the place of that vacancy, that margin, the incompatible Authority of Tristitia can be exercised. Conclusion.”

With that finale, Petra understood that Clind had finished the necessary explanation.

What he was saying, she understood. —In short, it was a matter of resources. There was a limit to the resources for operating the world which Od Lagna was managing.

The condition for using Clind’s Authority was to sacrifice something to create a leftover of resources that were originally being exhausted to their limit, and then surreptitiously make use of that surplus.

Having come to that realization, the clever and lovely Petra noticed one more thing.

Petra: “…Clind-niisama, we used your Authority a lot to get to the Empire. What about the compensation for that?”

Clind: “—. From the Master. Confidential.”

Petra: “…Seriously, ew.”

With vexation and abhorrence, the pits of Petra’s stomach churned.

Everyone from the Camp had mustered the entirety of their strengths to save Subaru and the others from that situation. Beatrice had remained asleep, believing that she would be reunited with Subaru, and Otto had even compromised his principles to seek help from his hometown. Emilia had desperately indicated her decision, and Petra had also intended to do everything possible.

And yet, the fact that the one to pay the most compensation for it, withholding from even divulging this truth, had been Roswaal, was an unbearable humiliation for Petra.

"Subaru": "What could it be, something like the desire for atonement? Like, an apology for the Sanctuary or the mansion?"

Petra: "I don't think it would be an easily understandable sentiment like that. That's why I hate the Master…!"

"Subaru": "Yeah, you're right to be angry, Petra…"

The Imaginary Subaru had still not read Petra's memories of the Empire, so he was unable to empathize with her emotions, which was frustrating. However, Petra did not want him to understand even this ugly, grimy enviousness of hers, so she cast that grime into the well of her heart, closed the lid, and nailed it shut, never to peek inside.

Her dissatisfaction with Roswaal was nothing new. Furthermore, it made sense that Roswaal was the most suitable person to fulfill the conditions for using Clind's Authority.

Petra: "The Master has many things that seem like they could be given as compensation, like his magic or Magicreation Tools."

Of course, it was not a matter of lightly relinquishing those things however much just because of their abundance.

It remained unclear whether Od Lagna would consider the degree of emotional attachment in its evaluation, but what had been mentioned was a "possibility" that would have exerted influence upon the world had it not been relinquished. Whatever that might have been Petra did not believe that something lacking emotional attachment could move the world.

—"Possibility", necessitated passion and emotional attachment.

To offer something bereft of that to try and obtain inexpensive salvation was tawdry, and there was no way such wretched reasoning would ever succeed in regaining something truly important.

That was why Petra—

Meili: "—I'm willing to offer somethi~ng."

"Subaru": "Oi, oi."

Having reached the same idea as Petra, Meili quietly murmured. While the Imaginary Subaru blinked in astonishment, Meili continued with an "After a~ll",

Meili: "Going back to it, the fact that I'm alive is all thanks to onii-san and the others letting me off the hoo~k. I'm not trying to repay that favor or anythi~ng, but it's pretty straightforward logic I suppo~se."

"Subaru": "Petra, stop this girl… Stop Meili! I don't know what went on between the me of the present and her, but I would've never saved her with that intention!"

Petra: "Mhm, you're right."

What the Imaginary Subaru was saying, his expression shifting, she could readily accept.

Subaru saving Meili had not been something so calculated as to make her exert herself or compel her to repay the favor at some point, it had been simply because he had wanted to save her.

Subaru would surely never let Meili close the door on her possibilities.

Petra: "You can't, Meili-chan. The most valuable among everything that you can offer is your Divine Protection that controls Witchbeasts, and without that, you're worthless."

Meili: "He~y! Petra-chan, you're being so mea~n!"

Petra: "Sorry. Worthless is a bit too far. Meili-chan, you'd be reduced to just being cute."

Truth be told, Subaru, Emilia and everyone else would likely say that was still fine. However, Meili, of all people, could not accept becoming just a cute girl.

Petra was painfully aware of this. —Cute girls could not remain just as cute girls, as much as everyone around them would think.

???: "—Petra-sama, Meili-sama."

Suddenly, a voice startled them, and Petra and the others turned around toward the dragon carriage. There, jumping down the carriage and rushing towards them, was a girl's—Flam's figure.

During their travel across the Augria Sand Dunes, she had spontaneously lost her consciousness, but had now woken up. The circumstances behind Flam losing her consciousness had been tied to her Divine Protection—

Petra: "Flam-chan, thank goodness you're awake—"

Flam: "The conditions for using the Divine Protection of Mindspeak have been met. I can contact my sister… Grassis. Communication should be possible with Felt-sama and Rachins-sama as well."

Petra: "…"

Rather than ascertaining safety and well-being, prioritizing quickly relaying her own situation was Flam.

That she must have wanted to establish contact with her people in regards to Reinhard and the Witch of Envy clashing immediately after waking up, yet withstood the urge to was something only to be grateful for.

Unquestionably, after receiving communication from Flam and learning of the frenzy that Al had enkindled, the Felt Camp would also be in the position to move the situation towards its resolution.

"Subaru“: "With Reinhard unable to move, there's no telling how much we could rely on Felt or Rom-jii…"

Petra: "—. No. We shouldn't be stubborn about doing this on our own."

“Subaru“: “Petra…”

Petra: “After all, this is no longer just our problem, it’s a problem for everyone in the Kingdom.”

Al was on a rampage, having captured the persons of Natsuki Subaru and Beatrice—the situation was no longer a miniscule problem of that kind, but rather had escalated to a national, even a global crisis intertwining the Sword Saint, the Divine Dragon, and the Witch of Envy.

That was why it was important for Petra and the others, who knew the situation best, to spare no expense in conveying information.

Petra: “Flam-chan, find out where Felt-sama and the others are right away. As long as we know where they are, we can join them with Clind-niisama here.”

Flam: “—Hk, understood.”

With Petra arranging the procedure and giving her this instruction, Flam glanced at Clind for a moment, but resisted the urge to ask for more details and immediately agreed.

Instead, Meili tugged at Petra’s sleeves and asked, “Petra-chan?”.

Meili: “We still haven’t finished discussing the compensation to give to Butler-sa~n.”

Petra: “—No, I’ve already made up my mind about that.”

Meili: “Eh~h?”

Meili’s eyes widening at Petra’s answer, the latter gently unfastened Meili’s grip on her sleeve and quickly approached Clind, then glanced at the Imaginary Subaru from the corner of her eye.

Despite knowing that he, who was staring at her actions with incredulity, was simply a convenient illusion for her to see,

Petra: “Cover your ears for a moment.”

In response to Petra's request, the Imaginary Subaru paused momentarily and meekly obeyed. Once he did plug his ears, Petra stood on her tiptoes and pronounced a "Clind-niisama". Subsequently, she brought her mouth close to Clind's ear and softly whispered.

That was—

Clind: "…"

Petra: "—So, would that work as compensation?"

As Petra lowered her heels and asked the question in a hushed voice, Clind froze and widened his eyes. Petra tilted her head slightly, making a gesture that pushed on the uppermost bounds of her cuteness, to which Clind let out an exhale.

With a long, deep sigh, he removed his monocle and, with face bared, regarded Petra once more.

Clind: "It ought to be possible. Estimation. However, Petra, that is —"

Petra: "Thank goodness."

Clind: "…"

Petra: "I always knew it, though. —That I had the "possibility" to move the world."

Puffing out her chest in pride, Petra disallowed Clind from speaking any further.

She had received the answer to a question she could have only posed to Clind. Regardless of what it was, Petra held pride in that answer—Clind was Clind. His assessment might not have necessarily coincided with Od Lagna's, but at the very least, Clind had recognized the value of that "possibility".

Petra: "I'll offer the compensation, Clind-niisama. Together, we can save the world… No, something like the world doesn't really matter to me. It's just, I want to save the people who are precious to me."

Clind: “—Understood, Petra. Amongst all the girls I have met, you are the bravest. Admiration.”

Clind gave a deep bow, one akin to those he gave to Annerose or Roswaal, or perhaps to people whom he thought to be splendid from the bottom of his heart.

In response, Petra returned a smile and noticed Meili staring at her. Seeing somewhat of an uneasiness in her round eyes, Petra gently embraced her.

Meili: “I don’t really kno~w, but, I’m pretty sure Petra-chan is a huge idio~t.”

Petra: “Hehe, that’s so mean. I’m smart, cute, and cool.”

Petra retorted to Meili’s rude remark and hugged her. Then she looked over her shoulder at the Imaginary Subaru standing there, looking utterly lost.

Finally, the Imaginary Subaru lowered his hands from his ears, his face being so endlessly dear for her to gaze upon; Petra broke past her personal record for maximum cuteness, and declared.

Petra: “Subaru, I love you.”

Chapter 34:
Attraction

1

Clind’s Teleportation—which he described as Compression, was something Petra had last experienced about a month ago, and Meili a few days prior.

Petra: “It might be surprising the first time, but there’s no need to be afraid.”

With that, Petra, drawing on her experience, offered the inexperienced Flam some advice.

She worried that without proper warning of what was to come, Flam might panic, but she simply shook her head with a “No,”

Flam: “There is no need to worry, as most surprises cannot surpass those of the young master.”

???: “That guy, even his own Camp treats him like a complete shocker of a human? How crazy is that?!”

Even “Subaru” was astonished by that overly straightforward comment.

However, Petra also knew from Subaru’s memories shared via the Book of the Dead that Reinhard had blown up a building with a single swing of his sword and sent Meili’s sister flying, so she understood Flam’s unusually calm attitude towards the abnormal.

???: “Even if Flam-chan is o~kay, I hope the sleeping Sensei-san doesn’t wake u~p. Little Crimson Scorpion-chan was really panicked the first time Butler-san transported u~s.”

Petra: “That reminds me, is there such a thing as teleportation sickness? When we were in Vollachia, some people were fine with Spica-chan’s Teleportation, but others weren’t.”

Her hair rustling, Meili shrugged, and the little Crimson Scorpion peeked out from inside, raising its pincers as if to imitate its master.

The previous comment reminded Petra of the Teleportation ability of Spica, who had been left behind in the Empire—whether due to physical constitution, individual strength, or weakness, those who were unable to handle it simply could not. While Petra was on the side of those who could handle it, Garfiel was on the side of those who could not, and would curl up and sulk afterward.

Then, in response to Petra's question, Clind raised a finger with a "That is interesting. Consideration,"

Clind: "Although the number of times it has been used and the number of people who have tried it are not that many, no one has fallen ill. Reassurance. Strictly speaking, the Authority of Tristitia is not Teleportation, but rather the result of the Compression of the time and distance that would normally be traveled. Abridgment."

Meili: "I have no idea what that means, no matter how many times I hear i~t."

"Subaru": "So, does that mean it's okay to think of it like King Crimson? No, it's unclear whether it erases even the effects in between, so maybe it's different from King Crimson…"

Petra: "There's no need to worry about getting sick, and it gives us the power to create the precious time we need. Knowing that is good enough for now."

Petra came to that conclusion, Meili gave a look of bewilderment, and "Subaru" mused over it in his own way.

She could have understood what "Subaru" meant, but she felt it would have been a waste of time and thought to dwell on the contents of his speech. If she had the time, she would like to confirm all the memories and knowledge that had been poured into her mind and become someone who knew everything about Subaru, but—.

Petra: "Clind-niisama, can I ask you something?"

Far from fulfilling that desire, the time spent on it would have been a waste, and so Petra prompted Clind.

The lens of his monocle glistened, and Clind nodded, “Yes. Timely.” Considering the phenomenon he was preparing to bring about, his attitude was reassuringly calm.

Then, while Petra was admiring that, Meili tugged on her sleeve with a “Hey,”

Meili: “Petra-chan, about the compensation we were talking about earlie~r…”

Petra: “—. It’s okay, Clind-niisama said it was good.”

Meili: “That’s not what I mea~nt… I don’t know the reason myself, but if you have to lose something, Petra-chan, then I don’t like i~t.”

Petra: “Lose something…”

Meili seemed overwhelmed by her emotions, and Petra blinked in surprise at her words.

Her friend’s frank concern along with Clind’s assessment of the compensation she had offered—the emotions that flooded Petra’s heart at that moment were intensely complex and profound.

With that, Petra smiled at Meili and,

Petra: “Thank you, Meili-chan. But really, I’ll be fine.”

Meili: “…If that’s a lie, then you’re terri~ble.”

Petra smiled and nodded at the poorly thought-out threat that had been mustered up after some deliberation.

She gently let go of her sleeve and held her hand close to her chest, then looked for “Subaru”. Petra knew his illusory form would not leave her behind, but it was a matter of principle.

When she spotted his translucent form, “Subaru” was gazing out in the distance at the Sand Sea.

"Subaru": "If I had been a bit more careful, I wouldn't have caused you so much trouble."

In the eastern sky—where the very air cried out in agony, the sky turned a sickening hue, and the sound of the earth being gouged away roared, there the battle between the Sword Saint and the Witch of Envy raged on.

It was a clash between two immensely powerful entities that would determine the fate of the world. Seeing "Subaru's" frustrated expression, watching as he lamented his own inadequacy, Petra was overcome with sadness.

Worried about his friend, Subaru did not mention the recent exchange between Petra and Clind, showing respect for Petra's wishes.

In essence, Petra could not hide anything from him, as he existed within her mind; if he wanted to, he could easily reveal all the information she had kept from him.

However, the Imaginary Subaru did not do so. —Whether this was due to "Subaru's" decency and thoughtfulness, or his intention to do as she said, or perhaps because Petra's self-consciousness, affection, and memories were all muddled together, she could not tell.

However, regardless of which it was, this was what Petra thought.

Whether it was out of consideration or because it was what Petra desired, the way "Subaru" behaved was based on how Petra Leyte saw the real Natsuki Subaru.

With that in mind—

Petra: "Clind-niisama, if you would be so kind."

Clind: "—Understood. Commendation."

Still embracing her love for "Subaru", Petra gave the signal to Clind.

Petra, Meili, and Flam. With Patrasche pulling the dragon carriage, plus the unconscious Garfiel and Ezzo, there were six people and one dragon in total. —Adding to that "Subaru" and the little Crimson Scorpion, the group, with the help of Clind, began their journey.

To that end, Petra offered the "compensation" to Od Lagna—

Petra: "…"

In an instant, in the literal blink of an eye, the world shifted, and the Compression was finished.

When she closed her eyes and opened them again, the scenery had completely changed. The taste of the air on her tongue and skin and the scent of the world that touched her sense of smell had changed dramatically, and Petra realized the Authority had been used.

Petra: "…"

For a moment, Petra closed her eyes and thought about the reality of running away.

However, she set aside her sentimentality with a momentary prayer, then focused her attention on the task at hand. From this point on, Petra and her companions could not afford even a single misstep.

Indeed, Petra gathered her resolve and—

???: "Woah?! Wh-what's going on?! A dragon carriage just appeared out of nowhere?!"

???: "Is, is it Reinhard?! Only he could do something so ridiculous!"

???: "Am I dreaming? Toto! Totooo! Lend me your soft lap!"

???: "Oh, be quiet! What's all the commotion… Wh-where did you come from?!"

Petra's enthusiasm was dampened by the noisy and unruly welcome they received at the destination of the Compression.

"Subaru": "What?! Rom-jii is one thing, but Tonchinkan too?!

Tonchinkan! Why are they with him?! How and why?!”

And, the final note to add was that Subaru was the first to respond to the warm welcome, loudly expressing his surprise at such an unexpected turn of events.

2

???: “Petra-chan! Meili! Are you both okay?!”

Petra: “—Hk.”

“Subaru”: “Emilia-tan…!”

As soon as Petra saw that change in expression and Emilia rushing towards them, Petra experienced sweet feelings erupting from within her heart.

Warm, fuzzy, and sentimental feelings filled her chest to the point it tingled, and her head was overflowing with flowery words praising her beauty and cuteness. Those powerful emotions were not just limited to her appearance, but extended to her mannerisms, her way of speaking, and even the sound of her footsteps.

Petra: “Too blatant… hk.”

Petra’s head reeled from the wave of easy-to-understand, intense emotions that washed over her.

Up until now, the biggest influence of the Book of the Dead was undoubtedly the existence of the Imaginary Subaru, but the shock caused by seeing Emilia was just as great.

Frankly speaking, an overdose of Emiliase might have been life-threatening—

Petra: “Why am I saying such stupid things? I…!”

Suddenly feeling as if half her consciousness were being taken away, Petra frantically grabbed at her collar, nearly losing sight of what was real, and managed to stay grounded in reality.

As expected, the love for Emilia was overflowing in an excessively bold manner.

That in itself made her feel a little jealous, but more than that, although Petra was happy to see Emilia again, it bothered her that her own precious feelings toward Emilia were being pushed aside, and she found that difficult to accept.

That was why, when Emilia found them and ran up to them with tears in her eyes, her face so beautiful it took Petra's breath away, Petra resisted the urge to think she was EMT and spread her arms wide.

And then—

Petra: "Emilia-neetama…!"

Emilia: "Nee-tama?!"

With a grand slip of the tongue, she startled Emilia just as they were about to have their emotional reunion.

She narrowly avoided calling her "Emilia-tan" and tried to correct herself, but missed the mark. It was a blunder very uncharacteristic of Petra.

Regardless—

Emilia: "But, thank goodness… Both of you actually came."

Petra: "Yes. I am relieved that you are safe, Emilia-neesama."

Overcome with emotion, Emilia embraced Petra, who replied and returned her embrace.

In contrast to Petra, Meili, who was also being hugged, reacted awkwardly, gasping, "I can't brea~the…" and timidly wrapped her arms around Emilia's back.

"Subaru": "Woah! It's such a relief to see Emilia-tan safe and sound! Huh? Has she gotten even cuter since I last saw her? She's got so much potential!"

While he observed Emilia embracing Petra and Meili from various angles, the floating “Subaru” was overwhelmed with emotion. He was getting a bit too excited. But that was understandable.

After all, given the chronology of the Book of the Dead, the last time “Subaru” had seen Emilia was when she was at her lowest point in the Sanctuary.

Back then, Petra had not been as close to Emilia as she was now, so she would not have been able to help her. If even Petra felt regretful about that, then the frustration that “Subaru” experienced up close back then must have been incomparable.

“Subaru”: “Oh! My goodness, Petra! Look! Emilia-tan is walking so energetically!”

Petra: “Yeah, she’s walking with long strides. That’s great.”

“Subaru”: “I’m relieved…! I’m so relieved…!”

Because of that, Petra hesitated to pour cold water on Subaru’s excitement. While responding appropriately to Subaru’s enthusiasm, Petra quietly savored a sense of relief.

Her relief was due to one thing—upon seeing Emilia, she was no longer afraid.

Petra: “The last thing I saw in the Book of the Dead…”

Trapped in the endless, obsessive shadows that surrounded them in the Sanctuary, Natsuki Subaru was caught in a web of inescapable torment, and in order to escape the Witch, he had resorted to the method of suicide prepared as a form of harassment.

In that final moment, Subaru = Petra saw it. —The terrifying Witch of Envy had the same face as the person he greatly cherished.

Petra: “…”

When she tried to think more thoroughly about the reason, it felt like she was trying to grasp something shrouded in mist, and nothing coherent came to mind. Still, the vivid emotions remained seared into her mind.

That was why she was apprehensive about seeing Emilia again. —No, that was not quite right. To be precise, she was apprehensive that she might not be able to see Emilia in the same way as before.

Petra: "But I'm glad it didn't end up that way… Although I'm excited in a different way than before."

Emilia: "Huh? Petra-chan, are you okay?"

Petra: "I'm fine. I'm just happy to see you, Emilia-neesama."

Petra hid her inner conflict and was genuinely happy to be reunited with Emilia, who smiled with wide eyes. In place of Meili, who continued to be stubborn, the little Crimson Scorpion on her head snapped its pincers, expressing happiness on its master's behalf.

And then, there was—

???: "—Just when I thought it was gettin' lively, you're here, lass."

There, a low, husky voice interrupted, and Emilia let out a gasp of surprise.

Emilia had left the door open when she rushed in, and a prominent figure standing there knocked on the door and peered inside.

That figure was—

Emilia: "Felt-chan's grandfather!"

Emilia's eyes widened at the sight of the old man, Rom-jii, who squeezed himself through the doorway. Hearing Emilia's voice, Rom-jii gave an amused smile and stroked his bald head,

Rom: "The way ya say that makes it sound like ya really think we're related… Everyone here calls me Rom-jii. But, this is the first chance we've had ta talk properly."

Emilia: "Um, well, I couldn't talk to you in the castle on the day the Royal Selection began, and when Felt-chan stole my insignia, there was no time to calm down and talk…”

Meili: “…You don’t have to worry so much. I understand the circumstances, so it’s oka~y.”

Emilia greeted Rom-jii, and as she responded to his greeting, she seemed to be worried about Meili in her arms. Meili responded with an attitude that was half annoyed and half appreciative of the concern.

The current exchange between the two of them was regarding Emilia’s connections with Rom-jii. —She was concerned about the fact that Meili’s older sister, Elsa, was involved in the previous incident where Felt had stolen an insignia that qualified Emilia to participate in the Royal Selection from her.

When thinking about it, these three people had quite a strange connection. If “Subaru” were to be included, it would be four people with a strange connection. If Reinhard were to also be included, there would be no end to it.

Rom: “…Callin’ ya “lass” seems inappropriate, given yer current position. May I call ya Emilia?”

Emilia: “Yes, that’s fine. Nice to see you again, Rom-jii.”

“Subaru”: “Wow… It feels like a historic moment, these two actually introducing themselves properly.”

Petra: “Don’t be so dramatic.”

As Emilia and Rom-jii shook hands and exchanged pleasantries, Petra found it funny that Subaru would use such a grand word like “historic”.

While there was undoubtedly a sense of poignancy, the way he put it made it sound like he had witnessed the reunion of two people who had not seen each other in over ten years.

But, putting “Subaru’s” excitement aside for now—

Emilia: “I’ve heard about Felt-chan, too. It must have been quite a difficult time for you and the others, right, Rom-jii?”

Rom: “Hmm, that’s right. We should talk ’bout that. Petra.”

Petra: “Yes. It will probably take a little while for Clind-niisama to return, so I think we can start without him… It is a race against time after all.”

Petra added the last part, and Emilia and Rom-jii nodded deeply at the same time.

Yes, this was a race against time. That was why Petra and the others resorted to using unfair tactics.

—Currently, Petra and the others were gathered at the Royal Residence in the Royal Capital of Lugunica.

Among the Emilia Camp, whose members were scattered and acting independently, Emilia’s position was clear, and if anyone were to become the central rallying point, it could only be her.

With that in mind, Petra hurried to the Royal Capital after meeting up with Rom-jii and the others using Clind’s Compression, but—

Rom: “It’s shockin’ ta see the state of destruction in the Royal Capital.”

Meili: “It’s been a while since I’ve been to the Royal Capital, but when I last saw it, it wasn’t so ruined, and I don’t think there were any works of art like tha~t.”

Rom-jii spoke with his arms crossed, and Meili, who was looking out the window, joined in.

Unlike the two with prior experience, this was Petra’s first time in the Royal Capital. Fortunately, the memory she had just recalled of the loot house was located in the slums of the Royal Capital, so she was able to compare it with her memories of the Royal Capital from the past, when it was still intact.

Certainly, the Royal Capital in her memory did not have many flashy ice towers, and the Noble District, with its rows of stately houses, was not in such disarray.

Rom: “I never liked that awful place, but I never thought the Noble District’d be completely destroyed like that. I heard that everyone was evacuated, but still, this is outrageous.”

Petra: “Meili-chan also said that Emilia-neesama made those ice towers, right?”

Emilia: “Ah, um, well, there was a reason I did that! Everyone was reaaally in danger, and I couldn’t afford to hold back…!”

Emilia frantically tried to explain the drastic changes to the Royal Capital that could be seen from the Royal Residence, which had barely escaped damage.

Petra found her frantic movements endearing, and worked with Rom-jii to sort out what had happened one thing at a time—

Petra: “—So, as expected, Al-san did it.”

Emilia: “…That’s right. The city was thrown into chaos, all because I couldn’t stop Al.”

Petra: “It’s not your fault, Emilia-neesama. Had you not created those ice towers, the people of the Royal Capital would’ve been in big trouble… that’s why you are E.M.G. (Emilia-tan is seriously a Guardian Angel)!”

Emilia: “Yeah, Petra-chan, thank you… huh? Wait, what did you just say?”

When Emilia blamed herself, Petra shook her head vigorously to deny that she was responsible.

Having heard that Al and Volcanica were involved, if anything, Petra felt responsible herself for the devastation that struck the Royal Capital of Lugunica. She could not help but think that if Al’s schemes had been stopped at their source in the Pleiades Watchtower, none of this would have happened.

Meili: “If you start talking like that, there will be no end to i~t.

Each of us got outsmarted by Helmet-san at every ste~p. It’s Helmet-san and his group who were at fault, don’t you thi~nk?”

Rom: “That’s right. It’s good ta reflect on yer shortcomin’s in order ta make up for ’em, but regrettin’ yer lack of ability ain’t productive. It’s an old man’s rule of thumb.”

Emilia: “—. Yeah, you’re both right. Al did something bad, and he’s the one who has to take responsibility for it. We don’t have time to feel sorry for ourselves!”

Emilia’s cheeks tightened at Meili and Rom-jii’s words, and she regained her composure. Seeing Emilia’s reaction, Petra let out a small sigh and braced herself.

Just as everyone had said, weakness disguised as reflection was a bad habit. There was always a path forward.

“Subaru”: “Al must think the same way… Otherwise, he wouldn’t have crossed the line to break a Sin Archbishop out of prison. What in the world was he thinking?”

“Subaru” picked up on Petra’s feelings and grimaced at Al’s outrageous behavior in the Royal Capital.

In fact, it was an outrageous act of terrorism to use Volcanica to cause massive damage to the Royal Capital, but that paled in comparison to his real objective—breaking Gluttony out of prison.

The Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, who held a deep connection to Petra and the others, had been allowed to escape.

Rom: “Just listin’ all the things that man has done is mind-bogglin’. He attacked those connected ta the Royal Candidates ‘n kidnapped one of their Knights. He turned Volcanica, the Divine Dragon ‘n protector of the Kingdom, against ‘em ‘n used the Witch of Envy ta prevent the Sword Saint from takin’ action. Furthermore, he took one of the Royal Candidates hostage ‘n invaded the Royal Capital, where he destroyed half of the Noble District ‘n freed an imprisoned Sin Archbishop.”

“Subaru”: “Damn, isn’t that something? How many years in prison would that get him?"

Petra: "He'd probably get the death penalty a hundred times over…"

Once again, the number and severity of Al's—no, of Al and his accomplices' crimes were extraordinary.

It seemed as if he was determined to commit every evil deed in the world, but Petra believed that this was done not out of sheer recklessness, but rather something premeditated.

Yes, Al had a proper plan, and he was taking the necessary steps to achieve it, which just happened to be a series of crimes that were each close to being the crime of the century.

Meili: "Maybe it would have been better to reconsider a plan that required the involvement of a Sin Archbishop in the first pla~ce?"

Emilia: "There's also the Witch of Envy, so there's no excuse…"

To begin with, Petra had no reason to make excuses on his behalf.

Based on the impression given by the Book of the Dead, Subaru considered Al to be someone from his hometown—someone he did not necessarily dislike, but he clearly went way beyond what was forgivable.

In that regard, it would have been fair to say that this was the shared opinion of everyone gathered here—no, everyone involved, including those who were not here.

Petra: "Right now, Clind-niisama is going around to gather everyone else and bring Frederica-neesama and the others here. Emilia-neesama, where is Otto-san?"

Emilia: "—Ah! Um, well, about Otto-kun."

Petra: "That reaction tells me everything. He's being reckless again."

Emilia: "Ugh… yeah, that's right. I'm sorry I couldn't stop him."

Slumping herself down, Emilia cast her eyes downward, ashamed of herself. But, Emilia was not the one at fault. If anyone were to be blamed, it would be Otto, and in this case, he was not entirely at fault either.

Among the members of the camp, Otto regularly acted recklessly; Petra, Frederica, and the others always told him he ought to take a break, but this time, that advice was not applicable.

In fact, Otto, who wielded the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language, was far too reliable in this situation.

Petra: “Using insects and birds for reconnaissance and espionage, huh? That Divine Protection sure has a lot of devious uses… but, that means undertaking a lot of labor in return.”

Meili: “Ara~, that’s exactly right. You can tell Hat-oniisan is a worri~er just by looking at him.”

Rom: “I’ve been around for a while, but I ain’t never heard of the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language. The fact that I’ve never heard of such a useful Divine Protection’s gotta be because no one who’s had it has lived long enough for people ta hear ’bout it.”

Meili chuckled, but Petra could not help but agree with Rom-jii’s grim speculation.

It was true that overusing the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language was dangerous to one’s health, and Petra had also witnessed Otto suffering from nosebleeds after using his Divine Protection excessively in the Empire.

That, too, was out of necessity due to the demands of war, where there was no room for half measures.

Emilia: “He was worried about Subaru and the others, but he was especially concerned about Garfiel… he was reaaally determined to do something about it.”

Petra: ““Ottobro asked my amazin’ self to do this, ‘n I messed it up…”. Those two are so much alike.”

Meili: “Petra-chan, that was a surprisingly good impersona~tion!”

Regardless of Emilia and Meili’s surprised reactions, it was easy to imagine Otto and Garfiel wanting to do something reckless in such a situation.

Still in a comatose state, Garfiel had been left in the care of the Royal Capital’s Medical Center, but caution had to be taken to ensure that he would not blame or hurt himself once he regained consciousness.

Petra: “I hope Frufoo-chan will be able to keep Otto-san calm.”

With that, Petra worried about the well-being of the absent Otto.

No matter what sort of insect or animal he attempted to communicate with, Otto himself had to be present to interpret the information gathered. For this reason, Otto was tracking Al’s gang on his own—or rather, with his long-time partner and beloved dragon, Frufoo.

“Subaru”: “Otto… I’m afraid he’ll mess up at a crucial moment, and I don’t know how much I’ll be able to rely on him.”

Petra: “If Otto-san were to hear that, he’d probably have the angriest face ever.”

Subaru had a tendency to take everything on by himself. Not just Otto, but anyone in the camp would be angry if they were told that; but, Petra thought Otto would be the most frightening.

Nevertheless, it was true that Otto should not bear this burden alone. If Clind could have brought Ram along, they could have shared the burden with the help of her Clairvoyance.

And then, just as she thought that, Petra suddenly remembered.

Petra: “Hey, Emilia-neesama, there’s something I wanted to ask you”

Emilia: “Hm? What is it, Petra-chan?”

Petra: “I don’t know if you’ve noticed, Emilia-neesama, but on the way here, Meili-chan and I suddenly started feeling sick…”

The question Petra had asked related to the events which occurred just after Flam had used the Divine Protection of Mindspeak with her sister Grassis in order to locate Rom-jii and the others, and as they were discussing rushing to the Royal Capital. —Suddenly, Petra’s entire body broke out in goosebumps, and she was struck by an unsettling feeling within her heart.

Petra was so shocked, she had wondered if it was a side effect of the Book of the Dead, or if Reinhard had lost and the Witch of Envy was coming for her; but, Meili was experiencing the same sensation, so they concluded that it was neither.

Petra: “But, given the situation, right? Flam-chan and Rom-ojiisan weren’t affected, but Meili-chan, Clind-niisama, and I all felt it. In this case, I thought it might not be entirely unrelated to Al-san… Emilia-neesama?”

It was an unusual situation, and even after discussing it with Meili and Clind, they had arrived at no conclusion.

Upon seeing Emilia’s reaction, Petra stopped sharing this potentially sensitive information. Emilia was staring intently with her beautiful amethyst eyes, her cheeks stiffening.

It was clear from her reaction that she understood what was said.

Emilia: “…That reaaally creepy feeling, it’s probably the work of the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony.”

“Subaru”: “…Did she say… Gluttony?”

Meili: “U~gh, it felt aw~ful.”

Subaru frowned at the mention of a Sin Archbishop, one of their most hated enemies, and Meili stuck out her tongue. Petra also put her hand on her chest, motioning with her eyes, prompting Emilia to continue.

Emilia: “I’m not exactly sure what happened. But Al made

Gluttony… Roy, do something, and then I suddenly felt sick and while my vision was spinning…”

Petra: “Al-san and Gluttony both got away?”

Emilia: “Yes, that’s right.”

Emilia’s shoulders slumped dejectedly, as she weakly nodded.

In response to Emilia’s reply, Petra glanced at Rom-jii, and the wise old man in charge of the Felt Camp stroked his head with his large hand and said,

Rom: “When this was just ‘bout Petra ‘n Meili, I was thinkin’ it was just some kinda misunderstandin’, but with Emilia feelin’ the same way on top of that, ‘n Gluttony bein’ involved, I don’t have a good feelin’ ’bout this.”

Petra: “What do we have in common…? We’re all Emilia-neesama’s allies, maybe?”

Meili: “It would be easier to figure out if Fang-oniisan was awake, or if Hat-oniisan wasn’t keeping quiet over there, or if Subaru-oniisan hadn’t been captu~red.”

“Subaru”: “Including the current me, we’re three idiots with bad timing…”

As Petra had predicted, Al was involved, but the fact that Gluttony was also involved made the uncertainty surrounding the unknown attack even more dire. —Leaving Spica behind in the Empire had begun to feel like a mistake.

Spica, too, despite her many trials and tribulations, was one of the Sin Archbishops of Gluttony—

Petra: “No, no, I shouldn’t think like that. I’m not the Master.”

What could be done and what could not be done, what would be useful and what would not.

If she were to start to determine a person’s value from that perspective, she would quickly become like Roswaal. Insight could be honed as much as one liked, but it was essential to be cautious to avoid losing one's humanity.

Rom: "For now, let's just be aware of Gluttony's actions. So, accordin' ta yer Internal Affairs Minister, their destination is…"

Emilia: "—Kararagi, the Grand Mogolade Geyser."

Rom-jii attempted to change the direction of the conversation to move away from the inconclusive discussion, and Emilia picked up on his words.

That was the final destination of Al and his accomplices, and the circumstances that led to this discovery were—

Rom: "They took Felt, 'n she left behind a message for ya guys. I trust Felt completely, but I'm unsure 'bout ya."

Emilia: "You mean Otto-kun? I believe in him not just a hundred times, but a million times over."

Petra: "Emilia-neesama, you're talking about quantity, but it's supposed to be a percentage. Still, it sounds cool."

Emilia's answer, which was not bound by the concept of percentages, warmed Petra's heart, while Rom-jii and Meili looked on with wry smiles.

But Emilia answered Rom-jii's questions thoroughly, which was typical of her.

"Subaru": "…You're not just cute, you've gotten incredibly strong, Emilia-tan."

Subaru stared at Emilia with a look of wonder.

The fact that this "Subaru“ was from the middle of solving the issues in the Sanctuary made it difficult for him to understand how Emilia had managed to grow and become so amazing.

She wanted to tell him. —That the Emilia of today had been forged in a three-legged race together with Subaru.

Petra: “No, there’s Beatrice-chan too, so it’s a four-legged race… if that’s the logic, then I want to join too, and Garf-san will get sulky if you don’t include him. Meili-chan, what about you?”

Meili: “What are you talking abou~t? It’s kind of scary when you suddenly start talking like Subaru-oniisa~n.”

“Subaru”: “That’s definitely something I would say, but Meili seems to understand it a bit too well, don’t you think?”

With a touch of lingering deep emotion, “Subaru” gave a wry smile at Petra and Meili’s conversation.

Regardless, Rom-jii seemed to be satisfied with Emilia’s answer, and it was shared that Al and his companions’ final destination was indeed the Grand Mogolade Geyser.

To be honest, she did not know what was in that place, but—

Emilia: “Since we know where they are going, we should be able to get there first with Clind-san’s help.”

Petra: “—. Right. Rom-ojiisan, Tonchinkan-san and the others are…”

Rom: “At present, everyone except the seriously injured shoulda entered the nearby town as instructed. That Clind boy… we can’t overuse his power, ain’t that right? We’ll plan accordingly.”

Rom-jii shrugged his broad shoulders, showing his understanding of Clind’s Authority without asking for further explanation.

Thanks to the “compensation” offered by Petra, the restrictions binding Clind’s Authority, Compression, were lifted. However, depending on the number of times it was to be used and the number of people involved, even that would become unable to completely cover the cost. First, they would need to prepare the field with the fewest number of people, then they would deploy as many people as possible once they had finished assessing the situation.

Thanks to the reckless actions of Otto, a ray of hope appeared in the midst of the preparations.

Furthermore, the more information they gathered about what sort of lineup Al and his party planned to arrive with before reaching their final destination, the better.

That was when—

???: “—The means to accomplish those goals are already in our hands. Opportunity.”

Hearing that voice, Petra and the others turned around in unison, seeing the person whom they had been waiting for. Clind bowed, taking in their full attention. It was exactly the person they had wanted to talk to.

Emilia’s expression brightened up as she exclaimed, “Clind-san!”, as if he had been waiting for the perfect moment,

Emilia: “Thank you for bringing Petra-chan and the others. Thanks to you, we were able to reunite properly.”

Clind: “I require no thanks. I returned to Mirula on my own accord, and it was Petra’s support that enabled me to meet your expectations. Encouragement. More importantly, my apologies for returning late. Remorse.”

Petra: “I don’t think you are particularly late, but did something happen? Clind-niisama?”

Clind slowly shook his head in apology, and Petra tilted her head in confusion.

Certainly, considering the nature of Compression, it could be said that Clind took some time to arrive at the Royal Residence. However, there must have been a need to explain the situation to the other parties at the pick-up location, so it did not seem like something that would warrant an apology for being late.

Perhaps it was a manifestation of his perfectionism, a trait of someone who was good at his job. Clind looked at Petra while she was thinking this, and said, “No. Negative,”

Clind: “As for the reason for the delay, rather than explaining it in words, it would be best for you all to experience it firsthand, as this would be the quickest and most reliable way to understand. Personal experience.”

“Subaru”: “Firsthand?”

Petra: “Experience?”

Petra and “Subaru” tilted their heads at the unnatural choice of words used to explain his tardiness.

Emilia and Meili seemed to have the same question, and Rom-jii, who was in the most objective position, crossed his arms and watched with interest to see what would happen.

Then, as everyone watched, Clind moved to the side of the room’s entrance,

???: “Ha. Kept you waiting, huh?”

With a dignified presence, a maid with pink hair strode boldly into the room, her brashly arrogant behavior perfectly suited to her—it was none other than Ram.

The woman Clind had retrieved and rejoined with was wearing a maid outfit for the first time in a while, and Petra, who was also a maid, felt quite nostalgic for the uniform, since it had been a long time since she had been able to wear one.

However—

Emilia: “Ram, you came, ah…?”

Emilia was about to run up and greet Ram in her maid uniform with a smile, but her words were cut off. She stopped in her tracks, and the hand that had been reaching out to take Ram’s hand was pressed against her own forehead.

Emilia: “Uh, um.”

Emilia let out a confused-sounding voice.

Although she should have been worried about what had suddenly happened, Petra was unable to do so. This was because Petra, like Meili and Emilia, was racked by the same indescribable feeling.

Petra: “This, is—”

The moment Petra saw Ram, she was overcome by a massive, inexplicable, indescribable feeling of turmoil welling up from inside.

Petra felt an unbridled enigmatic feeling similar to the nausea she had described earlier, which had been attributed to Gluttony. However, while she had felt strong malice in that previous instance of discomfort, she did not feel anything of the sort this time.

This was not like that, but rather a different, stronger, more powerful attraction—seeing Ram in a maid uniform brought out something intense from within.

And the answer to that attraction appeared immediately behind Ram.

It was—

???: “—Apologies for being late to join you, Emilia-sama.”

With that, a blue-haired maid dressed in the same maid uniform as Ram stood beside her and performed a graceful curtsy.

Of course, it was a familiar face. However, as far as Petra knew, she was not in a position to perform with such perfect manners and wear a maid’s uniform. —No, that was not right either.

Once again, and again, and again, her perception changed.

No. That was not right. It was absurd to think that she lacked the knowledge and manners of a maid. After all, she was the first person in this world to show Natsuki Subaru and Petra, who still had been a village girl at that time, what it meant to be a proper maid.

That attraction reminded Petra Leyte of this.

Namely, the one who stood there was—

???: “To get back that person… no, Subaru-kun, Rem will use any means necessary.”

Yes, the Roswaal mansion’s original versatile helpful maid, known for her polite but sharp tongue, Rem, looked straight ahead with her pale-blue eyes as she declared so.

Chapter 35:
The Awakening Star

1

—When Rem returned to the Roswaal Manor, she was unable to regain any sensation of “coming back home” whatsoever.

???: “Rem, do you see it? That is the mansion belonging to Roswaal-sama, the place where Ram and the others are employed.”

Rem: “Our… workplace…”

As Ram indicated the picturesque scenery endued by rays of the sun falling bright, a sight visible from the window of the dragon carriage, Rem’s pale-blue pupils blinked and her eyelids quivered at Ram’s words.

They had shared a dragon carriage and headed towards the Industrial City of Costuul, and it had been a while since they boarded the dragon carriage prepared there for their return journey to drop them off—what entered her sight was her Home, absent in recollection.

A towering gate, and beyond it, a splendid mansion. The Roswaal mansion, with greater extravagance than even the Berstetz residence she had sojourned in with Katya in the Vollachian Imperial Capital, was a building with elegance incapable of being forgotten after a single glimpse.

Yet—

Ram: “Well?”

Rem: “…I apologize, Nee-sama.”

Rem, spiritless, shook her head and apologized for failing to respond to her elder sister’s hopes.

Rem had made the journey thus far apart from Subaru or Emilia and the others who had to move separately towards separate goals, and had made her way back to the mansion with Ram. Having anticipated witnessing many things that would stimulate her memories, yet none so far had managed to bestow truth to that anticipation.

And it seemed that the mansion was no exception, the same mansion so valuable to Rem and Ram.

Ram: “I see. But, it can’t be helped. After all, it was quite a while ago that Ram and Rem worked in this mansion, and the mansion deeply memorable to Rem is not in this place.”

Rem: “Huh?!”

Ram: “Incidentally, the previous mansion was lit aflame by a vexed Otto and therefore is no longer extant. Would’ve thought of taking a detour to visit it had it remained not ashen to the ground.”

Rem: “Otto-san did… yet he didn’t seem to be a person of such kind.”

Rem’s eyes gyrated at the appended report, with further bewilderment at the information about Otto that Ram had recited.

The Internal Affairs Minister of the camp, Otto was a mild-mannered person, an inseparable friend and ally to Subaru, and a completely sleepless individual according to Petra and Frederica. The information of him furthermore setting the mansion ablaze in vexation, detracted from his character.

It might have been, as they say, that people do not match their appearances, and it might have been a good thing to accept that now.

Rem: “Including that person, are Emilia-san’s allies all a gathering of such people? Like Garfiel, and Roswaal-san too…”

Ram: “It’s, Roswaal-sama.”

Rem: “…Roswaal-sama too.”

Ram: “Good girl. But, to group Roswaal-sama together with those three, bad girl, Rem. Roswaal-sama is wise and proficient, the person said to be the most excelling magician in this world. Compared to him, those three, they’re the worth of one person when you put all three of them together… no, about the worth of half a person.”

Rem: “Half a person as three people together…”

Imagining Otto, Garfiel, and finally Subaru riding atop each other’s shoulders, Rem then arranged Roswaal, capable of flying via magic, beside the three in her mind. And upon lining them up, albeit Rem was ignorant of what difference would lie between them, it seemed Ram’s say was not mistaken.

Even now with null prospects of her memories returning, for Rem, the faith and endearment she felt coming from the familiarity she could feel from Ram, her twin elder sister, that alone was indubitably genuine.

—For that was the definitive nexus, which connected the Rem of the past with the present.

Rem: “…That manner of thinking, will purchase a scolding from Priscilla-san.”

Bitter sentiments surfacing in her mind, Rem recollected the gaze of a woman, fiery scarlet in hue.

She, who had engraved a marked impact onto Rem’s way of thinking and progressing, would never bless a bearing of fixating and clinging onto the past. In the same way, she would never favor a Rem flattered by Ram, entrusting herself to the nectar of faith.

Rem did not wish to be disliked by Priscilla, nor did she wish to walk an ashamed path of life.

Hence, she reprimanded her heart verging on pessimism, slapped her cheeks, and lifted her visage.

Rem: “But Nee-sama, going by this, then wouldn’t that mean there won’t be many paths to my memories’ return, even upon returning to that mansion?”

Ram: “Huhu, swift grasp. An astute little sister makes Ram proud as well.”

Rem: “No, not at all… I do not think that is anything deserving of such praise from you, Nee-sama…”

Ram: “However, just whose elder sister do you think the Ram standing here is? Do you think Ram, Rem’s Nee-sama, would make such an oversight?”

With her hand on her chest, Ram declared so with a visage brimming in confidence.

Rem earnestly shamed her own misapproximated worries at Ram’s bold utterance. Ram had foreseen it without needing to be told by Rem.

What roused curiosity, then, were Ram’s ideas—

Rem: “If we are returning to the mansion, yet that itself is not the goal, then… is the goal, a person?”

Ram: “Who knows. Whether your answer is correct… you will be able to ascertain soon.”

Ram smiled at Rem’s estimation, as the dragon carriage stopped at roughly the same time.

Feeling the jolting long kept at bay by the Divine Protection of Wind Evasion, Rem was shaken as Ram stood up and gallantly proffered her hand to her.

Ram: “Well then, we’ve arrived. Let’s go.”

Rem: “—Yes, Nee-sama.”

Taking Ram’s hand, Rem restrained her chest, faintly jouncing in anxiety, and dismounted from the dragon carriage.

As Ram spoke to the driver who had carried them thus far, Rem took a step forward from the dragon carriage and captured in her view the mansion and the serene front garden beyond the bars of the iron gate.

Rem: “This place is…”

As Rem narrowed her pale-blue eyes, the mansion reflected within her pupils, indeed, she possessed no recollection of.

Nevertheless, apprehending the attentive management that reached the building and flower beds, the hedges, and every nook and cranny that shaped the mansion, she inadvertently straightened her posture.

Regardless of the presence or absence of her memories, if Rem were to abide in this mansion hereon, then her position would surely be that of a servant like Ram and Frederica.

???: “Rem, you should just live a healthy and carefree life every day.”

For a moment, the impression of Subaru vocalizing this came to mind, but Rem forcibly repelled this over-indulging phantom.

Subaru, for certain, would likely say something along those lines, but he was toiling at something else at this moment.

Incomparable to Rem, right now, in order to console the one who sustained lacerations on his heart from losing Priscilla, he was—

???: “—Oh? Oh, oooh, ooooh!”

Hearing a sudden bellow, Rem drew back with an “Eek!”.

She could tell the voice came from beyond the bars, that was to say, from the grounds of the mansion. —Present there was the form of a young girl, her miniature hands gripping the bars, eyes wide and frozen steady.

Adorable features, adorned with long, pink hair. Height seeming to indicate about eleven or twelve years of age and a black garb enveloping her entire body save for her head, the young girl widened her spherical eyes and fixed her gaze upon Rem.

Rem had recollections, of this girl. —From the vortex of the cataclysm within the Empire.

Rem: “Y-You are… the Witch who brought on the Great Disaster!”

Ram: “Ah, Ryuzu-sama, thank you for the welcoming.”

She shuddered in fear, as the bearer of the Great Disaster extended a finger towards her.

Beside Rem’s horror at the sudden, implausible reunion with the disaster, Ram swiftly stepped forward and spoke to the girl. Rem turned towards Ram with a “Huh?” at her prosaic behavior, and the Witch also scowled at her in a snap,

Ryuzu: “Ram! You’re home. You’re home but… you’re a quick one!”

Ram: “…Are you asking Ram to pick you up the way Garf and Frederica do, Ryuzu-sama?”

Ryuzu: “That ain’t what I’m sayin’! Puttin’ that ‘side, that girl…”

Rem: “Nee-sama, who is this person…”

The Witch who had plotted the ruin of the Empire, her name being Sphinx.

However, Ram referred to the girl before her eyes with a disparate name—Ryuzu. Ryuzu’s line of sight once again on her, Rem perplexedly glanced at Ram.

At the reaction of the two, Ram gently placed her hand atop Rem’s shoulder,

Ram: “Kindly give your name to her.”

Rem: “…”

Despite the absence of even a minimal explanation, Ram’s calm timbre marvelously soothed Rem’s roiled heart. Her disarray naturally coming undone, Rem turned towards Ryuzu.

Stabilizing her breath, and steadily gazing into her opponent's eyes,

Rem: "—I'm Rem. Am I right to assume that you are… Ryuzu-san?"

Ryuzu: "…I, see. Yeah. Hm, yeah. I'm Ryuzu, Rem."

Rem gave her name and enquired hers, to which Ryuzu momentarily had a distant glint in her eye, then softly nodded.

From her response, Ram's attitude, and the fact that she was on the premises of Roswaal's mansion, Rem was at last able to harbor conviction that the girl before her and the Witch of the Empire were separate persons.

Rem: "Even so, the resemblance is exceeding…"

Ram: "Yes. There's a saying that there's at least three people in the world with a face that resembles yours, but in Ryuzu-sama's case, there are about ten times that. Hence, also ten times her crudity."

Ryuzu: "What a detestable thin' ta say at a moment the elderly'd be gettin' all emotional."

Rem alluded to the misleading nature of her appearance, as Ryuzu scolded Ram for her reply.

It was tellable from their exchanges as well, but the two had a fairly relaxed relationship. Judging from Ryuzu's attitude, she must have also been someone who had a deep relationship with the Rem of the past.

Rem: "Forgive me. But, I don't remember anything."

Ryuzu: "No matter no matter, ain't nothin' ta be apologizin' fer. I am—"

Ram: "—Ram's little sister. She has the same hair color as Ram, after all."

Rem: "Th-that's true…! Huh, but if she is Nee-sama's little sister, then that means…”

Ram interrupted Ryuzu and divulged a shocking truth. Her breath taken away by stupefaction, Rem compared Ram and Ryuzu, deeming a convincibility in their hair colors.

However, Ram and Rem were supposed to be twins, so inevitably, Rem and Ryuzu’s relation would come down to being—

Rem: “Also my… little sister…?”

Ryuzu: “Cut th’ cackle, Ram! This’s what ‘m sayin’! ‘S the bad influence of Lil’ Ros ‘n Lil’ Su!”

Ram: “To enumerate them as equals? Even you, Ryuzu-sama, have things you are and aren’t allowed to do.”

Ryuzu: “Ain’t somethin’ ya should be sayin’ with that tone!”

The brows of her cute face upraised, Ryuzu yelled aloud, to which Ram furrowed her eyebrows. Watching the quarrel between the two, Rem finally gauged that Ram had spoken in jest.

Rem: “Now that I think of it, it would certainly be strange for Nee-sama to address Ryuzu-san with ‘-sama’ if she were mine or Nee-sama’s little sister.”

Ryuzu: “In that case, ya could mistake ’em fer a father or mother, dependin’ on the situation, leavin’ the possibility of them bein’ a blood sister ta an important someone. Can’t say that’s some kinda perfect rebuttal.”

Rem: “That is also true… Then, you really are mine and Nee-sama’s…?”

Ryuzu: “Nah. Don’t’cha mistake it fer anythin’ but a bad joke of Ram’s. Seriously, what a headache.”

Ryuzu heaved a heavy sigh, to which Ram had her tongue slightly peeking out.

She had been played like a fiddle it seemed, but thinking back to it even along their journey to this place, Ram had quite often stumped Rem in her playfulness, and in doing so granted her salvation.

For Rem, quick to drown for the slightest of reasons, Ram's way, abounding in conviction and humor, was truly akin to the warmth of the sun.

Rem: "I believe Nee-sama is a wonderful person. Including this playfulness."

Ryuzu: "From what was informed in the birdmail, ain't been too many days since ya reunited, yet ta 've tamed her this much…"

Ram: ""Tame her" is a boorish way to put it. It was simply devoted sincerity and love."

Ryuzu: "Fer that, you're frolicin' too much ta an uncharacteristic level, Ram. Though I do understand yer happiness for bein' able ta live with yer lil' sis' after her finally wakin' up from her neverendin' sleep."

Ram: "—. How cheeky for a mere Ryuzu-sama."

Ryuzu: "Ya get in attack mode when you're hidin' yer embarrassment, so nevermind me, but I wish ya'd have some consideration with Lil' Gar. Now then…"

Ram faintly frowned. Rem was struck with admiration at the rare state of her elder sister being cornered, when Ryuzu stepped away from the bars after having been leaning upon the iron gate,

Ryuzu: "'S weird ta keep talkin' at the gate. I also wanna give a big hug to my granddaughters fer comin' back safe 'n sound."

Rem: "Granddaughters…?"

Ram: "That's the best joke she could come up with. Kindly laugh for her."

Ryuzu: "It means that's how much I think of ya!"

As Ryuzu tapered her lips, Rem's own lips loosened even through her perplexment. Not because Ram had told her to, it just spontaneously happened in response to Ryuzu's thoughtfulness.

Above all, for Ryuzu to treat Rem and Ram as granddaughters despite looking younger than them was a truly apocryphal element, even taking her thoughtfulness into account.

Rem: "Beatrice-chan was the same way, but is it the tendency of young children to act older than they are…?"

Ram: "It would seem so. Beatrice-sama's true self appears when she is atop Barusu's lap."

Rem: "Considering her cuteness, I would have to agree."

Spica was the same way, but it befitted children best to be like children, laughing to their fullest. Not just Beatrice, but if Ryuzu also stopped trying to act older and smiled suitably for her age, just how adorable she would be.

Immersed in these introspections, Rem's cognizance momentarily paused at what immediately followed.

Ryuzu: "Now then everybody, let's open the gates."

Upon apprehending what Ryuzu had vocalized, the iron gate to the mansion slowly began to open.

That, by itself, was good. Without issue. The issue lay beyond the gate's opening.

???: "…"
???: "…"

The gate's latches unfastened, the gateway opening to the inside—moving it were several persons abiding by Ryuzu's calling, each with hair and ornaments that adorned them differing per the respective liking of each, yet all of them wore the same face as Ryuzu.

Namely, those girls possessed an identical visage as the Witch Sphinx—

Rem: “—eek!!”

Expectably overwhelmed, without curtail, Rem screeched to her limit.

2

???: “That scream baffled me, but I understand. Most certainly anyone would be astonished after seeing Ryuzu-sama and her sisters, Pico-sama and the rest.”

Rem: “For you to say that, gives me some relief…”

Rem hung her head in shame before the blonde-haired maid who indicated her sympathy.

The greeting with Ryuzu at the gate, and the frightening affairs that followed—the entrance of more than ten girls bearing the same face as Ryuzu’s, made her feel incredibly embarrassed for her delirious response to it.

Rem: “Even though Nee-sama had apprised me that the amount of people who had a face identical to Ryuzu-san was three times ten, yet I reckoned she was only joking…”

Ryuzu: “‘S the way Ram spoke, but ya also can’t fault yerself fer thinkin’ that way, Rem. Fer ya ta not think of it as a joke’d be blind belief, ‘n I can’t say I approve of that.”

???: “You speak of it quite nonchalantly, but would it not be good for you to take a look in the mirror yourself as well, Ryuzu-sama? If you continue to cause problems so frequently that it will be impossible to discount them despite your adorable appearance, then it will be about time I took matters in my own hands.”

Ryuzu: “Y-You’re scarin’ me…”

Glowered by those somewhat tranquil eyes, Ryuzu curled up in reflection. This made Rem loosen her lips at last as she corrected her hunched posture.

She had never predicted such a commotion would be stirred up even before she had entered the mansion's premises, but now that she had been permitted to pass inside, she could not keep moping this way forever.

Although—

Rem: "I caused you trouble by making a ruckus. Um…"

Sylphy: "—I am Sylphy Elmart. Previously Corneas, but I divorced. I have been entrusted to attend to the mansion during everyone's absence."

Rem: "The mansion. Then, were you also a coworker of mine and Nee-sama's, Sylphy-san?"

Rem inquired of the maid—Sylphy, who gently lowered her back and bowed.

Albeit a matter of course, it was likely that all of the women who worked at Roswaal's mansion were acquaintances of Rem. Surely, she must have troubled them owing to her slumber.

However, Sylphy shook her head and denied Rem's concern with a "No",

Sylphy: "I am still a newcomer, so I have never worked with Rem-sama and the others. In addition, I have been employed not by the Margrave, but by Miload-sama. Furthermore."

Rem: "Furthermore?"

Sylphy: "My master is myself alone. And my heart's master is nobody but Emilia-sama."

Overawed by Sylphy's gaze, perfused with potent willpower, Rem's head unwittingly inclined backward.

The unordinary allegiance Sylphy had attested for Emilia. It could also be discerned from the flawless maintenance of the entry hall, the passageways, and the parlor she was presently in, all of which she had seen on her way around the mansion under Sylphy's guidance. In accordance with her impression of the mansion from the outside, the professionalism was remarkable.

This work incontrovertibly emanated from the emotions which exalted Emilia as even the master of her heart.

Rem: “Sylphy-san, have you known Emilia-san for a long time?”

Sylphy: “No, it has only been a few months since we met. And that, too, was an exceedingly limited timeframe in which I was able to be in her company personally.”

Rem: “And yet, you devote such emotion?”

Sylphy: “It is what that person did for you, rather than the length of time you spent with them, that determines to what extent that person will comprise your heart, is it not?”

Rem: “That’s…”

Taken aback by the unexpected reply, Rem cast her gaze downward at Sylphy’s subsisting words.

What crossed Rem’s mind in this moment were the figures of people she cherished, Spica and Katya. However, taking also into account that they were relationships Rem had fostered anew without her memories, the time Rem had spent with them was not a great number of days by any measure.

Nevertheless, still, Rem resolutely felt them to be irreplaceable.

What Sylphy had said was correct. —And, as Rem neared this conviction, a clear image of Subaru’s visage emerged within her mind, making her purse her lips shut.

Sylphy: “Rem-sama?”

Ryuzu: “She must be befuddled. Sylphy, I’m sure I told ya ’bout Rem’s circumstance.”

Sylphy: “You are… correct. My apologies. I lacked forethought.”

Rem: “No, this is not something you need to apologize for. —It’s simply… my circumstance.”

Ryuzu and Sylphy exchanged glances upon hearing Rem’s reply. Albeit to the heartache of the cordial two, Rem did not wish to speak of her present conflict.

As expressed, it was Rem’s own distress, her own anguish to the very end.

Ram: “—You look downhearted, Rem. Did Sylphy tease you or such?”

Rem: “…”

Upon the voice abruptly calling for her, Rem raised her face and gazed at the parlor’s entrance. Standing there was Ram, having momentarily parted from her in the middle of guiding her towards the parlor to see to certain business.

As Ram belatedly enjoined them, Rem gulped an inhale with eyes wide at her appearance. —For Ram stood there in an unfamiliar maid guise.

Rem: “Nee-sama, that attire…”

Ram: “Were you not told so multiple times? Ram is the mansion’s, Roswaal-sama’s maid.”

Rem was inadvertently captivated by Ram, who combed down her pink hair and replied in exuberance. Looking at Ram all the same as Rem, Ryuzu exhaled a jaunty “Ahh”,

Ryuzu: “Been a minute since we seen Ram in this kinda attire, ain’t that so.”

Ram: “Indeed. Ram had been wearing her travel clothing for some time, so it feels refreshing.”

Sylphy: “So refreshing that it would seem some parts of the uniform are disordered in the manner they have been worn. May I fix them?”

Ram: “Is that so? Then you are requested to.”

Beside the mesmerized Rem, Ryuzu was enthralled as Sylphy attentively began assisting with Ram’s dressing. Whilst Sylphy’s hands adjusted her uniform, Ram met Rem’s gaze by closing one eye and winking at her,

Ram: “This is the maid uniform that Ram and Rem wear whilst working in the mansion.”

Rem: “…I think it is, wonderful. But…”

Ram: “But?”

Rem: “Doesn’t it expose a bit more skin compared to Sylphy-san’s uniform? Just what difference… could it be, that person was behind it?”

Comparing the maid outfits of Ram and Sylphy, Rem bore this misgiving whilst hugging her own shoulders.

It was a lovely outfit, to be sure, but the discrepancy was much too clear and its intent, unknown. And when she thought back to it, in the Empire, Subaru would often vest convoluted sentiments within her by alluding to Rem’s attire, telling her what would be cuter, what would make her more alluring, et cetera. The memories of those times were resurrected by the uniforms before her eyes.

Rem: “I did think he had an abnormal obsession in even the attire of others, but for it to show up even here…”

Sylphy: “…It would seem a misunderstanding has occurred, Ram-sama?”

Ram: “Indeed. Ram personally is not concerned whatsoever by how much Barusu’s repute falls to the gutter in Rem’s mind, but it is unamusing to have credit stolen.”

Rem: “Credit, you say?”

Ram: “Yes. This maid uniform’s alteration was something Ram personally proposed and adjusted. All of it was because… Ram wished to wear a uniform with better mobility? Is what… it was supposed to be?"

Ryuzu: "Where'd that confidence of yers go all of a sudden?"

As Ram's confidence uncharacteristically wilted by the end of her utterance, Ryuzu tilted her head. Upon Ryuzu's delineation, Ram muttered "Quite incomprehensible",

Ram: "To be skeptical of one's own opinion, how unpleasant. The reason why Ram proposed the uniform's alteration was, probably, not supposed to be something so randomly offhanded like that."

Sylphy: "Y-You say that for your own opinion?!"

Ram: "It feels to be a scheme of the uniforms' provider… It is irksome for being a thought akin to Barusu's, but if they wanted to make Rem wear a cute uniform, that would be much more convincing."

Sylphy: "I see, most certainly. I am persuaded."

One finger on her lips, Sylphy for some reason endorsed Ram's inference. Judging from the flow of this conversation, Sylphy probably had the urge to dress someone in cute clothes as well.

In reality, in a world where the plural majority of memories surrounding Rem had disappeared, the true nature of Ram's malaise and the correct answer to it would likely never be known.

Ram: "If so, then Ram will believe what she wishes to believe. Unafraid of what anyone else may ever think, you see."

Rem: "…I'm sure Nee-sama would've found Priscilla-sama agreeable as well."

Albeit confined and small companionships of Rem's, but as noble and powerful women, Priscilla and Ram had radiant and suspired commonalities. Had Priscilla been alive and well, there would have been a future in which the two would have come to good terms with one another through Rem. Or, they would have collided against one another as natural enemies.

Anyhow, her suspicions towards Subaru concerning the maid uniforms seemed misplaced.

Rem: “But, it’s all because that person is constantly doing such misleading things.”

Ryuzu: “If you’re talkin’ ‘bout Lil’ Su, it’s a pity ya give flak to him.”

Rem: “Ryuzu-san, you’re able to say this because you haven’t witnessed that person say all sorts of nonsense and crossdress as a woman.”

Ryuzu: “To think! Lil’ Su was crossdressin’ even in the Empire! He oughta be learnin’ some manners.”

Sylphy: “Crossdress as a woman? Despite the presence of Emilia-sama’s person? With what purpose? Depending on that answer…”

Ryuzu’s reaction evinced that Subaru truly was a repeat offender. Sylphy expressed a stern displeasure upon hearing this, and Rem was determined to grill him about this once again in her mind.

During this exchange, Sylphy completed her dressing of Ram. Ram swiftly twirled, the hem of her skirt overturning, as she exuberantly stroked her hair upward,

Ram: “Nothing uncomfortable. Good work, Sylphy.”

Sylphy: “…Your compliment is an honor, is what I will state for the record.”

Ram: “It’s Ram’s commendation, so kindly accept it without feeling shy. That’s not all. From a cursory glance, you’ve attended to the mansion quite meticulously as well.”

Sylphy: “I did live days of subservience beneath an unsalvageable Husband-sama. Should even a speck of dirt be fallen onto the floor, each wife would bear the corollary of being worthless. Infuriates me to even remember. Although recently, he reaped what he had sown.”

Having corrected Ram’s uniform in an instant, Sylphy spoke of her previous place of employment—no, her environment, perhaps. It could be glimpsed through her words and conduct how debilitating that place was, to which Rem also felt a great sympathy.

And, before this Rem, with her shift into a flawless maid, Ram gently set a cup of tea.

Ram: “Here, you must be parched after all of Ryuzu-sama and Sylphy’s enquiries.”

Ryuzu: “Paintin’ us as villains even when you’re just handin’ a cup of tea, eh.”

Ram: “Hah.”

Scoffing an exhale at the sour-lipped Ryuzu, Ram laid out tea for her and Sylphy as well.

Seemingly having brought the serving stand to the corridor, Ram adeptly poured the two’s tea and, with her gaze, urged Rem to take a sip. Heeding her direction, Rem no longer constrained herself from enjoying the tea’s aroma any further and placed the cup to her mouth—her eyes reflexively dilating.

Rem: “Delicious…”

Ram: “Isn’t it. Brewing tea is Ram’s sole specialty as a maid, after all.”

Sylphy: “You carry yourself with contrasts of seriousness to a nearly enchanting degree… Not that I can say much, since truthfully, I have never had the opportunity to enjoy tea of such quality.”

Ryuzu: “Even Frederica’s always happy ta say this one’s peerless.”

Sylphy and Ryuzu also yielded in defeat to the triumphant Ram and sipped their tea.

Savoring the aroma entering her nostrils and the flavor atop her tongue, whilst nodding to the two’s voicing, Rem took a sudden notice to Ram’s gentle gaze, affection and a somber hope sojourned within.

Rem: "—Ah."

Ram would never aver. But, surely, she must have conferred her hopes onto even the flavor of this tea.

It was not arduous to imagine that before losing her memories, Rem also surfeited the flavor of this esteem, of this tea which only Ram could make. In reality, her serving of the tea, artful enough to bedew one's tear ducts in captivation, seemed to imbue every fragment of Rem's body with affection.

It did not, however, stimulate Rem's memories, and forge the outcome longed for.

Rem: "It is very, truly very delicious. But—."

Placing the cup she had finished sipping from upon the table, and with eyes closed, Rem spoke so evasively. However, to Rem's conduct, Ram smiled with a "Stupid",

Ram: "This was simply brewing some tea. Nowhere near any necessity for cute Rem to apologize."

Sylphy: "Ram-sama, you may have made her apologize due to your stabbing gaze. My former Husband-sama was an inordinately temperamental person, but he kept in good spirits if he were to just receive apologies in the meanwhile."

Ryuzu: "…Oh dear Ram, would ya pour 'nother cuppa tea for Sylphy? I feel so awful, so awful fer this girl."

Sylphy: "Why would you feel so? Contrary to feeling pity, I am rejoicing in the freedom which I never had before."

Slightly furrowing her eyebrows, Sylphy informed Ryuzu, eyes sorrowful, of her incredulity. Complying with Ryuzu's entreaty, Ram began preparing a second cup for Sylphy.

Whilst glimpsing Ram's back, once again did Rem ardently, fervently resolve.

…I want to respond, to the people who are so good to me.

vic.1120

3

After leaving the parlor, Rem followed her curiosity and ambled around parts of the mansion.

Every point at which she would stop, Ram, chaperoning her, would retell memories of those places, “That’s the flower bed where Barusu got his head covered in manure” or “This pillar has gnaw marks from Garf on it, doesn’t it? He shall be chided later” or “Ah, the portrait of the Great Spirit-sama that Emilia-sama and Beatrice-sama drew on the ground, it’s still here”, endowing her not even the time to relish her forlorn.

However, contrary to this embrace and consideration of Ram’s, Rem was unable to convene with a fortuitous feeling that pressed her back.

Rem: “Ah, more children resembling Ryuzu-sama…”

Ram: “Pico and the rest. After being taken out of the Sanctuary, they’ve been in the midst of learning many things from square one.”

Rem: “…I’m also in a similar circumstance to those girls, or Sylphy-san and the others, aren’t I?”

Unlike the awfully matured Ryuzu, these young girls appeared as innocent as their appearance suggested—these girls, with the child addressed as Pico as the first, were noticeable at every corner of the spacious Roswaal mansion, running about assisting maids wearing the same uniform as Sylphy.

The pronouncedly diligent girls apparently bore a destiny differing from that of most people by their birth, and now liberated from it, were currently purportedly in the midst of walking a different pathway of life.

On one hand were these ladies, maids whose beauty and elegance allured the eyes of many, but from what she had heard, these were women situated in plightful circumstances identical to Sylphy, and all of them had been able to escape with Emilia’s aid.

In the sense of Ryuzu's sisters as well as these maid girls having their ways of life trifled by destiny, playthings of fate, what crossed Rem's mind was that they were the same as her.

However, Rem's thought was appended by Ram's words, starting with an "Indeed",

Ram: "Regardless of the presence or absence of memories, upon resolving to start walking a new path, usually there is no choice but to start collecting from the beginning. Rem is not special."

Rem: "Nee-sama…"

Ram: "No, made a mistake. Rem is special. She is much too beloved to Ram, after all."

That revision stated, Rem turned her face away in bashfulness from the magnitude of love bestowed to her.

Of course Rem also felt a powerful kinship and overflooding love towards Ram, but the sense that what Ram gave to her was ten times, a hundred times of what Rem gave, left her disconcerted.

Bearing this vexation, Rem and Ram's tour of the Roswaal mansion resumed.

And before long—

Ram: "—Rem, this is your room."

Ram's hand opened the door, her hand gestured toward the room, into which Rem stepped inside.

Compared to places inside the mansion she had surveyed, like the reception or the dining halls, the large bath or the secret special training grounds, the lounge, the gardens and the balcony, there were not many points of interest here much like the parlor.

Considering the mansion's size, the room given to a mere servantile Rem was quite proper, but not much else.

Rem: "…"

A large bed, a bookshelf teeming with poetry collections and illustrated storybooks. A carefully tidied writing desk, placed upon it a vase adorned with vivid flowers.

Ram: “There was once a time these belongings had been put away without notice, but Barusu brought all of them out and put them all back where they were, saying this was how Rem kept everything.”

Rem: “That person…”

As Rem stood before the bookshelf, Ram conveyed to her Subaru’s toil.

Ram’s scathing remarks towards Subaru were primarily conspicuous, many of which Rem found agreeable, but the solitude of sincerity in the words she just appended struck Rem’s chest.

Pulling out a collection of poetry, she flipped through its pages. The written verses were all things she had no remembrance of, but these bindings were of literature that the Rem of before must have liked, must have loved. Many of them somehow seemed to recite love or romance, giving her both a sense of peculiarity and embarrassment towards her past self.

Rem: “For over a year, I was asleep, right.”

After placing the poetry collection back in the bookshelf, Rem sat on the bed and caressed it with her hand, narrowing her eyes.

In Rem’s stead once she had plunged into her unawakening slumber, unable to fulfill her duties as a maid, Ram, Frederica, Petra, and the others must have performed the mansion’s maintenance, and attended to the asleep Rem. Even now, the bed’s cushions and sheets had been maintained cleanly, the careful and conscientious work discernible.

Next to the bed were faint traces of sun-bleached discolorations on the floor, bearing witness that a chair had been set there for long. An image came to her mind, of those visiting Rem talking to her from there.

That surely must have been Ram, Emilia, and the rest, and finally—

Rem: "…"

Ram also wordlessly seated herself beside Rem on top of the bed. A tender gaze of light-crimson watching her profile, Rem closed her eyes, and shook her head.

She had not been asked. But, she must have made her want to ask.

Of everything in this mansion, of everything in this room, naught inspired Rem's memories. All that was here was a wealth of affections and love, things that made her feel so, things that illuminated to the unremembering Rem that she used to be happy.

She could ardently, fervently feel this, enough to mist her eyes with tears.

That was precisely why—

Rem: "…Nee-sama, that makes me really curious, what is that?"

The room was luminescent with sunlight filtering through the trees, a tender and gentle atmosphere permeated by compassion, and placed in one corner was a mysterious object—the strangeness of an iron ball, covered in spikes, attached to a chain, lured her eyes.

Upon Rem's enquiry, Ram murmured an "Ah" as though just taking notice,

Ram: "That's a "Morningstar"."

Rem: "…Moarning, stahr?"

Ram: "Yes. That's what Barusu started calling it, and before long it stuck… apparently, that is also something Rem treasured."

Rem: "Me, that thing?!"

Apprised of something exceedingly different from her reminiscences so far, Rem could not help but look back and forth at Ram and the spiked iron ball—the morningstar.

Afterwards, she nearly convinced herself this was another one of Ram's mischievous jokes.

Ram: "Ram also understands your doubt. But after looking at Barusu, especially preparing a dedicated cloth and oil, and polishing it every day, Ram thinks it's lasted for too long to be simply some worthless joke."

Rem: "B-but, doesn't it seem like that person would do something foolish like this?"

Ram: "Indeed. It's undeniable."

Perhaps a dispute already settled, Ram had a sympathetic response to Rem's objection. Ram's demeanor made Rem rise from the bed, and she walked towards that Morningstar.

Rem: "I don't understand…"

Upon closer examination, she noticed a handmade iron ball holder had been made for it so that the iron ball's spikes did not splinter the floor, a palpable sense of the smallest of considerations. The cloth and container of oil left at the same spot corroborated Ram's testimony of Subaru polishing it every day.

However, so what; that was all there was to it.

Rem: "I'm sure this, too, was one of that person's antic—"

Like with his crossdressing, simply expressed in truly limited words, it was unquestionably only some vile thing that reflected Subaru's tastes.

Bearing this notion, Rem stooped and touched the iron ball with her fingers. —It was at that moment.

Rem: "—Huh."

Without warning, Rem's vision warped and distorted as she unwittingly fell to the floor on her back. Disgraceful conduct, but in this moment in time, Rem had no composure to feel ashamed of it or be mindful.

Rem: “Ug…”

Fallen onto her rear, her swirling dizziness spiralled the world.

Despite her person’s position in this place, the floor and the ceiling became indifferentiable, the white and black of the world inverted, the things she could see and the sounds she could hear and the scents she could smell and the air’s taste and the sensation of touch, these five senses became nebulous and melded together, seeing the air, smelling the sounds, touching the scents, tasting the colors, she heard.

Rem: “—Ah, ug.”

All that she could sense coalesced, convulsing, and even Rem’s past, present, and future melded together.

A village in the mountains, a flag emblazoned with a wolf impaled by swords, creaking notes of a wheelchair, a weyr of flying dragons covering the sky, an abominable whale of white gliding through the night sky, a broken horn soaring into a twilight radiated by flames, and a young boy who pleaded with an earnest look, a young boy who raged, a young boy who shed tears, a young boy who laughed —.

Rem: “…”

Before long, the impact akin to the recreation of the world, burst open like a bubble popping.

Rem: “…”

Her sight, her hearing, her olfaction, her taste, her touch, each was able to see, hear, smell, taste, feel, informing her of the way to live in their correct forms.

The nigh-scorchingly severe sensation, feeling its received pulsation diffusing blood to every corner of her body, Rem blinked once, twice, thrice.

She did not know, what in the world had occurred.

Merely—

Rem: “I-… Rem, is…”

Still fallen to the floor, she touched her cheek with her trembling hand, ascertaining her existence.

The sensation of her fingers’ touch faded not. Fleeting, fallible, fearing to crumble like a castle made of soft sand, Rem did not pour any more strength in her fingers.

Feeling that she, if at all, coveted anything further, then all would vanish—

Rem: “…”

As Rem was engulfed in this unrejectable dismay and fear, a warm sensation enveloped her from behind.

She inhaled, too petrified to even turn around. Hugged tightly by arms wrapping around her from her back, as Rem’s mind and heart were inundated about herself, she gained a desire to focus on someone else.

And the first one on whom she focused, was the presence embracing her from her back—

Rem: “Nee-sa—”

Ram: “—Wait.”

Rem: “…”

Ram: “Don’t turn around, yet. Right now, for the first time in her life, Ram is feeling disappointed in herself.”

All of her attempts to voice, to turn around stifled by that person, Rem stiffened her body.

Ram, whose visage was concealed, her hugging arms, her professing voice, were all trembling. This was exceedingly antithetical, far removed from the image of Ram that Rem knew.

At all times, Ram was dignified and gallant, never showing Rem of anything but her majestic form.

That held true when they had reunited in the Empire, when they undertook the journey back to the Roswaal mansion just by the two of them, when she used to be overburdened by recoil when they first began working in the mansion just after her horn had been broken, when she grappled with Witch Cultist enemies in the blazing village to protect the foolish Rem.

Whenever had been captured by Rem's eyes, Ram was evermore venerable—.

Ram: "So, so sorry, Rem. Myself is deplorable."

Rem: "Nee-sama… what are you…"

Ram: "Even after…"

Rem: "…"

Ram: "Even after loving you, cherishing you so much, Rem, to have forgotten you and kept on living till this day, just how heartless was Ram as your Nee-sama."

Rem's eyes dilated at Ram's voice, possessor of love far too immense, and therefore in lament. Shaking off all restraints, Rem turned around and faced Ram as she hugged her.

Ram: "—hk."

Faintly widening her tearful, light-crimson eyes, Ram looked at her in astonishment. —Rem's chest warmed at the sight of the visage she had gazed upon the most, for the longest time, in her life.

She gained certainty. Of what a happy person she was, surrounded by that which she loved.

Rem: "Nee-sama, you are not heartless or anything such. Rem also wants to apologize. Always, always making you nothing but worried, betraying the piety of a sister."

Ram: “Rem.”

Rem: “Rem understands, everything. How much Nee-sama shattered her heart for Rem, and how many terrible sacrifices you made, to have been together with me to this day. And…”

Ram: “Rem.”

Rem: “About what the weak and deplorable Rem, who only ever receives, needs to do hereon.”

Ram: “—Hk.”

As Rem focused her eyes on the countenance before her, Ram’s cheeks were embellished with streams of tears, wiped by Rem’s fingers who then gave her a smile. She then stretched her arm to draw her elder sister’s head close, and embraced her into her chest.

Remaining seated on the floor, the two sisters gently nestled with one another, reciprocating affection. —No, it was Ram who had always been doing so. Rem was the one who lacked it.

Rem: “Nee-sama, I love you.”

Bringing close her lips to her ear whilst holding her close, Rem conveyed her brimming and overflowing emotions to Ram. Drip by drip, feeling warm droplets of tears wetting her chest, Rem maintained silence and continued to embrace Ram, weeping with tears.

Accepting in her heart, at long last the fulfillment of their true reunion, Rem conveyed her love with her past self, her present self, and all that she could wield.

To her mind’s satisfaction, to her heart’s content, at this moment, she wanted to be with Ram this way.

And after the unfilled time of the sisters was duly reclaimed, Rem had things she must do—too many people, to whom she must convey her gratitude and love.

Above all, the first person to surface in her mind, was a mean-eyed, black-haired boy—

Rem: “—Subaru-kun.”

To convey her love, she must stand up.

For what a happy reason am I allowed to live. —So spoke, Rem’s mind.

4

???: “…”

Giving a deep and silent bow, the girl in the maid uniform then looked up, drawing a gasp from Petra.

With wide eyes, their petrified bodies were frozen in place. Not just Petra, but Meili and Emilia were also similarly struck speechless at her appearance.

Amidst such involuntary silence, the first to speak was—

???: “—Rem.”

The intangible Imaginary Subaru stood motionless, staring at the same person as Petra.

His stupefied voice only reached Petra’s ears. Sadly, the girl, the one who called to herself all attention, could not see his transparent self. Even for Petra, she had not the time to help that unnoticed “Subaru”.

However, she could guarantee that which “Subaru” had called out, was correct. —The one who stood there, without mistake, was the girl so beloved and dear to him named Rem.

Petra: “—Ah.”

At that moment, sparks darted through Petra’s mind, and the fog in her field of consciousness successively cleared.

The presence of that which exerted such force of attraction right before her eyes made the images of memories, that had been unconsciously pushed into the corner of her mind and covered by a shroud of forgetfulness, start to reappear within her hall of cognizance.

And so, she was struck by an impact akin to scattering sparks, of all the vivid images that displayed.

—The time that Petra had spent in contact with her as "Petra" was not very long.

The young girl was a maid who frequently came from Roswaal's mansion to the village to do some shopping. Though they hardly interacted and had never exchanged a word, she became more expressive once Subaru had started to visit the village. More importantly, she was also the benefactor who had saved the lives of Petra and her friends. —The culprit behind endangering their lives had been Meili, in command of Witchbeasts, which was another tale of fate. Actually, Meili and her elder sister targeted those connected to herself at the most important moments far too much.

Anyhow, Petra's connection with this girl was thin.

Thereafter, just as the Royal Selection marked its beginning, she was met by the tragedy of the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony, victimized, and Petra was employed to fill her place, joining the Emilia Camp as a maid.

In other words, without the tragedy that had befallen her, Petra would not be in the position she was today, which in itself made for terribly complicated feelings—

???: "Rem… Rem, is that you?"

As though a face-down card flipped over, akin to confirming the patterns and text on it, one by Petra's misunderstandings about her were replaced with comprehension.

Beside her, in a faltering voice, Emilia called her name as she blinked her eyes.

Emilia stepped forward and hesitated, opening and closing her lips several times as if searching for the right words,

Emilia: “Umm, I’m sorry, that was a weird thing to say. I’ve always properly known that Rem is Rem… but, that’s not what I was trying to say.”

Rem: “No need to worry, Emilia-sama. Please calm down, and take your time. Rem, too, understands that this is all very sudden.”

Emilia: “—. Yes, thank you. There’s so much I want to say, but…”

Rem: “But?”

Emilia: “…That look suits you reaaally well. It makes me reaaally feel like you’re Rem.”

Emilia placed her hand firmly on her chest and smiled at Rem, her amethyst eyes moist with tears. In response to Emilia’s words, Rem raised her eyebrows slightly, and nodded.

She proudly puffed out her chest in her maid uniform and,

Rem: “It’s the uniform Nee-sama tailored to suit Rem, after all.”

Upon hearing Rem’s answer, Ram, her arms crossed, nodded in satisfaction.

???: “…What is this, all of a sudde~n?”

Beside this exchange between Emilia and Rem, Meili frowned and muttered.

As a little Crimson Scorpion emerged from her hair, clicking its pincers as if anxious about its master’s reaction, Meili closed one eye, and placing her hand to her forehead,

Meili: “The moment I saw Ram-oneesan’s sister, I was reminded of how she crushed the whole pack of Ulgarm-cha~ns. If it isn’t the reason that caused the job to fai~l…”

Ram: “In that case, you should be grateful to Rem. Thanks to Rem making your job fail, there were no victims other than Barusu, which is why you're able to be here at this moment."

Meili: "I've got mixed feelings about it, finding it difficult to express my gratitu~de…"

Ram pointed this out while clutching her elbows, to which Meili made a displeased face and stuck out her tongue.

While Ram's words were indeed harsh, they also held truth. In fact, it was unmistakable that Meili, at one time their enemy, was accepted into the Emilia Camp because the damage her deeds had caused to the camp were minimal. —Ram's point that there had been no victims other than Subaru, ironically enough, was also correct from the perspective of Return by Death.

???: "As per your understanding, the moment those who have hitherto known Rem lay their sight upon her, within them their memories of her are revived. Restoration. Neither Ryuzu-sama nor I were able to contain ourselves. Resultantly, we were delayed in rejoining everyone. Confession."

Ram: "Clind's reaction was meager and unamusing, but Ryuzu-sama's outburst was over the top and quite the sight to see. That is a privilege for those who were present to witness it."

Clind: "I see, a sight to see you say. Certainly, we did get to behold something unusual. Agreement."

Ram: "—. Hah."

The rebirth of her Memories, that befell those who surrounded Rem. —No, in view of the conditions of the Authority of Gluttony thus far, this phenomenon should be called the rebirth of her Name.

Touching upon that fact, Clind cast a meaningful look to Ram, to which she averted her eyes in obvious displeasure and snorted.

Upon a much closer inspection, the faint redness around Ram's eyes and Clind's remark about a sight to behold might have been related.

However, Petra did not allude to that either. —Not out of chivalrous sympathy, but because she was unable to.

Rem: "—Petra-san?"

Suddenly, Rem, who had been basking in everyone's attention, widened her eyes upon looking at the silent Petra. Emilia and the others also turned to see Petra at her reaction, and were startled by her state.

Their response was a matter of course. Petra, who had uttered not a word up until that point, had a flood of tears streaming from her round eyes and was desperately trying to suppress her throat, as it verged on convulsing in heaving sobs.

Emilia: "Petra-chan?! Oh no, she's crying so uncontrollably—"

Petra: "—Hk."

The moment her tear-strewn face was noticed, Petra kicked the ground and broke into a run.

Dodging the arms of Emilia, who, taken aback by Petra's tears, she tried to embrace her; avoiding Meili, who attempted to grab her sleeve; slipping under Rom-jii's legs, who was caught off guard by the situation; with agile movements, Petra jumped forward—into the bosom of Rem, who was staring at her with eyes dilated.

And—

Petra: "Rem—!"

Rem: "Kyaa!"

Caught in the arms of Rem, who had shown the kindness to not dodge her, Petra embraced her slender body tightly. Rem blinked her eyes as she reciprocated Petra's hug, who clung to her, reluctant to let go.

Petra: "Rem… Remm, Remmm…!"

Petra crumbled at Rem's reaction, unable to stop the tears from flowing; she found herself indulging in something she had resolved herself never to do, sniveling in front of others, yet she was unable to tear herself away.

Thus, while supporting that tearful Petra, Rem looked around for assistance,

Rem: “Um, do I just not remember, but were Rem and Petra-san this close for you to cry so much for me…?”

And so, failing to conceal the hue of her loss of bearings, she continued to gently caress Petra’s head.

Chapter 36:
Problem

1

???: “I’m sorry, I’ve caused you so much trouble…”

???: “No, Rem is the one who ought to be happy that you cried with joy. It was just like when Nee-sama did the same… ah.”

Petra bowed her head repeatedly, apologizing for her flustered and disgraceful behavior. Rem, who had tried to comfort Petra, realized she had said something awkward and stiffened her cheeks, looking toward Ram.

In response to Rem’s gaze, Ram smiled gently and said, “It’s okay”,

Ram: “After all, Ram is a pathetic older sister who is unable to even keep her composure during an emotional reunion. It’s no wonder Rem would call her sister a crybaby.”

Rem: “Th-that’s not what I meant! It’s a misunderstanding that you’re a crybaby, Nee-sama! Besides, I was happy that you cried for me, Nee-sama!”

???: “That’s right, Ram. You’re finally able to remember Rem. Even if you did cry, no one would think you’re a crybaby. Cheer up!”

Ram: “Rem, Emilia-sama… wah, wah, wah…”

Following Rem’s lead, Emilia joined in comforting her, to which Ram covered her eyes with her hands and turned away. The two remained concerned, but from Petra’s perspective, it was all just a farce.

Of course, there was no doubt that this situation brought tears of joy to Ram’s eyes.

Petra: “…Ram-neesama, I get that you’re happy, but you shouldn’t tease them so much.”

Emilia: “Huh?!”

Rem: “Tease…?”

Petra managed to compose herself and admonished Ram, causing Emilia and Rem to widen their eyes. Ram, who had deceived the two innocent girls, ceased her fake crying, shrugged her shoulders, and said,

Ram: “Well, now that memories have been restored, it’s natural to want to see all of Rem’s different expressions, so there was some teasing involved. Will you forgive such a mean older sister?”

Rem: “Nee-sama… well, it seems it can’t be helped. Just this once, okay?”

Ram: “Yes, thank you. Are you okay with that, Emilia-sama?”

Emilia: “Rem forgave you, so I can’t stay angry forever. Good grief.”

???: “Amazi~ng. Instead of showing any humility, all you did was act cute and you got away with i~t.”

Despite showing not a single shred of remorse, Rem and Emilia easily forgave Ram’s overbearing behavior, while Meili watched in astonishment and muttered in disbelief. Petra agreed with Meili’s disbelief. This was typical of Ram, but she was getting a little too carried away.

Petra: “I would like to hold a victory party for Rem… Rem-neesama, but this is a very difficult time, so could you please refrain from doing so, Ram-neesama?”

Ram: “Self-restraint, you say. That sounds reasonable at first, but what about you, Petra?”

Petra: “—? What do you mean? I’ve been reflecting on what happened earlier as well.”

Ram: “Not that you should feel bad about getting all worked up. It’s just something else that has been concerning. —Ever since a little while ago, it seems you have naturally positioned yourself between Rem and Emilia-sama."

Ram pointed this out with one eye closed, and Petra widened her eyes with a "Huh?". Then, she looked to her left and right, and saw the profiles of Emilia and Rem beside her.

The three of them were now sitting side by side on a long sofa, with Petra in the middle. Petra had her arms firmly wrapped around the two of them, as if she never wanted to let go.

Petra: "Huh?!"

Meili: "Don't just "huh" u~s. After you hugged Rem-oneesan, you ve~ry naturally pulled her along with yo~u. Even Emilia-oneesan was pulled along to~o."

Petra: "S-sorry. It seems like my love for both of you overflowed…"

Petra reflected on her actions in light of Meili's continued exasperation. However, her excuse was precisely the same as Ram's earlier, causing Ram to let out a "Ha!"

Rem: "It's okay, there's no need to worry, Petra-san. Rem also wants to fill in the gaps in her memory piece by piece."

Petra: "Rem-neesama…"

Rem: "Besides, Rem didn't think Petra-san and the others in the village got along with her very well, so it's a pleasant surprise to find that they cared so much."

With Petra's arm wrapped around her, Rem blushed slightly and gave a shy smile.

From Rem's perspective, her relationship with Petra and the others was at its peak around the time the Royal Selection began—during the month when Subaru was taken in at the mansion. Before that, they had been merely passing acquaintances at best.

That was why Rem's perception was not wrong. The reason Petra held such strong feelings for Rem was not so much because of her own emotions, but because of the extent of "Subaru's" influence.

However, despite that, she still felt them.

Petra: “Rem-neesama, smiling and looking shy, how precious…”

Emilia: “Petra-chan, your ears are reaaally red. Are you okay?”

Petra: “Ah, that’s not true. This isn’t two-timing… Emilia-neesama is number one!”

Emilia: “Huh? Um, that’s right. I’m the most important person in the camp, so I have to do my duties properly.”

Petra, torn between her impatience and happiness, blurted out something she should not have said, but Emilia, like the angel or goddess that she was, or perhaps because it simply went over her head, reacted to it like a dense protagonist.

With that in mind, Petra suppressed her racing heartbeat and stood up, telling herself, “Subaru is my number one…”

If she remained sandwiched between Emilia and Rem, her heart would surely be pulled apart.

Vic.ll2o

???: “Way to go, Petra! You hung in there!”

Petra: “Subaru, you better be ready for me to give you a piece of my mind later. You two-timer.”

“Subaru”: “That’s not fair! I can’t even touch Emilia-tan or Rem!”

Petra managed to cut off her lingering sentimentality and directed her pent-up anger toward the Imaginary Subaru. Holding a handkerchief to stifle her tears, she sighed as she watched “Subaru” dance around the reception room, exploding with emotions toward Rem, whose memories had returned.

That was when—

Rem: “Rem knows that she’s causing quite a disturbance, but it would be helpful if we could calm down for now. —Let’s talk about that person.”

Petra: “…”

Rem’s quiet voice caused the air in the room to become noticeably tense.

Although it had not completely relaxed, the atmosphere had started to warm up despite the urgency of the current situation, yet Rem herself wiped that away. That was very admirable and impressive.

Emilia: “Ram, Rem, did Clind-san already explain everything to you?”

Ram: “More or less. Besides, we also saw the devastation in the Royal Capital. Who would have thought it would come to this… Barusu really messed up.”

Petra: “Ram-neesama, that’s quite a way of putting it…”

Ram: “Sorry, let’s rephrase that. —Everyone, including Ram, really messed up.”

Petra: "…"

Ram's assessment weighed heavily and resonated deeply with everyone.

As previously confirmed before Ram and Rem had rejoined them, the severity of Al's actions was beyond one's ability to bear.

???: "That bein' said, there's nothin' ta be gained from blamin' ourselves excessively. Ultimately, the responsibility for what happened oughta lie with the person who caused it. That's what we've concluded."

Ram: "That's how Ram and the others feel, no doubt. But things aren't that simple. Wouldn't you agree?"

???: "…You're quite an impressive girl. What was all that foolin' around earlier?"

With that, Rom-jii stroked his bald head and gave Ram a stern look. Seeing the understanding between the two, Rem tilted her head and said "Nee-sama",

Rem: "When you say "things aren't that simple," are you talking about where the responsibility lies?"

Ram: "Yes, that's right. Rom-sama wants to discuss the details. Please go ahead."

Rom: "Throwin' us a load of trouble… well, fine. As the girl said, regardless of our resolve, the current situation ain't good for us or for all of ya."

Rom-jii, who had been entrusted with explaining the situation by Ram, pointed at himself and Emilia with his thick fingers. Staring at his large fingertips, Emilia blinked her amethyst eyes and,

Emilia: "That's true for us, but, Rom-jii, what about you, the others… and Felt-chan?"

Rom: "Ezzo was also at the Tower. He was given the task of managin' the Tower until an official investigation team could be dispatched by the Kingdom, but he was unable ta fulfill his duty. Even Reinhard wasn't able ta stop the helmet bastard nor the Divine Dragon, 'n damage was caused ta the Royal Capital."

Meili: "Bu~t, thanks to Emilia-oneesan, no big rocks fell on the city, ri~ght? So why are we still being scol~ded?"

Rom: "If ya could gain popularity just by smashin' stones thrown at ya, then Reinhard could just keep doin' that forever. Meili, it's not just the results that need ta be judged fairly, but the process as well."

Meili pouted at Rom-jii, who shook his big head slowly with a serious expression.

Hidden beneath Meili's dissatisfied attitude lay her frustration that Emilia's critical role was not being properly appreciated. Realizing this, Emilia smiled at Meili and said, "Thank you," causing the pouting girl to turn away even further.

Rom: "At the bare minimum, we gotta talk 'bout what we absolutely must do. First, we gotta stop that helmet bastard… the man who calls himself Aldebaran, with our own hands. We can't leave it ta anyone else or the Kingdom. We can only talk 'bout recoupin' our losses after we've done that."

Emilia: "Why does it have to be us? Of course, it would be natural for us to try our best, but if Al is stopped before he does something terrible…"

Rom: "Emilia, ya don't understand. It's no longer just 'bout Aldebaran. He's got the Divine Dragon on his side. This is a serious matter that could shake the foundations of the Royal Selection… the only way ta reverse that is for the Dragon Priestess, a Royal Candidate, ta recall the Divine Dragon. If that can't be done…"

Emilia: "—Would that mean the Royal Selection itself would be null and void?"

Emilia spoke of a definitive possibility, and Rom-jii drew back his chin with a serious expression. Upon hearing this, Petra belatedly comprehended the gravity of the situation.

In the first place, the Royal Selection to determine the next monarch of the Kingdom of Lugunica was based upon the prophecy of the Dragon History Stone that was necessary in order to maintain the Covenant with the Dragon. In other words, it was a ceremony which relied upon the mighty power of the Divine Dragon Volcanica, and without the Divine Dragon, the Royal Selection would not be viable.

Rom: "For that reason, we must. The only solution's ta stop Aldebaran, the one who's bewitched the Divine Dragon, by the hands of a Royal Candidate."

This was a fundamental prerequisite for settling this crucial situation, and for the continuation of the Royal Selection.

The words of the old giant, the wise man from the Felt Camp, who had long seen the world, possessed conviction which none could refute.

The destruction of the world by Al's hand must be averted. However, that did not mean that so long as the world was spared, nothing else mattered.

After the battle ended, there was the matter of—

Rem: "We need to ensure there is a proper place for Subaru-kun's return."

Emilia: "Rem…"

After listening to Rom-jii's words, Emilia looked at Rem as she muttered so. Rem met her gaze, her pale-blue eyes filled with resolve, responding with "That's how it should be, is it not?",

Rem: "That person, he did the same for me. Rem's room in the mansion remained exactly as it was before… because Subaru-kun thought so highly of her, Rem was able to remember the things she had forgotten. It's all thanks to the Morningstar that Subaru-kun polished every day…!"

Indeed, Rem emphasized that forcefully, with an iron ball attached to a chain in her hands—the Morningstar. Overwhelmed by the chain's rousing resonation and Rem's vigor, Emilia tilted her head.

Emilia: "…Thanks to the Morningstar?"

Rem: "Yes. It may surprise you, but it was in the moment upon touching the Morningstar. Every memory up to that point came flooding back… thinking that it was all just that person's obsession was a misunderstanding… There are so many things to apologize for."

Lowering her eyes as if ashamed of herself, Rem recounted how her memories had returned to her. Troubled by Rem's impassioned plea, a wide-eyed Emilia waved her hands about.

Perhaps, it was a matter of timing. —That which Gluttony, whom Al had released from the Prison Tower, had done was likely related to the rebirth of Rem's Memories and Name. And that had happened at the same time Rem had touched the Morningstar in the mansion.

That was why Rem was convinced that the Morningstar had awakened her.

Emilia: "You know, Rem, can you calm yourself for a moment to listen…"

Rem: "Rest assured, Emilia-sama. With this Morningstar, Rem will surely be of help in getting Subaru-kun back. After that is done, let us discuss what happened in the Empire and the future…"

Emilia continued to look troubled as Rem clenched her fists with an attitude of determination. Next to her, Meili looked at Ram and asked, "Aren't you going to stop he~r?", to which she replied,

Ram: "It can't be helped. This is something Ram didn't expect either. —Who would have thought that Barusu's ridiculous ramblings about polishing it every day would actually prove useful?"

Meili: "…It's really bad that I'm the one with the most common sense he~re.”

Meili lamented the situation, in which even Ram had placed too much faith in the power of the Morningstar.

In any case, it was necessary to share everything they knew concerning Gluttony with Rem and the others, including their speculations. Petra decided to leave that to Emilia, and turned back to Rom-jii, keeping the dream-like interplay between Emilia and Rem in the corner of her eye.

And then—

Petra: “Clind-niisama still hasn’t returned with the Master and the others… but we don’t have much time. We’ll be cooperating with Rom-ojiisan, right?”

Rom: “—. Yeah, that’s right. It’s our consensus that the Royal Selection’s gotta continue.”

Petra: “Then, please tell us all about it. Rom-ojiisan, what have you noticed about Al-san?”

Rom-jii had joined up with them in the plains and had accompanied them as they rushed to the Royal Capital. For the sake of Clind’s Compression, he had opted to act separately from Tonchinkan and the rest, but he had been laying the groundwork for fighting alongside Emilia and the others, saying that he had critical information concerning Al that he had obtained during their previous clash.

From the discussions up to this point, the Emilia and Felt Camps were of one mind. It was time for both sides to open up to each other; thus, Petra urged Rom-jii.

In response to Petra’s request, Rom-jii patted his bald head and said,

Rom: “What I’m gonna tell ya is gonna sound pretty outlandish ‘n insane. I didn’t keep it a secret ’cause I wanted ta seem important or nothin’, but ’cause it’s so unbelievable.”

Petra: "It's okay. I'll believe you, Rom-ojiisan. I'm sure Rom-ojiisan would be surprised if he knew, seriously."

Rom: "…You're also quite the peculiar girl, ain't'cha, Petra."

Perhaps mistaking it for lip service, Rom-jii lowered his eyebrows and muttered in exasperation.

But, there were no lies in Petra's words. Petra trusted Rom-jii. She knew that he cared deeply for Felt, who had been taken hostage by Al and his accomplices, and that he was a man of fatherly love who would show no hesitation to sacrifice his life for Felt.

For that reason, the hurdle of trust about which Rom-jii was concerned was cleared at the onset.

Unaware of Petra's various circumstances, while paying heed to Emilia and Rem, who even now were still reconciling their perceptions of each other, Rom-jii said,

Rom: "This is somethin' I'll tell Emilia 'n the others later, but… this Aldebaran guy, he's likely usin' some kinda cheat technique called an Authority."

"Subaru": "—An Authority."

"Subaru" reacted to Rom-jii's carefully chosen words before Petra could.

"Subaru" ceased his twirling in midair and his face stiffened, his gaze fixed intently upon Rom-jii. The Imaginary Subaru's reaction was understandable. They had just heard it from Clind's mouth, but both Petra and "Subaru" were familiar with the word "Authority" and its more sinister significance.

It was a word that had been uttered by the Sin Archbishop of Sloth, and by the Witch of Greed who slumbered in her tomb.

The manifestation of a formidable right which allowed one to interfere with the nature of this world, to overturn concepts, to selfishly paint over those laws.

The reason Rom-jii concluded that Al utilized one was because—

Rom: “—This guy, it seems like he’s able ta go back ta time gone by. But, it don’t seem ta go very far back, though.”

2

—In the end, just what was it that she absolutely needed to do?

That “problem”, which had accompanied her endlessly since the days she had been small and weak, continued to familiarly haunt Felt even now that she had been taken by the Aldebaran Crew.

Felt: “Geez, it’s so damn irritating.”

Scratching her head at that frustration, Felt spat out the bitterness that had been festering in her stomach.

Feelings of powerlessness and resignation, albeit definite, were of no use; this Felt knew. Despite that, despite neither quenching her throat nor filling her belly, they would seek to fill up people’s bodies, welling up by every means just to get in the way.

Felt: “—Tsk.”

With a click of her tongue, Felt sunk her teeth into the dried meat served to her for dinner, chewing it apart. Finding herself clearly unsatisfied with the overly salty flavor, she was disgusted with how spoiled she had become.

It had been a mere two and a half days since they had been parted, yet she longed for the cooking of Flam and Grassis.

Even the heavily seasoned, manly meals that Ezzo, Rachins, and the rest would sometimes bring to the table were far preferable to these portable dishes. Flam and Grassis would get mad at her if she made Reinhard cook, as it was a task below his station, so she did not make him do so, but when Felt had him make sweets in secret, he was not bad at all.

Unfortunately, Felt and Rom-jii’s culinary skills were so horrendous that she was amazed she had not died of food poisoning in the over ten years she had spent at the loot house. That was likely the source of Felt's meager growth when compared to others of the same age.

Regardless of the culinary circumstances of her Camp—

Felt: "I can't cook or nothing. So then, what can I do?"

Licking a grain of salt off her fingertip, Felt narrowed her red eyes, her thoughts returning to the initial "problem".

—At present, the Aldebaran Crew was moving from place to place, with Aldebaran and the Divine Dragon endeavoring to recover from their exhaustion incurred from the Royal Capital. Initially, Felt assumed that Aldebaran and his accomplices would make straight for their objective, the Grand Mogolade Geyser, after fleeing the Royal Capital, but it seemed as if it was not simply a matter of reaching the destination; an element of grasping the right time was involved as well.

However, those breaths of respite while waiting for that time were far from ideal—they had been met with the relentless sabotage of a callous pursuer, Otto Suwen.

Felt: "It's not just talking with bugs, it's an outrageously terrifying Divine Protection… Or rather, what's terrifying is probably not the Divine Protection, but Zodda bug-niichan himself."

Otto possessed a quiet and ignorant face, but his true nature seemed to be that of an individual warranting extreme caution.

Ultimately, every Divine Protection served as nothing more than just another tool. No matter how fine a sword one held, if they were not equipped with the strength to swing it, the ambition and opportunity to learn how to wield it, and the courage to brandish blade when the time came, then the sword would merely be a fine decoration.

Otto had the strength, the opportunity, the ambition, and the courage. —Thus, Felt would have no choice but to prove that she too possessed those things, swordless as she was.

Felt: "That nii-chan's going all out on the offensive… plotting some damn nasty stuff.”

With the Divine Protection of the Soul of Language, Otto had allied with bugs, birds, and fish; without allowing the Aldebaran Crew even a moment of tranquility, he was constantly forcing them to counter.

The buzzing of insects and the distant howling of beasts, the pollution of water and contamination of food supplies, his methods of attack were diverse; since they were unable to secure any sleeping hours, Felt, being dragged along with them, was also experiencing a headache.

But, getting caught in the crossfire like this was something Felt could discount as trivial damage. If possible, Felt would make use of her position accompanying the enemy to mercilessly contribute to Otto’s tactics.

Felt: “I thought there’d have been plenty enough meaning in serving to suppress the Divine Dragon, but…”

That alone would not suffice; she had understood that through the battle between Divine Dragon and Sword Demon at the Royal Capital.

Even if Felt’s presence curtailed the Divine Dragon’s power by ten percent, the remaining ninety percent was still enough to display catastrophic power; that was the true worth of the Divine Dragon Volcanica—considering the possibility that from here forward, Rom-jii would seek a rematch against Aldebaran’s party after his initial defeat, her current state was lacking.

At present, that was the “problem” that the captured Felt ought to face.

Felt: “No, I guess there’s also one more.”

Muttering so, Felt turned her eyes toward the other “problem”, visible from her position.

???: “…”

To her fore, across the crackling bonfire, a man sat facing Felt. — No, he could not be described as facing her. After all, his face was downcast, with nary a glance in her direction.

Clutching a sheathed sword to his chest, silently cowering as if he were deceased, the red-haired man radiated a sense of vexation in every direction—Heinkel.

Left alone at the entrance of a cave naturally formed in a rocky wall, Felt and Heinkel were spending a dismal time together, waiting for the ones who had gone to ascertain the safety of the surroundings and remove obstacles.

For the time being, Heinkel was supposed to be in charge of supervising Felt, but based on the ratio of who was looking at who, it would not have been possible to tell exactly who the supervisor was. That manner of rejecting the outside world, to the point of neither touching his dinner of dried meat nor putting water to his lips, thoroughly rubbed Felt the wrong way.

Felt: "…"

Felt had declared that she had no ruler of good or bad with which to measure Heinkel's actions. There was no falsehood in that, and she would not alter her view, but—she did have a ruler of liking and disliking to measure with.

At the very least, his demeanor befitting a Hollow despite yet living, was something she absolutely hated.

Felt: "Oi, if you aren't gonna eat, pass me that dried meat."

Heinkel: "…"

Felt: "You can hear me, yeah? Don't ignore… woah there."

Albeit her initial belligerence, the dried meat she had used to broach conversation was thrown at her as if to shut her up. She hastened to pick it up, but Heinkel cast nary a glance in her direction.

In that instant, thinking it foolish to unclench her fists, Felt called out “Oi” once more,

Felt: “So, why the hell did you interfere back there?”

Straight to the point, Felt boldly cut straight to the source of Heinkel’s cowering.

Heinkel: “…”

Heinkel kept his silence; however, given that he had flung the dried meat at her, he had not completely cut himself off from the outside world. Seizing on that, Felt lightly exhaled,

Felt: “Your old man… how should I call him. The fight between Reinhard’s grandfather and the Divine Dragon. I’m not really a warrior or anything like that, so I dunno the specifics of who was superior in that battle and stuff. But, you’re supposed to be the Divine Dragon’s ally, yeah?”

Heinkel: “…”

Felt: “For you to have interfered there meant that things were looking bad for the Divine Dragon. That’s an outrageous prospect, but there’s also something strange about it. —If your objective is the Dragon’s Blood, then that grandpa being on the verge of victory ought to have been the perfect opportunity.”

Heinkel: “…”

Felt: “Even though you might have gotten your hands on the Blood if the Dragon died, you got in the way. Why’s that?”

Using the other party’s lack of objections to make her point, Felt bluntly lined up her words.

As she had said, Heinkel’s interference with the battle between Divine Dragon and Sword Demon was exceedingly unnatural when considering his goal. There was also a possibility that he had acted on impulses of a strong grudge towards his father, but before flying off with the Divine Dragon, Heinkel had requested the Dragon to apply healing on Wilhelm, whom he had stabbed.

In other words, Heinkel had wished for neither Divine Dragon, nor Sword Demon, to die during that battle.

Felt: “It’s way too incoherent. Just what exactly are you—”

Thinking; it had been the moment she was about to continue her words. —Immediately pinned down to the hard ground, an unsheathed blade was fastened to Felt’s neck.

Heinkel: “You talk too much, brat.”

Right before her eyes, the bloodshot blue eyes of Heinkel were present. Perhaps because he had bitten the inside of his mouth, his breaths doused her in a reek of blood, causing Felt to grimace. While she did so, Heinkel continued to slide the blade as if to intimidate Felt,

Heinkel: “If you don’t want to feel the pain, then don’t say such unnecessary—goaghh?!”

Through an opening in that threat, Felt drove her fist forward without hesitation, straight into Heinkel’s nose.

Heinkel exclaimed “Uh, ah?”; rather than pain, it was the reality of having been hit that surprised him. As he stood up with the momentum, a kick to the chest sent him crashing onto his backside, and Felt looked down upon him.

Felt: “There’s no way I’d be scared of you at this point.”

Saying that, Felt picked up Heinkel’s sword which had fallen beside her. For a moment, Heinkel’s body tensed, but Felt heaved a sigh and tossed the sword back to him. Heinkel snatched up the sword, eyes widening, but Felt just shrugged her shoulders in response.

It might have seemed a mystery why she had returned the sword, but from Felt’s perspective, it was the natural decision.

Even if Felt went ballistic here, she could not beat Heinkel, and on the off chance that Heinkel thoughtlessly tried to cut Felt down, it was clear that Yae would be overjoyed. To begin with, the moment Felt and Heinkel had been left alone here, Yae’s aims were made obvious.

If possible, Yae wished to discard both Felt and Heinkel. Resorting to violence here was unideal, as it would only have been playing right into her hands. —Even without such reasoning, there was also the fact that it was not Felt's role to beat up Heinkel.

Felt: "Then you'd think it'd be Reinhard's role, but I think that also doesn't seem right."

Heinkel: "—Hk."

As Reinhard's name came up, Heinkel was once again greatly perturbed.

For a man over double Felt's age to be cowering in fear over her every word and action was absurdly unsightly. However, Felt wanted to uncover the reason behind that unsightliness.

Even if that would deliver a terribly bitter flavor to Felt, she wished to know.

Felt: "Same as before, you don't gotta answer anything. I'll speak on my own, and infer on my own."

Wiping the hem of her clothes, dirtied from being pinned down, Felt waited not for the other party's response, and looked to the sky. Within the night sky, visible through a fissure in the rocky wall, countless stars shone aglow with a brightness that did not belong.

Glaring at the ironic beauty in that sky, Felt broached with "As a matter of fact",

Felt: "What bothered me about the battle between the Divine Dragon and that grandpa was everything I said before. Even though you want that Dragon's Blood, the actions you took don't seem to add up. And so, there's one other thing with you that doesn't seem to add up either. —It's Gluttony."

Heinkel: "…"

Felt: "Let's ignore the fact that that bastard's got the absolute worst personality, and that he never ever stops talking. Even without that, he's a good-for-nothing Sin Archbishop, and there's no way he'd ever be welcomed, but… when it comes to reasons to hate that bastard, you ought to have way more than I do, yeah?"

Hushed, Heinkel gave no answer, but his breath caught upon hearing the question. Even if he did not respond with words, Heinkel's reaction was far too easy to read, and thus Felt narrowed her eyes.

Released from the Prison Tower, Roy Alphard was being made to accompany them by Aldebaran as a necessity for his plan—there were endless reasons to hate, to detest the Sin Archbishops who brought forth many a tragedy, but Heinkel ought to have had a more precise, definite reason for enmity.

After all, the woman who was Reinhard's mother, who was Heinkel's wife—the affliction of the ever-slumbering Louanna Astrea bore a striking resemblance to that of the victims of Gluttony.

Felt: "I said it once before, but I know about your… about Reinhard's family circumstances. That your wife's been sleeping for over ten years, and that you can't find a way to wake her up. Well, that might be resolved once you've received the Dragon's Blood, but… how are you gonna settle the score?"

Heinkel: "…"

Felt: "How are you gonna settle the score with the fuckface who put your wife to sleep for over ten years?"

Through the assault on Duchess Crusch Karsten and the battle at the Watergate City Pristella, the damage incurred by the Authority of Gluttony had been made clear; Sleeping Beauties—tragic beings whose ties had all been severed, discovered in a state of unawakening sleep, with nobody around aware of their existence. It was uncovered that such individuals were none other than victims of the Witch Cult.

Of course, that also ought to have reached the ears of Heinkel.

Nevertheless, not once had Heinkel displayed any interest in Gluttony, who could have been the cause of his wife's slumber.

—Was it because his utmost priority was to acquire the Dragon's Blood and awaken his wife?

—Was the impact of stabbing his own father, bathing in his blood, simply all too much?

Or perhaps—

Felt: "If you seriously are just completely disregarding the bastard, then why?"

Heinkel: "W-wait… what are…"

Felt: "You don't need to respond. I told you, didn't I? I'll speak on my own, and infer on my own."

His grip on the sword quivering, with an expression deathly pale Heinkel did look at Felt. The gaze of eyes Astrea-blue clashed with that of her own red, and Felt was convinced.

Deep within Heinkel's eyes were terribly indefinite, yet ultimately unperishing embers. —Likely, they were heat of the same ilk as that which dwelled in the eyes of Rom-jii whenever he gazed upon Felt.

Heinkel: "…"

Appearing to be a despicable man, self-centered, selfish, self-destructive, of wavering heart whilst being ignorant of his own capabilities, and beyond all help, was Heinkel Astrea. —If concealed deep within, visible through only the slightest of gaps, was a heat ever-present in this man's every action, that would mean.

Felt: "The reason you don't even bother to look at Gluttony, is because you know there's no connection between your wife falling asleep and Gluttony. You know it's incorrect, so you don't turn your sword on him. But…"

—Louanna Astrea's affliction of Sleeping Beauty, was definitively different to that of the other Sleeping Beauties.

Unlike the Sleeping Beauties whose every tie in the world was severed, Louanna was remembered by Reinhard, by Heinkel, by all who were acquainted with her, and her slumber they all did lament.

In other words, it was different. Louanna Astrea was no victim of Gluttony. Then, while Heinkel knew the truth of the matter, he had not shared it with anyone else.

Why was that? Because he could not afford for any to know. —The cause, of Louanna's slumber.

That cause was—

Felt: "—Reinhard."

Heinkel: "…"

A pair of motionless, widened eyes, a voiceless countenance, a husky breath void of vitality, all of which became an answer more eloquent than words, lending credence to Felt's conviction.

That which she absolutely needed to do. —Finding that out, was Felt's current "problem".

By her resolve and conviction to face that "problem", she arrived at the terribly bitter truth, and that was—

Felt: "—So the one who put Reinhard's mother to sleep, was Reinhard himself?"

Bonus Short Stories

The Land of Nascent Wolves:
Undead Busters III

1

—Harline the Iron-Arms was a weaponkin whose brutality cemented his name in the history of the Empire.

The weaponkin, born with the capacity to wield parts of their bodies as armaments, spanned many variations, such as fashioning one's arms into sharp blades, growing a steel lash in a manner akin to a tail, or morphing one's back into a greatshield.

Among those weaponkin, Harline's speciality was exactly as described by his alias, Iron-Arms— swinging his arms wrought of steel, he was a monster notorious for having slaughtered countless people.

However, to brand his nature as brutal, and his existence as a monster, would be a bit hasty.

If you asked Harline himself, there was another side to the unfavorable manner in which the story painted him. —His manner of crushing the heads of those he deemed opponents may have been called brutal, but that was the fault of the construction of their heads being weaker than that of Harline's arms. It may have been said that he mercilessly killed women and children, but that was just to sever off any worries of anxiety or revenge. Above all, the one who truly ought to have been called a monster was not Harline, but his younger brother "Excuse me. It seems like that would end up being a rather long story but the more you speak the more it seems like it's an episode that piques nobody's interest so why don't we change things up to a scene depicting stuff like the leading actor's preferences and trivial daily life that the fans truly want to see!"

A carefree voice seemed to blot over the introduction, and in an instant, the arms raised aloft were severed at the elbows, and the Iron Arms from which he derived his alias spun around as they flew through the air.

There was no pain. If his body had been reconstructed in such a manner, then he might just be able to reconnect the arms by pressing the cross sections back together—

???: “In the way.”

That meager hope of Harline’s was extinguished by the hellfire that engulfed his airborne arms.

As he bore witness to the arms as they met a terminus of ash and dust, anger swelled in Harline, having lost his Iron Arms, and he would attempt to pounce at the enemy who had enacted that—

Harline: “—Ah?”

A tiny palm squarely touched his chest. Right in front of Harline was a young girl of short stature, and he met her blue eyes.

Then—

???: “—Aaine.”

Having been resurrected from death, Harline the Iron-Arms was once again plunged into the depths of Od Lagna.

2

Cecilus: “Man~, that really was an opponent with absolutely no pushback or challenge or sense of accomplishment whatsoever! He bluffed with a name like Iron-Arms so I thought he’d surely make for a fine bout but the script might have been a lot tidier if that whole scene was just dropped!”

Spica: “Uu~, eieved.”

Cecilus: “Right?! I thought that you would feel the same way, Spica-san! Well I suppose that since Star Eating succeeded with no issues it’s good that your hopes have been met, right, Anya? You think so too, right Anya?”

Arakiya: “Cecilus, you’re noisy.”

Cecilus: “Hahahaha, what would I be if not loud? We’re in a place detached from human settlements. Our stories won’t reach anyone unless we raise our voices!”

He was shot down by a curt comment from his fellow traveller, however, Cecilus still laughed loudly in good humour. Sandwiched between those two, Spica shrugged her shoulders with an “Uu~au”.

—The Star Eating pilgrimage for which Spica had stayed behind in the Empire, an attempt to reduce the number of undead resurrected by the Great Disaster to zero, had commenced with the permission of the Vollachian Emperor, Vincent.

The existence of the undead was something of a headache for Vollachia— in the sense that they were the embers of the Great Disaster which had caused so much damage, their elimination was desirable both for practical reasons as well as for the sentiments of the populace, which aligned with Spica’s desire to amass positive contributions.

Spica bore the unerasable sin of having been the Sin Archbishop of Gluttony in times past.

Without memories of the past identity known as Louis Arneb, it was a sin Spica had no recollection of enacting, but as long as the world continued to see it as a wrongdoing that could not be so easily forgiven, nobody would lend Spica an ear even if she cried and wailed and pleaded. —No, there were people who would lend her an ear, so Spica had no choice but to work as hard as she could to rinse away that poor reputation in order to be together with those people.

On this journey of atonement, Spica’s ability to properly dispose of the undead with Star Eating was perfect, and furthermore, her companions on this quest were the two people who were evaluated to possess the greatest strength throughout the entire Empire— and yet.

Cecilus: “To begin with, aren’t your selections kinda bad, Anya?

Even though I desire to find a more spectacular and picturesque villain why is it that I only continue to have my hopes dashed? Could it be that you keep leaving me hanging on purpose? Nobody desires that sort of thing so even if out of personal desire or spite such methods are incredibly petty, behhh!”

Arakiya: “I don’t think about you to that extent, Cecilus.”

Cecilus: “So you mean that you keep crashing us into the end of the road without thinking causing us to draw one losing ticket after another? So that would make Anya the type of heroine whose archetype is that of not having anything but would that not then be quite humiliating?”

Arakiya: “Die.”

Making statements that many would see as being provocative, Cecilus caused the eyepatch-clad woman to avert her gaze— Spica’s other companion, Arakiya, could not hide her irritation.

When it came to these two, from start to finish and from dawn to dusk, they would bicker in such a manner, causing Spica’s head to spin as she was caught up in the middle of it all. —But, these two, unable to get along, matched each other’s pace to an unbelievable extent, and were indispensable for Spica’s journey.

As a matter of fact, the undead known as Harline the Iron-Arms who had just been sent away through Star Eating, was an enemy so formidable that Spica would not have been able to do a thing without these two. As expected from the immovable First and Second of the Vollachian Empire, which Subaru had referred to as a nation of complete carnage.

The Iron-Arms seemed to have been someone who had been known for his strength during his life, but the pair had easily evicted Harline from the mountain cavern he had burrowed away in and finished the job while the sun was yet high in the sky.

Hence, she had no dissatisfaction whatsoever with the strength of the pair. She merely wished that they would get along a bit better.

Cecilus: “Ah! You still only fry the eggs on one side, Anya! No matter how many multitudes of thousands of times I ask you, why don’t you just do it?! The half-fried eggs are all crying out!”

Arakiya: “Eggs don’t cry. Cecilus, are you stupid?”

Cecilus: “Mghkk! In that case I’m crying! The tears shed by the leading actor will cause a mere lunchtime scene to go down as a classic that will be discussed for many years to come!”

Whilst doing this and that, Cecilus and Arakiya had at some point started to make preparations for a meal, which led to the beginning of a dispute regarding the manner in which the food was prepared.

Having taken in a tremendously powerful Spirit, Arakiya was preeminent at wielding the forces of earth, water, fire, and wind; instantly creating a steel plate by compressing earth, she heated it with fire to prepare the tools for cooking. Onto it, Cecilus cracked an egg which he had procured from the nest of a wild bird, and thus, they began frying the egg.

Spica: “Aaiya.”

The two of them displayed good communication, even in this situation, and with a sidelong glance to Cecilus, who was deftly preparing the wild bird which he had also strangled, Spica called out to Arakiya as the latter fried the egg.

Receiving Spica’s call, Arakiya looked towards her,

Arakiya: “…It wasn’t on purpose.”

Spica: “Uu~?”

Arakiya: “It wasn’t to annoy Cecilus. We must, keep searching for undead.”

As Arakiya falteringly selected her words, Spica widened her eyes, and then loosened her lips.

What Arakiya was explaining was in regards to Cecilus’s prior comment— the suspicion that she had purposely chosen an opponent in opposition to the group's desires.

That which could have been called the very land of Vollachia itself, the Great Spirit Muspel, the Stone— having merged with that entity, Arakiya could sense the whereabouts of the undead, who had been resurrected using Muspel's power. However, it had still only been a short time since she had merged with the Great Spirit, so Arakiya had yet to fully master its power, and thus could not tell apart the strength of the undead she perceived, which caused her anguish. This also brought with it several complaints from Cecilus.

Due to that reality, Arakiya expressed her apologies to Spica in her own way. Understanding that to be the reason behind her explanation, Spica sat down next to Arakiya and leaned her head on her shoulder.

Arakiya: "…You're heavy, and in the way."

Spica: "Aau-."

Without meeting eyes, Arakiya displayed a cold attitude, however made no effort to remove Spica's head. Spica felt good about that, and together they watched over the egg she was frying at hand.

Cecilus: "Huh? What's this what's this with you two sitting all nicely together in a picturesque scene? Please keep all developments of unknown events off-screen while I'm doing my best to prepare this bird!"

Arakiya: "Cecilus, you're the one who's off-screen."

Cecilus: "There are things that are fine to say and things that aren't fine to say, Anya!"

Spica: "Eius, aa's igt."

Having reached his boiling point unusually fast, Cecilus puffed his chest out with a "Naturally!" at Spica's comment,

Cecilus: "Alright? Of course even those who are not actors deserve their time in the spotlight and on those occasions the camera should be turned to them. But but when it's not that type of scene the shot should always be angled with the leading actor right at the center. That—”

As Cecilus began speaking tediously yet at such a high pace that it bore no feeling of tediousness, Spica feared that another fight would break out with Arakiya. Thus, Spica looked towards Arakiya in trepidation, but—

Arakiya: “…”

She was not looking towards Cecilus. Not towards the steel plate frying the egg by her hands, either. Her beautiful features, still with a trace of youthfulness behind the immense power they concealed, were facing upwards, and her thin lips quivered.

Arakiya: “—It’s coming.”

It happened at the next moment. —A roar thundered across the campground, and a part of the mountain was blown away.

3

—Breznon the Iron-Legs was a weaponkin whose brutality cemented his name in the history of the Empire.

Born as a weaponkin with both legs wrought of steel, Breznon was a monster known for having used his titular Iron Legs to kick countless people to death.

But, if you asked Breznon himself, the one who truly ought to be called a monster was not Breznon, but his older brother, Harline the Iron-Arms “—GRAOAAA!!”

???: “ORAHHHHHHH!!”

Alongside a mighty roar, struck by the oncoming blow of a black bracchium, Breznon was sent flying into the air, spinning his body around to unsheathe and aim a kick at his opponent’s face.

The steel-wrought Iron Legs were concealed by pants and shoes, unperceivable by an opponent upon first encounter. His older brother, the Iron-Arms, would always strongly assert himself, but since Breznon did no such thing, there was no end to those who misread his kicks.

This opponent would likewise choose to catch the blow without dodging, and would have his face smashed in by Breznon's Iron Legs— that instant, Breznon's leg was caught in his opponent's jaws, and shattered.

Breznon: "Ah?"

Widening his eyes at the impossible situation of having lost out in hardness, Breznon froze as the joint of his other leg was met by a flash of claws, severing the fixture between flesh and steel as his left leg was torn from its root.

Right leg crunched, and left leg severed by claws, Breznon had been disarmed in an instant.

And then—

Breznon: "Wh-What the hell, are you—"

???: "—Luck hath pissed upon thee. I be naught but a fordeemed wretch."

The gaping jaw sunk its teeth into Breznon's windpipe, nowhere left to run. That biting force, capable of even crushing legs of steel, was something that Breznon's slender throat had no way of resisting.

???: "…"

Fangs gnashed, and the yoke which tethered the empty life was lost; the undead known as Breznon shattered like ceramic, crumbling to smithereens.

Ascertaining that, the one who had enacted that by his own hand— nay, by his own fangs, looking down the slope of the mountain that crumbled due to the tremors of battle, slowly turned around,

???: "—It's exceedingly wonderful to say that you're nothing but a fordeemed wretch. To not say much and give a sense of mystery in such a scene produces a brilliant performance. Dear me I might have to watch and learn.”

There stood a blue-haired, waso young man, bearing a smile upon his soft features.

???: “…Thou’rt, whom?”

Young Man: “The leading actor of this world, the one who stands at the center of the stage anticipated by all. In addition, one who bears the duty of hunting you, resurrected as an undead as you are, my name is Cecilus Segmunt.”

Eloquently, the young man gave his introduction as if having rehearsed it many times before— at the sight of Cecilus, his bestial fur stood on end.

Without even needing to look at the two katanas holstered at his waist, Cecilus was visibly a fighter from his posture alone. The fact that Cecilus was so accustomed to giving his introduction, was proof of the extent to which he had traversed the front lines of death.

Warriors who staked themselves in duels had a habit of giving their name, and he was one who had experienced that opportunity several hundreds of times.

And, whether or not he realized the heightened tension within him, Cecilus tilted his head saying “By the way”,

Cecilus: “Might I ask your name?”

???: “…Volcas.”

Cecilus: “Ho! Volcas-san! That’s quite a nice name. A black-furred wolfman gives the impression of an outstanding fighter but for your name to be Volcas on top of that is quite exquisite! It reminds me of one of the characters starring in “Iris and the King of Thorns” who was a preeminent warrior talked about through the history of the Empire, the Doomwolf General!”

Volcas: “…”

Cecilus: “I said it reminds me but could it be that you are that very person in the flesh?”

With a sudden sparkle in his eyes, Cecilus sought to ascertain that without a hint of malice, and the jet-black wolfman— Volcas, while scratching his own neck, scrunched up his snout.

He had been asked about a name and title he had not wished to hear. Naturally, it caused him to scowl.

Cecilus: “With that look on your face the answer’s clear even if you don’t say anything. As long as I haven’t misread your expression which could possibly be displeasure at being mistaken for a famous person…”

Volcas: “As long as that, then what?”

Cecilus: “I’ll have to apologize to Anya! Truly and certainly beyond a shadow of a doubt! You are the very symbol of the grand climax I’ve desired!”

As Cecilus smiled from ear to ear, Volcas experienced the greatest dread he had ever known, and readied himself. Seeing that response, Cecilus widened his stance, and,

Cecilus: “—Blue Lightning, Cecilus Segmunt.”

Volcas: “—Doomwolf General, Volcas.”

Showing that he too was one well accustomed to giving introductions, Volcas’s claws and fangs closed in on his opponent.

However, the strength of those bearing the title of General in the current era was—

Cecilus: “Please don’t take it too hard. —I’m simply far too dazzling.”

A flash of lightning and a triumphant proclamation colored the conclusion of the momentary combat between fellow Generals emblematic of their respective eras.

Cecilus: “I don’t wanna do that though? I’m completely against having Spica-san eat Volcas-san here! This place is absolutely Chaosflame! It can only possibly be Yorna-san’s place!”

Arakiya: “You’re not making sense. I won’t play along with your games, Cecilus.”

Cecilus: “These aren’t games it’s romance! Why can’t you just understand this Anya? If this wish and prayer came true then Anya’s precious little sister princess would have surely been greatly pleased!”

Arakiya: “—Hk! Unbelievable…! Just go die! Die! Cecilus!”

Cecilus: “Ah! Anya’s mad! Though just now it was my choice of words that was poor!”

Too loud to just be called lively, the tempestuous conversation reached the ears of Volcas, causing him to slowly open his eyelids. And then—

???: “Aau?”

Right before his eyes, peering into his face, collapsed as he was, a young girl met his eyes.

Volcas: “…”

Behind her was unfolding a duel so fierce it made Volcas’s clash with the Iron-Legs seem like child’s play, but Volcas averted his focus from that.

Either way, he had already lost. If his second shot at life had been shattered and come to an end, then so be it.

However—

Girl: “Ood ohning.”

Feeling that the young girl, patting his head as she said that, would do no such thing, he closed his eyes.

Merely, the young girl’s hand caused him to silently recall when a gentle woman had once done the same for him, and thus silently, ever so silently, Volcas,

Volcas: “—Iris.”

Indeed, calling the name of the woman pictured on the back of his eyelids, so excessively did that voice quiver with love.

To be continued

Kararagi Reaper Incident III

1

Upon arriving at their destination of Banan, Anastasia's group was aghast at the disastrous sight.

Originally, they had come here due to the reports of large-scale wind damage, but—

???: "I would have never imagined the city to be damaged to this extent…"

Laying eyes upon the same scene, Julius muttered so as he received that selfsame shock.

In accordance with his words, the major city in western Kararagi, Banan, had had its buildings destroyed, its trees felled by a great wind; it had been transformed into a wasteland where all conceptions of city districts had vanished.

???: "This here won't do. Even my place seems ta have vanished. Tho', it'd be fine if everyone I know's alright."

Anastasia: "Halibel's place; were ya livin' in Banan now? If ya'd told us that…"

Halibel: "Not like the wind woulda stopped if I'd said anythin'. Woulda only made lil' Ana's face cloud over, so I didn't say nothin'. I ain't someone with lotsa possessions ta begin with, so even if I lost my house it's 'bout the same amount of trouble as a bit of rain."

Halibel played the fool with a wave of his hand, causing Anastasia to feel discontent.

Rather than stemming from the fact that he had not told her, it was more so discontent at how his reason for not doing so felt like he was treating her like a child; but, pointing that out would also be extremely childish, so she would do no such thing.

Regardless, the level of damage from the wind made it clear as to why it had been so difficult to obtain information.

From what could be observed, even though it was the strong people of Kararagi, there had yet to be anyone proactively engaging in its restoration. There was a need for someone to raise their voice, and to take charge of the command.

Normally, that was a task that would have been undertaken by the Mayor or someone beneath them, but—

???: "—Ah!! Miss! It's the Miss! As expected, I was right because it smelled like Miss!"

Then, as a loud voice tore through the ravaged cityscape, Anastasia lifted her face right away. When she looked, she saw a small figure waving its hands and running towards her from the other side of the street.

Anastasia: "Mimi! Ya had me worryin', are ya alright?"

Mimi: "I'm doing super good! The wind blew me into the air really strong, but thanks to the captain pretty much everyone is safe!"

At the entrance of the kittengirl who had rushed towards her—Mimi, Anastasia and the rest patted their chests in relief.

While she did believe that she could more easily rest assured when there had been no news from Ricardo based on her prior experiences, that was not to say she did not feel at all worried upon bearing witness to the extent of the wind damage. But, seeing Mimi's energetic figure and hearing her report, she could now rest assured.

Anastasia: "By the way, when ya say that "pretty much everyone's" safe, ya mean that Ricardo's the only one who's been hurt?"

Mimi: "Ohh, as expected of the Miss! Right answer on the first guess! Bullseye! Your prize is a hug from Mimi!"

Anastasia: "Yes, yes. Though I'm grateful, I'll be passin' it over to Julius 'cause I'm feelin' a bit wobbly."

Julius: “Received. Come, Mimi.”

As Julius smiled and welcomed her with open arms, Mimi leaped at him with an “Uryahhh!!”. With a sidelong glance to that heartwarming embrace, Anastasia contemplated the terrible state of the city, and Ricardo who had likely pushed himself too far.

It was a matter which made her wish to say that he never changed no matter where he went, but this was his motherland of Kararagi, so the locations in which he pushed himself too far were actually more concentrated to this region.

Halibel: “So, Mi-chan, ya mind if we ask where the Ricardo of the essence might be? We kinda wanna know a bit more ‘bout what the damages ta the city actually were.”

Mimi: “Captain? Captain’s over with Tia! He’s keeping watch so that she doesn’t go berserk!”

Bobbing the kiseru he had begun puffing up and down with his mouth, Halibel asked that to Mimi, to which she responded in high spirits. However, included in her response was an unknown name, and a troubling phrase.

So that she did not go berserk, suggested that she was not peaceful.

Anastasia: “Mimi? Who’s that Tia you’re speakin’ of? Sounds like someone we don’t know.”

At that question, Mimi began to speak, “So, umm”,

Mimi: “Tia’s that! She made the wind blow a lot, and sent the town and Mimi and everyone else flying up into the sky; she’s a really strong woman! Right now, she’s imprisoned in a holding cell!”

Thus, she had declared so.

2

—The unprecedented great cataclysm of wind that had occurred in the Kararagi City-State’s Second-City, Banan.

With Banan at the epicenter, the large-scale wind storm had done a severe amount of damage even to the surrounding towns and villages, but even after the few days that had passed since the event, the lack of accurate information regarding the damages had led to confusion across the various areas.

With the scale of the damage being the only thing ascertainable from the meager information available, various relief efforts had been sent into the affected area; enlisted among them was the name of Anastasia's private beastperson mercenary group, the Iron Fang.

Considering the duties usually sought from a mercenary group, it might have seemed unsuitable to dispatch them into a disaster zone, but the one who had arranged that, the Mayor of the Third-City Ivada, Orgo Hayata, with a sharp mind that belied his eccentric appearance, was the first to recognize the possibility that the wind cataclysm might have been the work of man.

That behind the curtain of this great wind storm, was interposed the will of one who concealed extraordinary power.

Thus—

???: "—What is it, human? There shouldn't be anything so funny to look at here. Or perhaps, have you come to laugh at me in this state? Is that really so funny, I wonder… It isn't funny!"

Anastasia: "Even tho' I ain't said nothin', what a darn strange girly."

With those words, Anastasia gave a wry smile to that possessor of dreadful power— the white-haired girl who proclaimed herself as such, who still had yet found herself locked up in a holding cell.

Almond-shaped eyes, and a projecting voice that seemed to linger in the ears; with both elements seeming to be strikingly combative, she was a person who left an impression of beauty and sharpness. She appeared to be either younger than or around the same age as Anastasia, so it was hard to believe that she was the origin of the dreadful wind disaster that has caused the disastrous scene of Banan.

Echidna: “I was also dubious, but it seems there is no doubt about it being this girl, correct, Ricardo?”

Ricardo: “That’s right. I also traded blows with her… or rather, we had a contest of endurance. ‘N in the midst of all that, she sent a stupid number of buildin’s up into the sky.”

Mimi: “I flew around a ton in the crazy wind! Wanna do it again sometime!”

Ricardo: “Gimme a break, will ya? My body’s been seriously roughed up.”

Ricardo responded to Echidna’s question, worn out by Mimi’s uninhibited comment.

Bandages were wrapped all around Ricardo’s body, and his right half had sustained particularly serious injuries. He had just lost one of his arms in the battle against the Witch Cult a few months prior, so upon seeing him so beaten up once again, Anastasia had a mountain of things she was itching to lecture him on, but she would have to contain herself for now.

Ricardo: “This here’s someone’s mansion… I believe the owner’s named Riften Magorge. He’s famous for holdin’ the position of the Fierce Merchant.”

Echidna: “On top of being a great merchant of Banan, he also ought to have taken on the duties of Mayor. He has had no acquaintance with Ana before, but it sounds like he is quite the important person. If he were here, one would think that the post-disaster operations would be going a bit smoother, but…”

Ricardo: “Seems like nobody’s able ta contact Riften-san. There’s also talk that he got caught up in the wind storm while in transit.”

Anastasia: “I see. Tho’, it’d’ve been better if he was alright.”

Unexpectedly, the cause for the heightened chaos in Banan after the disaster was the absence of the Mayor, so Anastasia made a mental note that the utmost priority was the need to put forth a representative.

Then, she suddenly felt concern for Julius and Halibel, both of whom had been keeping silent until now. Ever since the two of them had entered the holding cell— a room within Riften's mansion, the Magorge Palace, and laid their eyes upon Tia, the one being held captive there, their mouths had remained closed.

Thus, Anastasia voiced "Julius?" to her personal Knight, and,

Anastasia: "What's the matter? Yer eyes are stuck lookin' at that girl. She's a beauty, so have ya maybe been enchanted?"

Julius: "—No, my apologies. No matter how beautiful someone might be, to think I would ever set Anastasia-sama aside and become enchanted. Only, she is… this personage, is a different matter."

Anastasia: "…"

Julius had responded in earnest to the persiflage she had appended, and hearing him deliberately revise the way in which he referred to Tia, Anastasia narrowed her pale turquoise eyes.

It was not apprehension about her Knight having a change of heart. It was precisely because she was aware of her Knight's nature.

Thus, before Anastasia's eyes, Julius kneeled down before Tia, who was sitting on her folded legs atop the tatami, and with slight sentiments of reverence upon his gentle facial features,

Julius: "In such a place, in such a manner, I did not think I would be able to meet a Great Spirit as esteemed as yourself. For the rudeness of my delayed greeting, I deeply apologize."

Tia: "Huh? You can tell what I am? Impressive. Not that I'm praising you, though."

Julius: "It is an honor to receive your praise. After all, I am but a man who has been granted the lowest seat of Spirit Knights."

Tia: "Didn't I just say I'm not praising you…!"

As Julius politely revered her, Tia shouted at him with a stern glare.

Setting aside Tia's anger for now, learning that her identity was that of a Great Spirit, Anastasia successfully connected the dots between Banan's destruction and her presence as the origin of it. If it was a powerful Great Spirit, then it would have easily been possible to generate gusts strong enough to level a city.

However, beside Anastasia as she thought this, Halibel inclined his head with a "Hmmm?",

Halibel: "I'd thought she was a girl with a curious air 'bout her, but it all just clicked now that ya mention she's a Spirit. Tho', what's botherin' me is somethin' different ta Julius."

Ricardo: "Golly, Halibel. Are ya tryna badmouth one of our own? If ya do things half-hearted, playin' as a lone-wolf, we'll teach ya just how scary the pack can be."

Mimi: "Yep yep! We'll teach you, and take all your money!"

Halibel: "Ohh, scary, scary. Haven't paid my tuition fees in a gosh darn while, and ya won't be findin' no loose change in my pockets. But, even so…"

Tia: "—?"

Giving a wry smile to Ricardo and Mimi's interjection, Halibel sent a sharp sidelong glance over to Tia. Noticing his gaze, Tia wore a suspicious expression, and Halibel spoke.

Halibel: "Yer body's structured in an awfully unnatural manner. There're tons of deadspots both big 'n small, 'n they move 'n disappear 'n just don't seem ta settle down at all."

Tia: "I don't know what you're trying to say, but are you picking a fight? If that's the case—"

Halibel: "What's this now, ain't ya seemin' ta be missin' somethin'? The Mana's flowin' in that sorta way."

Tia: "—Hk!"

That instant, a gale began to rise within the holding cell, causing

Anastasia’s long hair to blow wildly.

With eyes sharpened, and teeth bared, the fact that it was a wind that had sprung forth from Tia, was instantly apparent from how all warriors present immediately stood to guard Anastasia.

Julius, Ricardo, Mimi and Halibel, all stood on guard for Anastasia. Tia cast an intense glare upon Halibel, who stood calmly among them,

Tia: “You, do you know the whereabouts of my Light Sphere?”

Halibel: “Hmm? Nah, ain’t got a clue. Why’d ya think that?”

Tia: “You just said! Didn’t you just say how I was missing something?! The rest of you heard it as well, didn’t you?! It’s this guy! This guy has my Light Sphere…!”

Halibel: “Zoinks, seems like I stirred the hornet’s nest. What’s goin’ on here, Ricardo?”

Ricardo: “She was sayin’ somethin’ ‘bout lookin’ for an object called a Light Sphere. Tho’, we couldn’t really grasp the gist of what the Tia lassie was sayin’, so we decided to just put her here ‘til someone capable of conversin’ with her came.”

Before Tia, who brimmed with enmity as she bared her teeth, Halibel and Ricardo exchanged those words.

No details had been revealed, but Tia was searching for something, and had mistakenly thought that it was in Halibel’s possession. Then, the reason why Tia had ravaged the city likely also laid therein.

Anastasia: “In other words, someone ran off with somethin’ important to Tia… the Light Sphere. While searchin’ for that thief, ya went on a wind rampage absolutely everywhere, ain’t that ’bout right?”

Tia: “…That turn of phrase, “ran off with”, I don’t like it. Doesn’t it make me sound like a fool? Whoever stole it did so by a cowardly method. It seems like they knew they could not win in a contest of strength, so they got sly. Humans are experts at that, after all… Like they could ever be an expert, damn coward!”

Anastasia: “I see… By the way, ya sure ya didn’t take it, Halibel?”

Halibel: “Well, I’ve done been in the Empire this whole gosh darn time right ‘longside y’all, lil’ Ana. Don’t’cha think it’d be impossible for me ta steal that thing from Tia-chan, even if I used a clone?”

Anastasia: “…”

Halibel nonchalantly shrugged his shoulders, but since Anastasia knew what he was capable of utilizing his clones, things might have gotten a little complicated, so she would withhold that information. Nevertheless, she knew that Halibel was not a suspect. His statement just now had been purely to inform Tia.

Anastasia: “At any rate, we’ve got Tia-san’s goal, but to destroy one town after another ‘cause of that’s intolerable. Even if she’s a Spirit as Julius says, that ain’t somethin’ we can overlook.”

For Anastasia and the other humans to make a Spirit abide by the laws of the Kararagi City-States felt a bit strict, but there was no other way to measure something like this. If she was going to enact outrageous deeds that crossed the line drawn by the law, then they would have to respond appropriately.

Julius: “Anastasia-sama, to manifest herself in such a detailed human form means that even among Great Spirits, Tia-sama possesses extraordinary power.”

Anastasia: “‘N for that reason, ya wanna overlook this as a Spiritual-Arts User?”

Julius: “No. Only, to make an enemy of such a Great Spirit, also comes with a high possibility of making an enemy out of the very nature that she is at essence. If it was a wind cataclysm that had assailed Banan, then…”

Anastasia: “Ya need the resolve to make an enemy of the wind itself. I see, that’s quite the tough foe.”

As Julius's voice resonated within her ears, Anastasia closed a single eye at his warning.

She had not had many points of contact with Great Spirits— strictly speaking, Echidna, who disguised herself as Anastasia's scarf, counted as a Great Spirit while also being artificial, so she could not say that she had never had a point of contact, but that was a troublesome quality.

But, at the composure of Anastasia's group, none other than Tia spoke out, "Wait",

Tia: "I'm saying this because you're noisy, but stop revering me because I'm a Great Spirit or whatever. I hate it. I don't like it. I'll start wanting to kill you."

Halibel: "Ya better quit sayin' stuff that's too overly violent. Yer current position's that of a captive."

Tia: "The thing that should be stopped is your misunderstanding. I'm simply here doing what I want. Also, I have something to say to the female woman looking all high and mighty there in the middle."

Anastasia: "I think that "female" 'n "woman" mean the same thing, but what'cha got for me?"

Tia: "One town after another, you said it as if I've destroyed multiple cities, but this is the only place I've rampaged, so it was just the one time when that wolf cub stopped me."

Anastasia: "—What'd ya say?"

As Tia confessed with her arms crossed, Anastasia raised her eyebrows, letting out a gasp.

For a moment, the possibility that it was just a ruse by Tia flashed through her mind, but she could not see any meaning in admitting that she had devastated Banan, but not that she was responsible for the other cases. Judging from her personality thus far, there did not seem to be a human element of telling worthless lies.

There was no falsehood in Tia's words. —That was to say, there was another cause for the several wind cataclysms that were popping up.

Then, it happened right after that thought crossed her mind.

Fighters: "—!"

The atmosphere in the holding cell suddenly tensed, and Anastasia felt a chill crawl down her spine.

Much like before, instead of Anastasia, who was unable to fight, those who could reacted to something before her. However, this time, they were joined by one other person. —Tia.

The five of them simultaneously directed their attention outside of the Magorge Palace, strung high with tension.

And then—

Tia: "—Tsk, they're coming with human power."

Declaring so in an irritated manner, Tia turned around and held her hand aloft, pointed at the wall of the holding cell. The next instant, the wind that gust forth from that hand sliced the wall apart, forcibly creating a new egress. That instant action gave no time for anyone to interfere, but there was no time to challenge her on it.

Halibel: "This ain't good."

Halibel spoke in a manner bereft of seriousness and urgency; however, that was a great deal removed from reality.

Through the hole that had been opened, far in the distance from the devastated townscape of Banan, slowly approaching was an enormous vortex of wind— a tornado engulfing everything was en route.

Anastasia: "…"

For a moment, widening her eyes at that sight, Anastasia's thoughts came to a halt.

What flashed through her mind in that instant was the scale of damage and lives that would be lost were the tornado to reach the city, a premature pessimistic and pragmatic violence of numbers.

But—

Julius: "—Anastasia-sama."

As soon as her Knight called her name, the threat of those violent numbers was lost. —No, with the notion that they had no choice but to make that threat be lost, it set her resolve alight.

Anastasia: "Mimi! Gather the Iron Fang! Julius, Halibel! Halt the tornado's progress, I'll leave ya to figure out how! Ricardo, I'll be needin' ya to push yerself again. Come with me!"

As Anastasia issued commands with the clap of her hands, everyone receiving them blinked their eyes, and immediately responded appropriately, leaping to follow the duties to which they had been ordered.

Without the time to spare to see them off politely, Anastasia stepped forward, and,

Anastasia: "Tia-san, ya mind if we rely on yer strength? Ya want us to cooperate, don't'cha?"

Tia: "—. Are you testing me? You've got some nerve. I'll praise you for that… Once we're finished!"

Tia was taken aback, but ferociously smiled at Anastasia's request. As Anastasia nodded at her valiance, the completely bandaged Ricardo stood up next to her,

Ricardo: "Miss, now ain't ya lookin' pretty darn cool."

Anastasia: "'Course. I'd know even if ya didn't tell me."

Indeed, gaining strength from the unbelievably laid back interaction as a hopeless natural disaster made its approach before them, Anastasia stepped outside through the gaping opening that Tia had made in order to protect the major city of Banan.

To be continued

No Stella No Life III

???: “—Expand Territory, Matrix Redefinition.”

With that proclamation as an impetus, the rules of the world were rewritten around Aldebaran.

Ordinarily, the world would not permit any usage that did not abide by its fixed rules.

Objects fell from up to down, sound could be heard but not seen, hot things felt hot, cold things felt cold, the color of blood was red most of the time, and a life once lost could never return. —These were defined as unshakeable rules for the stable operation of the world.

???: “However, Witch Factors take those established laws, and bend them to the will of their possessor. Truly, a refutation of the world desiring stability… to be frank, it is fruit borne of pestering.”

Aldebaran: “Pestering…”

???: “From the perspective of Od Lagna, it must be quite unbearable, yes? Having poured in time and intent to forge those laws, only for them to be blotted over by an extremely small number of mutational variations on the whims of distorted human nature. Supposing I were to go through that same hardship, then…”

Aldebaran: “Then what?”

???: “I would end up wanting to investigate just what sort of intentions brought about such actions; the reasons and objectives behind it all… Hm, if I may say so myself, perhaps my personality is not suited to this example.”

Thus acknowledging her own curiosity as a minority viewpoint, the Witch spoke calmly, causing Aldebaran to shrug his shoulders in exasperation.

Conversations with the Witch, with how eager she was to chat and learn, would often derail in such a manner.

He would occasionally get some useful anecdotes from her, but even in those cases, it would never cut straight to the point. The conversation would twist and turn, lose sight of the original focus, and as Aldebaran listened to the Witch's explanations, she would ask for his thoughts and impressions, then speak of those instead. — It was lamentable, but Aldebaran absolutely did not hate that time spent in futility.

Aldebaran: "Getting all carried away 'cause of that, it must be that sorta thing…"

Witch: "Hm? What is it? Did you say something just now?"

Aldebaran: "Nah, I was just thinking that despite knowing that the Authorities of Witch Factors are equivalent to pestering, for you to still create this sorta space means that there's something wrong with you, Teacher. I feel bad for Od Lagna-san."

Witch: "Ultimately, Od Lagna is nothing more than a concept. We can presume that it has nothing in the vein of emotions, nor fixations directed towards specific individuals. Well, I suppose it was my blunder for using the term "pestering", an expression which prescribes Od Lagna with a notion of personhood."

Placing a finger to her lips, the Witch sighed in a manner unbefitting of self-reflection.

Despite having listened to her words, the image of a pitiful Od Lagna crying as it glared over a space with which it could not interfere did not fade from within Aldebaran.

In reality, the act of producing another world within the world was something that could only be performed by an extraordinary being like a Witch, and the thing that made a Witch a Witch was an Authority— no, it was the key by which an Authority was manifested, a Witch Factor. For the Witch in question, without showing any diffidence, to not recognize humanity within Od Lagna, regardless of whether or not it was a conceptual entity, made him want to at least hold out a handkerchief for it to wipe its tears with. Be that as it may—

Aldebaran: “Just like Teacher, I’m part of the side doing the pestering…”

Thinking of the Authority in his possession, Aldebaran sighed as he scratched the back of his neck.

From Od Lagna’s perspective, while it went without saying for the Witch who ran counter to the rules it had laid out, the one being tutored by that Witch, Aldebaran, would have also been considered an indisputable anarchist. No matter what Aldebaran could have said to it, it would have only ever seemed like he was trying to deceive it.

For Aldebaran, acquiring his Authority had been a matter he had no say in, so he wished to be given a break from being glared at by Od Lagna, the very will of the world itself.

Witch: “But, if you are going to use that line of logic, the same goes for the rest of us. It does not happen very often that someone takes in a Witch Factor of their own volition. The only ones who fit that description would be the Valiant and the Saintess, who attempted to obtain power that defied reality.”

Aldebaran: “Don’t come out all of a sudden using keywords that catch my interest. What’s this now, Valiant? Saintess? There are people with such archetypal jobs in this world?”

Witch: “Oya, is it really so surprising? It shouldn’t be so strange for there to be a Saintess given the existence of a Witch, correct?”

Aldebaran: “In that case, there should be a Demon King given the existence of a Valiant, yet is there?”

Witch: “Hahaha, no matter how you look at it, a Demon King would be a bit too far-fetched, no?”

Aldebaran: “This doesn’t make a lick of sense…”

If a Saintess corresponded to a Witch, it should have been a Demon King that corresponded to a Valiant, but the theory of such a

Demon King existing was scoffed at, so Aldebaran's lips zipped into a frown in a grand expression of his discontent. Her smile deepening at Aldebaran's reaction, the Witch resumed with "However",

Witch: "Demon King, Demon King, hm? With how it is written, it would be a King of Evil… it would make sense for such a figure to be one who rules over Witches. If you can bend me and the other Witches into submission, it does not seem like it would be such a bad idea to proclaim yourself the Demon King."

Aldebaran: "Well, to make Teacher and the others serve me would certainly be a pretty picture straight out of a man's dreams. As long as I just close my eyes to the impossibility of such a thing~!"

Witch: "Hm, impossible, is it? —I believe otherwise."

The moment her quiet voice spoke those words, Aldebaran froze still.

With eyes framed by long lashes cast down, the Witch brought a finger to her lips in rumination, and as the unfathomably deep pool of knowledge revealed itself upon her beautiful face,

Witch: "The Witch Factors that manifest Authorities have no greater or lesser power than one another. Pride, Greed, Envy, Wrath, Lust, Gluttony, Sloth; there is no inherent superiority or inferiority among them, which holds true even for the abilities of any given Authority. Though, there are some that become obstreperous when tied to the strength of the user, like in the case of Sekhmet's Authority."

Aldebaran: "Ah, yeah, she was like the strongest Witch in generations, right?"

Witch: "There is no doubt about that evaluation. But then again, Sekhmet had major shortcomings outside of her strength which could be taken advantage of. Perhaps because of her lineage as a Giant, she was sloppy in many things."

Aldebaran: "That summarization of yours was just as sloppy… By the way, about your Authority, Teacher…?”

Witch: “It is an uninteresting Authority. —Through “Past”, “Present”, and “Future”, I can view any event I wish to. It is truly monotonous. I spoke of Witch Factors as pestering Od Lagna, but this cannot be perceived as anything but clear pestering towards myself.”

Shrugging her shoulders in lamentation, the Witch sought Aldebaran’s sympathy. But unfortunately, Aldebaran did not quite understand the Witch’s dissatisfaction.

The Witch before his eyes was a monster of curiosity, and for that reason had attained the title of the Witch of Greed. The explanation of her Authority just now could only have been seen as fitting for the Witch who was chosen by the Witch Factor of Greed due to her intense thirst for knowledge.

Witch: “Well, the matter of my boorish Authority is fine for now. More importantly, about your Authority— I believe it to be an absolute, something capable of attaining victory against all sorts of opponents, including Sekhmet.”

Aldebaran: “…”

Witch: “Oya, the look on your face appears to not believe me in the slightest. How strange.”

Aldebaran: “It’s not strange or anything of the like. In truth, I don’t believe a shred of that. Unfortunately, I don’t think you and the other Witches are such tiny hills that I could surmount them with a couple of retries, Teacher.”

To speak ill of oneself was not healthy, but he could not help saying that.

It was not as though he did not understand the Witch’s logic, but it was something akin to taking a chance that was ultimately not zero, but practically zero in essence, and deceitfully boasting that it was possible.

As two fellow living beings, if an ant fought an elephant, the chances that the ant would win were not zero, but anyone could understand that it was a chance that would not come to fruition even if given a million, no, not even ten billion attempts. Not to mention, in this case, the ant Aldebaran's opponent was not an elephant, but a dragon.

Against a dragon that could breathe fire, and soar through the skies, just how could the ant emerge victorious?

Witch: "An ant would not win, certainly. I am not saying that I have disregarded reality to that extent."

Aldebaran: "That so? Though, this space we're in, I heard it was a failed attempt at a plan to create another world, one stretched out to be the same size as the real world…"

Witch: "I am not saying that I have disregarded reality to that extent. Hence, it would be impossible for an ant."

The Witch resumed her words whilst ignoring the inconvenient criticism, causing Aldebaran to make a bitter face at her selfishness, as she continued with "but",

Witch: "What about if it was not an ant, but a dog? Do you not think it stands a better chance than the ant?"

Aldebaran: "…Well, compared to an ant…"

Witch: "Right? Or if you prefer, do you not get the feeling that the ant would have a shot of winning against a dog? That is to say, there is merely a gap between the ant and the dog that can be overturned depending on the conditions and the methods employed. Thus, if the ant can pose a threat to the dog, then it is also possible for the dog to pose a threat to the elephant."

Aldebaran: "…I'm understanding bit by bit. Teacher, what do you want to tell me?"

Placing a hand on his chin, Aldebaran responded so, and the Witch flashed a wicked smile as if to hint that he had already gotten it. — It was a gentle, pretty smile, which was precisely why its nature was something that could only be described as wicked and vile.

At the very least, whenever Aldebaran managed to draw out that smile, he would end up feeling happy.

Aldebaran: “Those methods and conditions for an ant to pose a threat to a dog, and a dog to an elephant, are what you’re teaching me, Teacher. Of course, even with those at the ready, things won’t suddenly become even between the ant and dog, or between the dog and elephant. But…”

Witch: “If the chance nearing zero can be made into one, you possess the method of turning that one into the very first one after accumulating numerous defeats.”

Aldebaran: “…”

Witch: “That is why, I shall deliberately bestow these words upon you. —There is nobody who can beat you.”

Indeed, with the Witch’s black eyes looking squarely at him, the words imparted sent a shiver through Aldebaran’s body.

The Witch’s point was layers of sophism, cobbled together from conceivable possibilities and made to sound logical; merely a sand castle of ideals constructed atop a crumbling foundation.

Under rain or wind, or perhaps the malintent of another, it would easily come crashing down, nothing more than a flash so brittle that it would seem like it had never been anything at all. Despite all that, through Aldebaran’s body, through his heart, ran a shiver.

A shiver because he wished to believe those words of the Witch—no, because he had no choice but to make those words come true.

Witch: “Judging from your demeanor, it would seem that my words have mostly resonated with you, yes?”

Aldebaran: “—. Eh, who’s to say? As a man, it’s not like I didn’t think anything of it; I guess it’s to that extent?”

Witch: “Is that so? Hm, I thought that the words I had chosen were not too shabby, but it would seem I require more diligence… Fufu, oh how luscious it is when you do not procure the results you had desired.”

Licking her thin lips, the Witch vocalized quite a sinful joy, and he averted his eyes from her. He had a reluctance to the Witch, bereft of a human heart, who could know what he was truly thinking at a mere touch.

Hence, Aldebaran would deliberately alter the direction of the conversation from what it had been a moment prior.

Aldebaran: “By the way, this is completely unrelated, but why are they called Witch Factors? From what you said, Teacher, it’s not as though Authorities can only emerge in women, yeah? There are other guys like me.”

Witch: “Ah, has that piqued your interest? Previously, I had also wondered about it and decided to investigate, but the reason was nothing too major. When Witch Factors were first perceived in this world… that is, when the first Witch was identified, all those in possession of a Factor just happened to be women.”

Aldebaran: “Just happened, by chance…”

Witch: “Supposing it was not just women, and there were also men in the mix, then they might not have been called Witch Factors, but rather Demon Factors or Evil Factors, and if it was instead only men, then they might have even been called Man-Witch Factors.”

Aldebaran: “Man-Witch Factor… that sounds so lame…!”

Were it to come to that, it would be far cooler to call them Demon King Factors. Only, in the case of Demon King Factors, there would instead be the problem of having seven of them despite being Kings.

Aldebaran: “Well, the “Demon King of Greed” or the “Demon King of Wrath” do sound a lot better. In that case I guess it wouldn’t really be weird no matter how many Kings there are…”

Witch: “Oya oya, your resolve has weakened. For you, the title of Demon King ought to have been the manifestation of a man’s dream to defeat the current Witches and bind them to his servitude, was it not?”

Aldebaran: “Don’t treat what I said in the flow of the conversation as an established fact! First of all, I could never manage dealing with the seven Witches! I’m—”

Witch: “—? You are…?”

Though it was not a tit-for-tat, Aldebaran’s words came to a halt as he lost his cool. As for what laid ahead of those halted words, the Witch enquired with an unmalicious gaze.

At the Witch’s defenceless demeanor, Aldebaran trembled—

Aldebaran: “IDIOOOT!!”

Witch: “Gyah-! O-Oww! That hurt! Why did you do that?!”

Applying pressure to her forehead, to which she had received a flick unguarded, the Witch cried out on the verge of tears. Turning his face away at the Witch’s appeal, Aldebaran firmly placed his fist to his own forehead and entered deep reflection.

Was it not that he was truly overflowing with a longing for company? This Witch, who was likely withholding a plethora of things in her heart of hearts, was causing his own heart to waver far too much. Even if it had been out of necessity, staying in the Witch’s castle for so long might have caused him to develop something in the vein of Stockholm syndrome. Or rather, there was no doubt that was the case.

Aldebaran: “Phew, got carried away there. Close call.”

Witch: “I do not think it is good when you leave me behind to produce those sorts of conclusions from time to time! When you are troubled on how to respond, you try to improve the situation by making extreme contact, and that is a bad habit! I have no memory of teaching you in such a manner!”

Aldebaran: “That’s also some extreme pride to believe your pupil would grow up exactly as you desired. Since when did you change positions from the Witch of Greed to the Witch of Pride? Though, it’d also suit you.”

Witch: “That sarcastic part of you would not be suitable for any of the Witch Factors! If it had to be one, then it seems like Tristitia would be the most fitting! How about that, do you feel displeasure?”

Aldebaran: “Rather than displeasure, I’m just surprised that you mentioned a Witch Factor I had no idea about. Huh? Aren’t there only seven Witch Factors? The evil thoughts are also included?”

Hearing the reverberation of “Tristitia” that the Witch had played as a trump card, Aldebaran received the shock that the Witch Factors he believed to be based on the seven deadly sins, were actually modelled after the original eight evil thoughts.

That instant, the Witch blinked her eyes and muttered a faint “Oops”,

Witch: “Well then, let us once again delve into the details of your Authority’s ability. The phenomenon which occurred in the midst of the trial the other day, where the subjectivity of your Territory was reversed… I would like to propose that we define those as the Victim and Aggressor of the Territory, but—”

Aldebaran: “Wait wait wait, don’t pull the wool over my eyes like that.”

Witch: “But, it is exceedingly important to thoroughly analyze events that have transpired and give names so that things can be easily classified. You must not neglect these things.”

Aldebaran: “Sure then, we can call it the Victim and Aggressor of the Territory. More importantly, the evil thoughts.”

Unexpectedly, she was zooming through an aspect of his Authority so fast that she would leave behind a trail, but Aldebaran halted the Witch, and pressed her for details.

Ultimately, Aldebaran’s objective lay in Envy, but since he had no idea what sort of irregularities might occur, he wished to avoid lacking knowledge for anything pertaining to Witch Factors.

Aldebaran: “Answer. If there’s Tristitia, then is there also Vanagloria?”

Witch: “There is, but you have no particular reason to worry. It is not our responsibility to do anything about them, and I do not wish to get involved. They are both good-for-nothings.”

Aldebaran: “That oughta be a given since nobody who’s taken in a Witch Factor is a decent person!”

Witch: “They are especially good-for-nothing. We were all discovered by our Witch Factors to become Witches. Whereas those two are different. They took in Factors of their own volition, pure aberrants reduced to Witch and Warlock.”

Aldebaran: “…”

Witch: “Whoops, allow me to amend that. Those two were not the only ones to willingly take in a Witch Factor. There is one more. — That is none other than the foe you and I share in common.”

The Witch’s utterance was quiet, however, in it Aldebaran perceived powerful emotions the opposite of silence: dark, murky hostility and hatred, anger and sorrow, likely every conceivable negative sentiment.

The simple, unacceptable aversion regarding the two evaluated as good-for-nothings was easy to understand. That she truly hated them, was clear.

However, the negative emotions directed towards the final person added on, were exceedingly complex.

Undoubtedly, it was to the extent of convincing one that love and hatred were two sides of the same coin. —And, those emotions were by no means a stranger’s affair to Aldebaran.

Witch: “Indeed. You and I are no strangers. Though we are not related by blood, we are strongly bound together. Not only because we have spent a long time together, but more fundamentally… I suppose it’s something like this. To me, you are something like a little brother.”

Aldebaran: "…"

Witch: "Hm? That expression, what is the matter?"

Aldebaran: "Nah, I was just considering the age gap. Older sister? You'd be lucky to be my great grandma, no?"

Witch: "On top of that extremely unpleasant sense of age, you have gone and instantly made us feel like strangers!"

As the Witch exploded with discontent, Aldebaran made no effort to listen.

Only, when the Witch had likened herself to an older sister, he had also felt displeasure at being treated like a younger brother.

A terribly unhealthy relationship, one in which they would never be equal, yet bound by necessity to collaborate toward a shared goal; they were by no means in a relationship as warm as that between a brother and sister.

Thinking that whilst ignoring the Witch's objections, Aldebaran pondered.

He was awfully loathe to admit it, but—

Aldebaran: "If the current mood is anything to go by, then certainly, Tristitia might have also been just perfect for me."

So he spoke.

To be continued

Volume 42

Chapters 37-49

Prologue:
A Witch's Blessing

1

???: "—There is nobody who can defeat you, who I created."

The smile of the Witch as she voiced those words appeared to be tinged with the hue of blood to Aldebaran.

As if clinging to him, as if cherishing him, as if lamenting him, as if pleading with him, as if revealing to him, as if despairing of him, the Witch gazed at Aldebaran at a proximity so close that he could feel her breathing upon him.

Her white facial features, her black irises, were things Aldebaran thought quite beautiful.

—Likely, amongst those whom Aldebaran knew, she was a contender for the first or second most beautiful.

—The combination of silver and amethyst, and the combination of white and black.

For Aldebaran, who admittedly knew nothing more than a narrow world, those were the utmost beautiful combinations of colors, and the apex of what ought to be revered the most.

2

When the shell he had challenged many times finally cracked, it felt surprisingly hollow. Aldebaran: "..."

With a clang, a black orb fell onto the tea party table. While keeping his eyes on it as it rolled, Aldebaran widened his eyes in surprise. He had seen examples of what its success was meant to look like many times, and it was something he had even been made to experience himself, but he had felt like the road to actually succeeding at it himself was long and far, as if it was a never ending series of swings and misses.

Of course, it was none other than her who had told him. He would get it eventually; he had also thought so, but—

Aldebaran: “To think when I finally got it right, it would feel this underwhelming…”

While unmistakably voicing his true feelings, Aldebaran picked up the black orb rolling on the table, and toyed with the strange sensation which felt neither cold nor warm in his palm.

He might have appeared underwhelmed, but this black orb was the apotheosis of Yin Magic—nay, this was not something that took the righteous path, rather, taking the pinnacle of heresy, it was the forbidden art, Ol Shamak. By limiting the targets for its efficacy to those possessing Witch Factors, its effectiveness was heightened to the utmost extreme; ‘twas the sole anti-Witch trump card in this world.

With Aldebaran’s acquisition of it having been prescribed as an absolute condition, it was the hyper magic he had been endeavouring towards until today.

???: “—I know that you are immersing yourself right now, but I would like for you to turn your attention back to me already.”

Aldebaran: “Woawahhh?!”

Taken aback by the sudden voice, the black orb slipped out of Aldebaran’s hand. And, as that black orb protested “Wait, wait!” it tumbled down onto the verdant grass.

Aldebaran: “Ahh, whoops. Don’t mind.”

Witch: “Your manner of speech does not seem concerned in the slightest. Come on, hurry up and pick me up.”

While answering with a “Yeah yeah”, Aldebaran hastened towards the fallen black orb. Fortunately, the grass of the plain had been trimmed quite short, so there was no worry of losing sight of the orb.

Aldebaran: “Anyway, it rolls around much more than I expected… maybe it’ll be easier for you to move around now that you’re an orb, Teacher. You wanna stay like that?”

Witch: “Do not say such frightening things. Albeit it is a forbidden art of my own development, it is far too effective against those possessing Witch Factors, so it is truly impossible to exert one’s own strength. If you have seriously lost your mind to the point of wishing to seal me away, I would have no means of resisting.”

Aldebaran: “Teacher in this state, eh?”

Witch: “Huh? Why are you muttering in a way that seems like it is even slightly possible? Scary, scary. Are you making a joke in order to drive me into a corner?”

Even though she was supposed to be a Witch who did not comprehend emotions, the fact that she was so good at acting afraid grated on his nerves.

Ignoring those sentiments of his, Aldebaran spotted the black orb that had finally come to a halt, and nimbly picking it up, he rolled it around in his hand again. —For a moment, he began to feel like he ought to keep the Witch sealed away in such a manner.

Witch: “Aldebaran?”

But, that momentary delusion was succinctly erased by a single one of the Witch’s calls.

Instead, what remained in his heart was a sense of reality that finally surged up, and the unease that accompanied it. The grand conclusion that he had always been told about, and the courage needed to grapple with that.

Aldebaran: “If you get out of here, Teacher…”

Witch: “—? What is it?”

Aldebaran: “For the most part, the preparations are in order. My Authority, the magic that was necessary, and…”

Witch: “Your growth. Indeed. —The time for that, is nigh.”

Whether she understood Aldebaran’s feelings or not, the Witch’s voice was calm.

Since she would occasionally appear childish or strangely playful, it would be easy to form a misunderstanding. She was a Witch, and her relationship with Aldebaran was naught more than sharing in a certain objective.

By no means would their hearts ever understand each other, nor would they ever treasure the other dearly, and yet.

Witch: “It would seem like you have just a bit of a misunderstanding.”

Aldebaran: “Huh?”

Caught off guard just as he was about to settle his thoughts, he let out a foolish grunt. Within Aldebaran’s hand, the black orb, having gained the will to shatter, cracked like lightning.

That which could not be shattered by any means other than Authority or Dragon Sword, was shattered by efforts not belonging to the caster—

Aldebaran: “…”

The next moment, Aldebaran looked up at the Witch who had been liberated from the black orb.

With Aldebaran sprawled out on the grassy plain, the Witch gazed at him after pushing him down. Restrained by the Witch’s black eyes from up close, Aldebaran could not muster any words.

To Aldebaran, who had fallen silent, the Witch continued.

Witch: “You have no need to feel unease. I have provided you with as much knowledge as I could, and you have managed to deal with all the challenges I had presented you with. Without even seeking insight from the words of the other Witches, yes?”

Aldebaran: “Teacher, I’m…”

Witch: “You do not need to say anything.”

A finger pressed against his trembling lips, Aldebaran was silenced by the Witch, whose facial expression shifted. The Witch’s thin lips curved into a gentle half-moon, and she displayed a smile which she had never shown him before.

As if to captivate Aldebaran’s eyes, his breath, his heart, it was a smile tinged with the hue of blood.

The Witch who ought to have possessed no colors other than white and black, now displayed the hue of blood—

Witch: “—There is nobody who can defeat you, who I created.”

The words slipped through Aldebaran’s eardrums, permeating his brain, and were seared into his soul.

Never forget, never forget, never forget; deeply engraving itself into his being was the Witch’s blessing unto Aldebaran, who had always been chasing that star until this very day.

The Witch would never speak any falsehoods. —Ergo, that was the truth. Aldebaran: “…Nobody, can defeat me.”

Witch: “Yes, that is so. I wish for you to prove that. Certainly, there is nobody who will ever attempt to extol you, but… I alone, solemnly vow to bless you from the bottom of my heart when you succeed.”

For Aldebaran, that oath was the irresistible temptation of the Witch.

There existed in this world only two people who Aldebaran wished would acknowledge his existence. Since that was something that could never be expected from one of them, he could only pray that the other one would.

Aldebaran: “I’ll win, Teacher. —So that I may be myself.”

Witch: "…"

In accordance with the Witch's expectations, Aldebaran replied so, a flame alight in his heart.

And hearing his reply, an entirely different emotion flashed through the Witch's eyes, ever smiling. As for which of the Witch's wounds that had originated from was, Aldebaran knew not.

Only, in the Witch's words, her teachings, her blessing, he believed.

Before his eyes, stood the beautiful Witch of white and black. When he closed his eyes, envisioned was the beautiful Witch of silver and amethyst.

While chasing a glaring, odiously twinkling star, Aldebaran awaited that moment.

Finally, that would be rewarded. That it would be rewarded, he believed. As if to give shape to her blessing upon Aldebaran and his courageousness, the Witch's lips fell upon Aldebaran's forehead.

Feeling within the sensation of those lips a wish that seemed as if the Witch was clinging to it, the Following Star whispered.

Aldebaran: "—I, no matter what, will definitely kill you."

Vic.ll20

Chapter 37: Mindset

1

???: “—Subaru-sama and Beatrice-sama have fallen into the hands of the man calling himself Aldebaran. Bitter regret. Currently, countermeasures are being taken to deal with that person, with Emilia-sama taking charge. Report.”

Indeed, after receiving Clind’s report, which arrived using the Authority of Tristitia, Roswaal found himself shaken by the gap between his rational acceptance of what had happened and the difficulty of accepting it emotionally.

Their location was the Barielle mansion—the estate that Priscilla Barielle inherited from her late husband, Leip Barielle, and which had become masterless once more after her death. Currently, Roswaal, accompanied by Priscilla’s servant Schult, was visiting this place after being separated from Emilia and the others.

Clind appeared and brought the report to a room in the mansion.

—Frankly speaking, Roswaal was not at all delighted with Subaru’s suggestion to take the grieving Al to the Pleiades Watchtower.

It required a protracted amount of time to find and secure Subaru, who had been transported to the Vollachian Empire. —Rem had also been transported there, but Roswaal did not indulge in self-deception. Roswaal’s goal was to bring Subaru back, and Rem’s safety was secondary.

Of course, everyone in the camp was happy that Rem had returned, but they could not be optimistic considering the time that had been squandered. They had to start working immediately to make up for the delay in the necessary measures to be taken for the Royal Selection. —It was just then that Subaru came to consult with them about going to the Pleiades Watchtower.

What should be given top priority? Roswaal tried to persuade Subaru from such a perspective, but he was unable to change his mind, and in the end, Subaru's proposal was approved.

Nonetheless, Subaru's decision was not entirely without merit.

???: "Please, please, I humbly request, you handle Al-sama…"

And the one who said that, bowing their slightly curly pink crown of hair, was Schult, Priscilla Barielle's servant and loyal vassal who had been carefully protected by her.

Though still a child, Schult was astute and determined to be strong. Despite the enormous shock of Priscilla's death, he desperately tried to support himself with his own delicate legs, determined not to dishonor the name of his late master. Schult was also close to Al and had been deeply concerned about his trauma.

Subaru's consideration for Al went a long way in winning Schult's trust.

Making a favorable impression on Schult and earning the gratitude of the Emilia Camp would be a huge advantage in the upcoming Royal Selection—particularly in dealing with the now vacant Barielle Domain.

When the Royal Selection began, Emilia and Priscilla became rivals, but they came to respect each other through mutual acceptance and became close friends. When Priscilla passed away, Emilia took on her legacy and supported the people of the Barielle Domain who had been under her protection. —Schult, who was deeply loved by Priscilla, was essential to this.

Emilia also promised that she "wanted to be friends with Priscilla after the Royal Selection," so some embellishment was just artistic license.

Hence, Roswaal reluctantly sent Subaru and the others to the Pleiades Watchtower and chose to accompany Schult back to the Barielle Domain. —However, that had been a mistake.

???: "Subaru-sama and the others… Then, what about Garf? What happened to Garf? Garf went with them to protect Subaru-sama and the others!"

Clind: "Unfortunately, Garfiel was defeated by Aldebaran's schemes and suffered serious injuries. He fainted. We had hoped that the effects of the Divine Protection of Earth Spirits would take effect, but… the fact that he was injured in the Augria Sand Dunes, a region filled with miasma, proved harmful, and its effects were less than expected. Weak."

???: "Garf…"

As Roswaal pondered, Frederica, who had accompanied him to the Barielle Domain, overheard Clind talking about Garfiel's condition while he was with Subaru and the others, and looked down in regret.

Her expression did not show disappointment or dismay at Garfiel's failure to fulfill his expected role, but rather a deep sense of relief at being alive and concern for what hardships he faced.

Roswaal was also relieved that Garfiel was alive, but—

Roswaal: "…I don't understaaand~. Al-dono's strength is nowhere near Garfiel's. Of course, Garfiel's mind still has a lot of room for improvement, so it's possible that he was attacked mentally and his opponent took advantage of that weakneeess~."

Frederica: "…With Garf, that is the most likely explanation. He is so gentle-hearted."

Clind: "Kindness is not something to be condemned for. Even if it is for disciplining oneself, there is no need to choose harsh words deliberately. Highlight."

Frederica: "You are always like this whenever this sort of thing comes up…"

In response to Clind's thoughtful words, Frederica gritted her fangs with a complicated expression.

Their relationship began more than ten years ago, when Frederica left the Sanctuary and began working for Roswaal, but the rift that opened up between them was difficult to reconcile.

At first, Frederica looked up to Clind like an older brother and followed him around, calling him “Nii-sama, Nii-sama” at all times. However, when Frederica started to grow taller, their relationship changed completely.

Roswaal, who knew the circumstances, showed understanding toward Clind in what caused the issue, but Frederica, who was suddenly pushed away, was not convinced. Because of that, she had continued to harbor an intense disdain for him like a poisonous snake or a scorpion, and it was hard to express anything about it.

In any case—

Roswaal: “Clind, judging from your attitude, I guess there was a situation where Garfiel could not be blamed… What haaappened~?”

Clind: “—. The husk of the Divine Dragon Volcanica has joined Aldebaran. In response, the Sword Saint, Reinhard van Astrea-sama, has already set out to subdue it. Expedient.”

Frederica: “—Hk. Sword Saint-sama? But if that is the case…”

Roswaal: “Unbelievable, Al-dono defeated even Reinhard-kun?”

Clind: “To be precise, it would be more accurate to say that they have been constrained. Correction. In addition, various problems are repeatedly emerging in the Royal Capital. Master, we urgently request your assistance. Proposal.”

At Clind’s words, Roswaal narrowed his eyes and sank deep into thought.

Frederica’s emerald-green eyes were wide open with shock, staring, unable to process the overwhelming torrent of information, and Roswaal shared the same thoughts, more or less. The difference between her and him was that while she was understandably dumbfounded by the deluge of information, even though he was feeling the same, Roswaal still had a choice to make.

In other words, would this not be the appropriate time to fulfill his promise with Subaru?

Roswaal: "…"

Before Subaru was officially knighted, after the situation surrounding the Sanctuary had settled, Roswaal told Subaru his thoughts and stance.

If Natsuki Subaru vowed to continue picking up all the pieces, Roswaal would resolve to take measures to make him start over if he ever were to lose anything in the future. That meant burning everything he did not wish to lose and the subsequent abandoning of the world in which his subjective self currently lived.

Roswaal: "With Priscilla-sama, it was a tricky decision."

It was difficult to decide whether or not to include Priscilla in what Subaru considered to be "everything".

However, Roswaal decided that the death of Priscilla, a preeminent political rival, would be a tailwind for Emilia, who wanted to win the Royal Selection, and therefore decided that her death was not covered by the Contract. —Furthermore, he did not think that Priscilla's death, based on what he knew, should be overturned.

Priscilla Barielle's death was the result of her own choices.

Unless the individual was indispensable to Roswaal's objectives, he would not deny that choice.

—But Subaru's current situation appeared to be dire.

According to Clind, it would seem that there had been no severe casualties, but considering Al's situation, it was only a matter of time before something happened. If something was going to happen sooner or later, then Subaru should be made to start anew, given how things were progressing.

If it were required to do so, Roswaal would do it.

However—

Roswaal: "—Beatrice."

Roswaal held a glimmer of hope for Beatrice, who had been taken captive alongside Subaru.

It was not because Beatrice was a Great Spirit who had mastered the Yin attribute, nor because she was an unparalleled being created by Echidna, the Witch of Greed, the greatest magician of the world, nor because she would protect Subaru with her strong feelings of determination and resolve as his Contracted Spirit.

For Roswaal, it was an extremely perplexing and difficult emotion to process, but there was no basis for it.

Roswaal wanted to believe in Beatrice, he could not help but feel that way.

???: "—Margrave-sama, I most graciously ask for your help."

It was not Frederica or Clind who spoke.

Schult, who had been present in the mansion's reception room at the meeting to discuss the future of the Barielle Domain, interjected.

When Clind appeared after using Compression to teleport, Schult repeatedly exclaimed, "Huh?" and "Ah!" in surprise at his report. But now, the child who had just spoken to Roswaal appeared to have lost much of his previous weakness—no, it had been completely hidden.

People would call that hidden, untouchable mask either courage or determination.

Schult: "I apologize on behalf of Al-sama for what he has done. Furthermore, I implore you not to allow Al-sama to do any further harmful behavior."

Frederica: "Schult-sama…"

Schult: "I will be fine. Everyone at the mansion will help for Priscilla-sama's sake… so please, I beg you!"

Schult bowed his head deeply, and Frederica looked at Schult's trembling shoulders, then turned her gaze to Roswaal. In her eyes, there was a plea for him to accept Schult's wish, and a desire to help him, but—

Roswaal: "If I'm to act upon Schult-kun's wishes to the fullest, we can't leave Frederica behind. Especially if Al-dono has the Divine Dragon with hiiim~."

Frederica: "Master, what do you mean by that…?"

Clind: "—I will tend to that. Volunteer."

Frederica frowned, perplexed about her connection to the Divine Dragon, but before she could ask for an answer to her doubts, Clind spoke up.

Frederica found herself confused by what he meant, but Roswaal was not. Clind's words had a meaning beyond their surface meaning.

Clind thought that no matter how many words he used, Roswaal would not change his decision. Seeing Roswaal's gaze, Clind slightly relaxed his lips and spoke.

Clind: "I was captivated by a soul so dazzling that I was moved to no longer be a bystander. Jealousy."

So he spoke.

2

???: "—This guy, it seems like he's able ta go back ta time gone by. But, it don't seem ta go very far back, though."

???: "…"

As soon as those words left Rom-jii's mouth, the room was swept over by a silence that contained all the various conceived thoughts in that moment.

Emilia's beautiful, gem-like eyes opened wide, while Rem's eyes, sparkling like the surface of a clear lake, blinked rapidly.

Meanwhile, it was not hard to tell that Ram was clearly puzzled, as Meili tilted her head while playing with her braids,

Meili: “I don’t really get what you’re saying at all~.”

She muttered an impression similar to Emilia’s.

If Clind had been there, someone might have been able to react more calmly to Rom-jii’s report, but Clind, who had just brought Rem and Ram, had been requested to meet Roswaal and the others, so they could not see his response.

Still, not having to hear that topic whilst Roswaal was present alongside the others might have been a blessing in disguise.

???: “Turning back time, that’s…”

“Subaru”: “—Return by Death.”

“Subaru” muttered those words, folding his arms, as Petra’s voice faintly trembled beside him.

Petra looked up at him at those words, and had no room left within to let her heart flutter at her beloved for having reached the same conclusion she had.

